T. N. THE TRANSLATOR TO THE READER.

Ood Reader, here is now offered you the fourth time printed in English, M. Calvin's book of the Institution of Christian Religion, a book of great labour to the author, and of great profit to the Church of God. M. Calvin first wrote it when he was a young man, a book of small volume, and since that season he hath at sundry times published it with new encreses, still professing at every edition himself to be one of those qui scribendo proficium, & proficiendo scribunt, which with their writing do grow in profiting, & with their profiting do proceede in writing. At length having in many his other works trancated about exposition of sundry books of the Scripture, & in the same finding occasion to discorse of sundry common places & matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occasions of the text that were offered him & not in any other methode, were not so ready for the readers use, he therefore enred into this purpose, to enlarge this book of Institutions, & therein to treat of all those places & common places largely, with this intent, that whensoever any occasion fell in his other books to treat of any such cause, he would not newly amplify his books of Commentaries and expositions therewith, but referre his reader wholly to this storehouse & treasure of that sort of divine learning. At age and weakness grew upon him, so hastened his labour, and according to his petition to God, he in manner ended his life with his worke, for he lived not long after. So great a jewel was meete to be made most beneficial, that is so say, applied to most common use. Therefore in the very beginning of the Queen's Majesties most blessed reigne, I translated it out of Latine into English, for the commoditie of the church of Christ, at the speciall request of my deare friends of worthy memory Reginald Wolfe and Edward Wchichurch, the one her Mairesies Printer for the Hebrew, Greeke, & Latine tongues, the other her Highnes Printer of the books of common Prayer. I performed my worke in the house of my faide friends Edward Wchichurch, a man well known of upright hearts and dealing, an ancient excellent Gospeller, as plaine and true a friende as ever I knew living, and as desirous to do any thing to common good, specially by the aduancement of true religion. At my saide first edition of this book, I considered how the author thereof had of long time purposely labored to write the same most exactly, and to pack great plente of matter in small room of wordes, yea and those so circumjuxtapos'd and precisely ordered, to avoyde the cabalations of such, as for entitie to the truth therein contained, would gladly seeke and abuse all advantages which might be found by any oversight in penning of it, that the sentences were thereby become so full as nothing might well be added with out idle superfluity, & againe so nicely pared that nothing could be minisled without taking away some necessarie substance of matter therein expressed. This manner of writing, besides the peculiar teares and figures, & the difficulty of the matters themselves, being through out enterlaced with the schoolemen controversie, made a great hardnes in the authors owne booke, in that tongue wherein otherwise he is both plentifull and easie, eafe in so much that is suffifeth not to read him once, unless you can be content to read it in mine. This consideration encombr'd me with great doubtings for the whole order and frame of my translation. If I should follow the words, I saw that of necessity the hardness in the translation must needs be greater than was in the tongue wherein it was originally written. If I should leave the course of words, and grant my selfe liberty after the natural manner of my owne tongue, so far that in English which I conceived to be his meaning in Latine, I plainly perceived how hardly I might escape error, and on the other side in this matter of faith and religion, how previous it was to err. For I durst not presume so warrant my selfe to have his meaning without his words. And they that note what it is to translate well and faithfully, specially in matters of religion, doe knowe that not the onely grammatical construction of words suffifeth but the very building and order to observe all advantages of semeence or grace, by placing or accent of words, maketh much to the true setting forth of a writer's minde. In the ende, I rest upon this determination, so follow the words so near as the phrase of the English tongue would suffer me. Which purpose I so performed, that if the English bookes were printed in such paper & letter as the Latine is, it should not exceed the Latine in quantity. Whereby, beside all other commodities that a faithful translation of so good a work may bring, this one benefite is moreover provid'd for such as are desirous to attain some knowledge of the Latine tongue (which is at this time to be writ in many of those men for whose profession this book was fully sernch'd) that they shall not finde any more English than shall suffice to confine the Latine wished, except in such few places, where the great difference of the phrases of the languages enforc'd me: so that comparing the one with the other, they shall both proff in good matter, and furnish themselves with understanding of that speech, wherein the greatest treasures of knowledge are disclosed. In the doing hereof, I did not only trust mine owne wit or abilitie, but examined my whole doing from sentence to sentence throughout the whole book with conference and one looking of such learned men, as my translation being allowed by their judgment, I did both satisfy mine owne conscience that I had done truly, and their approoving of it might be a good warrant to the reader, that nothing should herein be deliver'd but sound, unmingle'd and uncorrupt'd doctrine, such as the author himselfe had first fram'd it. All that I wrote, the grace, learned and vertuous man Mr. David Whitehead (whom I name with honorable remembrance) did among others, compare with the Latine, examining every sentence throughout the whole book. Befide all this, I principally required many, and generally all men with whom I ever had any talk of this matter, that if they found any thing either not truly translated, or not plainly Englished, they would enforce me thereof, promising either to satisfy them or to amend it. Since which time I have not been adversif'd by any man of any thing which they would require to be alter'd. Neither had I my selfe, by reason of my profession being otherwise occupied, any leisure to peruse it. And that is the case, why not only at the second and third time but also at this impression, you have no change at all in the work, but altogether as it was before. In deede I perceived many men well minded and studious of this book, so require a table for their safer and furtherance. They bennif deire I have fulfilled in the second edition, and have added thereunto a plentiful table, which is also here inserted which I have translated one of the Latine, wherein the principal matters discours'd in this book are named by their due titles in order of Alphabets, & under every title is set forth a brie& summe of the whole doctrine taught in this booke, concerning the matter belonging to that title or common place: and therewith is added the Booke, Chapter, & Section or division of the Chapter, where the same doctrine is more largely expressed & proved. And for the reader finding thereof, I have added the number of the Chapters to be set upon every leaf in the booke, and quoted the Sections also by their due numbers with the small figures of Algolism. And now at this last publishing, my friends by whose charge it is now newly imprinted in a Roman letter & smaller volume, with diverse other Tables, which since my second edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be translated and here added for your benefit. Moreover, whereas in the first edition the end of my scribling hande, the enterling of my Copy, and some other causes well known among workemen of that faculty, made very many faults to passe the Printer, I have in the second impression caused the booke to be composed by the printed copy, and corrected by the written: whereby it must needs be that it was much more truly done than the other was, as I myselfe do know above three hundred faults amended. And now at this last Printing, the composing after a printed copy brings in some ease, and the diligence used about the correction, having bene right faithfullly looked unto, it cannot be but much more truly set forth. This also is performed, that the volume being smaller, with a letter fayre and legible, it is of more easie price, that it may be of more common use, and so to more large communicating of so great a treasure to those that desire Christian knowledge for instruction of their faith, & guiding of their duties. Thus on the printers behalf and mine, your ease and commodite (good Readers) is provided for. Now resteth your owne diligence for your owne profit in studying it. To spend many words in commending the work it selfe, were needlesst; yet thus much I think I may both not untruly and not vainly say, that though many great learned men have written booke of common places of our religion, as Melanchthon, Sarcevins, and other, whose works are very good and profitable to the Church of God, yet by the confessing judgement of those that understand the same, there is none to be compared to this work of Caluine, both for his substantial sufficiency of doctrine, the sound declaration of truth in articles of our religion, the large and learned confirmation of the same, and the most deep and strong contention of all oldes & new heretiqes: so that (the holy Scriptures excepted) this is one of the most profitable booke for all students of Christian divinitie. Wherein (good Readers) as I am glad for the glory of God, and for your benefit, that you may have this profite of my trauel, so I beseech you lest we have this use of your gentlenesse, that my doings may be construed to such good end as I have meant them: & that if any thing mistake you by reason of hardnes, or any other cause that may seeme to be my default, you will not forsooth condemne the worke, but read it after: in which doing you will finde (as many have confessed to me that they have found by experience) that those things which at the first reading that displease you for hardnes, shall be found so easie as so hard matter would suffer, & for the most part more easie than some other phraze which should with greater loosenes & smoother sliding away deceive your understanding. I confess indeed it is not finely & pleasantly written, nor carieth with it such delicate full grace of speech as some great wise men have bestowed upon some solitary things: yet it containeth sound truths set forth with faithful plainnes without wrong done to the authors meaning: and so if you accept and use it, you shall not fail to have great profite thereby, and I that think my labour very well employed,

TO THE MOST MIGHTY
AND NOBLE PRINCE, FRANCISCE
THE MOST CHRISTIAN KING THE French King his soueraigne Lord, John Caluine witheth peace and sal-uation in Christ.

WHEN I did first set my hande to this worke, I thought noting lesse (most noble King) than to write any thing that afterward should be presented to your maestie. Onely my minde was to teache certaine introductions, whereby they that are touched with some zeale of religion might be instructed to true godlinesse. And this travaile I tooke princi-ally for my contriemen the Frenchmen, of whom I understood very many to hunger and thirst for Christ, but I sawe very fewe that had rightly reduced so much as any little knowledge of him. And this was my meaning, the boke it selfe declareth, being framed after a simple and plaine maner of reaching. But when I perceived, that the furious rage of some wicked men hath so faire prevailed in your realme, that in it there is no roune for sound document: I thought I should do a thing worth my travaile, all in one worke both to give an inftruction for them, & to declare a confession to you: whereby ye may learne what manner of doctrine that is, against which those nurious men burned in so great rage, who at this day trouble your realme with swordes and fier. For I wil not feare to confess, that I haue in this worke coprehended in manner the summe of that selfe same doctrine, against which they cry out, that it ought to be punished with prisonement, banishment, codemnation without judgement, and with fier, that it ought to be chaced a-away by land and sea. I knowe in deede with how hainous informations they haue fill'd your minde and eares, to make our cause most hatefull vnto you: but this of your clemencie ought you to wey, if ther shall be no innocencse, neither in wordes nor deedes, if it may be enough to accuse. Truely if any, to bring the same in hatred, shall allege that this Doctrine whereof I nowe go about to yeeld account vnto you, hath beene long ago condemned by co-ten of all degrees, and attented by many judgements already given in judicial courts: all that he sayth shal amount to no more but that it hath partily bin violently thrown downe by the banding and power of the aduersaries thereof, and partly beene traiterously and fraudulently oppresed with their lies and little practises and scelnders. Herein is violence shewed, that without hearing the caufe, blody sentences are pronounced against it: herein is fraude, that it is without deffering accused of sedition and cuni.
And that none may thinke that we wrongfully complaine of these things, you your selfe can beare vs witness, moost noble king, with how lieng scel-ders it is dayly accused vnto you: as, that it tendeth to no other end but to writh from kings their scepters out of their handes, to throwe downe all judges seates and judgements, to subucite all orders and civil governments, to trouble the peace and quiet of the people, to abolish all laws, to vnde all proprieties and possessions, finally to turn all things vpside downe. And yet you heare the smallest portion. For horrible things they spread abroad amongst the people: which if they were true, the whole worlde might worthily judge it with the maintaineers thereof, worthy of a thousand fiers and gallows. Who can now maruell that a common hatred is kindled against it, where such most wrongfull accusations are beleuened? Lo, this is the caufe y all degrees agree & conspire to the condemning of vs & our doctrine. They that fit to judge, being rauished with this affection pronounce for sentences their foreconceived determinations which they brought from home with them: and thinke that they have well enough discharged their duties, if they command no man to be drawn to execution, but such as are found guilty either by their owne confession or by sufficient witnesse. But of what fault? of that condemned doctrine, say they. But by what lawe condemned? Herein should have stand the succor of defence for them, not to deny the doctrine it selfe, but to maintaine it for true. But here is all libertie once to mutter, ytterly cut off from vs.
To the French King.

Wherefore I doe not vnuniuely require, most victorious King, that it may please you to take into your own hand the whole hearing of the cause which hitherto hath bene troublesomel handled or rather carelesly tosled without all order of lawe, more by outrageous heat than judicall gratuiety. Neither yet thinke, that I here goe about to make mine owne private defense, whereby I may procure to my selfe a safe returne into my natuie contrie, to which although I beare such affection of natural loathing as becommeth me: yet as the case now is, I not miscontentedly want it. But I take vpon me the common cause of all the godly, yea and the caufe of Christ himselfe, which at this day hauing bene by all meanes torne & troden downe in your kingdom, lieth as it were in dispaired case, and that in deede rather by the tyrannie of certeine Pharisians, than by your owne knowledge. But howe that cometh to passe, it is not here needfull to tell: truely it lieth in great diffires.

For thus farre have the vngodly preuailed, that the truth of Christ, if it be not destroyed being chafed away and scattered abroad, yet it lieth hidden as buried and vnregarded: as for the silly poore Church, it is either wafted with cruel slaughters, and so driven away with banishments, or dismayed with threats & terrours, that it dare not once open her mouth. And yet stil they continue with such rage & fiercenes as they are wont, thwarting strongly against the wall already bending & the runne which the eluys hate made. In the meane time no man steppeth forth, to set him selfe in defense against such furies. And they, if there be any such, that will most of all seeme to fawe the truth, say no more but that it were good to pardon the error and vnskilfulness of ignorant men. For thus the good natured men forsooth do speake, calling that error & vnskilfulness which they know to be the most certaine truth of God: calling them ignorant men, whose wit they see that Christ hath not so despited but that he hath vouchesfated to communicate to them the mysteries of his heavenly wisedom. So much are all ashamed of the Gospel. It shalbe your office (most noble King) not to turne away shall not onely be no Christians, but also no men? For though some of them doe plenteously glut themselves, & other some live with gnawing of poore crustes; yet they liue all of one pot, which without these warming helpes should not onely waxe cold, but also thoroughlie freeze. Therefore howe much more every of the is carefull for his belly, so much more earnest warrier he is for their faith. Finally they all endeavor themselves to this, to kepe still either both kingdom safe, & their belly full: but of pure zeale none of them sheweth any token, be it nother so little. Neither yet so do they cease to laudour our doctrine, and by al the colours that they can, to accuse and defame it, whereby they may bring it into hatred or suspicé. They calit new, & lately forged:they caull that it is doubtfull, & vncertaine: they demande by what miracles it is confirmed: they aske whether it be meete that it shold preuaile against the consent of so many holy Fathers, and the moit auncient custome: they presse vpon vs to confesse it to be schismatical, which mouth warre against the Church, or that the Church hath lien dead in many ages in which no such thing hath beene heard of. Lat of all they say, that there neede no arguments, for (say they) it may by the frutes be judged of what fort it is, namely which hath brede so huge a heape of fectes,so many turnoiles of seditions, so great licentiousnesse of vices. Truly full easie it is for them, to triumph vpon a forfaken caufe before the light beleeuing and ignorant multitude. But if we might also have our turne likewise allowed vs to speake, verily this sharpe heate would sone be cooled wherewith they do so with full mouth and as licentioufly as vnpunishedly some against vs.

First,whereas they call it newe, they do great wrong to God, whose holy word deserveth not to be accused of newnesse. To them in deede I nothing doubt that it is new, to whom Christ is newe, and his Gospel is new. But they which knewe that preaching of Paul to be olde, that Jesus Christe died for our finnes, and rofe againe for ourjustification, shal finde nothing newe among vs. Whereas it hath long lien hidden vnknownen, and buried: that is the fault of the vnGodlines of men. Nowe sith it is by the bountifulnesse of God restor'd to vs, it ought at least by right of full restitution to receive againe the title of auncientie.

Out of the fame fountaine of ignorance springeth this, that they take it for doubstull and uncertaine. This verily is it which the Lord by his Prophet complaineth, that the oxe knewe his owne, and the ass his maisters stool, but his people knewe not him. But howsoever they mocke at the uncertainty of it: if they were druen to seale their owne doctrine with their owne bloud, & with losse of their life, men might see how much they set by it. But farre other is our affiance, which dreadeth neither the terrors of death, nor yet the very judgement scare of God.

Whereas they require miracles of vs, they deale vreasonably with vs. For we cyme no new Gospel, but hold fast the felie same Gospel for confirming of the truth whereof all the miracles doe ferue that euery Christ and his Apostles haue done. But this thing they haue speciall aboute vs, that they can cume to this day confrme their faith with continuall miracles. Yea but rather they alledge miracles, which may weaken a minde otherwise well stabli-

They are so either trifling and worthy to be laughed at, or vaine and lying. And yet, although they were never so monstrous, they ought not to have been of any value against the word of God: forasmuch as the name of God ought both in every place & at every time to be hallowed, whether it be by miracles or by natural order of things. This false colour might para- adventurous have made the better shewe, if the Scripture did not informe vs of the lawful end and vs of miracles. For, Marketh that the signes which followed the preaching of the Apostles were set forth for the confirming of it: Likewise Luke alfo faith that the Lord did beare witnesse to his word of his grace, when signes and wonders were shewed by the handes of the A- ppostles. Wherwith wholly agreeeth that saying of the Apostle, that when the Gospell was preached, veneration was confirmed by this, that the Lord did beare witnesse to it with signes, and wonders, and diuerse powers. But those things which we heare to be the dealings of the Gospell, shall we turne to the destroying of the credit of the Gospell? those things which are appointed only to stablifh the true, shall we apply to confirming of lies? Therefore it is meete that the doctrine, which (as the Evangelist faith) goeth before miracles, be first examined and tried. If that be allowed, then it may lawfully take confirmation of miracles. But of a true doctrine, this is the marke, if it tende not to the seeking of the glory of men, but of God. Sith Christ affirmeth this to be the prooue of doctrine, miracles are wrongfullie esteemed which are drawn to any other ende than to glorifie his name of God alone. And we ought to remember that Satan hath his mirac- les, which although they be juggling deceites rather than true powers, yet are such as may deceite the ignorant & vnskilful. Magicians & enchanters haue bin alway famous in miracles: wonderfull miracles have nourished i- dolatrie, which ye doe not proue to vs, that the superstitition of Magicians and idolaters is lawfull. And with this battling ramme in olde time the Donatiftes did shake the simplicitie of the common people, for that they excel- led in miracles. Therefore we doe nowe make the same answer to our ad- versaries, which Augustine then made to the Donatiftes: that the Lord hath made vs were against such miracle workers, when he foretold that there should come false prophets, which with lying signes and diuerse wonders, should, if it were possible, bring the elect into errour. And Paul hath given warning that the kingdom of Antichrist should be with all power, & signes, and lying wonders. But these miracles (fay they) are done not of idols, not of forserers, not of false prophets, but of the Saintes. As though we knewe not that this is the craft of Satan, to tranfigure himselfe into an Angell of light. In olde time the, Egyptians worshipp Redimy which was buried a- mong them, with sacrifices and other divine honors. Did not they abuse the holy Prophet of God to idolatry? And yet by such worshipping of his tombe, they obtained that they thought the healing of the stinging of the serpent to be the iust reward thereof. What shall we say: but that this hath bin and euer shall be the most iust vengeance of God, to send strength of illusion to them that haue not receivd the loue of truth, that they may beleue lying? Therefore we want not miracles, and those certaine, and not subject to cau- lations.
The Preface

As for miracles which they bring forth for themselves, they are mere illusions of Satan, forasmuch as they lead away the people from the true worshipping of their God to vanity.

Moreover, they do slanderously set the Fathers against us (I mean the ancient Fathers & the writers of my age as yet more uncorrupted) as though they had them for maintainers of their ungodliness: by whose authority the debate were to be ended, the better part of the victory (to speak even most modestly) would bend to our side. But whereas many things have been excellently well & wisely written of those Fathers, & in some things, that hath happened to them which is wont to happen to men: these good natural children forsooth, according to the rightness that they have, both of wit, judgement, and minde, do worship only their faultes and errors: & those things which are well spoken, they either marque not, or faine as if they knew them not, or do corrupt them: so as a man may say that their care was altogether to gather dunge in of the golde of the Fathers. Then they oppresse vs with importunare cryeing out against vs, as despliers and enemies of the Fathers. But we do so not despise them, that if it were the matter of my present purpose, I could very easily prove by their consenting voices, the greater parte of these things that we say at this day. But we so reade their writings, that we always remember, that all things are ours, to serve vs, not to have dominion ouer vs: and that we are Christes alone, whom wee must obey in all things without exception. Who so kepth not this choice, shall haue nothing certaine in religion: forasmuch as those holy men were ignorant of many things, do oftentimes strue one with another, yea and sometimes fight with themselves. Not without cause (say they) we are warned of Solomon, that we passe not the olde bounds which our Fathers haue set. But there is not all one rule in the bounding of fieldes, and the obedience of faith, which ought to be so framed that it forget her people & the house of her Father. If they have so great delite to vs allegrories, why do they not rather expounde the Apostles, than any other, to be their Fathers, whose appointed bounds it is not lawfull to pluckle vs: for so did Hierom expounde it, whose words they haue registred among their Canons. But if they will haue the bounds of the same Fathers, whom they meane, to be stedfastly kept: why do they, so oft as they lift, to licentioues passe them? Of theumber of the Fathers were they, of whom the one saide, that our God eateth not, nor drinke: and that before he needeth neither cuppes nor dittes: the other said, y the holy things require not golde, and that those things pleafe not with golde which are not bought with golde. Therefore they passe the bounde, which are in the holy things somuch delited with golde, silver, jorrie, marble, precious stones and filkes, and thinke that God is not rightly worshipped, vnlesse altogether they be disolutely set out with exquisite gorgeousines, or rather with outrageous excesse. A Father was he, which said, y he therefore did freely eate flesh on the day in which other abstained, because he was a Christian. Therefore they passe the boundes, when they accuse the soule that eatte flesh in Lent. Fathers were they, of whom the one said y a Monke which laboureth not not with his handes, is judged as euill as a violent taker, or (if you wil) a robber: The other said, that it is not lawfull for Monkes to liue of other mens goods, although they be continually busied in contemplations, in prayers, in study. This bounde also they haue pasted, when they placed the idle and barrel bellies of Monks in stews and brothel houses to be fatted with other mens substance. A Father was he, which saide, that it is a horrible abomination to see any image painted, either of Christ or of any Saint in the temples of Christians. Neither was this pronounced by the mouth of one man alone, but also decreed by an Ecclesiastiicall Councell, that that which is worshipped should not be painted on walles. They are farre from holding themselves within these boundes, when they leave not one corner without images. An other Father counsell'd, that having done the dutie of natural kindenesse toward the dead in burying them, we should let them rest. These boundes they brake, when they cast into men a continuall carefullnesse of the dead. One of the Fathers was he, which testifieth that the substance of bread and wine in the sacrament of the Supper so remaineth and ceaseth not, as in the Lord Christ remaineth the substance and nature of man ioyned with the substance of God. Therefore they passe measure, which faie that after the words of the Lord rehearsed, the substance of bread and wine ceaseth, that it may be transfermblante into his holy and bloud. Fathers were they which as they deliuered to the whole Church but one Sacrament of Thanksgiving, and as they debarred from it wicked and hainous euill doers: so did greuously condemne all those which being present, did not communicate of it. How farre haue they removed those boundes, when they fill not only Churches, but also private houses with their maffes, and admet all men to looke vpon them, and every man so much more gladly as hee more largely payeth, howe vncleane and wicked fo ever they be; but allure no man to faith in Christ and faithfull communicating of the Sacraments: yea rather doe boastingly set out to sale their owne worke for the grace and merite of Christ? Fathers were they, of whom the one decreed, that they should be altogether debarred from the holy Supper of Christ, which holding themselves contented with partaking of the one kindle, abstained from the other: And the other Father stoutly maintaineth, that to the chri- tians people the bloud of the Lord ought not to be denied, for the confession whereof they are commanded to shedde their owne bloud. These boundes also they haue taken away, when they haue by an inviolable lawe commanded the felde same thing which the one of these Fathers punished with excommunication, and the other reprobated with a strong reaason. A Father was he, which affirmed it to be rashnes to determine any thing of a doubtfull matter on the one side or the other, without cleare and evident witnesses of the Scripture. This bounde they forght, when they established so many constitutions, so many canons, so many mafterly determinations, without any word of God. A Father was he, which among other heresies reproched Montanus with this, that he was the first that had charged men with lawes of fasting. This bound also they haue farre pasted, when they commanded fasting with most straight lawes. A Father was he, which denied that marriage ought to be forbidden to ministers of the Church, and pronounced a man lying with his owne wife to be chaste: and Fathers were they, which agreed to his authoritie. Beyond these bounds haue they gone, when they flcurely enjoyed unmarried life to their sacrificers, A Father was he which judged, that onely Christ ought to be hearde, of whom it is said, Heare him; and that we ought not to haue regard, what other men which were before vs, haue tayde or done, but what Christ (which is the first of all) hath commanded. This bounde neither do they appoint to themselves, nor do suffer other to haue it appointed them, when they set both overt themselves & other any maisters whatsoever they be, rather than Christ. A Father was he, which affirmed that Church ought not to set it selфе before Christ, because he alway judged truely: but the judges of the Church, as men, are commonly deceived. They breaking through this bound also, stitch not to affirme that the whole authority of the Scripture, hangeth upon the awardment of the Church. All the Fathers haue with one heart accursed, and with one mouth pronounced it abominable, that the holy word of God should be entangled with the subtilites of Sophisters, & brawlings of Logitians. Do they holde themselves within these boundes, when they goe about nothing else in their whole life, but with endless strifes, & more than Sophistical brawlings to wrap & encombre the simplicitie of the Scripture? So that if the Fathers were now raised to life againe, & should heare such an art of brawling, which these men cal Speculatiae Divinitie, they would beleue that nothing leffe is done than any dissipation had of God. But my talke should spread it selffe beyond due boundes, if I would reckne vp how boldly these men shake of the yoke of the Fathers, whose obedient children they would seeme to be. Truely both monethes & yeares would be too little for me. And yet they are of so extreme and desperate shamelesnesse, that they dare blame vs for that we stitch not to passe the auncient boundes.

But now whereas they call vs to custome, they nothing preuaile. For we should be most vniustly dealt with, if we should be driven to yelid to custom. Truely if the judgemenet of men were right, Custome should be taken of the good. But it oftentimes happeneth that men doe otherwise. For, that which is seene to be done of many, by and by obtayned the right of a Custome. But the state of men hath scarceily at any time bin in so good case, that the better things pleased the greater number. Therefore for the most part of the priuate vices of many hath bin made a publike error, or rather a common consent of vices, which now these good men would haue to stand for a lawe. Who so haue eyes do se that not only one sea of euils hath overflowed, many poysnonous pestilences have inundated the world, that all things runne headlong to ruine; so that either the matters of men must be more despered, or we must lay hande vnto, or rather vs violence vpon so great euils. And remedy is by no other reason driven away, but because we haue now long time accustomed vs to euils. But be it that publike error haue place in matters of common weale: yet in the kingdome of God his onely truthe is to be hearde and regarded, to which by no succeeding course of yeares, by no custome, by no conspired agreement, may any prescription be limi-limited. So in olde time Esay taught the electe of God, that they should not say Conspiring, to all things in which the people saide Conspiring: that is to say, that they should not conspire together to the wicked agreement of the people, nor should feare and dread the peoples feare: but rather that they should sanctifie the Lorde of hostes, and he should be their feare and dread. Now therefore let them as much as they lift object against vs both passed and present ages, if we sanctifie the Lord of hostes, we wil not be much afraid. For whether it be manie ages have consented to like vngodlines, he is strong to take vengeance to the third & fourth generation: or if the whole world together conspire into one selfe fame wickednes, he hath by experience taught what is the end of them that offend with y multitude, when he did with a generall overflowing destroy the whole kinde of men, preserving Noe with a small househولد, which shoulde by his faith being but one man condemne the whole worlde. Finally an evil custome, is none other than a common pestilence, in which they do notwithstanding dye that die with company of a multitude. Moreover they ought to have considered that which Cyprian faith in certaine places, that they which sinne by ignorance, although they cannot cleare themselues from all fault, ye may seeme after some maner excutable: but who so obstinatly refuse y truth offred by the grace of God, they have nothing to pretend for their excuse.

As for their double horned argument, they doe not drinke vs to so hard a straights with it, to compel vs to confesse, that either the Church hath lyen dead a certaine time, or that we have controverse se against the Church. Truly the Church of Christ hath liued & shall liue so long as Christ shall reigne at the right hande of the Father: by whose hande she is vpholde, by whose succour she is defended, by whose power the keepeth her saerie. For he will vndoubtedly performe that which hee hath once promisde, that he will be present with his euene vntill the ending of the world. Against it now we haue no warre at all. For we do with one consent together with all the people of the faithful honor and worship the one God and Christ the Lorde, in like sort as he hath alway beene worshipped of all the godlie. But they themselves not a little way erre from the truth, when they acknowledge no Church, but which they fee with present eie, and go about to compasse it about with those bounds in which it is not enclosed. Vpon these points hacth our controverse: first that they affirme that the forme of the Church is alway appearing and to be seene; then, that they set the same forme in the see of the Church of Rome, & in the order of their prelats. We on the contrary side affirme, both that the Church may consist of no appearing forme, and that the forme it selfe is not contained in that outward shining shewe, which they foolishly haue in admiration, but hath a far other mark, namely the pure preaching of the word of God, and the right ministracion of Sacraments. They are in a rage, in lesse the Church may be alwayes pointed out with a finger. But how oft happened it in the people of the Iewes to be so deformed, that there appeared no forme at all? What forme thinke we to haue shined, when Helias bewailed that he alone was left? How long since the comming of Christ hath it lien hidden without forme? How since that time hath hath it bene so oppressed with warres, seditions, and heresies, that it shined out on no side? If they had liue'd at that time, woulde they have beleued that there was any Church? But it was sayde to Helias, that there were preferred seven thousand men, which had not bowed their knee before Baal. Neither ought it to be doubtfull to vs but that Christ hath alway reigned in earth since he ascended into heauen. But if the godly had then sought any discernable forme with their eyes, should they not by and by have bin discouraged? And verly Hylarir accounted it even already in his time for a most great fault, that being occupied with the foolish admiration of the dignitie of Bishops, they markted not a deadly pestilence lurking vnder that vi-for. For thus he sayth: One thing I warne you, beware of Antichrist: for you are all taken with the love of wals: ye do ill worship the Church of God in houses and buildinges vnder them ye do ill thirst in the name of Peace. It is doubtfull that in those Antichrist shall sitte? Mountains and woods, and lakes, and prisons, and caues are safer for me. For in these the Prophets, when they were either abiding or thrown into them, did prophesie. But what doth the world at this day honour in his horned Bishops, but that it thinketh them to be holy prelates of religion, whom it feeth to be heads ouer great cities? Away therefore with such foolish esteeming. But rather let vs leave this to the Lord, forasmuch as he alone knoweth who be his, and sometime also taketh away from the fight of men the owrward knowledge of his Church. That is (I graunt) a horrible vengeance of God vpon the earth. But if the wickednes of men so defere, why doe we seek to with-stand the just vengeance of God? In such wise the Lord hath in times past taken vengeance of the vnhankfulnesse of men. For because they would not receive his truth, and had quenched his light, he suffred them being blinded in senfe, both to be mocked with lyes full of absurditie, and to bee drowned in deepe darkenes, so that there was no face of the true Church to be vseen. Yet in the meane time he saued his both being scattered abroad and lying hidden in the midst of errors and darknesse, from destruction. And no maruell. For he can skil to saue both in the very confusion of Babylon, and in the flame of the burning ouen. But whereas they would haue the forme of the Church to be judged by I wote not what vaine pom-pous shew: howe perilous that is, I will rather point out vno than declare, leaft I should drawe out my tale into infinite length. The Pope (say they) which holdeth the Apostolike see, and the Bishops that are annointed and con-secrate by him, so that they be trimm'd with fillets and miters, doe repre-sent the Church, and ought to be taken for the Church: and therefore they can not erre. How so? because they are pastors of the church, & consecrate to the Lord. And were not Aaron and the other rulers of Israell also Pastors? But Aaron and his sonsnes after that they were made priests, did yet erre when they made the calfe. After this reafon, why should not the foure hundred Prophets which lyed to Ahab, have represented the Church? But the Church was on Michesas side, being indeede but one man alone, and vn-regarded, but out of whose mouth came truth. Did not the falfe prophets in resemb ance beare both the name and face of the Church, when they did

with one violent assault rife vp against Jeremie, and with threatening boasted that it was not possible that the lawe should perishe from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, the word from the Prophet? Jeremie alone was sent against the whole company of the Prophetes, to declare from the Lord, that it should come to passe, that the lawe should perish from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, and the word from the Prophet. Did not such a glistering shew shine in that Councel which the Bishops, Scribes, and Pharifees assembled, to take aduises together for the killing of Christ? Now let them goe and sticke fast in the outward vifour, that they may make Christ and all the Prophetes of God, schismatikes: and on the other side make the ministers of Satan, the instruments of the holy Ghost. If they speake as they thinke, let them faithfully answere me, in what nation & place they thinke that the Church remained since the time by the decree of the Councell at Basile, Eugenius was thout downe and deprivd from the estate of pope, and Aymee set in his place. They can not, though they would burst for it, deny that the Councell, for so much as concerneth outward solemnities, was lawfull, and summoned not only of one Pope, but of two. Eugenius was there condemned of schisme, rebellio, and obstinacie, with the whole flocke of Cardinals and Bishops, which had with him practifed the desolution of the Councell. Yet afterward being borne vp by the fauour of Princes, he recovered his papacy safe againe. That election of Aymee, which had bin orderly made by the authoritie of a generall and holy Synode, vanished away in a smoke: sauing that he himselfe was appeased with a Cardinals hat, as it were a barking dog with a pece of bread cast vnto him. Out of the bofome of these heretikes, rebels, and obstinates, are proceed all the Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, Abbots and priestes that haue bin since. Here they are taken and can goe no further. For, to whether side will they giue the name of the Church? Wil they deny that the Councell was generall, which wanted nothing to the outward majestie: namely, which being solemnely summoned by two bulles, and well framed in the order of all things, continued in the same dignity to the last ende? Wil they confesse Eugenius with all his company a schismatike, by whom they are all sanctified? Therefore either let them otherwise define the forme of the Church, or they all as many as are of them shame of vs accouunted schismatikes, which wittingly and willingly haue bin orderd of heretikes. If it had never before bin knowne, y the Church is not bound to outward pomps, they themselves may be to vs a large prooe, which vnder that glorious title of the Church haue so long so proudly boasted themselues, whereas yet they were the deadly pestilences of the Church. I speake not of their maners, and those tragi-cal doings wherwith their whole life swarmed full: because they say that they be the Pharifees which are to be heard, not to be followed. But if ye will spare some of your leasure to read our writings, you shall plainly know that the very doctrine, the doctrine it selfe, for the which they say that they be the church is a deadly butchery of soules, the firebrand, ruine, and destruction of the Church.

Finally they doe not vprightly enough, when they do spitefully rehearfe

howe great troubles, vprores, and contentions the preaching of our doctrine hath drawne with it, & what fruits it now beareth in many. For the blame of these evils is unworthily laide vpon it, which ought rather to haue bin imputed to the malice of Satan. This is as it were a certaine naturall propertie of the word of God, that whensoever it riseth vp, Satan is neuer quiet or sleeping. This is the most sure and most trustie mark, whereby it is discerned from lying doctrines, which doe easilie shew forth themselves when they are receiued with favourable cares of men, and are heard of world rejoicing at them. So in certaine ages past, when all things were drownned in deepe darkness, the Lord of this world made a sport and a play in manner of all men, and lay idle and tooke his pleasure like a certaine Sardanapalus in founde peace. For, what should he els doe but laugh and play being in quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdom? But when light shineth from above somewhat scattered abrode his darkness, when strong man troubled & assailed his kingdom, then he began to shake off his wonted drowndnes, & haftily to arme himself. And first he stirred the force of men, whereby he might violently oppresse &truthe beginning to shine. By which when he nothing prevailed, he turned to subtile entrappings. He stirred vprores & dilagements of doctrines by his Catabaptists, & other monstrous lewde men, whereby he might darken it and at length utterly quench it. And nowe he continueth to assaile it with both engines. For he traueileth both by the force and power of men to plucke vp that seede, and with his darnell (as much as in him lieth) to choke it, that it may not growe and beare fruit. But all this he doth in vaine, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his craftes vnto vs, that he should not take vs vnware, and hath armed vs with sufficient defences against all his engines. But how great malicioussines is it to lay vpon the worde of God, the hatred either of vprores, which noughty & rebellious men doe stirre vp, or of the sectes which deceivers doe raise against it? Yet it is no newe example. Elias was asked whether it were not he that troubled Israel. Christ was esteemed of the lewes a seditious man. The Apostles were accuced of making a commotion among the people. What other thing doe they which at this day doe father vpon vs all the troubles, vprores and contentions that boyle vp against vs? But what is to be answered to such, Elias hath taught vs: namely that it is not we that scatter errors or stirre vp vprores: but it is they themselves that wraaffle against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to bear backe their rashnes, so againe we ought to meete with the weaknesses of other, who oftentimes happen to be moved with such offences, and in their dismaying to waue. But let them, to the ende that they may not faint with this dismaying and be discouraged, know that the Apostles in their time felte by experience the same things that nowe happen vnto vs. There were unlearned and vnstedfast men, which wretst to their owne destruction, those things that Paul had written by the inspiration of God, as Peter faith. There were dispersers of God, which when they heard that sinne abounded to the end that grace might more abound, by & by objected, We will then abide in sinne, that grace may abound. When they heard that the faithfaithfull are not vnder the lawe, they by and by answered, We wil then sin, because we are not vnder the law, but vnder grace. There were that accused him as an exhorter to cull. There entred priuily many false Apostles to destroy the churches which he had builded. Some by enuy and contention, and not purely, yea and maliciously preached the Gospel, thinking to add more affliction to his banandes. Somewhere the Gospel not much profited. All fought their owne, and not the things of Iesus Christ. Some went backward, dogges to their vomit, and swine to their wallowing in the mire. The most part did draw the liberty of the Spirit to the licentioufnes of the fleshe. Many brethren crept in, by whose there came afterward great dangers to the godly. Among the brethren themselves were many strifes raised vp. What should the Apostles have done in this case? Should they not either have dissembled for a time, or rather altogether have gluen ouer and forsaken the Gospel, which they sawe to be ye seedplot of so many contentions, the matter of so many dangers, the occasion of so many offences? No. But for help in such diffcrees this came in their minde that Christ is the stone of stumbling and rocke of offence, set vnto the ruine and rising againe of many, and for a signe that should be spoken against. With which affiance they being armed, went forward boldly through al dangers of vprores & offences. With ye fame thought we also ought to be vpholden, for asmuch as Paul teftifieth that this is the perpetual propertie of ye Gospel, to be the favor of death vnto death to them that perish, although it were ordained to this end, that it should be the favor of life vnto life, and the power of God vnto the falvation of the faithfull; which verily we should also feele, if we did not with our vnhankfullnes corrupt this so singular a benifte of God, and turne that to our owne defitution which ought to haue bin to vs the onely defence of our faticke.

But now I returne to you, my soueraigne Lord. Let those false reportes nothing move you, by which our aduersaries travel to caft you in feare of vs, with saying that by this newe Gospel (for so they call it) nothing is hunted for and sought but in occaion of seditions, and vnpunished libertie of vices. For our God is not the author of diuision, but of peace: and the sonne of God is not the minifter of sinne, which came to destroy all the workes of the Diuell. And wee are unworthy accused of such desires, whereof wee never gaine any fuppition were it neuer so small. It is likely that wee forsooth doe practize the overthrowing of kingdomes, of whom there hath neuer beene heard any one seditious worde, whose life hath ever beene knowne quiet and simple, when wee liued vnder you, and which nowe beeing chaced from home, yet ceafe not to pray for all thinges prosperous to you and your kingdome. It is likely forsooth that we hunt for licentioufnesse of vices, in whose behauiours although many thinges may be found faulty, yet there is nothing worthy of so great reproaching: neither have we with so ill successe (by the grace of God) profited in the Gospel, but that our life may bee to these backbyters an examplar of chastifie, liberality, mercy, temperance, patience, modesty, & whatsoever other vertue. Verily it is by the profe of selfevident y we do vsnaignedly feare and worship God, forasmuch as we desire that his name be halowed both by our life and our death, and enuie it selfe is compelled to beare of some of vs a witness of innocenc and caule vprightnesse, in whom this one-ly thing was punished with death, which ought to haue bin accounted for a singuler praiie. But if any ynder pretence of the Gospell doe stirre vp tu-multes (as hither to it hath not bin founde that there haue bin any such in your Realm) if any pretende the libertie of the grace of God to defend the licentiousnesse of their vices (of which fort I haue knowne many) there bee lawes and penalties of lawes, by which they may according to their desertnings be sharply punished: yet so that in the meane time the Gospell of God be not quill spoken of for the wickednes of naughty men. Thus haue you (O King) the venamous unjustice of the slaunderers largely enough declared, that you may not with an care of too caufie believe bende to their reports. I feare me alio leaft it be too largely set out, for asmuch as this preface is in a maner come to the quantitie of a whole booke of defence,whereby I intended not to make a defense indeede, but onely to mollifie your minde aforeshand to give audience to the disclosing of our caufe: which your minde, though it be now turned away and estranged from vs, yea and enflamed against vs, yet we trueth that we shalbe able to recover the fauour thereof, if you shall once haue without displeasure and troublous affection red ouer this our confeffion, which we will to bee in stead of a defense for vs to your maiestie. But if the whisperinges of the malicious doe so posseffe your cares, that there is no place for accused men to speake for them fclues: and if those outrageous furies doe still with your winking at them, exercise crueltie with prifoning, tormenting, cutting and burning: we shallindeede, as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, be brought to al extremities, yet so that in our patience we shall posseffe our soules, and waite for the strong hande of the Lorde: which shall without doubt bee present in time, and stretch foorth it selfe armed, both to deliver the poore out of afflaction, and to take vengeance on the dispisers, which nowe triumph with so great assurednesse.

The Lord the King of Kingses stablishe your throne with righteous-

JOHN CALVINE TO THE READER.

T he first setting out of this worke, because I did not looke for that success, which the Lord of his unmeasurable goodness hath given, I had (as men use to doe in small worke) for the more part lightly passed it over. But when I understood that it was received with that favor of all the godly, which I never durst have desired, much lese have hoped for: as I verily felt in my heart, that much more was given to me than I had deserved, so I thought it should be a great unthankfulness if I should not at the least after my slender abilities endeavor to answer so favorable affections toward me, and which of them selves provoked my diligence. And this I attempted not only in the second setting forth of it: but howe of since that time, the worke hath bin imprinted, so of hath it bin enriched with some increase. But although I did not then repent me of the labor that I had employed: yet I never held my selfe contented till it was disposed into that order which is now set before you. Now I trust I have given you that which may be allowed by all your judgements. Truely with how great endeavor I have applied my selfe to the doing of this service to the Church of God, I may bring forth for an evident witness, that this last winter, when I thought that the seuer Quarante had summoned me to death, how much more the sicknes enforced upon me, so much lesse I spared my selfe, till I might leaue this booke to overleue me, which might make some part of thankfulness recompence to so gentle provoking of the godly. I had rather in deede it had bin done soone: but it is soone enough if well enough. And I shal then thynke that it is come abroade in good season, when I shal perceive that it hath brought yet more plentiful fruits than it hath done heretofore to the Church of God. This is my onely desire. And truely full ill it were with me, if I did not, holding my selfe contented with the allowance of God alone, despite the judgements of men, whether they be the foolish and sordid judgements of the unskilful, or the wrongfull and malicious of the wicked. For although God hath throughly setted my minde to the endonor both of enlarging his kingdom, and of helping the common profit: and though I am cleare in mine owne conscience, and have him selfe and the Angels to witnesse with me, that since I tooke upon me the office of a teacher in the Church, I have seded to none other purpose but that I might profit the Church in maintaining the pure doctrine of godlines: yet I thinke there is no man, that hath bin snatcht at, listen, and torn in sunder with more slanders than I. When my epistle was now in printing, I was certainly informed that at Angibrugh where th' assembly of the states of the Empire was holden, there was a rumor spread abroad of my revolving to the Papacie, and
To the Reader.

The same was more greedily received in the courses of Princes than was meete. This forsooth is their thankfulness, who are not ignorant of many trialls had of my steadfastnes, which trialls as they shake off so smile a scandal, so they shoulde with all indifferent and gentle judges have defended me from is. But the Dispel with his whole course is deceived if in oppressing with filthy lies, he thinke that by his unjust dealing I shalbe either the more discouraged or made the leefe diligent; because I trust that the Lord of his unmeasurable goodnes will grant me that I may wish even sufferance continue in the course of his holy calling. Whereof I give to the godly readers a new proffed in this setting forth of this booke. Now in this truell this was my purpose so to prepare and furnish them that be studious of holy Divinitie to the reading of the word of God, that they may both have an easie entrie into it, & go forward in it without stumbling: for I think that I have in all points so knit up together the summe of religion, and disposed the same in such order, that whatsoever shall well have it in mind, it shall not be hard for him to determine both what hee ought chiefly to secke in the Scripture: and so what marke to apply whatsoever is contained in it. Therefore, this as it were a way being once made plaine, if I shal hereafter set forth any expostion of Scripture, because I shal not neede to enter into long disputations of articles of doctrine, and to wander out into common places: I will alwaye knit them up shortly. By this meanes the godly reader shalbe eased of great paine and seditions, so that he come furnish'd beforehand with the knowledge of this present worke as with a necessary instrument. But because the intent of this purpose, doth clearely as in mirrors appeare in so many commentaries of mine, I had rather to declare indeede what it is, than to set it out in wordes. Fare well friendly Reader, and if shal receinne any fruite of my labors, helpe me with thy prayers to God our Father.

THE FIRST BOOKE
OF THE INSTITUTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION,
which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator.

The first Chapter.

That the knowledge of God, and of our selves, are things consigned: and how they be linked the one with the other.

All whole summe in a manner of all our wisdom, which conly ought to be accompted true and perfect wisdom, consisteth in two partes, that is to say, the knowledge of God, & of our selves. But whereas these two knowledges be with many bondes linked together: yet whether goeth before or engendreth the other, it is hard to dicerne.

For first no man can looke vpon himselfe, but he must needs by and by turne all his senses to the beholding of God, in whome he liueth & is moued: because it is plain, that those gifts wherewith we be indued, are not of our selves, yet even that that we haue being is nothing els but an offence in the one God. Finally, by these good things that are as by dropmeale powred into vs from heauen, we are led as it were by certein stremes to the spring head. And so by our owne needinesse, better appeareth that infinte plentie of good things that abideth in God. Specially that miserable ruine, whereunto the fall of the first man hath thrown vs, compelleth vs to lift up our eyes, not onely being foodedles and hungry, to crave from thence that which we lacke, but also being awakened with feare, to learne humility.
For as there is found in man a certeine world of all miferies, & since we haue bene spoyled of the divine apparell, our shamefull nakednesse discloseth an infinite liape of filthy disgracements: it must needs be that every man be pricked with knowledge in conscience of his owne vnhappinesse to make him come at ye least vnto some knowledge of God. So by the understanding of our ignorance, vanitie, beggerie, weakness, perrterfences, and corruption, we learne to reknowledge that no where else but in the Lord abideth the ture light of wisdome, found vertue, perfect abundance, of all good things, and puritie of righteousnes. And so by our owne ends we are stirred to con-der the good things of God: and we cannot ernestly aspire toward him, untill we beginne to mislike our selves. For of all men what one is there, that would not willingly rest in him selfe? yea who doth not rest, solong as he noweth not himselfe, that is to say, solong as he is contented with his owne giftes, and ignorant or vnmindfull of his owne mifery? Therefore every man is by the knowledge of himselfe, not onely pricked forward to secke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him.

1 Againe it is certeine, that man neuer commeth vnto ye true knowledge of
of himselfe vnlesse he hath first beholde the face of God, and from beholding therof do descencd to looke into himselfe. For (such is the pride that is naturally planted in vs) we alway thinke our selues righteous, innocens, wise and holy, yntill that with manifeast proues we be convinced of our vnrighteousnesse, filthines, solie and vnclennes. But we are not convinced thereof, if we looke vpon our selues only, and not vpon God alfo, who is the only rule whereby this judgement ought to be tryed. For because we are naturally inclined to hypocrisy, therefore a certaine vaine resemblance of righteousness doth abundantly content vs in stead of righteousness in deed. And because there appeareth nothing among vs, nor about vs, y is not defiled with much filthines, therefore that which is somewhat leffle filthy pleath vs as though it were most pure, & long as we holde our selues within the bounds of mans vnclennes. Like as the eye that is vfed to see nothing but blacke, thinke thinke that to be pure white, which yet is but darkish white, or browne. Yea, we may yet more plainly discerne by our bodily sense how much we are blinded in considering the powers of the foule. For if at midday we either looke downe vpon the ground, or behold those things that round about ly open before our eyes, then we thinke our selues to have very affured and piercing force of sight; but when we looke vp to the sunne, and behold it with fixt eyes, then that same sharpnesse that was of great force vpon the ground, is with so great brightness by and by dafted and confounded, that we are compelled to confesse the same sharp sight which we had in considering earthly things, when it commeth to the sunne, is but mere dunnes. Even so commeth it to passe in weyng our spiritual good things. For while we looke no further than the earth, & long being well contented with our owne righteousness, wisedome and strength, we do sweetely flatter our selues, and thinke vs in manner halfe gods. But if wee once beginne to raife vp our thought vnto God, and to wey what a one he is, and howe exact is the perfection of his righteousness, wisedome and power, after the rule whereof we ought to be framed: then that which before did please vs in our selues with false pretence of righteousnesse, shall become lothsome to vs as greatest wickedness: then that which did maruellously deceyse vs under colour of wisedome, shall stink before vs as extreme folly: then which did beare the face of strength, shall be proued to be most miserable weaknesses. So flenderly doth y which in vs seemeth even most perfect, answer in proportion to the purenes of God.

3 Hereof proceedeth that trembling & amasednes, wherewith the scripture in manie places reciteth that the holy men were stricken & astonished so oft as they perceived the presence of God. For when we see y they which in his absence did stand affured & unmoved, so sone as he disclosed his glory, begin so to quake and are so dismaid, y they fall downe, yea are swalowed vp, & in matter as destroyed with feare of death: it is to be gathered therby that man is never sufficiently touched & inwardly moved with knowledge of his owne basenes, vntil he have compared himselfe to y majestic of God. But of such dismaying we have often examples both in the judges & in y Prophets: so that this was a common saying among the people of God: We shall dye because the Lorde hath appeared vnto vs. And therefore the history of Iob, to throwen men down with knowledge of their owne folly, weaknes, and vn-cleannes, bringeth alway his principall proove from describing Gods wisdom, strength & clennes. And that not without cause. For we see how Abraham, the meret that he came to behold the glorie of God, the better acknowledg'd himselfe to be earth and dust. We see how Elias could not abide to tary his comming to him with vncovered face: so terrible is the beholding of him. And what may man do that is but corruption and a worme, when euell the Cherubins for very feare must hide their faces? Euen this is it that the Prophet Esay speakes of: The Sunne shall bluss, and the Moone shalbe ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall raigne, that is to say, when he displayeth his brightnes, and bringeth it nearer to sight, then in comparison thereof the brightest thing of all shal be darkened. But howsoever the knowledge of God and of our felues, are with mutuell knot linked together, yet the order of right teaching requireth that first we intreate of the knowledge of God, & after come downe to speake of the knowledge of our felues.

Vvhat it is to knowe God, and to what end rendeth the knowledge of him.

I Meane by the knowledge of God, not only that knowledge, whereby we conceiue that there is some God, but also that, whereby we elarne so much as behoueth vs to know of him, and as is profitable for his glory, finally so much as is expedient. For, to speake properly, we can not lay that God is known where there is no religion nor godlinesse. But here I doe not yet touch that special kind of knowledge whereby those men that are in themselves reprobate and accursed do conceiue God the redeemer in Christ the mediator: but I speake only of the first and simple maner of knowledge, whereby the very order of nature would haue led vs, if Adam had continued in state of innocencie. For although no man, in thkinke is in this ruine, can perceiue God to be eyther a father, or author of saluation, or in any wise fauourable, vnles Christ come as a meane to pacifie him toward vs: yet it is one thing to seele that God our maker doth by his power sustaine vs, by his prouidence goure vs, by his goodnes nourish vs, and endue vs with all kindes of blessings: and another thing to embrace the grace of reconciliacion offered vs in Christ. Whereas therefore the Lord first simply appeareth as well by the making of the world, as by the generall doctrine of the scripture, to be the Creator, and then in the face of Christ to be the redeemer: hereupon arise two sortes of knowing him, of which the former is now to be intreated of, and then the other shal orderly follow in the place fit for it. For although our mind cannot conceiue how knowledge of God, but how it must gue to him some kind of worship, yet shal it not be sufficient simply to know that it is he only that ought to be honored & worshipp'd of all men, vnles we be also perswaded that he is the fountaine of all good things, to the end that we should seeke for no thing elsewhere but in him. I meane hereby, not onely for that as he hath once created this worlde, so by his infinite power he sustayneth it, by his wisedome he governeth it, by his goodnes he preserueth it,

and specially mankind he ruleth by his righteousness & judgement, suffereth by his mercy, and sauguardeth by his defence: but also because there can no where be found any one drop either of wisdom, or of light, or of righteousness, or of power, or of vprightnes, or of sincere truth, which floweth not from him, or whereof he is not the cause: to this end verely, that we should learne to looke for & crave all these thinges at his hand, & with thanksgiving account them receiv'd of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to vs a mere scholemaster of godlines, out of which springeth religion: Godlines I call a reverence of God joined with loute of him which is procured by knowledge of his benefites. For men wilt neuer with willing obedience submit themselves to God, untill they perceive that they owe all things to him, that they are nourished by his fatherly care, that he is to them the author of all good things, so that nothing is to be sought elsewhere than in him. Yea they will neuer yeld themselves true & with all their hart wholly to him, vnles they assuredly beleue that in him is perfect felicitie reposed for them.

2 Therefore they do but trifie with vaine speculations, which in entreatyng of this question, do make it their purpose to discusse, what thing God is, where it rather behoueth vs to know what maner one he is, & what agreeeth with his nature. For to what end serueth it to confesse as Epicure doth, that there is a God which doth onely delight him selfe with idlenesse, having no care of the world? Finally, what profiteth it to know such a God with whom we may haue nothing to do? But rather the knowledge of him ought to serve to this end, first to frame vs to feare and reverence: then that by it guiding and teaching vs, we may learne to crave all good things at his hand, and to account them receiv'd of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy mind, but that thou must therewithall by & by thinke, that forasmuch as thou art his creature, therefore thou art of right subject & bound to his authority, that thou oweft him thy life, thy whatsoever thou entertainest, whatsoever thou doest, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truely it followeth that thy life is perverely corrupted if be not framed to obeying of him, forasmuch as his will ought to be our law to live by. Againe, if not cleereLy see him, but that thou must needes know that he is the fountaine and originall of all good thinges, whereupon should growe both a desire to cleare vnto him, and an assured trust in him; if mans owne corruptnes did not drawe his minde from the right searching of him. For first of all, the godly mind doth not as by a dreame imagine to her selfe any God at adventure, but stedfastly beholdeth the onely one and true God: and doeth not falsely forge of him whatsoever her selfe liketh, but is content to beleue him to be such a one as he discloseth himselfe, & doth alway with great diligence beware that with presumptuous rashnesse she passe not beyond his will, and so wander out of the way. And when she doth knoweth him, because she understandeth that he governeth all thinges, she assuredly trueth that he is her faire keeper and defender, and therefore wholly committeth her selfe to his faith, because she understandeth that he is the author of all good thinges; therefore if any thing trouble her, or if she want any thing, by & by she flyeth to him for succour, looking for helpe at his hand. Because she is perswaded
God the Creator.

1. Becaufe he is good and merciful, therefore with assured confidence hee resteth on him, and doubteth not in all her euils to find ready remedie in his mercifull kindneffe. Because she knoweth him to be her Lord & father, therefore she determineth that he is worthy that she should in all things have regard to his authoritie, reverence his majestie, procure the aduancement of his glory, and obey his commaundements. Because she seeth that he is a righteous judge, and armed with his utteritie to punish sinners, therefore she alway setteth his judgement seate before her eyes, & with feare of him withdraweth and restraineth her selfe from prowoking his wrath. Yet is she not so affraide with the seeing of his judgement, that she would conuert her selfe from it, although there were a way open to escape it: but rather shee doeth no leffe love him, whyle she extendeth vengeance vpon the wicked, than while he is beneficall to the godly, forasmuch as the understandeth that it doth no leffe belong to his glorie that he hath in store punishment for the wicked and cuill doers, than that he hath reward of eternall life for the righteous. Moreover shee doeth not for only feare of punishment refrain her selfe from sinning: but because shee loueth and reverenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoureth him as her Lorde, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet shes dreadeth his onely displeasure. Nowe beholde what is the pure and true religion, euen faith joyned with an earnest feare of God: so that feare may conteine in it a willing reverence, & drawe with it a righte forme of worshipping such as is appoynted in the lawe. And this is the more heedefullie to be noted, because al men generally do worship God, but fewe do reverence him, while ech where is great pompous fhewe in ceremonies, but the purenes of heart is rare to be found.

2. Truely, they that judge rightly, will alway hold this for certaine, that there is grauent in the minds of men a certaine feeling of Godhead, which never can be blotted out. Yea that this persuasion, that there is a God, is euen from their generation naturally planted in them, and deeply rooted within their bones, the very obstinacie of the wicked is a substantiall witness, which with their furious struing yet can neuer winde themselues out of the feare of God. Although Dirigores and such other doe jest and laugh at all that hath in all ages bene beleued concerning religion: although Dionysius doe scofte at the heavenly judgement: yet is it but a laughter from the teeth forward, because inwardly the worme of conscience gnaweth them much more sharply then al hot fearing iron. I allege not this Cicerov faith, that errors by continuance of time growe out of vse, & religion daily more & more encreaseth & waxeth better. For the world (as a little hereafter we shall haue occasion to shew) traueleth as much as in it lieth to shake off all knowledge of God, & by al meanes to corrupt the worshipping of him. But this only I say, that when the dul hardnes, which the wicked doe desirously labour to get to despise God withall, doeth lye pyningly in their heartes, yet the same feeling of God, which they would most of all desire to haue utterly destroyed, lyeet still, and sometime dooth vter it selfe: whereby we gather that it is no such doctrine as is first to be learned in scholes, but such a one whereof every man is a teache to himselfe even from his mothers wombe, and such
The third Chapter.

That the knowledge of God is natural and planted in the mindes of men.

We holde it out of controversy, that there is in the mind of man, even by naturall instinction, a certaine feeling of the Godhead. For to the end that no man should flee to the pretence of ignorance, God himself hath planted in all men a certaine understanding of his diuine majesty: the remembrance whereof, with povering in now and then as it were newe droppes, he continually reneweth: that when all, not one excepted, do know that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all be condemned by their owne testimonie, for that they have not both worshipped him, and dedicated their life to his will. But truely if the not knowing of God be any where to be found, it is likely that there can no where else be any example of it more than among the grossest sorts of peoples & fardest from civill order of humanitie. But (as the heathen man faith) there is no nation so barbarous, no kinde of people so fauage, in whom resteth not this persuasion that there is a God. And euery that in other partes of their life seeme very little to differ from brute beasts; yet do continually kepe a certaine seede of religion. So thoroughlie hath this common principle possest all mens mindes, and so fast it sticketh within all mens bowels. Sith then from the beginning of the world there hath bin no coutrie, no Citty, yea no house, that cold be without religion; in this is emplied a certaine secret confession, that a feeling of the Godhead is written in the hearts of al men. Yea & idolatrie it selfe is a substantiall prove of this persuasion. For we know how unwillingly man abased himselfe to honor other creatures aboue himselfe. Therefore when he had rather worship a blocke and a stone, than he would be thought to haue no God, it appeareth that this imprinted persuasion of God is of most great force, which is impossible to be rased out of his minde of man, that it is much more easie to haue the affection of nature broken, as in deed it is broken when man from his owne naturall swelling pride of his owne will floueth downe.
downe eu'en to the basest creatures to honor God.

2. Wherefore it is most vaine which some do say, that religion was devis'd by the suttellie and craft of a fewe, by this policie, to keepe the simple people in awe, whereas they themselves that procured other to worship God, beleued nothing lesse than that there was any God at all. I grant in deede that suttell men haue inuented many things in religion, whereby to bring the people to a reverence, and cast them in a feare, to make their mindes the more pliable to obedience: But this they could never have brought to passe, vnlesse the mindes of men had bene already before hande persuaded that there was a God, out of which persuation as out of seede springeth that ready inclination to religion. Neither is it likely that eu'n they which suttellly deceiued the simple sorte with colour of religion, were them selues altogether without knowledge of God. For though in times past there haue bene some, and at this day there arise vp many, that denie that there is any God: yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes seele that which they are defirous not to know. We reade of none that euer did break forthe into more presumptuous and unbridled deſpifing of God, than Caius Caligula: yet none more miserably trembled when any token of Gods wrath appeared. And so against his will he quaked for feare of him whom of willful purpose he endeauoured to deſpife. And the fame may a man commonly fee to happen to such as he was. For the bolder deſpiser of God that any man is, the more is he troubled at the very noyce of the falling of a leafe. And whence commeth that, but from the reuengement of Gods maieſtie, which doth so much the more vehemently strike their {confinces as they more labor to flee away from it? They do in deede looke about for all the starting holes that may be, to hide them selues from the presence of the Lord: but whether they will or no, they are still holde[n] fast yedd. For howsoever sometime it seemeth to vanishe away for a momet, yet it oft returneth againe, and with newe assault doth runne vpon them: so that the rest which they haue, if they haue any at all, from torment of conscience, is much like to the sleepe of drunkards or frantike men, which eu'n while they sleepe do not quietly rest, because they are at euery moment vexed with horrible & dредfull dreames. Therefore the very vn-gody themselves sere for an example to prove that there alway liueth in all mens mindes some knowledge of God.

That the same knowledge is either choked, or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

But as experience teacheth that God hath sowed seede of religion in all men, so scarcely may be found the hundreth man, that having it conceiued in his heart doth cherish it, but no man in whom it ripened, so far is it of that any frute appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that some become vnaine in their owne superfluities, or that some doe of set purpose maliciously revolt from God; yet all doe runne out of kinde from the true knowledge of him. So cometh it to passe that there remaineth no true godliνesſe in the worlde. But whereas I sayd that some by error fall into superstition,
Cap. 4. Of the knowledge of

... by nature, I meane not thereby as though their simplicitie might excuse them from blame, because the blindnessse that they haue, is commonly alway mingled both with proude vanitie, and with stubbornesse. Vanitie and the same ioyned with pride appeareth in this, that they miserable men both in the seeking of God do not climbe above themselves as they ought to have done, but measure him according to the proportion of their owne fleshly dullness, and also neglecting the bound manner of searching for him, do curiously fly to vaine speculations. And so they conceive him not such a one as he offereth him elfe, but do imagine him such a one as of their owne rash presumption they haue forged him. Which gulle being once opened, what way sooner they strike their patience, they must needs alway runne headlong into destruction. For whatsoever afterward they go about toward the worshiping or servise of God, they can not account it done to him, because they worship not him, but rather the deuise of their owne heart, and their owne dreame in stead of him. This peruerfenes doth Paul expressly touch, where he faith, that they were made foolees when they coueted to be wife. He had before saide, that they were made vaine in their imaginations: but least any man should thereby excuse them from blame, be addeth further, that they are worthilie blinded because not contented with soberie, but presumptuously taking vpon themselues more than they ought, they wilfully bring darkenesse vpon them, yea with vaine & soward pride do make themselues foolees. Whereupon followeth, that their foolishnes is not excusable, whereas the cause is not onely vaine curiousitie, but also a greedines to know more than is meete for them, ioyned with a false confidence.

2. As for this that David saith, that 'tis wicked & mad men think in their heartes, that there is no God: First that is meant only of those that choking the light of nature, doe of purpose make themselues senselie, as we shall see againe a little hereafter. Euen as we see that many after that they haue bin hardened with boldnesse and custome of sinning, doe furiously put from them all the remembrance of God which yet is by very feeling of nature inwardly ministred vnto their mindes. Now David, to make their madness the more detestable, bringeth them in as though they precisely denied, that there is any God: although they take not from him his being, but because in taking from him his judgement and providence, they shut him vp idle in heauen. For whereas nothing lefte agreeeth with the nature of God, than to throw away the government of the world, and leave it to fortune, to winke at the finnes of men, so as they may live in licentious outrageous unpunished: whosoever he be that quenching the feare of the heauenly judgement, doth carelessly followe his owne affections, he denyeth that there is a God. And this is the just vengeance of God, to drawe a fainnes ouer their hearts, so 'tis the wicked when they have once closed their eyes, even in seeing may not see. And David in another place is best expounder of his owne meaning, where he faith: That the feare of God is not before the eyes of the wicked. Again, that in their cuill doings they proudly reioyce at themselves, because they persuade themselues that God doth not looke vpon them. Therefore although they be compelled to acknowledge some God, yet do they rob him of his glorie, glorie in withdrawing from him his power. For as God (as Paul witnesseth) cannot deny himselfe, because he continually abideth like himselfe: so is it truly sayd, that these men in faining God to be a dead and vaine image, doe deny god. Morover it is to be noted that although they wrastlle against their owne natural feeling, and doe desire not onely to shake out GOD from thence, but also to destroy him in heauen: yet their dull hardenesse cannot so farre preuaile, but that God sometime draweth them backe to his judgement seate. But forasmuch as they are not withholden with any feare from running violentely against God: therefore it is certaine that there raigneth in them a brutifh forgetfulnes of God, so long as that blinde pang of rage doth so forciblie carie them.

3 So is that vaine defense overthrown, which many are wont to pretend for excuse of their superstitition. For they thinke, that any devotion to religion sufficeth, whatsoever it be, though it be never so much contrarie to order and truth. But they consider not, that true religion ought to be framed according to the will of God, as by a perpetuall rule: & that God himselfe abideth alway like himselfe, & is no imagined Ghost or fantase, y may be diversly fashioned after euery mans liking. And truely we may plainly see with how lying deceites superstitition mocketh God, while he goeth about to do him pleasure. For catching hold of those things in a maner only, which God hath testifie that he carathe not for, the either contemptuously vseth, or openly refuseth those thinges that he appointeth and saith to bee pleasant unto him. Therefore whomesoever do set vp new inuented forms of worshipping God, they worship and honour their owne doting deuises: because they durst not so trifle with God, vnles they had first sained a God, agreeing with the follies of the trifting toyes. Wherefore the Apostle pronounceth, that that vnstaticd and wandering opinion of the maieftie of God, is a verry not knowing of God. When (sayeth he) ye knewe not God, ye esteemed them in that nature were no gods. And in another place he faith that y Ephesians were without a God at such time as they straied from the right knowledge of the one God. And at least in this case, it differeth not much, whether thou beleue one God or many, because in both cases thou departest from & forsaikest the true God: whom when thou haist once forsaken, there is nothing left with thee but a detestable Idol. It followeth therefore, that we must determine with La&Tantius, that there is no lawfully allowable religion, but that which is ioyned with truth.

4 There is also a second fault, that they neither have at any time any consideration of God, but against their wills, nor do approch towards him, till for all their holding backe they be forcibly drawn to him: and even then also they have not a willing feare that proceedeth from reuerence of Gods maieftie, but only a seruile & constrained feare, which y judgement of God wringeth out of them; which judgement because they cannot escape, therefore they dread it, but yet so as therewithal they abhorre it. And so that saying of Statius, y feare first made gods in the world, may be firly spoken of vngodlineffe, & of this kinde of vngodlines only. They that have a mind abhorring from the justice of God, doe heartily wish to hauve his throne of judgement overthrown, which they know to stand for punishment of offences against his justice by which affection they were against God, who can not be without his judgement. But when they understand that his power impossible to be auyed, hangeth over them: because they can neyther by force remove it, nor by flight escape it, therefore they feare it. So leaft they should in all thinges seeme to despise him, whose majestie still preseth vp upon them, they see a certaine outward forme of religion, such as it is: but in the meane time they cease not to defile them selves with all kinde of vices, to ioyne outrageous mischeues to mischeues, vntill they haue in all points violate the holy lawe of the Lord, & destroyed his whole righteousnes or at leaft they are not so holden back with that famed seare of God, but ye they sweetly rest in their sinnes, and flatter themselues, & had rather to followe the intemperance of their flesh than restraine it with the bridle of the holy Ghost.

But forasmuch as the same is but a voyde and lying shadow of religion, yea fearefully worthy to be called a shadow: hereby aaine is easily gathered how much the true godlines, which is powred onely into the hearts of the faithfull, I mente that out of which religion springeth, doth differ from this confuse knowledge of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtaine by crooked compasses to seeme nigh unto God, whom they fly from. For wheras there ought to haue bin one continuall vnbroken course of obedience in their whole life, they in a maner in all their doings carelessly rebelling against him labour with a few sacrifices to appease him. Wheras they ought to haue serued him with holines of life & syncreteneffe of heart, they invente unfaith & observances of no value, to procure his favour withall: yea they doe more licentiously lie dul in their owne dregges, because they trust that they may be discharged against him with their owne mockeries of propiciatory satisfactions. Finally whereas their affiance ought to haue bin fastened in him, they neglefting him doe rest in themselfes, or in creatures. At length they entangle themselfes with such a heape of errors, that the darke mist of mallice doth choke, & at last utterly quench those sparkes, that glimmeringly shined to make them see the glory of God. Yet ye see the still remaineth which can by no meanes be plucked vp by the roote, to beleue that there is a certaine godhead: but ye fame sees is so corrupted, that it bringeth forth of it none other but very evil fruiets. Yea therby is that which I traitle to prove more certainly gathered, that there is a feeling of godhead naturally graven in ye heartes of men, forasmuch as the very reprobate themselfes are of necessity enforced to confess it. In quiet prosperitie they pleafantly mocke at God, yea they are full of tale and prating to diminish the greatnes of his power: but if once any desperation touch them, it stirrith them vp to seeke the fame God, and miniftreth them sodaine short prayers: by which it may appeare, that they were not utterly ignorant of God, but that the same, which ought sooner to haue beene vtered, was by obstinacie suppressed.

The fifth Chapter.

That the knowledge of God doth shew the appeare in the she making of the worlde and in the continuall governement thereof.

Moreover
M oreover because the furtther ende of blessed life standeth in the knowledge of God: that the way to felicitie should be stopped to none, therefore God hath not onely planted in the mindes of men that seede of religion which we haue spoken of, but also hath so dislosed himselfe in the whole workemanshippe of the worlde, and daylie so manifestly prezenteth himself, that men can not open their eyes but they must needs behold him. His substance in deedes is incomprehensible, so that his diuine majestic farre fumounteth al mens fenses: but he hath in al his workes grauen certaine markes of his glorie, & thofe fo plainely and notably discernible, that ye excuse of ignorance is taken away from men, be they neuer fo grosse and dull witted. Therefore the Prophet rightfull cryeth out, that he is clothed with light as with a garment: as if he should haue sayde, that then he first began to come forth to be seen in visible apparel, since the time that he first dispoled his ensignes in the creation of ye world, by which euem now what way soever we turn our eyes, he appeareth glorious vnto vs. In the same place also the fame Prophet aptly comparith the heauen as they be disposed abroad, to his royal pavillion: he faith that he hath framed his parlours in the waters, that the clouds are his chariots, that he rideth upon the wings of the winds, ye winds & lightnings are his swift messengers. And because the glory of his power & widdom doth more fully shine aboue, therefore commonly the heauen is called his palacce. And first of all, what way soever thou turn thy eyes, there is no piece of the world be it neuer fo small, wherein are not seen at least some sparks of his glory to shine. But as for this most large & beautiful frame, thou canft not with one viewe perceiue the wide compaffe of it, but that thou must needs be on every side overwelmed with the infinite force of the brightnes thereof. Wherefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes doth very well call the ages of the worlde the spectacle of invisible things, for that the so orderly framing of the world setteth vs for a mirroure wherein we may beholde God which otherwise is invisible. For which cause the Prophet assigneth to ye heauenly creatures a language that all nations understand, for that in them there is a more evident testification of the Godhead, than that it ought to escape the consideration of any nation be they neuer so dull. Which thing the Apostle declaring more plainely sayth that there is discloiled vnto men so much as was behoefful to be known concerning God: because all men without exception, do throughly see his invisible things euens to his very power and Godhead, which they understande by the creation of the worlde.

2 As for his wonderfull wise dome, there are innumerable proues both in heaven and in earth that witnesseth it: I meane not onely that secreter sort of things, for the ruder marking whereof Aastrologie, Phisitke, & all naturall Philosophy ferueth, but euem thofe things that thrurf themselues in sight of every one, euem of ye rudeft vnlearned man, fo that men can not euen their eyes but they must needs be witnesses of them. But truely they that haue digested, yea or but tastted the liberall arts, being holpen by the ayde thereof, do proceed much further to knowe into the secrets of Gods wise dome. Yet is there no man so hindered by lacke of knowledge of those arts, but that he through-

ly seeth abundantly enough of cunning workmanship in God's works, to bring him in admiration of the workman thereof. As for example: to the searching out of the movements of the stars, appointing of their places, measuring of their distances, and noting of their properties, there needeth art and an exacter diligence: by which being thoroughly perceived, as the providence of God is the more manifestly disclosed, so it is convenient, that the mind rise somewhat the higher thereby to behold his glory. But forasmuch as the unlearned people, yea & the rudest sort of them, such as are furnished with the only help of their eyes, can not be ignorant of the excellency of God's cunning workmanship, which in this innumerable & yet so severally well ordered & disposed variety doth of itself shine forth itself: it is evident that there is no man to whom God doth not largely open his wisdom. Likewise it requireth a singular sharpness of wit, to see with such cunning as Galen doth, the knitting together, the proportionall agreement, the beautie, & vse in the frame of mans body: but by all mens confession, the body of man doth vttre in very shew of it selfe so cunning a compating together, that for it the maker of it may worthily be judged wonderfull.

3 And therefore certaine of the Philosophers in olde time did not without caufe call man a little worlde, because he is a rare representation of the power, goodness & wisdome of God, and containeth in himselfe miracles enough to occupie our minde, if we will be content to marke them. And for this reason Paul, after that he had sayd that the very blind men may finde out God by groping for him, by & by sayth further, y he is not to be sought farre of, because all men doe seele undoubtedly within themselves the heavenly grace wherewith they be quickned. But if we needs to go no further than our selves, to find and take holde of God: what pardon shall his shoulterfulness desire that will not vouchsafe to descend into himselfe to find God? And the same is the reason why David, when he had shortly spoken in his advancement of the wonderfull name & honor of God y do euyty where gloriously shine, by & by cryeth out: What is man y thou art mindful of him? Againe, Our of the mouth of infants and sucking babes thou hast stablished strength. For so he pronounceth that not only in the whole kind of man is a mirror of the works of God, but also that the very infants while they yet hang on their mothers breestes, have tongues eloquent enough to preach his glory, so that there needeth no other orator. And therefore he doubteth not to set their mouths in the vauwarde, as being strongly armed to subdue their madness that would according to their diuellish pride couet to extinguish the name of God. And hereupon riseth that which Paul allegeth out of Aratus, that we are the offpring of God: because hee garnishing vs with such excellencie, hath testified that he is our father. Like as cun by common reason, & as it were by information of experience, the prophane Poets called him the father of men. And truely no man will affentingy & willingly yeeld him selfe to serve God, but he that hauing tastted his fatherly loue, is mutually allured to loue and worship him.

merable works of God, & also a shop stuffed with inestimable plente of riches, and when they ought to burst forth into praysing of him, are contrariwise stuffed vp & doe dwell with so much the greater pride. They feele how diversly in marvelous wife God worketh in them: they are taught by experience it selfe, how great variety of gifts they possesse by his liberalitie: whether they wil or no, they are enforced to knowe that these are the tokens of his goodhead: and yet they suppress it close within them. Truely they neede not to go out of them selves, for they would not in presumptuously taking upon them fences that which is given from heauen, bury within the ground that which brightly giueth light to their minds to see God. But euery day the earth beareth many monstreous spirites, which ittie not to abuse the whole seede of godhead that is owen in mans nature, & to employ it to oppresse the name of God. How detestable, I pray you, is this madness, that man finding God a hundred times in his body and & his soule, should by the very same pretence of excellencie deny that there is a God? They will not say, that they are by chance made different from brute beasts. But they pretend a cloke of nature, whom they account the maker of all things, and so do conuey God away. They see that exquisite workmanship in all their members, from their mouth & their eyes euery to the nailes of their toases, and yet here also they put nature in place of God. But specially the so swift motions, the so excellent powers, the so rare gifts of the soule, do represent a divine nature that doth not easely suffer it selfe to be hid: vnlesse the Epicureans like the Giantes Cyclopes would bearing themselvese bold upon this hie degree outrageously make warre against God. Doe the whole treasures of the heauenly wisedome so meete together, to rule a worme of suche feete long: and shall the whole vniuersalitie of the worlde bee without this prerogatwe? First to agree that there is a certaine instrumentall thing that answereth to all the partes of man, doth so serue nothing at all to obste the honour of God, that it rather doth more gloriously set it out. Let Epicure answer me, what meeting of vndisvisible bodies, boyling the meat and drinke in man, doth dispose part into excrementes and part into bloud, and bringeth to passe that there is in all the members of man such an endeuoring to doe their office, euery as if so many feueral soules did by common aduise rule one bodie.

5 But I have not now to do with that stic of swine. I rather speake unto them, that being giuen to suttelties, would by crooked conueiance with that cold saying of Aristote, both to destroy the immortalitie of the soule, and alfo to take from God his right. For because there are instrumentall powers of the soule, by pretence thereof they bind the soule to the body, that it can not continue without the body, & with praises of nature they doe as much as in them is, soppresse the name of God. But the powers of the soule are farre from being enclosed in those exercises that serue the body. For what pertaineth it to the body, for a man to measure the skie, to gather the number of the starrs, to learne the greatnesse of one, to knowe what space they be distant one from another, with what swiftnesse or slownesse they go their courses, how many degrees they decline this way or y way? I grant in deede

that there is some vse of Astrologic: but my meaning is onely to shew that in this so deepe searching out of heavenly things, it is not an instrumentall measuring, but that the soule hath her offices by it selfe seuerall from the body. I haue shewed one example, by which it shalbe easie for the readers to gather the rest. Truely the manifold nimbleness of the soule, by which it surueith both heauen & earth, ioyneth things past with things to come, keepeth in memorie things heard long before, & expresseth ehe thing to it self by imagination, also the ingenious things which inuenteth things incredible, & which is the mother of so many marvelous arts, are sure tokens of divine nature in man. Befide that, euen in sleepe it doth not only roll & turne it selfe, but also conceiueth many things profitable, reasoneth of many things, and also prophesieth of things to come. What shall we in this case say, but that the signes of immortality that are imprinted in man, can not be blotted out? Now what reason may beare that man shalbe of divine nature, and not acknowledge his Creator? Shall we forsooth by judgement that is put into vs diuerse betweene right and wrong, & shall there be no judge in heauen? Shal we euen in our sleepe haue abiding with vs some remnant of understanding, & shal no God be waking in go verning the worlde? Shal we be so cou-ted the inuenters of so many artes and profitable thinges, that God shalbe defrauded of his praise, whereas yet experience sufficiently teacheth, that from an other and not from ourselues, all that we haue, is in diuerse wise distributed among vs? As for that, which some doe babble of the secret inspiration that giueth liuelines to the worlde, it is not onely weake, but also vngodly. They like well that famous saying of Vergil:

First heaven and earth, and flowing fields of seas,
The shining globe of Moone, and Titans stars, Spirite feedes within, and throughout all the lims, Infused minde she whole huge masse doth moue,
And with the large bigge bodie mixe is selfe.
Thence come the kindes of men and eke of beastes,
And liues of flying foules, and monsters strange,
That water beares within the marble Sea.
A shyn liuelinesse and heavenly race there is Within those feedes, &c.

Forsooth, that the world which was created for a spectacle of the glorie of God, should be the creator of it selfe. So in an other place the same author following the common opinion of the Greekes and Latins, sayth:

Some say that bees have parte of minde divine,
And heavenly draughtes, For eke they say that God Goethe through the coasts of land, and creeks of sea,
And through deepe skie, And hence the flocks and herdes,
And men, and all the kindes of savage beastes Ech at their birth receive their fustie lines, And there are they renderd all at last,
And all resolved are resound againe.
Ne place there is for death: but lively shew,

Loc., what that hungry speculation of the universal mind that guieth soul and induceth to the world, saileth to engender & nourish godlines in the hearts of men. Which doth also better appear by the blasphemous sayings of the sithie dogg Lucræ, which are derived from the same principle. Even this is it, to make a shadow of God, to drive forever away the true God whom we ought to fear and worship. I grant in deed that this may be godly said, so that it proceed from a godly mind; that Nature is God: but because it is a hard and an unproper manner of speech, forasmuch as Nature is rather an order prescribed by God: therefore in things of so great weight and to which is due a singular religiousness, it is hortefull to wrap vp God confusedly with the inferior course of his works. Let us therefore remember, so oft as any man considereth his own nature, that there is one God which so governeth all nature, that his will is to have us to look to him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worshipped and called upon of us: because there is nothing more against convenience of reason than for us to enjoy those excellent gifts that favour of divine nature in us, and to despise the author that freely doth give them unto us: Now as concerning his power, with how notable examples doth it forceably drawe us to consider it vndele perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a strength it is with his only word to uphold this infinite masse of heaven and earth, with his only beck, sometime to shake the heaven with noise of thunders, to burne vp eche thing with lightnings, to set the aire on fire with lightning flames, sometime to trouble it with divers forts of tempestes, and by and by the same God when he lift in one moment to make faire weather: to holde in the Sea as if it hanged in the aire, which with his heightf seemeth to threaten continual destruction to the earth, sometime in horrible wife to raise it vp with outrageous violence of windes, and sometime to appease the waues and make it calme again. For proofe hereof do seue all the praises of God gathered of the testimonies of nature, specially in the booke of Iob and in Esay, which nowe of purpose I settpasse, because they shal els where haue an other place fitter for them, where I shall entreat of the creation of the world according to the Scriptures. Only my meaning was now to touch, that both strangers & they of the household of God haue this way of seeking God common to them both, that is, to follow these frist draughts which both above and beneath do as in a shadow set forth a lively image of him, And now the same power leadeth vs to consider his eternitie. For it must needs be that he from whom all things have their beginning, is of eternal continuance, and hath his beginning, of himselfe. But nowe if any man enquire the cause whereby he both was once lead to create all these things, & is now moved to preferre them: we shall finde that his onely goodnes was it that caufed him. Yea and although this onely be the cause, yet ought the fame abundantly to suffice to allure vs to the love of him, for as much as there is no creature (as the Prophet sayth) vppon which his mercy is not poured out.

C 5 6 Also 6 Also in the second sort of his worke, I meane those that come to passe beside the ordinarie course of nature, there doth appeare no leffe evidet prose of his powers. For in governing the fellowship of men hee so ordereth his prudence, that whereas he is by innumerable meanes good and bountifull to all men, yet by manifest and dayly tokens he declareth his fauorable kindnes to the godly, and his seuerity to the wicked and euill doers. For not doubtful are the punishments that he layeth vpon hainous offences: like as he doth openly showeth himselfe a defender and reuenger of innocency, while he prospereth the life of good men with his blessing, helpeth their necessity, alwageth and comforteth their forowes, elicieth their calamities, & by all meanes proudeth for their safety. Neither ought it any thing to deface the perpetuall rule of his justice, that hee oftentimes permitteth wicked men and euill doers for a time to rejoice vnpunished: and on the other side suffereth good and innocent to be tossed with many adversitiees, yea to be oppressd with the malice and vnjust dealing of the vngodly. But rather a much contrary consideration ought to enter into our mindest that when by manifest showre of his wrath he punisheth one sin, we should therefore thinke that he hateth all sinnes: and when he suffereth many sins to passe vnpunished, we should therewith thinke that there shalbe an other judgement to which they are differred to be then punished. Likewise howe great matter doth it minister vs to consider his mercy, while he oftentimes casteth not unto his vnwearied bountifullnesse vpon miserable sinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tendernesse, untill he haue subdued their frowardnes with doing them good?

7 To this end, where the Prophet particularly rehearseth, howe God in cares past hope, doth sodenly and wonderfully and beside all hope succour men that are in misery and in a maner lost, whether he defend them wandering in wildernesse from the wilde beasts and at length leadeth them into the way againe, or ministrith foode to the needy and hungry, or delive-rereth prisoners out of horrible dongeons and yron bands, or bringeth men in peril of shipwrack safe into the hauen, or healeth the half dead of diseases, or scorcheth earth with heat & drynes, or makest it fruitful with secret watering of his grace, or advancest the baseft of the raflcall people, or throwst downe the noble Peceres from the hie degree of dignitie: by such examples showed foorth he gathereth that those thinges which are judged chaunces happening by fortune, are so many testimonies of the heavenly providence and specially of his fatherly kindenes, and that therby is gien matter of rejoycing to the godly, and the wicked & reprobate haue their mouths stopped. But because the greater part infected with their errors are blind in to cleare a place of beholding, therefore he crieth out that it is a gift of rare and singular wisdome, wisely to wey these workes of God: by sight whereof they nothing proffit that otherwife feeme most clere sighted. And truely howe much sooner his glory of God doth apperantly shine before them, yet scantily the hundreth man is a true beholder of it. Likewise his power & wisdome are no more hid in darknes: whereof the one, his power, doth notably appeare, when the fierce outrageousnesse of the wicked being in all mens opinion un-con
conquerable, is beaten flat in one moment, their arrogancies tamed, their strongest holdes rased, their weapons & armour broken in pieces, their strengthes subdued, their deuises ouerthrown, and themselves fall with their owne weight, the presumptuous boldneffe, y auanced it self above the heauen is thrown down even to the bottome point of the earth: againe, the lowly are lifted vp out of the dust, & the needle raised from y donghill, the opprессed & afflicted are drawn out of extreme differeffe, men in despaired state are restored to good hope, the unarmed beare away the victorie from the armed, few from many, the feeble from the strong. As for his wisdome, it self sheweth it selfe manifestly excellent, while it difposeth every thing in fittest oportunitie, confoundeth the wisdome of the world be it never fo pearing, findeth our y subtle in their substicie, finally governeth all things by most conuenient order.

We see that it needeth no long or laborsome demonstration, to fetch our testimonies, to serve for the glorious declaration & proofe of Gods majestie: for by these few that we haue touched it appeareth that which way so euer a man chance to looke, they are so common & readie that they may be easilly marked, with eye, & pointed out with the finger. And here againe is to be noted, that we are called to the knowledge of God, not such as contented with vaine speculation, doth but flie about in the braine, but such as shall be found & fruitfull, if it be rightly conceived & take roote in our hearts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force whereof because we feele within vs, & do enjoy the benefits of them, it must needes be that we be inwardly moved much more latly with such a knowledge, than if we should imagine God to be such one, of whom we should have no feeling. Wherby we understand that this is the righteſt way & fittest order to seek God, not to attempt to enter deeply with presumptuous curiousitie throughly to discuſſe his substance, which is rather to be reverently worshipped than scrupulously searched: but rather to behold him in his worke, by which he maketh himself familiar, & doth in a maner communicate himselfe vnto vs. And this the Apostle meant, when he said, that God is not to be sought a farre off, for as much as he with his most present power dwelleth within every one of vs. Wherefore Dauid, hauncing before confessed his unspeakeable greatnesse, when he descended to the particular rehearsal of his worke, protested that y fame will shew forth it self. Therefore we also ought to gete our felues vnto such a searching out of God, as may so holde our wit suspended with admiration, that it may therewithall throughly moue vs with effectuall feeling. And, as Augustine teacheth in another place, because we are not able to conceiue him, it behoueth vs as it were fainting vnder the burden of his greatnesse, to looke vnto his worke, that we may be refreshed with his goodnes.

Then such a knowledge ought not onely to stirre vs vp to the worshipping of God, but also to awake vs, & raise vs to hope of the life to come. For when we consider that such examples as God sheweth both of his mercifulnesse, and of his seueritie, are but begun and not halfe ful: without doubt we must think, that herein he doth but make a shewe afore hande of those things, whereof the open disclosing & full deliuerance is differed vnto another life. On the other side, when we see that the godly are by y ungodly grieued grieved with afflictions, troubled with injuries, oppressed with slanders, and vexed with disputeful dealings and reproaches: contrary wife that wicked doers doe flourish, prosper and obtaine quiet with honor, yea and that unpunished: we must by and by gather that there thalbe an other life, wherein is laid vp in store both due reuenge for wickednes, and rewarde for righteousnes. Moreover when we note that the faithfull are often chastised with the roddes of the Lord, we may most certainly determine that much leffe the vngodly shall escape his scourges. For very well is that spoken of Augustine. If euerie sinne should now be punished with open paine, it would be thought that nothing were referued to the last judgement. Again, if God should now openly punish no sinne, it would be beleuued, that there were no prouidence of God. Therefore we must confesse, that in euery particular worke of God, but principally in the vniverfal generalitie of them, the powers of God are set forth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankind is prouoked and allured to the knowledge of him, and from knowledge to full and perfect felicitie. But whereas these his powers doe in his workes most brightly appeare, yet what they principally tende vnto, of what value they be, and to what ende wee ought to wye them: this we then onely attaine to understand when we descende into our selves, and doe consider by what means God doth shew forth in vs his life, wisedome, and power, and doth vs towards vs his righteousnes, goodness, and mercifull kindenesse. For though David justly complaineth, that the vnbeleuuing do dote in folly, because they wye not the deep counfaile of God in his gouernance of mankind; yet that is also most true, which he faith in an other place, that the wonderful wisdome of God in that behalf exceedeth the hearces of our head. But because this point shall hereafter in place convenient be more largely entreated, therefore I do at this time palle it ouer.

10 But with howe greate brightnes foote God doth in the mirror of his workes shew by representation both himselfe and his immortall kingdom: yet such is our groffe blockishnesse, that we stand dully amased at to place testimonies, so that they palle away from vs without profit. For, as touching the frame and most beautifull placing of the worlde, how many a one is there of vs, that when hee either lifteth vp his eyes to heauen, or casteth them about on the diuerse countries of the earth, doth direct his minde to remembrance of the creator, & doth not rather rest in beholding the workes without hauing regard of the workeman. But as touching those things that dayly happen beside the order of naturall course, how many a one is there that doth not more thinke that men are rather whirled about & rowled by blinde vndistemnesse of fortune, than gouerned by prouidence of God. But if at any time we be by the guiding & direction of these things driven to the consideration of God (as all men must needs be) yet so soone as we haue without aduision conceiued a feeling of some Godhead, we by & by slide away to the dotages or erroneous intentions of our flesh, & with our vanitie we corrupt the pure veritie of God. So herein in deede we differ one fr6 an other, that euery man priuatly by himself procureth to himselfe some peculiar error: but in this point we all are most like together, that we all all, not one excepted, doe depat from the one true God to monstrous trifles. To which disafce not onely common and grosse wittes are subie& but also the most excellent and those that otherwise are endued with singular sharpeneffe of understanding, are entangled with it. How largely hath the whole sect of Philosophers bewrayed their owne dullnes and beastly ignorance in this behalfe? For, to passe over all the rest, which are much more unreasonably foolish, Plato himselfe the most religious and most seber of all the rest, vainely erreth in his round globe. Now what might not chance to the other, when the chiefe of them, whose part was to give light to the rest, doe themselues so erre and stumble? Likewhile where Gods governance of mens matters doth so plainly prove his prudence, that it cannot bee denied, yet this doth no more preuaile with men, than if they beleued that all things are tossed up and downe with the raft will of Fortune: so great is our inclination to vanity and error. I speake now altogether of the most excellent, and not of the common sort, whose madness hath infinitely wandred in prophaning the truth of God.

11 Hereof proceedeth that unmeasurable sink of errors, wherewith the whole world hath bin filled and overflowne. For each mans wit is to himself as a maze, so that it is no maruell that euery seuerall nation was diversely drawne into seuerall denises, and not that onely, but also that each seuerall man had his seuerall gods by himselfe. For since that rash presumption and wantonness was ioyned to ignorance and darknesse, there hath bin soarely at any time any one man found, that did not forget to himselfe an idole or fanfie in stead of God. Truely even as out of a wide and large spring doe issue waters so the infinute number of gods hath flowed out of the wit of man, while euery man ouer licentiously straying, erroneously deviseth this or that concerning God himselfe. And yet I neede not here to make a regifter of the superstitions, wherewith the world hath bin entangled: because both in so doing I should never haue end, and also though I speake not one word of them yet by so many corruptions it sufficiently appeareth howe horrible is the blindenes of mans minde. I passe over the rude and unlearned people. But among the Philosophers, which enterprised with reason and learning to pierce into heauen, how shamefull is the disagreement? With the higher wit that any of them was endued, and filled with art and science, with so much the more glorious colours he seemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithstanding, if one do narrowly looke vpon, he shall finde them to be but vanishing false colours. The Stoickes seemed in their owne conceit to speake very wisely, that out of all the parts of nature may be gathered diverse names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby torne in sunder. As though we were not already more than enough enclin’d to vanity, vnlike a manifold plenty of gods set before vs shoulde further and more violently draw vs into error. Also the Egyptian mystical science of divinity sheweth, that they al diligently endeavoured to this end, not to seeme to erre without a reason. And it is possible, that at the first sight some thing seeming probable, might deceuie the simple & ignorant: but no mortal maeuer inuented any thing, whereby religion hath not bin foully corrupted. And
And this so confus'd diversité emboldned the Epicures & other grosse dispisers of godlinesse, by little and little to cast of all feeling of God. For when they saw the wisest of all to strive in contrary opinions, they sticked not out of their disagreements, & out of the foolish or apparently erronisous doctrine of each of them, to gather, that men doe in vaine and fondly procure torments to themselves while they search for God, which is none at al. And this they thought that they might freely doe without punishment, because it was better briefly to deny utterly, that there is any God, than to faigne vncertaine Gods; and so to raise vp contentions that never should have end.
And too much fondly doe they reason, or rather cast a mist, to hide their vn-godlines by ignorance of men, whereby it is no reason that any thing should be taken away from God. But forasmuch as all doe confesse, that there is nothing, about which both the learned and vnlearned doe so much disagree thereupon is gathered that the wittes of men are more than dull and blinde in heavenly mysteries, that doe so err in seeking out of God. Some other doe praffe that anfwere of Symonides, which being demanded of King Hieron what God was, desired to have a dayes respite granted him to study upon it: And when the next day following, the king demanded the same question, he required two dayes respite, and so oftentimes doubting the numer of dayes at length he anwmered: Howe much the more I consider it, so much the harder the matter seemeth unto me. But granting that he did wifely to suspend his sentence of so darke a matter, yet hereby appeareth, that if men be only taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, soundly, and plainly concerning God, but onely are tryed to confus'd principles to worship an vnknowne God.

12. Now we must alfo hold, that all they that corrupt the pure religion (as all they must needs doe that are giuen to their owne opinion) doe depart from the one God. They wil boaft that their meaning is otherwise: but what they meane, or what they perfwade themselves maketh not much to the matter, uth the holy ghost pronounceth, y al they are Apostates, that according to the darknes of their own mind do thrust ducels in the place of God. For this reason, Paule pronounceth that the Ephesians were without a God, til they had learned by the gospel, what it was to worship the true God. And we must not thinke this to be spoken of one nation only, for as much as he generally affirmeth in another place, that all men were become vaine in their imaginationes, since that in the creation of the world, the Majefty of the cretor was disclos'd vnto them. And therefore the scripture, to make place for the true and one only God, condemneth of false-hood and lying, whatsoever godhead in old time was celebr'd among the Gentiles, and leaveth no God at all, but in the mount Sion, where flourished y peculiar knowledge of God.

Truely among the Gentiles the Samaritans in Christes time seemed to approach nighest to true godlines: and yet we heare it spoken by Christes owne mouth, that they knew not what they worshipp'd. Whereupon foloweth, that they were deceived with vaine error. Finally although they were not al infected with grosse faultes, or fell into open idolatries, yet was there no true and approved religion that was grounded only vpon comon reason. For albeit
beit, that there were a few were not so mad as the comon people were, yet this doctrine of Paul remaineth certainly true, that the princes of this world conceiue not the wilidome of God. Now if the most excellent hace wandered in darknesse, what is to be saide of the very dreagues? Wherefore it is no meruaille, 34 if the holy Ghost doe refuse as bastard worshipings all forms of worshipping deuised by the wil of men. Because in heavenly mysteries opinion conceiued by wit of men, although it doe not alway breed a heape of errors, yet is alway the mother of errour. And though there come no wofe of it, yet is this no small fault, at adventure to worship an unknowne God: of which fault, al they by Christs own mouth are pronounced guilty, y are not taught by the law what God they ought to worship. And truly the best lawmakers that euer were, proceeded no further, than to saye that religion was grounded vpon comon consent. Yea and in Xenophon Socrates praieth the answere of Apollo, wherein he willed that euer man shoulde worship Gods after the maner of the country, and the custome of his owne citie. But how came mortall men by this power, of their owne authority to determine that which farre furmounteth the world? or who can so rest in the decrees of the elders, or common ordinances of peoples, as to receiue without doubting a God deliered by mans deceit? Every man rather will stande to his owne iudgement, than yeelde himselfe to the will of another. Sith therefore it is too weake & feeble a bond of godlines, in worshipping of God to follow either a custome of a citie or the consent of antiquitie, it remaineth that God himselfe must testifie of himselfe from heauen.

13 In vaine therefore so many lampes lightned do shine in the edifice of the world, to shew forth the glory of the creator, which doe so every way display their beames vpon vs, that yet of them they cannot bring vs into the right way. In deede they raise vp certaine sparkles, but such as bee choked vp before that they can spread abrode any full brightnes. Therefor the Apostle in the same place where he calleth the ages of the world images of things inuisible, faith further, that by faith is perceived, that they were framed by the word of God: meaning thereby that the inuisible godhead is in deede representated by such shewes, but that we haue no eyes to see the same throughly, vnles they be enlightened by ye revelation of God through faith. And Paul, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world was discloosed that which was to be known concerning God, doth not meane such a disclosing as may be comprehended by the wit of men: but rather sheweth, y the same proceeded no further but to make them vnexecuable. The same Paul also, although in one place he faith that god is not to be sought a far of, as one that dwelleth within vs; yet in another place teacheth to what ende that neere-nesse may leaf. In the ages past faith he) God suffred the nations to walke in their owne wayes: yet he left not himselfe without testimonie, doing good from heauen, giving showers and fruitfull leasons, filling the hearts of men with good and glaunefse. How fouer therefore the Lord be not without testimoyny, while with his great and manifold bountifulnesse he sweety allureth men to the knowledge of him: yet for all that, they cesse not to followe their owne wayes, that is to say, their damnable errors.
But although we want natural power, whereby we cannot climb up into the pure and clear knowledge of God, yet because the fault of our dulness is in our selves, therefore all coulour of excuse is cut away from vs. For we cannot so pretend ignorance, but that even our conscience with still condemn vs of slothfulness and vnthankfulness. It is a defence forsooth right worthy to be receiued, if man will allege that he wanted cares to hear the truth, for the publisheing whereof the very dumbe creatures haue lowde voices: if man shall say that he cannot see those things with his eyes, which the creatures without eyes doe shew him: if man shall lay for his excuse the feebleness of his wit, where all creatures without reason doe instruct him: Wherefore fishe all things do shew vs the right way, we are worthily put from all excuse of our wandering and straying out of the way. But howsoever it is to be imputed to the faulte of men, that they doe by and by corrupt the seed of the knowledge of God, sowne in their minde by maruelous workmanship of nature, so that it groweth not to good and cleane fruite: yet it is most true, that we are not sufficiently instructed by that bare and simple testimony, that the creatures doe honorably declare of Gods glorie. For so soon as we haue taken by the beholding of the world a small taste of the Godhead, we leaving the true God doe in stead of him raise vp dreams and fantasies of our owne braine, and doe commit thus hither and thither from the true fountain the praise of righteousnes, wisdome, goodness and power. Moreover we doe so either obscure, or by ill esteeming them, deprave his dayly doings, that we take away both from them their glory, and from the Author his due praise.

That, to attaine to God the Creator, it is needfull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and maistrefse.

Therefore although that fame brightnesse, which both in heaven and earth shineth in the eyes of all men, doth sufficiently take away all defence from the wickednesse of men, even so as God, to wrap all mankinde in one giltonesse, doth shew his divine majestie to all without exception as it were portrayed out in his creatures: yet is it necessarie that wee haue also an other and a better helpe that may rightly direct vs to the very Creator of the world. Therefore not in vaine he hath added the light of his word, that thereby he might be knowne to salvation. And this prerogative he hath vouchsafe to give vs, whom it pleased him more surely and more familiarly to draw together to himself. For because he sawe the minde of all men to be caried about with wandering and vnstedfast motion, after he had chosen the Israel to his peculiar flocke, he compassed them in as it were with bars, that they should not wander out in vanity as other did. And not without cause he holdeth vs with the same meane in the true knowledge of himselfe. For otherwife euery man should quickly swande away that seeme to stand stedeast in comparison of other. For as ole men, or poore blinde, or they whose eyes are dimme sighted, if you laye a faire booke before them, though they perceiue that there is somewhat written therein, therein, yet can they not read two wordes together: but being holpen with spectacles set betweene them & it, they begin to read distinctly: so the Scripture gathering vp together in our minds the knowledge of God, which other wise is but confused, doth remove the mist, & plainly shew vs the true God. This therefore is a singular gift, that to the instruction of his church God vseth not only dummte teachers, but also openeth his owne holy mouth: not only publisheth that there is some God to be worshipped, but also theweth al pronounceth that he himselfe is the same God whom we ought to worship: & doth not only teach the elect to looke vpon God, but also presenteth him selfe vnto them to be looked vpon. This order hath he kept from the beginning toward his church, beside these common instructions to give them also his word. Which is the righter & certainer marke to know him by. And it is not to be douted, that Adam, Noe, Abraham & the rest of the fathers by this help attainted to that familiar knowledge, which made them as it were securally different from the vnbelieuers. I speake not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, wherewith they were enlightened into the hope of eternal life. For, that they might passe from death to life, it was nedeful for them to knowe God not only to be the creator, but also the redeemer: as doubleeth they obtained both by the word. For that kind of knowledge whereby was guien to understand who is the God by whom the world was made & is governed, in order came before the other: and then was that other inward knowledge adjoyned, which only quickened dead soules, whereby God is known not only to be the maker of the world & the only author & judge of all things that are done, but also to be the redeemer in the person of the mediator. But because I am not yet come to the fall of the world & corruption of nature, I will omit also to entreat of the remedie thereof. Therefore let the readers remembre that I do not yet speake of the covenant whereby God hath adopted to him selfe the children of Abraham, & of that special part of doctrine whereby the faithful haue alway bin peculiarly seuered from the prophane nations: because that doctrine was founded vpon Christ: but I speake howe we ought to learne by the Scripture, that God which is the creator of the world, is by certaine marks seuerally distincribed from counterfeit multitude of false gods. And then the order it selfe shal conveniently bring vs to the redeemer. But although we shall allege many testimonies out of the newe Testament, and some also out of the law & the Prophets, wherein is expresse mention made of Christ: yet they shal all tend to this end, to prove that in the Scripture is discloesd vnto vs God the creator of the world, & in the Scripture is set forth what we ought to think of him, to the ende that we should not fecke about the bush for an uncertaine godhead.

2 But whether God were known to the fathers by oracles & visions, or whether by the mean & ministration of men he informed them of that which they should from hand to hand deliever to their posteritie: yet it is undoubtedly true that in their harts was engraven a stedfast ceretainty of doctrine, so as they might be perswaded & understand, that it which they had learned came from God. For God alwayes made vn doubted assurance for credit of his word, which farre exceeded al uncertain opinion. At length that by continual proceeding of doctrine, the truth surviving in all ages might still remaine in y world, the same oracles which he had left with the fathers, his pleasure was to have as it were enrolled in publike tables. For this extent was y law published, whereunto after were added the Prophets for expounders. For though there were diuers fves of the law, as hereafter shall better appear in place convenient: and specially the principal purpose of Moses & al y prophets was to teach y maner of reconciliation betwene god & men, for which cause also Paul calleth Christ the end of the law: yet, as I say once againe, beside y proper doctrine of faith & repentance which sheweth forth Christ the mediator, the Scripture doth by certaine marks & tokens paint out y only & true God, in that that he hath created & doth gouerne the world, to the end he should be feuerally known & not reckned in the false number of faiued gods. Therefore although it behoueth man earnestly to bend his eyes to consider the works of God, forasmuch as he is set as it were in this gorgeous stage to be a beholder of them; yet principally ought he to bend his eares to the word, that he may better profit therby. And therefore it is no manuell y they which are borne in darkness do more & more waxe hard in their amased dulnes, because very few of them do give themselues pliable to learne of the word of God, whereby to kepe them within their boundes, but they rather reioyce in their own vanity. Thus then ought we to hold, that y ende true religion may shine among vs, we must take our beginning at the heauenly doctrine. And that no man can haue any taft be it neuer so little of true & found doctrine, vnlesse he haue bin scholer to the Scripture. And if it hence groweth the originall of true understanding, that wee reuerently embrace whatsoever it pleaseth God therein to teutne of himselfe. For not only the perfect & in all points absolute faith, but also all right knowledge of God springeth from obedience. And truely in this behalfe God of his singular prouidence hath provided for men in and for all ages.

3. For if we consider how flippery an inclination mans minde hath to slide into forgetfulness of God, how great a readiness to fal into all kinde of errors, howe great a lust to forge oftentimes new & counterfayt religions, wee may thereby perceiue how necessarie it was to haue the heauenly doctrine so put in writing, that it should not either perish by forgetfulness, or grow vaine by errour, or be corrupted by boldnes of men. Sith therefore it is manifest that God hath alwayes vised the helpe of his word, toward al those whom it pleased him at any time fruitfully to instruct, because he foresaw that his image emprinted in y most beautifull forme of the world was not sufficiently effectuall: Therefore it behoeth vs to traualle this straight way, if we earnestly count to attaine to the true beholding of God. We must, I say, come to his worde, wherein God is well & fluently set out by his worke, when his worke be weyed not after the pervertynesse of our owne judgement, but according to the rule of y eternal truth. If we swarue from that word, as I said even now, although we runne neuer so fast, yet we shall neuer attaine to the marke, because the course of our running is out of the way. For thus we must think, y the brightnesse of the face of God, which the Apostle calleth such as cannot be atteined vnto, is vnto vs like a maze out of which we cannot unwrap our selves, vnlesse vnlesse we be by the line of the word guided into it: so that it is much better for vs to halt in this way, than to runne nerer so fast in an other. And therefore David oftentimes when he teacheth that superstitions are to be taken away out of the world, that pure religion may flourish, bringeth in God reigning: meaning by this word reigning, not the power that he hath, but the doctrine whereby he challengeth to himsell a lawfull governement: because errors can never be rooted out of the hearts of men, till the true knowledge of God be planted.

4 Therfore the same Prophet, after that he hath recited that the heavens declare the glory of God, that the firmament sheweth forth the workes of his handes, that the orderly succeeding course of daies & nightes preacheth his majesty, then decleneth to make mention of his word. The lawe of the Lord (faith he) is vndefiled, couering soules: the witnes of the Lord is faithfull, givinig wisdom to little ones: the righteousnesses of the Lord are vpright, making harts cheareful: the commandement of the Lord is bright, givinig light to the eyes. For although he comprehendeth also the other vses of the law, yet in generallity he meaneth, that forasmuch as God doth in vaine call vs to him all nations by the beholding of the heauen and earth, therefore this is the peculiar schoole of the children of God. The same meaning hath the xxix.Psalme, where the prophet haung preached of the terrible voice of God, which in thunder, windes, showers, whirlwindes and stormes, shaketh the earth, maketh the mountaines to tremble, and breaketh the ceder trees: in the end at last he goeth further and faith, that his praiies are song in the sanctuary, because the vnbelieuers are deafe and heare not all the voyces of God that resound in the aire. And in like maner in an other Psalme, after hee had described the terrible waues of the Sea, hee thus concludes: thy testimonies are veried, the beauty of thy temple is holines for euer. And out of this meaning also proceede that which Christ saied to the woman of Samaria, that her nation and the reft did honor that which they knew not, and that onely the Iewes did worship the true God. For wheras the wit of man by reason of the feeblenes of thereof can by no meane attaine vs to God, but being holpen and lifted vp by his holy word, it folowed of necessity, that all men, except the Iewes, did wander in vanitie & error, because they sought God without his word.

By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be established, that is by the witnesse of the body Hguist, that the authoritie thereof may remaine certaine. And that it is a wrucked invention to say that the credit thereof doth hang upon the judgement of the Church.

But before I go any further, it is needful to say somewhat of the authority of the Scripture, not onely to prepare mens mindes to reuerence it, but also to take away all doubt thereof. Now, when it is a matter confessed that it is the word of God that is there set foorth, there is no man osto desperate boldenesse, vnlesse hee bee voide of all common sense and naturall witte of man, that dare derogate the crede of him that speakeh it.
But because there are not daily oracles given from heaven, and the onely Scriptures remaine wherein it hath pleased to preserve his truth to perpetual memorie, the same Scripture by none other meanes is of full credit among the faithful, but in that they doe beleue that it is as verily come from heaven as if they heard the liuely voice of God to speake therein. This matter indeede is right worthy both to be largely entreated of and diligently w eyed. But the readers shall pardon me if herein I rather regard what is proportion of the worke which I have begun may beeare, than what the largenes of the matter requireth. There is growne vp among the most part of men a most hurtfull error, that the Scripture hath onely so much authority as by common consent of the Church is giuen vnto it: as if the eternall and inviolable truth of God did rest vpon the pleasure of men. For so, to the great scorne of the holy ghost, they ask of vs who can assure vs that these scriptures came from God: or who can ascertaine vs that they have continued vnto our age safe and vncorrupted: who can perswade vs, that this one booke ought to be reuerently received, and that other to be striken out of the number of scripture, vnlesse the church did appoint a certaine rule of all these things? If hangeth therefore (say they) vpon the determination of the church, both what reuerece is due to the Scripture, and what bookees are to be reckened in the canon therof. So these robbers of Gods honor, while they seeke vnder colour of the church to bring in an unbridled tyrannie, care nothing with what absurdities they shewe both themselues and other, so that they may enforce this one thing to be beleued amongst simple, that the Church can doe all things. But if it be so: what shall become of the poore confidences that seeke fested assurance of eternall life, if all the promises that remaine theroff stand and be staled onely vpon the judgement of men? When they receive such answere, shall they seafe to waue and tremble? Again to what scornes of the vngodly is our faith made subject? into how great suspicion with all men is it brought, if this be beleued that it hath but as it were a borrowed credit by the favoure of men?

2 But such bablers are well confured euon with one word of the Apostle. He testifieth that the church is builded vpon the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles. If the doctrine of the Prophets, and Apostles be the foundation of the Church: then must it needs be, that the same doctrine stooed in stedfast certainty, before that the Church began to be. Neither can they well caual, that although the Church take her first beginning thereof, yet it remaineth doubtful what is to be said of the writings of the Prophets and Apostles, vnlesse the judgement of the Church did declare it. For if the Christian Church were at the beginning builded vpon the writings of the Prophets and preaching of the Apostles: wheresoeuer that doctrine shalbe foud, the allowed credit thereof was surely before the Church, without which the Church it selfe had never bin. Therefore it is a vaine forged deuise, that the Church hath power to judge the scripture, so as the certainty of the scripture should be thought to hang vpon the will of the Church. Wherefore when the Church doth receive the Scripture and sealeth it with her consentting testimonie, she doth not of a thing doubtfull, and that otherwise should should be in controverfie, make it autentike and of credit: but because the acknowledgeth it to be the truth of her God, according to her duttie of godlineffe without delay she doth honor it. Whereas they demand, howe shall we be perfwaded that it came from God, vnlesse we refort to the decree of the Church? This is all one as if a man should afke, how shall we learne to knowe light from darkeness, white from blacke, or sweete from fower. For the Scripture fieweth in it felfe no leffe apparent fenfe of her trueth, than white and blacke things doe of their colour, or sweete and fower things of taft.

3 I know that they commonly allege the faying of Augustine, where he faith that he woulde not beleue the Gofpell, faue that the authoritie of the church moued him thereto. But how vntruly and cauillously it is alle- ged for fuch a meaning, by the whole tenor of his writing it is easie to perceiue. He had to doe with the Manichees, which required to be beleued without gainefaying, when they vaunted they had the truth on their fide, but pro- mised it not. And to make their Manicheus to be beleued, they pretended the Gofpel. Now Augustine asketh the what they would do, if they did light vp a man that would not beleue the gospell it felfe, with what maner of perfuasion they would drawe him to their opinion. Afterward he faith: I my felfe would not beleue the Gofpel, &c. faue that the authority of the church moued me thereto. Meaning that he himfelfe, when he was a ftranger from the faith, could not othereife be brought to embrace the gospell for the asuried truth of God, but by this that he was overcome with the authority of the church. And what maruell is it, if a man not yet knowing Chrift, haue regard to men? Augustine therefore doth not there teach that the faith of the godly is grounded vpon the authority of the church, nor meaneth that the cer- tainty of his gospell doth hang therupon: but simply & only, that there should be no affurednes of the gospell to the infidels, wherby they might be won to Chrift, vnlesse felfe content of the church did drue them vnto it. And the fame meaning a little before he doth plainly confirme in this faying, When I fhal praise that which I beleue, &c one that which thou beleueft, what thinkeft thou mete for vs to judge or do? but that we forfake fuch men as first cal vs to come and knowe certaine truethes and after commaund vs to beleue things vncertaine: and that we follow them that require vs first to beleue that which we are not yet able to fe, that being made ftrong by beleuing we may attain to vnderftand the thing that we beleue: not men nowe, but God himfelf inwardly strengthening and giuing light to our mind. These are the very words of Augustine: wherby euery man may easily gather, that the holy man had not this meaning, to hang the credite that we haue to the Scriptures vpon the will and awardeament of the church, but onely to shewe this, (which we ourfelues alfo doe confesse to be true) that they which are not yet lightned with the spirite of God, are brought by the reverence of the church vnto a willingnes to be taught, fo as they can finde in their hearts to learne the faith of Chrift by the Gospell: and that thus by this meaneth the authoritie of the Church is an introduction, whereby we are prepared to beleue the Gospell. For, as we fee, his minde is that the affurance of the godly be stayed upon a far other foundation. Otherwise I do not deny but that he often preseth the Maniches with the consent of the whole church, when he seeketh to prove the same Scripture which they refused. And from hence it came, that he so reproached Faustus for that he did not yield himself to the truth of the gospel so grounded, so established, so gloriously renounced and from the very time of the Apostles by certaine stuccelions perpetually commended. But he never traceoth to this end, to teach that the authority which we acknowledge to be in the Scripture, hangeth upon the determination or decree of men. But only this, which made much for him in the matter he disputed of, he bringeth forth, a universal judgement of the church, wherein he had the advantage of his adversaries. If any desire a fuller prove of it, let him read his book concerning the profit of beleeving. Where he shall find that there is no other readines of belief commended versus by him, but that which onely giveth versus an entrie, and is versus a convenient beginning to enquire, as he termeth it: and yet not that we ought to rest versus bare opinion, but to learn to the certaine and sound truth.

4. We ought to hold, as I before said, that the credit of this doctrine, is not established in versus, until such time as we be undoubtedly persuaded, that God is the author thereof. Therefore the principal proof of the Scripture is commonly taken of the person of God the speaker of it. The Prophets and Apostles boast not of their owne sharp wit or any such things as procure credit to men that speake: neither stand they versus proving by reason, but they bring forth the holy name of God, thereby to compel the whole world to obedience. Now we have to see how not only by probable opinion, but by apparent truth it is evident, that in this behalf the name of God is not without, cause nor deceitfully pretended. If then we wil provide well for conseqences, they shall not continually caried about with vnstedfast doubting, nor may waver, nor stay at every small stop, this manner of persuasion must be fetched deeper than from either the reasons, judgements or the consciences of men, even from the secret testimonie of the holy Ghost. True in deed it is, that if we lifted to worke by way of arguments, many things might be alledged that may eaily proove, if there be any God in heauen, that the law, the prophesies and the gospel came from him. Ye although men learned and of deepe judgement would stand versus to the contrary, & would employ & shew foorth the whole force of their wits in this disputation; yet if they be not so hardned as to become desperately shamelesse, they would be compelled to confesse, that there are seene in the scripture manifest tokens that it is God that speaketh therein: whereby it may appeare that the doctrine thereof is from heauen. And shortly hereafter we shall see, all the books of versus holy Scripture doe far excell all other writings what soever they be. Yea if we bring thither pure eyes and uncorrupted senses, we shall forthwith finde there the majesty of God, which shall subdue all hardnes of gaine laying and enforce versus to obey him. But yet they doe disorderly, that by disputation trauel to establish the perfect credit of the Scripture. And truely although I am not furnished with great dexterity, nor eloquence: yet if I were to contend with the most subtle defiers of God, that have a desire to shew themselves witty and pleasant in febling the authoauthority of Scripture, I trust it should not be hard for me to put to silence their babblings. And if it were profitable to spend labour in confuting their caullations, I would with no great business shake in sunder the brages that they mutter in corners. But though a man doe deliuer the sound worde of God from the reproches of men, yet that sufficeth not foorthwith to fasten in their hearts that assuredly that godlines requireth. Prophane men because they thinke religion standeth only in opinion, to the ende they would beleue nothing fondy or lightly, doe couert and require to have it proved to them by reason, that Moses and the Prophets spake from God. But I answere that the testimonie of the holy Ghost is better than all reason. For as onely God is a convenient wittnesse of himselfe in his owne word, so shall the same word never finde credit in the hearts of men, vntill it be sealed vp with the inward wittnes of the holy ghost. It behooueth therefore of necessitie that the same holy Ghost which spake by the mouth of the Prophets, doe enter into our hearts to perswade vs that they faithfully verted that which was by God commanded them. And this order is very aply set forth by Esai in these words: My spirit which is in thee, & the words that I have put in my mouth and in the mouth of thy seedes, shall not faile for euer. It groweth some good men, that they have not ready at hand some cleare proofe to alleege, when the wicked doe without punishment mur- mure against the word of God: As though the holy Ghost were not for this cause called both a scale and a pledge, because vntill he doe lighten mens minde they doe alwaies water among many doutinges.

Let this therfore stand for a certainly perswaded truth, that they whom the holy Ghost hath inwardly taught, doe wholly rest upon the scripture, and the same scripture is to be credited for it selfe sake, & ought not to be made subiect to demonstration and reasons: but yet the certainty which it getheth among vs, it attaineth by the wittnes of the holy Ghost. For though by the onely majestie of it selfe it procureth reverence to be giuen to it: yet then onely it thoroughly perceieth our affections, when it is sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost. So being lightned by his vertue, we doe then beleue, not by our owne judgement, or other mens, that the scripture is from God: but above all mans judgement we hold it most certainly determined, even as if we beheld the majestie of God himselfe there present, that by the ministery of men it came to vs from the very mouth of God. We seeke not for arguments and likelihoodes to rest our judgement vpon: but as to a thing without al compasse of consideratio, we submit our judgement & wit vnto it. And that not in such fort as some are wont sometime hastily to take hold of a thing vnknowne, when after being thorougly perceived displeaseth them: but because we are in our conficences well afluire that we hold an inuincible truth. Neither in such fort, as silly me are wont to yseid their mind in thral- dome to superstitions: but because we undoubtedly perceive therein the strength & breathing of the diuine majestie, wherewith we are drawne & stirred to obey, both wittingly & willingly, & yet more liuely & effectually than mans will or wit can attaine. And therefore for good cause doth God cry out by Esai, that the Prophetes with the whole people doe beare him.
witness, because being taught by prophecies they did undoubtedly beleue without guile or uncertainty that God himselfe had spoken. Such therefore is our perswasion, as requireth no reasons: such is our knowledge, as hath a right good reason to maintaine it, even such a one, wherein the mind more assuredly & stedfastly resteth than upon any reasons: such is our feeling, as cannot proceede but by revelation from heaven. I speake nowe of none other thing but that which every one of the faithfull doth by experience find in himself, saying that my words doe much want of a full declaration of it. I leave here many things unspeaken, because there wilbe elsewhere againe a convenient place to entreate of this matter. Onely now let vs know, that only that is the true faith which the spirite of God dooth seal in our hearts. Yea with this only reason will the sober reader, and willing to learne, be contented. Esa propheseth, that all the children of the renuèd church shallbe the scholars of God. A singular privilege therein doth God vouchsafe to grant to his elect only, whom he feuereth from all the rest of mankinde. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a ready cherefulness to hear the voyce of God?
But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moses, as it is written: Say not in thy hart, who shall ascend into heaven, or who shall descend into the deepe? the word is euene in thine owne mouth. If it be y pleasure of God that this treasure of understanding be layde vp in store for his children, it is no maruell nor unlikely, that in the common multitude of men is scene such ignorance and dulness. The eomon multitude I calle the most excellent of the, vntil such time as they be graffed into y body of the church. Moreover Esa giuing warning that the prophets doctrine should scene incredible not only to fragers but also to the fewes that would be accounted of the household of God, addeth this reason: because the arme of God shall not be received to all men. So oft therefore as the smallnesse of number of the beleueurs doth trouble vs, on the other side let vs call to minde, that none can comprehend the mysteries of God but they to whom it is giuen.

The viii. Chapter.

That so farre as mans reason may leave, there are sufficient proves to stablish the credi of Scripture.

V Nlesse we haue this assurance, which is both more excellent & of more force than any judgement of man, in vaine shall the authority of sprin-ture either be strengthened with arguments, or stablished with consent of y church, or confirmed with any other meanes of defence. For vnlesse this foudation be layd, it still remaineth hanging in doubl. As on the other side when exempting it from the common state of things, we have embraced it deuoutly and according to the worthinesse of it: then these things become very fit helps which before were but of smale force to graffe and fasten the assurance thereof in our minde. For it is maruellous, howe great establishment growth hereof, when with earnest study wee consider howe orderly and well framed a disposition of the diuine wisdome appeareth therein, howe heavenly a doctrine in euery place of it, and no-	hing thing laouoring of earthlinesse, howe beautifull an agreement of all the parts among them seues, and such other things as auaille to procure a majeftie to writings. But more perfectly are our heartes confirmed when we consider, how we are euem violently caried to an admiration of it rather with dignity of matter, than with grace of wordes. For this alfo was not done without the singular providence of God, that the hee mysteries of heavenly kingdom should for the most part be vtted vnder a contemptible basenes of wordes, leaft if it had bene beautified with more glorious speach, the wicked should cauile that the onely force of eloquence doth raigne therein. But when that rough and in a maner rude simplicite doth raife vp a greater reuerence of it selfe thant any Rhetoricians eloquence, what may we judge, but that there is a more mightie strength of trueth in the holy Scripture, than that it needeth any art of wordes? Not without caufe therefore the Apostle maketh his argument, to proue that the faith of the Corinthians was grounded vpon the power of God, and not vpon mans wydome, because his preaching among them was fet forth not with ensing speach of mans wydome, but in plaine evidence of the spirite and of power. For the trueth is then fet free from all douting, when not vpholden by foraigne aids it selfe alone suficeth to sustaine it selfe. But how this power is properly alone belonging to the Scripture, hereby appeareth, that of all the writings of men, be they never fo cunningly garnished, no one is so farre able to pearce our affections. Reade Demofthenes or Cicero, read Plato, Ariftotele, or any other of all that forte: I graunt they shall maruellously allure, delite, moue, and rauih thee. But if from them thou come to this holy reading of Scriptures, wilt thou or not, it shall so liuely moue thy affections, it shall so pearce thy heart, it shall so settle within thy bones, that in comparison of the efficacie of this feeling, all that force of Rhetoricians and Philosophers shall in manner vnish away: so that it is easie to perceiue that the Scriptures, which do farre excell all gifts and graces of mans industrie: doe in deede breath out a certaine diuinitie.

2 I graunt in dede, that some of the Prophets haue an elegant cleare yea and a beautifull phrase of speach, so as their eloquence giuent no place to the prophan writers: and by such examples it pleased the holy Ghost to shewe that he wanted not eloquence, though in the rest he vsed a rude and grosse style. But whether a man read Dauuid, Efay, and such like, who have a sweete and pleasant flowing speach, or Amos, the heardman, Hieremie and Zacharie, whose rougher talke favoreth of countrie rudenesse: in euery one of them shall appeare that majeftie of the holy Ghost that I spake of. Yet am I not ignorant, that as Satan is in many things a counterfater of God, that with deceitfull refemblance he might better creepe into simple mens mindes: so hath he crauftie spread abroad with rude and in manner barbarous speach, those wicked errors wherewith he deceived sily men, & hath oft times vfed discontinued phrases, that vnder such visoure he might hide his deceites. But how vaine and uncleanlie is that curious counterfater, all men that haue but meane understanding doe plainly see. As for the holy Scripture, although froward men labour to bite at many things, yet is it full of such sentences as could not be conceived by man. Let all the Prophets be looked upon, there shall not one be found among them, but he hath farre excelled all mans capacitie, in such sorte that those are to bee thought, to have no judgement of rait to whom their doctrine is vsfaucior.

3 Other men have largely entreated of this argument, wherefore at this time it sufficeth to touch but a few things, y chiefly make for the principall summe of the whole matter. Befide these points that I have already touched the very antiquitie of y Scripture is of great weight. For howsoever y Greek writers tel many fables of the Egyptian diuinitie: yet there remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is far inferior to the age of Moses. And Moses deuised not a new God, but setteth forth the same thing which the Israelites had receieved in long proccefe of time, counseled to them by their fathers as it were from hand to hand concerning the everlasting God. For what doth he else but labour to call them backe to the covenant made with Abraham? If he had brought a thing never heard of before, he had had no entrie to begin. But it must needs be y the deluerauce from bondage, whereas they were detayned, was a thing well & commonly known among them, so that the hearing of the mention thereof did foorthwith raise vp all their minds. It is also likely that they were informed of the number of the CCCC. ycares. Nowe it is to be considered, if Moses which himselfe by so long distance of time was before all other writers, do from a beginning so long before himselfe fetch the original deluerauce of his doctrine: how much the holy Scripture then is beyond all other writings in antiquitie.

4 Vnlesse perhaps some lift to beleue the Egyptians, that stretch their antiquity to fixe thousand yeares before the creation of the world. But sith their vaine babling hath bin alway scorned euyn of all y prophane writers themselves, there is no caufe why I should spend labour in confuting of it. But Iosephus against Appion, alleageth testimonies worthy to be remembred out of auncient writers, whereby may be gathered, that by consent of all nations the doctrine that is in the lawe hath bin famous euyn from the first ages, although it were neither read nor truely known. Nowe, that neither there should remaine to the malitious any cause of suspicition, nor to the wicked any occasion to caull, God hath for both these daungers provided good remedies. When Moses rehearseth what Jachob almoast three hundred yeares before had by heauenels inspiration pronounced upon his owne posteritie, how doth he set foorth his owne tribe? yea in the person of Leui he spotseth it with eternall infamie. Symeon (sayth he) and Leui the vesils of wickednesse. My soule come not into their counsel, nor my tongue into their secret. Truely he might haue passed over that blotte with silence, in so doing not onely to please his father, but also not to staine himselfe and his whole family with part of the same shame. Howe can that writer be suspected, which unconstrainedly publishing by the oracle of the holy Ghost, that the principall auncester of the family whereof him selfe descended was an abominable doer, neither privatielie prouided for his owne honor, nor refused to enter in displeasure of all his owne kindred, whom undoubtedlie this matter greeued? When also he rehearseth the wicked murm-murmuring of Aaron his owne brother, and Marie his sister: shall wee face that he spake after the meaning of the flesh, or rather that he wrote it obeying the commandement of the holy Ghost? Moreover Sith himselfe was by set in authoritie, why did he not leave at least y office of the lyre priest-hode to his own sonnes, but appointeth them to the basest place? I touse here only a fewe things of many. But in the lawe it selfe a man shall eche where meets with many argumentes that are able to bring full prose to make men believe that Moses without all question commeth from heaven as an Angell of God.

5 Now these so many and so notable miracles that he recounteth, are euen as many Establishements of the lawe that he deliuered, and the doctrine that he published. For, this that he was caried in a cloud vp into the moun-taine: that there euen to the fourtieth day he continued without company of men: that in the very publishing of the lawe his face did shine as it were besette with sunne beames: that lightenings flashed round about: that thunders and noyses were heard eche where in the ayre: that a trompet sounded being not blown with any mouth of man: that the entrie of the tabernacle by a cloude sette betwene was kept from the fight of the people: that his authority was so miraculously reuenged with the horrible destruction of Chore, Dathan and Abiron, and all that wicked faction: that the rock stri-ken with a rodde did by and by powre forth a riuier: that at his prayer it rayned Manna from heaven: did not God herein commend him from heaven as an undoubted Prophet? If any man object agaynst me, that I take these things as confessed, which are not out of controuersie, it is easy to answere this caullation. For seeing that Moses in open assembly published all these things, what place was there to tayne before those witnesses that had them seene the things done? It is likely forsoth that he would come among them, and rebuking the people of infidelity, stubbornes, unthankfulness and other finnes, would have boasted that his doctrine was established in their owne sight with such miracles, which in deede they never sawe.

6 For this is also worthy to be noted, so oft as he telleth of any miracles, he therewithall odiously ioyneth such things as might stirre the whole people to erie out against him, if there had bin never so little occasion. Whereby appeareth, they were by no other meane brought to agree vnto him, but because they were ever more than sufficiently confoundt by their owne experience. But because the matter was plainlier knowne, than the prophane coulde denye that miracles were done by Moses: the father of lying hath ministrad them an other caullation, saying, that they were done by Magical artes and sorcellery. But what likely proofe haue they to accuse him for a sorcerer, which so farre abhorred from such superstition, y he com-mandeth to stone him to death, that doth but ake counsell of sorcerers and footsaiers? Truely no such deceuier vieth his ingulling caues, but that he studieth to amase the minde of the people to get himselfe a fame. But what doth Moses? by this that he crieth out, that himselfe and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth only execute those things that God hath appointed,
Of the knowledge of he doth sufficiently wipe away all blottes of thinking evil of him. Nowe if the thinges themselves be considered, what enchantement could bring to passe that Manna daily raining from heaven, should suffice to feede you people? and if any man keep in store more than his suffe measure, by the vertue rotting thereof he should be taught, that God did punish his want of beleefe?
Besides that, many great ones God suffered his servant so to be tried, y now the wicked can nothing prevail with prating against him. For how oft did sometime the people proudlie and impudently make insurrections, sometime duers of them conspiring among themselves went about to overthrowe the holy servant of God: how could he haue begled their fury with illusions? And the ende that followed plainly sheweth, that by this means his doctrine was stablished to continue to the ende of all ages.

Gen. 49. 7 Moreover where he assigneth the chiefe governement to the tribe of Iuda in the person of the Patriarche Iacob, who can deny that this was done by spirit of prophecy, specially if we wye in consideration the thing it selfe, how in comming to passe it proved true? Imagine Mofes to haue bin the first author of this prophecy; yet from the time that he did first put it in writing, there passed four hundred yeares wherein there was no mention of the scepter in the tribe of Iuda. After Saul was consecrate king, it seemed that the kingdom shoulde rest in the tribe of Benjamin. When David was appointed by Samuel, what reason appeared there why the course of inher-ITANCE of the kingdom shoulde be chaunged? who would haue looked that there should have come a king out of the base house of a hearende? And when there were in the same house seuen brethren, who would haue said that that honour hold light vpon the yongest? By what meane came he to hope to be a king? who can say that this anointment was governed by any arte, trauaile or policy of man, and not rather that it was a fulfilling of the heavenly prophecy? Likewise those things that Moses aforespeaketh, albeit darkely, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into the covenant of God, seeing they came to passe almost two thousande yeares after, doe they not make it plaine that he spake by the inspiration of God? I overskippe his other tellinges aforehand of things, which do so evidently favour of the revelation of God, that all men that haue their founde wit may plainly perceiue that it is God that speaketh. To be short, that same one song of his, is a cleare looking glasse, wherein God evidently appeareth.

Deuter. 32. 8 But in the other prophets the same is yet also much more plainlie scene. I will choose out only a few examples, because to gather them all together were too great a labour. When in the time of Esay the kingdom of Iuda was in peace, yea when they thought that the Chaldees were to them some stay and defence, then did Esay prophecie of the destruction of the city and exile of the people. But admit that, yet this was no token plaine enough of the instinct of God, to tell long before of such things as at the time seemed false, and afterward proved true: yet those prophecies that he vereth concerning their deliuerance, whence shall we say that they proceed-d but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whom the Chaldees should be subdued, and the people restored to libertie. There passed more than an hun-
dred yeares from the time that Efaie so prophecied before that Cyrus was borne: for Cyrus was borne in the hundreth yeare or thereabouts after the death of Efaie. No man could then gesse that there should be any such Cyrus, that should have warre with the Babylonians, that should bring subiect so mightie a monarchie vnder his dominion, and make an ende of the exile of the people of Istaell. Doth not this bare telling without any garnishment of wordes evidently shew, that the thinges that Efaie speaketh, are the undoubted oracles of God, and not the conjectures of men? Againe, when Hieremie a little before that the people was caried away, did determine the ende of the captituation within three score & ten yeares, and promised returne and libertie, must it not needs be that his tongue was gonerned by the spirit of God? What shamelessnesthe shall it be to deny, that the credite of the prophetes was stablished by such prooues, and that the same thing was fulfilled in deede, which they them selues do reporte to make their sayings to be beleued? Behold, the former thinges are come to passe, and new thinges do I declare: before they come forth, I tell you of them. I leue to speake how Hieremie and Ezechiel being so farre astonder, yet prophecying both at one time, they so agreed in all their sayings as if either one of them had endeited the wordes for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing prophecies of things to come for the space of sixe hundred yeares after, in such sort as if he had compiled an historie of things already done and commonly known? These thinges if godly men haue well considerd, they shall be sufficiently well furnished, to appease the barkinges of the wicked. For the plaine proofe hereof is too cleare to be subiecte to any cauillations at all.

9 I know what some learned men do prate in corners, to shew the quicknes of their wit in assailing the truth of God. For they demande, who hath assur'd vs that these thinges which are read vnder title of their names, were euer written by Mofes and the prophetes. Yea, they are so hardy to moue this question, whether euer there were any such Mofes or no. But if a man should call in doubt whether euer there were any Plato, or Ariftotle, or Cicero: who would not say, that such madnesthe were worthy to bee corrected with strokes and stripes? The law of Mofes hath bin maruellously preferred rather by heauenly prudence then by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the Priestes it late buried a little while: yet since the time that the godly king Iosias found it, it hath still by continual succession from age to age bin vsed in the handes of men. Neither did Iosias bring it foorth as an unkownen or new thing, but such a thing as had bin euer commonlie published, and whereof the remembrance was at that time famous. The originall booke it selfe was appointed to be sacredly kept in the temple, and a copie written out thereof, to remaine with the keepers of the kings Records. Only this had happened, that the Priestes had ceas'd to publish the law according to the olde accustomed maner, and the people themselues had neglec'd their wonted reading of it. Yea there in maner passed no age wherein the establishment thereof was not confirmed and renew'd. They that had Dauid in their handes, knewe they not of Mofes? But to speake of them all at once, it is most certain that their writings came to posterity none otherwise but from hand to hand (as I may term it) by continuall orderly course of yeres delivered from their fathers, which had partly heard them speak, & partly while the remembrance was fresh of it, did learne of them which heard them that they had so spoken.

As for that which they obieect out of the historie of the Machabees, to minish the credite of scripture, it is such a thing as nothing can be deviseed more fitte to stabill the same. But first let vs wipe away the colour that they lay vpon it, & then let vs turne vpon them selues the engine that they raise vp against vs. When Antiochus (say they) commannded all the bookes to be burned, whence are come these copies that we now haue? On the other side I ask them, in what shop they could so fone be made? It is evident, that after the crueltie appeased they were immediately abroade againe, and were without controversy knowne to be the same of all godly men, that having bene brought vp in the doctrine of them, did familiarly knowe them. Yea, when all the wicked men being as it were confined together, did insolently triumphe with reproches vpon the Iewes, yet never was there any that durst lay to their charge false changing of their bookees. For whatsoever they thinke the Iewes religion to be, yet still they thinke Moses to be the author of it. What then doe these praters else, but bewray their owne more then doggish frowardnesse, while they falsely say that these bookees are changed, and newe put in their places, whose sacred antiquitie is approved by consent of all histories? But to spende no more labour vainly in confuting such foolish caullations: let vs rather hereby consider how great a care God had for the preservation of his word, when beyond the hope of all men, he saued it from the outrage of the most cruel tymant, as out of a present fire; that he endewed the godly priests & other with so great constancie, they sticked not to redeeme this booke eu'n with losse of their life if need were, & so to conuay it ouer to posterity:that he disappointed their narrow search of so many gouernors & souldiours. Who can but acknowledge the notable & miraculous worke of God, these sacred monumetts which the wicked verily thought to have bene vertely destroyed, but by and by came abroade againe as fully restored, & that with a great deale more honour? For by & by followed the translating of them into Greek, to publishe them through out the world. And not in this only appeared the miraculous working, that God preferred the tables of his covenant from the bloudy proclamations of Antiochus:but also that among so manifold miserable afflictions of the Iewes, wherewith the whole nation was sometime worne to a fewe & wafted, & last of all, brought in maner to vter destruction, yet they remained still safe and extant. The Hebrew tongue lay not onely vnesteemed, but almost vnknown. And surely had not bene Gods pleasure to haue his religion provided for, it had perished altogether. For howe much the Iewes that were since their returne from exile, were swarmed from the naturall vs of their mother tongue, appeareth by the Prophetes; that liued in that age, which is therefore worthie to be noted, because by this comparison the antiquitie of the lawe and the prophets is the more plainly persuch. And by whom whom hath God preferr'd for vs the doctrine of salvation contained in the law and the prophets, to the end that Christ might in his appointed time be openly shewed? even by the most cruelly bent enemies of Christ, y Iewes whom Saint Augustine doth therefore worthily call the keepers of the Librarie of Christian Church, because they have ministr'd vs that thing, to reade whereof, themselues haue no vfe.

11 Nowe if we come to the new Testament, with how sounde pillars is the truth thereof vpholden? The three Euangelists write the historick in base and simple speach. Many proud men do lothe that simplicitie, because they take no heed to the chief pointes of doctrine therein, whereby it were easie to gather, that they entreate of heavenly mysteries above mans capacitie. Surely whosoever haue but one dropp of honest shame will be ashamed if they reade the first chapter of Luke. Now, the sermons of Christ, the same whereof is shortly comprized by these three Euangelists, do easily deliver their writing from all contempte. But John thundering from on hie, whose whom he compelleth not to obedience of faith, hee throweth downe their stubburnes more mightily than any thunderbolt. Now let come forth all these sharpened faultfinders, that haue a great pleasure to shake the reverency of scripture out of their owne and other mens hearts, let them reade Johns Gospell: Wil they or no, they shall there finde a thousand sentences that may at least awaken their sluggishnesse, yea that may print a horrible brande in their owne consciences to restraine their laughing. The same is to bee thought of Peter and Paul, in whose writings although the more parte be blinde, yet the verie heavenly majestie in them holdeth all men bounde, and as it were fast tied vnfoe it. But this one thing doth sufficiently dauntance their doctrine above the worlde, that Mathew being before all gien to the gaine of his monie boorde, Peter and John brought vp in their fishe boates, all grosse vnlearned men, had learned nothing in mens schoole that they might deliuer to other. Paul, not only from a profeysed, but also from a cruel and bloody enemie converted to a newe man, with sodaine and vnhop'd chaunge doth thewe, that being compell'd by heavenly authoritie he now mainstanth that doctrine, which before he had fough't against. Now let these dogges deny, that the holy Ghost came downe vpon the Apostles, or let them differene the historie: yet still the truth it selfe openly cryeth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghost, which being before time despis'd mens among the raskall people, sodenly began to gloriously to entreate of heavenly mysteries.

12 There be ye, also furthermore many very good reasons, why the conscience of the Church should not be esteemed without weight. For it is to be accounted no small matter, that since the Scripture was first published, y willes of so many ages haue constantly agreed to obey it. And ye howsoever Satan with all the worlde hath travailed by marvelous means, either to oppresse it, or ouerthrowe it, or utterly to blotte & deface it out of mens remembrance, yet eu'r still like a palme tree, it hath risen vp aboue, and remained invincible. For there hath not lightly bin in olde time any sophister or Rhetorician, who haue any more excell'd with the other, but he hath bent his force against this Scripture: yet they all have nothing prevailed: The whole power of the earth hath armed it selfe to destroy it, & yet all their enterprises are vanished away, as in smoke. How could it have resisted being so mightily on either side assailed, if it had had none other defence but men? Yea rather it is hereby proved, that it came from God himselfe, that all the travailes of men striving against it, yet it hath of her owne power still risen vp. Beside that, not one citie alone, nor one only nation hath agreed to receive and embrace it: but so farre as the world extendeth in length & breadth, the Scripture hath attained her credite, by one holy conspiracie of divers nations, which otherwise were in nothing agreeable one with another. And forasmuch as such agreement of mindes to divers & disagreeing in manner in all things els, ought much to move vs, because it appeareth, that the fame is brought about none other way, but by working of the heavenly majestie: no small estimation groweth vnto it, when we behold their godlines, that do so agree, I mean not of them all, but onely of those, with whom as with lightes it pleased God to have his Church to shine.

13. Now with what assurrednesse of minde ought we to submitte vs to that doctrine which we see established and witnessed with the bloude of so many holy men? They when they had but once receiued it, sticked not boldely without feare, yea and with great chearfulnesse to die for it: howe should it then come to passe, that we, having it controiled to vs with such an assurred pledge, should not with certaine and vnmoveable persuation take holde of it? It is therefore no small confirmation of the Scripture, that it hath beene sealed with the bloude of so many witnesses, specially when we consider that they suffred death to beare witness of their faith: and not of a frantike diuertinge of braine, as sometime the erronious spirites are wont to doe, but with a firme and constant and yet sober zeale of God. There be other reasons and those not few nor weake, whereby the Scripture hath her dignitie and majestie not onely ascertained vnto godly hartes, but also honourably defended against the subtilties of caullers, yet be they such as be not of them selues sufficiently auayable to bring (edr aft credite vnto it, vntill the heavenly father disclosing therin his majestie, doth bring the resuerence thereof out of al controversie. Wherefore then only the Scripture shall suffice to your knowledge of God that bringeth salvation, when the certentie thereof shall be grounded vpon the inwarde persuasion of the holy Ghost. So those testimonies of men that feue to confirme it shall not be vaine, if as seconde helps of our weakness they follow that cheefe and hyest testimony. But they do fondly that will have it persuaded by proofe to the vs faithfull, that the scripture is the wordes of God, which can not be knownen but by faith. For good reason therefore doth Augustine giue warning, that godlinesse and peace of minde ought to goe before, to make a man understand somewhat of so great matters.

That those samistical men, which forsaking Scripture, refuse vnto revelacion, doth overthrow all the princes of godliness.

Nowe
Now they that forsaking the Scripture doe imagine I wrote not what way to attaine vnto God, are to be thought not so much to be holden with error, as to be caried with rage. For there have arisen of late certaine giddie brained men, which most presumptuously pretending a schoole of the spirite, both themselves do forake all reading; and also doe scorne their simplicitie, which still follow the dead & slaying letter, as they call it. But I would faine knowe of these men, what spirite that is, by whose inspiration they are caried vp so hie, that they dare despite the doctrine of the Scripture as childish and base. For if they ansrewre that it is the spirite of Christ, then such carelesnesse is worthie to be laughed at. For I thynke they will graunt, that the Apostles of Christ and other faithfull in the primitue Church were lightned with none other spirite. But none of them did learne of that spirite to despite the worde of God: but rather every one was moued more to reverence it, as their writings do most plainly witnesse. And surely so was it foretold by the mouth of Elias. For where he faith, My spirite that is upon thee, and my wordes which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seede for euer: he doth not binde the olde people to the outwarde doctrine as though they were fet to learne to spell, but rather he teacheth, that this shall be the true & perfect felicitie of the newe church vnder the regne of Christ, that it shall no lesse be led by the voice of God, than by the spirite of God. Whereby wee gather, that these Iewde men with wicked sacrilege doe seuerly affounde those things that the Prophet hath ioyned with an inutilable knot. Moreover, Paul being raised vp into the third heauen, yet ceasst not to go forward in the doctrine of the law and the Prophets, euens as he exhorteth Timothy, a doctor of singular excellencie to apply reading. And worthie is that commendation to be remembred, wherewith he setteeth foroorth the Scripture, saying, that it is profitable to teach, to admonish and to reprooue, that the servantes of God may be made perfect. How diuulish a madnesse is it to faine, that the vs of Scripture is but transtorie, and lasteth but for a while, which in deed guideth the children of God euens to the last ende? Againes, I would have them ansrewre me this: whether they haue taasted of another spirite than that, which the Lord promised to his disciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madnesse, yet I thynke they are not caried with such giddinesse, that they dare so boast. But what manner of spirite did he speake of in his promise? euens that spirite which should not speake of it selfe, but should minifter and inspire into their minde those things, which he the Lord himselfe had taught by his worde. It is not therefore the office of the spirite, which is promised vs, to faine new and unheard of revelations, or to coine a newe kinde of doctrine, whereby we should be led from the received doctrine of the Gospel, but to seale in our minds the selfe same doctrine that is commended vnto vs by the Gospel.

2. Whereby we plainly understand, that we ought right studiously to apply the reading and hearing of the Scripture, if we lift to take any vs and fruite of the spirite of God. As also Peter praiseth their diligence that are heedful to the doctrine of the Prophets, which yet might seeme to have giboundes. So for this present, let it suffice vs to learne, howe God the maker of heaven and earth doth gouerne the world by him created. Euer where is renouned both his fatherly bountie and enclined wil to do good, & there are allo examples rehearsed of his severitie, which shewe him to be a righteous punisher of wicked doinges, specially where his sufferance nothing preuateth with the obstinate.

2 In certaine places are set forth more plaine descriptions wherein his natural face is as in an image represented to be seen. For in the place where Moses describeth it, it semeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehend all that was lawfull for men to understand of God. The Lord (sayth he) the Lord, a mercifull God, and grantious, patient and of much mercy, and true, which keepest mercy, vnto thousandes which takest away iniquitie & wicked doinges, before whome the innocence shall not bee innocent, which rendreth the wickednesse of the fathers to the children and childrens children. Where let vs marke, that his eternitie and being of himselfe is expressed in the twise repeeting of that honorable name: and that then his vertues are rehearsed, in which is described vnto vs, not what he is in respect to himselfe, but what a one he is toward vs: that this knowledge of him may rather stand in a liuely feeling, than in an empty and supernatural speculation. And here we do heare receiued those vertues of his which we noted to shine in the heaven and earth, that is to say, clemencie, bountie, mercy, iftice, judgement and truth. For might and power are conteined vnder this name Elohim God. With the same names of addition do the Prophets set him forth when they mane fully to paint out his holy name. But, because I would not heap vp too many examples together, at this present let one Psalm suffice vs, wherein in the summe of all his vertues is so exactly reckened vp, that nothing can seeme to be omitted. And yet is nothing there rehearsed, but that which we may behold in his creatures. So plainly do we perceive God by information of experience, to be such as he declareth himselfe in his worde. In Jeremie where he pronounceth, what a one he would have vs knowe him to be, he setteth forth a description not altogether so full, but yet comming all to one effect. He that glorifieth, faith he, let him glory in this that he knoweth me to be the Lord that do mercie, ifstice, and judgement on the earth. Surily these three things are very necessary for vs to know: mercy, in which alone consisteth all our saluation: Judgement, which is daily executed vpon euyl doers, & more greucious is prepared for them to eternall destruction: Ifstice, whereby the faithfull are preferred & most tenderly cherished. Which things when thou hast conceiued, the prophesy faith thou haist sufficiently enough whereof thou maist glory in God. And yet here are not omitted either his truth or his power, or his holines or goodnes. For how should the knowledge and sure which is here required of his ifstice, mercy and judgement, vnles it did rest vpon his unmoveable truth? And how should we beleue that he doth gouerne the earth with ifstice and judgement, but understanding his power? And whence cometh his mercy but of his goodnes? If then all his waies be mercy, ifstice & ifstice, in them must holines also needs be seene. And to none other end is directed y knowledge of God that is is set forth unto us in the Scriptures, than is that knowledge also which appeareth emprinted in his creatures, that is to say: it first moutheth vs to the feare of God, and then to put confidence in him, to the ende we may learne first to honour him with perfect innocency of life and vnfained obedience, and then to hang altogether upon his goodnesse.

3 But here I mean to gather a summe of generall doctrine. And first let the readers note, that the Scripture to the end to direct vs to the true God, doth expressly exclude and cast away all the gods of the Gentiles, because commonly in a manner in all ages religion hath bin corrupted. True it is in deed that the name of one God was euery where known and renowned. For euery that they worshipped a great number of Gods, so oft as they did speake according to the proper sense of nature, they simply vsed the singular name of God, as if they were contented with one God alone. And this was wisely marked by Iuftine the Martyr, which for this purpofe made a booke of the Monarchie of God, where by many testimonies he sheweth this, that there is but one God, was engraven in the heartes of all men. The same thing also doth Tertullian proue by the common phrafe of speech. But rather as much as all without exception are by their owne vanitie either drawn or fallen to false forged deuifes, and so their senses are become vaine, therefore all that cουt they naturally vnderflode of the being but one God, avail no further but to make them inexcusble. For euery the wisest of them doe plainly shewe the wandering error of their mind, when they with some god to assist them, and in their prayers doe call upon vncertaine gods. Moreover in this that they imagined God to haue many natures although they thought somewhat lesse absurdely than the rude people did of Jupiter, Mercury, Venus, Minerua and other: yet were they not free from the deceites of Satan, and as we haue already sayde els where, whatsoever wayes of escape the Philosophers haue suftelie inuented, they cannot purge these lustes of rebellion but that they all haue corrupted the truth of God. For this reason, Habucuc after he had condemned all idoles biddeth to seeke God in his owne temple, that the faithfull should not admitt him to be any other than such as he had disclofed himselfe by his word.

That it is unlawfull to attribute un to God a visible forme, and that generally they forfake God, so many as do erect to themselves any images.

But as the Scripture prouiding for the rude and grosse wit of man yeth to speake after the common maner: so when it meaneth to make seuerally knowne the true God from the false gods, it chiefly comparreth him with idoles: not that it doth allow these inventions that are more subtle and finely taught by the Philosophers, but the plainlier to discloze the foolishnesse of the worlde, yea rather their madness in seeking God so long as they cleaue euery one to their owne imaginations. Therefore that exclusive definition which we commonly heare, bringeth to nought all that maner of Godhead that men frame to themselves by their owne opinion, because God himselfe is the only convenient wittness of himselfe. In the meane time, fish this brutish groffeneffe hath posseffed the whole world, to couer visible shapes of God, and so to forge themselves Godes of timber, stone, gold, siluer, and other dead and corruptible matter, we ought to hold this principle, that with wicked falshood the glory of God is corrupted so oft as any shape is framed to represent him. Therefore God in his law, after he had once challenged the glory of his deitie to himselfe alone, meaning to teach vs what manner of worshipping him hee alloweth or refuseth, addeth immediately: Thou shalt make thee no graven image, nor any similitude, in which wordes he restraineeth our liberty, that wee attempt not to represent him with anie visible image. And there he shortly reckneth vp all the forms wherewith of long time before, superstition had begun to turne his truth into lying. For we know that the Persians worshipped the Sunne, yea & so many stars as the foolish nations sawe in the skie, so many goddes they framed them. And scarce was there any living creature which was not among the Egyptians a figure of God. But the Grecians were thought to be wiser than the rest, because they worshipped God in a shape of a man. But God compareth not images one with an other, as though one were more & an other leffe meet to bee vsed, but without any exception hee reckneth all images pictures and other signes, whereby the superstitious thought to have God neere vnto them.

2. This is easie to be gathered by the reasons which hee joyneth to the prohibition. First with Moses: Remember that the Lord hath spoken to thee in the vale of Horeb. Thou hearest a voyce, but thou sawest no body. Therefore take heed to thine selfe, leaft peradventure thou be deceiued and make to thine selfe any likenesse &c. We see how openly God setteth his voyce against all counterfeit shapes, that we may know that they forsoke God who soever do couer to have visible formes of him. Of the Prophets onely Esay shalbe enough which speaketh oft and much hereof, to teach that the majestie of God is defin'd with vncomely and foolish counterfeiting, when he being without body is likened to bodily matter: being incomming to a visible image: being a spirit, to a thing without life: being incomprehensible, to a small lump of timber, stone or gold. In like manner reafoneth Paul: For as much as we are the generation of GOD, we ought not to thinke that the godhead is like vnto gold, or siluer, or stone graven by art and the invention of man. Whereby it certainly appeareth, whatsoever images are erected or pictures painted to express the shape of God, they simply displeasce him as certaine dishonours of his majestie. And what marvel is it if the holie Ghost do thunder out these oracles from heauen, sith he compelleth the very wretched and blind idolaters themselves to confesse this in earth? It is known how Seneca complained as it is to read in Augustin. They dedicate (faith he) the holy immortal and inuiolable Gods in most vile & base stuffe, and put upon them the shapes of men and beastes, and some of them with kinde of man & woman mingled together, and with sundrie shapen bodies, and such they call Gods which if they should receive breath & meere them, would be reckned monsters. Whereby againe plainly appeareth, that it is fond cauillation wherewith the defenders of images seake to escape, which say that the Iewes were forbidden images, because they were inculcable to superstitition. As though that thing pertained to one nation only which God bringeth forth of his eternall being and the continuall order of nature. And Paul spake not to the Iewes but to the Athenienfes when he confuted their error in counterfailing a shape of God.

3 God in his deed, I grant, sometime in certain signes hath given a presence of his godhead, so as hee was sayde to bee beholde face to face, but all these signes that ever he shewed did aptly serue for means to teach, and withall did plainly admonisht men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloud and sioke and flame, although they were tokens of the heavenly glory, yet did they as it were bridle and restraine the minde of men that they should not attempt to passe any further. Wherefore not Moses himselfe, to whom God did clofe him selfe most familiarly in comparison of other, obtained by prayer to see that face, but receiued this answere that man is not able to sustaine so great brightnesse. The holy Ghost appeared under the likenes of a dove, but fith he immediately vanished away, who doth not see that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment the faithfull are put in minde that they ought to beleue him to be an invisible spirite, that holding them contented with his vertue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This, that God appeared sometimes in forme of a man, was a forerowing of the decealing that was to be made of him in Christ. And therefore it was not lawfull for the Iewes to abuse this pretence to erect to themselfes a representation of the godhead in the shape of man. Also the mercy scate wherein God shewed forth the presence of his power in the time of the lawe, was so made as it might teache that the best beholding of the godhead is this, when mens minde is carried beyond the minde with admiration of it. For the Cherubins with their wings stretched abroade did cover it, the vail did hide it, & the place it selfe being set faire inward did of it selfe sufficiently keepe it secret. Therefore it is very plaine that they be very mad that go about to defende ye images of God and of Saints with the example of these Cherubins. For, I pray you, what meant these little images, but to shewe that images are not meete to represent the mysteries of God? forasmuch as they were made for this purpose, that hying the mercy scate with their wings they should not only keepe backe the eyes of man, but also all his sences from the beholding of God, and so to correct his rash hardinesse. For this purpose made it that the Prophetes described the Seraphins shewed them in vision, with their face uncouvered: whereby they signifie, that so great is the brightness of God's glory of God the Angels themselves are kept from direct beholding it, and the small sparkes thereof that shine in the Angels are withdrawn from our eyes. Although yet so many as rightly judge, do acknowledge that the Cherubins of whome we now spake, pertained onely to the olde maner of introduction as it were of children vised in the lawe. So to draw them now for an example to our age, is an absurditie. For ye childish age, as I may so terme it, is palled, for the which such rudimenteres were appointed. And it is much shame, that the painime writers are better expounders of the lawe of God than the Papistes are. Intemal reprocheth the fewes as it were in scorne that they honor the white cloudes and the deitie of heaven. I grant he speaketh perturly & wickedly: and yet he speakeeth more truely in saying that they haue among them no image of God, than the Papistes do which prate that they had a visible image of God. And whereas that people with a certaine hote haftiness, brake out oftenetimes to seke them idoles, even as waters out of a great fresh spring boile out with violent force: hereby rather let vs learne how great is \( \frac{1}{2} \) inclination of our nature to idolatry, left throwing upon the lewes the blame of that fault which is common to al, we sleepe a deadly sleepe vnder vnaine allurementes to sinne.

4 To the same purpose serueth this saying: The idoles of the Gentiles are gold and filuer, euem the worke of mens handes. Because the Prophet doth gather of the stuffe it selfe, that they are no gods that haue a golden or filuer image: and he taketh it for confessed trueth, that it is a foolish fained invention whatsoever we conceiue of our owne serce concerning God. He nameth rather gold and filuer than clay or stone, that the beautie or \( \frac{1}{2} \) price should not serue to bring a reuerence to idoles. But he concludeth generally that nothing is leffe allowable, than gods to be made of dead stuffe. And in the mean ende he standeth as much upon this point, that men are carried away with too mad a rashnes, which themselves bearing about with them but a borrowed breath, readie to vanishe away at euery momente, yet dare give the honor of God to idoles. Man must needs confess that himselfe is but a creature of a daies continuance, and yet he will have a piece of metal to be counted God to which himselfe gauie the beginning to bee a God. For whence came the beginning of idoles but from the wil of men? Very justly doth the heathen Poet giue them this taunt:

1.lat.8.

I was sometime a fig tree log, a blocke that seru'd for noth:
The workman douned what of me were fittest to be wrought:
A foume to sse upon, or els a Priap God to be.
As length he thought the better was a God to make of me.

Eloquently doth an earthly silly man that breatheth out his owne life in manner euery moment, by his workemanship shall conuoy the name and honour of God to a dead stock. But farre much as Epicure in scoffingly ieeting hath caured for no religion, let vs leaue the tauntes of him and such as he is, and let the rebuking of the Prophet pricke vs or rather thrust vs through where he faith, that they are too much bewildedly witted \( \frac{1}{2} \) with one selfe piece of woode do make a fire and warme them felues, doe heat the ouen to bake bread, doe roost or seeth flesh, & doe make them a God before which they fall down humbly to pray. Therfore in an other place he doth not only accuse them by the law, but also doth reproch them that they haue not learned of \( \frac{1}{2} \) foundations of the earth: for that there is nothing leffe conuenient than to bring God to the meafure of fince foote which is above all meafure and incomprehensible. And yet this same monstrous thing which manifeatly repugneth against \( \frac{1}{2} \) order of nature, custome sheweth to be natural to men. We must moreover hold in mind, that superftitions are in Scripture commonly re Zubuk in this phrase phrase of speech, that they are the works of men's hand which want the authority of God: that this may be certain, that all these manneres of worshipping that men doe devout of themselves are detestable. The Prophet in the Pfalme doth amplify the madness of them that therefore are endued with understanding, that they should know that all things are moved with the only power of God, and yet they pray for helpe to thinges dead and senselesse. But because the corruption of nature carieth as well al nations, as ech man privately to so great madness, at last the holy Ghost thundreth with terrible curse against them, saying: Let them that make them become like to them and so many as trust in them. And it is to be noted that a similitude is no lesser forbidden than a grauen image, whereby the fond sutilty of the Greeks is confuted. For they thinke they are well discharged if they graue not a God, while in painting they doe more licentiously outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeth an image not onely to be made by the grauer but also to be counterfeit by any other workeman, because such counterfaiiting is euill and to the dishonor of his majestie.

5 I know that it is a saying more than common among the people, that images are lay mens bookes. Gregory so said, but the spirit of God pronounceth far otherwise, in whose schoole if Gregory had bin taugh, he woulde never so haue spoken. For whereas Hieremy plainly faith that the stocke is a doctrine of vanity: and whereas Habacuc teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lyes: surely heresof is a general doctrine to be gathered, that it is vaine and lying who soever men learne by images concerning God. If any man take exception, and say that the Prophets reprove them onely which abuses images to wicked superstition: I grant that to be true. But I adde further that which is easie for all men to see, that they condemn that thing wholly which the Papistes take for an assured principle, that images are in steede of bookes. For they doe in comparison set images against God as things directly contrary and such as never can agree together. This comparison I say is made in those places which I haue alledged. Sith there is but one true God whom the Iewes did worship, it is amiss and falsely done to force visible shapes to represent God, and men are miserably deceived, that thereby seek for knowledge of God. Finally if it were not true that it is a deceitfull and corrupt knowledge of God that is learned by images, the Prophets would not so generally condemn it. At least thus much I winne of them when we shew that it is vanity and lying that men doe attempt to represent God with images, we doe nothing but rehearse word for word that which the Prophets haue taught.

6 Let be read what Laistantius and Eufebius haue written of this matter which stick it not to take it for certaine that they were all mortall of whom images are to be seene. Likewise Augustine: which without douting pronounceth that it is unlawfull not onely to worship images, but also to set vp images to God. And yet faith he none other thing but the same which many yeares before was decreed by the Elibertine Counsell, whereof this is the xxxvi. Chapter. It is orderd that no pictures be had in the Church, that the thing which is honoured and worshipped be not painted on the walles.

walle. But most notable is that which in another place Augustine addideth out of Varro, and confirmeth it with his owne attent, that they which first brought in the images of Gods, both took away the feare of God, & brought in error. If Varro alone should say this, peraduenture it should be but of small authority. Yet ought it of right to make vs ashamed, that a heathen man groping in darkenesse came to this light, to see that bodily images are therefore vnmeete for the maisefy of God, because they diminish the feare of God and encrease error in men. The prooffe it selfe witnesseth that this was no lesse truely than wisely spoken. But Augustine having borrowed it of Varro, bringeth it forthe as of his owne minde. And first he admonisheth, the first errors wherewith men were entangled concerning God, began not of images, but as with new matter added encreased by them. Secondly he expoundeth that the seare of God is therefore diminisshed or rather taken away therby, because his majestie may easily in the foolishnesse and in the fond and absurd forging of images growe to contempt. Which second thing I would to God we did not by prooffe finde to be so true. Whosoever therefore will court to be rightly taught, let him else where learne than of images, what is meete to be knowne concerning God.

7 Wherefore if the Papistes haue any shame, let them no more vs this shift to say that images are lay mens bookees, which by many testimonies of Scripture are so openly confuted. And although I grant them so much, yet should they not much get therby for defense of their idols. What monsters they thrust in, in the place of God, is well knowne. The pictures and images that they dedicate to Saints, what are they but examples of extreme riot and uncleanesse, wherunto if any would fashion himselfe, he were worthy to be beaten with stoues? Surely y brothelhowses, can shew harlots more chastly and soberly attred, than their temples shew images of these whom they would have advertise. Euen as vncomly array gue they to the Martyrs. Let the therefore fashion their idols at least to some honest shewe of shamefaiiness, that they may somewhat more colourably ly in saying, that they are the bookees of some holinesse. But if it were so, yet then would we answere, that this is not y right way to teach the faithful people in holy places, whom God would haue there instructed with far other doctrine than these trifles. God commanded in the churches a common doctrine to be set forth to all men in preaching of his word and in his holy mysteries: wherunto they shew themselves to haue a mind not very heedfull, that cast their eyes about to behold images. But whom do the Papistes call ley and vnlearned men whose vnskillfulnes may beare to be taught onely by images? forsooth even those whom y Lord knowledgeth for his discipiles, to whom he vouchsafeth to reveale y heavenly wisdome, whom he willeth to be instructed with the wholesome mysteries of his kingdom. I grant indeede as the matter standeth that there are at this day many which cannot be without such bookees. But whence I pray you growth that dulnes, but that they are defrauded of that doctrine which only was meete to instruct them with? For it is for no other cause that they which had the cure of churches gaue ouer their office of teaching to idols, but because themselves were dunce. Paul testifieth...
And the Author of this doctrine, to make men more easily to under understand, did so far as he could, represent the images that were made after the image of God, to which he added many miracles; for the which purpose they may be thought to have more than of a thousand crosses of wood or stone. For perhaps the covetous do set their minds and eyes after upon the golden & silver crosses than upon any words of God.

8 As concerning the beginning of idols, that is by common consent thought to be true which is written in the booke of wisdome, that they were the first authors of them, which gave this honor to the dead, superstitiously to worship their memorie. And truly I grant that this cuill custom was very antient, & I deny not that it was the herbrand wherewith the rage of men being kindled to idolatry, did more & more burne therin. Yet do I not grant that this was the first originall of this mischief. For it appeareth by Moses that images were vfed before that this curiosity in dedicating the images of dead men, whereof the prophane writers make often mention, were come in vre. When he telleth that Rachell had stolen her fathers idols, he speaketh it as of a common fault. Wherby we may gather that the wit of men is, as I may so call it, a continual worship of idols. After the generall flood, there was as it were a new regeneration of the world, and yet there passed not many years, but that men according to their owne lust signified them gods, & it is likely that the holy Patriarch yet living, his childrens children were gitten to idolatry, so that to his bitter grief he saw the earth defiled with idols, whose corruptions the Lord had but late purged with so horrible indugment. For Thare and Nachor even before the birth of Abraham were worshippers of false gods as Isaias testifieth. Seing the generation of Sem so soon swareted, what shall we judge of that posterity of Cham, who were already cursed in their father? The mind of men, as it is full of pride & rash boldness, presumeth to imagine God according to her owne conceit, & as it is possest with dulness, yea overwhelmed with grosse ignorance, so it conceiveth vanity & a fond fantastic in stead of God. And in these cuils is added a new mischief, that man astepteth to express the workmanship such a God as he inwardly conceiveth. Thus the mind begetteth the idole, & the hand bringeth it forth. The example of the Israelites poueth that this was their beginning of idolatry, that men do not believe that God is among them vnlesse he shew himself carnallly present. We know not (said they) what is become of this Moses: make vs gods: y may goe, before vs. They knew that there was a God whose power they had had experience of in so many miracles: but they did not believe y he was noe into the vnlesse they did see with their eyes a corporall representation of his face to be a witness unto them of the God that governed them. Their minde was Exod. 31, wherefore to know by vs image going before them, that God was the guide of their journey. This thing daily experience teacheth, that the flesh is alway vnquiet till it hath gotten some counterfeit: deuise like it selfe, wherein it may vainely delight as in an image of God. In a manner in al ages since the Cap. 11. Of the knowledge of the creation of the world, men to obey this blind desire have erected signs wherein they imagined God to be present before their carnall eyes.

For such invention forged, by and by followed worshipping. For when men thought that they beheld God in images, they did also worship him in them. At length being both with minde and eyes altogether fastned theron, they began to waxe more and more brutish, and to wonder at them and have them in admiration, as if there were some nature of godhead in them. So appeareth that men brake not out into the worshipping of images, till they were persuaded in some grosse opinion: not to thinke the images to be gods, but to imagine that there did a certaine force of Godhead abide in them. Therefore whether thou represent to thy selfe either God or a creature in the image, when thou failest downe to worship, thou art already bewitched with some superstition. For this reason the Lord hath forbidden not onely images to be erected that are made to express a likenesse of him, but also any titles or stones to be dedicated, that should stand to be worshipped. And for the same reason also in the commandement of the law, this other point is added concerning worshipping. For so some as they have forged a visible forme for God, they also tyue the power of God unto it. So beastly foolish are men, that there they fasten God where they counterfeit him, and therefore must they needs worship it. Neither is there any difference whether they simply worship the idole, or God in the idole. This is alway idolatry, when honours due to God are giuen to an idole, vnder what colour so euer it be. And because God will not bee worshipped superstitiously, therefore whatsoever is giuen to idoles is taken from him. Let them take heed hereunto that secke for pretences to defende the abominable idolatry, wherwith these many ages past, true religion hath bin drowned and overthrown. But (say they) the images are not taken for Gods. Neither were the Iewes them selues so vnaudioed to forget that it was God by whose hand they had bin brought out of Egypt before they made the calfe. Yea when Aaron said, that those were the Gods by whom they were deliuered out of the land of Egypt, they boldly assented, shewing a plaine token of their meaning, that they would still keepe that God which was their deliverer, so that they might see him goe before them in the calfe. Neither is it to be beleued that the heathen were so grosse as to beleue, that God was no other thing but flockes and stones. For they changed their images at their pleasure, but stil they kept the same Gods in their minde: and there were many images of one God, & yet they did not according to the multitude of images faine them many Gods. Beside that they did dayly consecrate new images, yet did they not thinke that they made new Gods. Let the excuses be read which Augustine faith were pretended by the Idolaters of his age. When they were rebuked, the common fort answered, that they did not worship that visible thing, but the deity that did in it invisibly dwell. And they that were of some better religion, as he calleth it, did say that they did neither worshipp the image nor the spirite in it, but by the corporall image they did beholde the signe of that thing which they ought to worship. How then? All idolaters, whether they were of the Iewes, or of the the gentiles were none otherwise minded than as I haue faide: being not contented with a spiritual understanding of God, they thought by the images he should be more sure and nearer imprinted in them. After once that such disordered counterfeitimg of God well liked them, they never ended, till dayly more and more deluded with newe deceites they imagined that God did shewe foorth his power in images. And nevertheless, both the Iewes were persuaded that under such images they did worship the one true Lord of heauen and earth: and likewise the gentiles, their false gods, whome yet they faigned to dwell in heauen.

10 Whosoever deny that it hath thus bin done in time past, yea within our owne remembrance, they imputedly lyse. For, why fall they down before them? And when they pray, why turne they toward them as to the cares of God? For it is true that Augustine faith, that no man prayeth or worshippeth when he so beholdeth an image, but he is so affected in mind that he thinketh himselfe to be heard of it, or that it will doe for him what he defireth. Why is there such difference betweene the images of one God, that passing by one image with little reverence or none done to it, they honour an other solemnly? Why doe they weary themselves with vowed pilgrimages to visite those images wherof they haue like at home? Why doe they at this day in defense of them as it were for their religion & countrey, fight to slaughter and destruction, in such fort as they would better suffer to haue the one onely God than their idols to be taken from them? And yet I doe not reckon vp the groffe errors of the common people, which are almost infinite, and doe in maner possesse the hearts of all men. I doe onely shewe what themselves doe confesse when they meane most of all to execuse themselves of idolatry. We doe not call them (say they) our Gods. No more did the Iewes nor the Gentiles call them theirs in time past: and yet the Prophets ech where eafe not to cast in their teeth their fornicatiowith stockes and stones, for doing no more but such thinges as are dayly done by them that would be counted Christians, that is to say, that they carnally worshipped God in stockes and stones.

11 Although I am not ignorant, nor thinke good to passe it ouer as if I knewe it not, how they seek to escape with a more little distinction, whereof I shall againe make mention more at large hereafter. For they pretend that the worship which they giue to images, is Idolodulia, which is seruice of images, & not Idololatria which is worship of images. For so they term it when they teach that they may lawfully without any wrong done to God giue vntyto images and pictures that worship which they call Doulia or seruice. And so they thinke themselves without blame if they be but the seruants and not also the worshippers of idoles: as though it were not a little lighter matter to worship than to serue. And yet while they seek a hole to hide them in the Greeke word, they childishly disagree with themselves. For seeing Latreuein in Greeke signifieth nothing but to worship, their saying cometh but to this effect, as if they would say that they worship indeede their images, but without any worshipping. And there is no cause why they should say that I seake to catch them in wordes: but they themselves while they they seek to cast a mist before the eyes of the simple, do bewray their own ignorance. And yet though they be never so eloquent, they shall not attain by their eloquence to prove unto vs that one false same thing is two sundry things. Let them (say I) shew me a difference in the thing: it selfe whereby they may be thought to differ from the old idolaters. For as an adulterer or a murderer cannot escape giltiness of his fault, by giving his sinne a newe devised name: so it is a very absurditie to thinke that these men be quit by new devise of a name, if in the matter it selfe they nothing differ from those idolaters whome they themselfes are compelled to commend. But so farre are they from proving that their case differeth from the case of those idolaters, that rather the fountaine of all this whole mischief is an vnorderly counterfaiing, wherein they have fruited with them whilst with their owne wit they devise, & with their owne hands they frame them signifying forms to express them a fashio[n] of God.

12 And yet am I not so superstitious that I thinke no images may be suffered at all. But forasmuch as carving and painting are the gistes of God, I require that they both be purely and lawfully vfed. Least these things which God hath giuen vs for his glorie & for our own benefit, be not onely defiled by disorderd abuse, but also turned to our owne destruction. We thinke it unlawfull to have God fashioned out in visible forme, because himselfe hath forbidden it, & because it cannot be done without some defacement of his glory. And least they thinke that it is only we that are in this opinion, they that haue bene travelled in their workes haue finde that all sound writers did alwaye reproose the same thing. If then it be not lawfull to make any bodily image of God, much lesse shall it be lawfull to worship it for God's, or God in it. It remaineth therefore lawfull that only those things be painted & grauen whereof our eyes are capable: but that the majestie of God which is farre above the senses of our eyes, be not abused with vncomely devised shapes. Of this sort are partly histories & things done, partly images & fashions of bodies, without expressing of any things done by them. The first of these have some vide in teaching or admonishing a man: but what profit the second can bring saue only delectation, I see not. And yet it is evident, that euery such were almost all the images that heretofore haue stande vp in churches. Whereby we may judge that they were there set vp not by discrete judgement or choice, but by foolish and vnadvised desire. I speake not how much amisse & vncomely they were for the most parte fashioned, nor how licentiouly Painters & Carvers haue in this point shewed their wantonnesse, which thing I haue alreadye touched. Only I speake to this end, that though there were no fault in them, yet do they nothing auile to teach.

13 But leaving also that difference, let vs by the way consider whether it be expedient in Christian temples to haue any images at all, that do expresse either things done or the bodies of men. First if the authentick of the auncient church do any thing move vs, let vs remember that for about v. C. yeres together, while religion yet better flourished, & sincere doctrine was in force, the Christian churches were vniuersally without images. So they were then first brought in for the garnishment of churches, when the sinceritie of minisnistration was not a little altered. I will not now dispute what reason they had with them, were the first authors thereof. But if a man compare age with age, he shall see that they were much swaried from that uprightness of them that were without images. What do we think ye those holy fathers would have suffered the church to be so long without the thing which they judged profitable & good for them? But rather because they saw either little or no profit in it, & such danger to lurk vnderneath it, they did rather of purpose & ad\n tiely reject it, than by ignorance or negligence omit it. Which thing Au\ngustine doth also in express words testify: When they be set in such places (faith he) honorably on hve, to be scene of them that pray & do Sacrifice, although they want both sense & life, yet with the very likenesse y they haue of likely members & fenes, they so move the weake mindees, that they seem to live & breath, &c. And in another place: For that shape of members doeth worke & in manner enforcing thus much, that the minde liuing within a bodye doth think that body to haue sense, which he feeth like unto his own. And a little after: Images do more auaile to bow downe an unhappie soule, by this that they haue mouth, eyes, ears, & fenes, than to amend it by this that they neither speake nor see nor hear nor go. This truely seemedeth to be a cause why John willed vs to beware not only of worshipping of images, but also of images themselves. And we haue found it too much in experience, y through the horrible madnesse which hath heretofore possed the world, to the destruccion in maner of all godlineesse, so soon as images, be set vp in churches, there is as it were a signe set vp of idolatrie, because the folly of men cannot refrain it selfe, but it must forthwith ruune on to superstitious worshipping. But if there were not so much danger hanging thereby: yet when I consider for what vs temples are ordain'd, me thinke it is very ill be\ncoming the holinesse thereof to receiuie any other images than these huyly & natural images, which the Lord by his word hath con\nfecrate. I mean Baptisme and the Lords supper, and other ceremonies wherewith our eyes ought both more earnestly to be occupied & more huyly to be moued, than that they should neede any other images framed by the wit of men. Lo the incommensurable commoditie of images, which can by no value be recompened, if we beleue the Papistes.

I4 I thinke I had spoken enough of this thing already, but that the Nicene Synode doth as it were lay hand on me to enforce me to speake more. I mean not that most famous Synode which Constantine the Great assembled, but that which was holden eyght hundred yeres agoe, by the commandement and authority of Irene the empress. For that Synode decreed, that images should not only be had in churches, but also worshipped. For whatsoeuer I should say, the authoritie of the Synode would make a great prejudice on the other side. Although to say truth, that doth not so much moue me, as make it appeare to the readers how farre their rage extended, that were more desirous of images than became Christians. But first let vs dispatch this. They that at this day maintaine y vse of images, allege the decree of that Nicene Synode for their defense. But there is extant a booke of confutation bearing the name of Charles y Great, which by y phrase we may gather gather to haue bin written at the same time. Therein are recited the sentences of the Bishops that were present at that Council, and the arguments wherewith they contended. John the Legate of the easte partes said: God created man after his owne image: and thereupon gathered that we ought to haue images. The same man thought that images were commended vnto vs in this sentence: shewe me thy face because it is beautiful. Another to proove that images ought to be set vpon altars, cited this testimony: no man lighteth a candle and putteth it vnder a buheell. An other, to shewe that the beholding of them is profitable for vs, brought foorth a verse out of the Psalme: the light of thy countenance is sealed vpon vs. An other tooke this similitude: As the Patriarches vsed the Sacrifices of the Gentiles, so must Christian men haue the images of Saints in stead of the images of the Gentiles. To the same purpose haue they writhed this saying: Lord, I haue loued the beauty of thy house. But specially wittie is the exposition of this place, As we haue heard so haue we seene, that God is not knowne by onely hearing of his worde, but also by looking vpon images. Like is the sharpe deuife of Bishop Theodore. Maruicilous (faith he) is God in his Saints. And in another place: In the Saints that are in the earth: therefore this ought to be referred to images. Finally so filthy are their vauntorie follies that it greeueth me to reheare them.

15 When they talke of the worshipping, then are brought foorth the worshipping of Pharaon, and of the rod of Iofeph, and of the pillar that Iacob fet vp. Albeit in this last example, they do not onely depraye the meaning of the Scripture, but also bring in that which is no where to be read. Then these places seeme to them maruicilous strong and meete proues. Worship his footstole. Againe, worship on his holy hill. Againe, all the rich men of the people shall worship thy countenance. If a man would in seorne put the perfonage of a riding foole vpon the patrones of Images, could he gather together greater and greater follies? But to put all out of doute, Theodotus Bishop of Mira, doth so earnestly confirme by the dreames of his Archdeacon, that images ought to be worshipped, as if he had an oracle from heauen to shew for it. Now lett the fauouers of images goe and preffe vs with the decrees of that Synode. As though those reverend fathers doe not altogether discredite themselues, in either so childishly handling, or so vn godly and fowly tearing the Scriptures.

16 Now come I to those monstrous impieties, which it is maruell that either they durft vomit, and wilde maruicilous that they were not cried out against with his detestation of all men. And it is good that this outrageously wicked madness be bewrayed, that at least the faile colour of antiquity may be takene away, which papistes pretend for the worshipping of images. Theodotus the Bishop of Amoru pronounced cursed against all them that wil not haue images worshipped. An other impueth all the calamities of Grecia and the East part to this, that images were not worshipped. What punishment then were the Prophetes, the Apostiles and Martyrs worthy to suffer in whole time there were no images? They adde further: If the Emperours image be met with perfume and censing: much more is this honor due to the the images of Saints. Constantius Bishop of Constance in Ciprus, professeth that he reverently embraceth images, and affirmeth that he will give to the same honorable manner of worship that is due to the Trinity that giveth life. And who soever resolveth so to do, he curseth him and sendeth him away with the Manicheans and Marcionites. And, that ye should not thinke that this was the private sentence of one man, they did al affirm unto it. Ye a John the Legate of the east parts being further caried with heat, said it were better to bring all brothelhoufes into the city than to deny the worshipping of images. At length by consent of them all it was decreed, that worse than all Heretikes are the Samaritans, and worse than the Samaritans are the enemies of images. And because the play should not be without his solemn farewell, this clause was added, let them be glad and rejoyce that having the image of Christ doe offer Sacrifice vnto it. Where is now the distinction of Latrnia and Dulia, wherewith they are wont to seeke to blinde the eyes both of God and men? For the counsell without any exception doth giue euyn as much vnto images as vnto the living God himselfe.

That God is severally disderned from idols, that he may be onely and wholly worshipped.

We sayde in the beginning that the knowledge of God standeth not in bare speculation, but draweth with it the worshipping of him, and by the way we touched howe he is rightly worshipped, which point thalbe in other places more largely to be set forth. Noye doe but shortly repeate, that so oft as the Scripture affirmeth that there is but one GOD, it criueth not for the bare name of GOD, but withall commandeth this, that whatsoever belongeth to the Godhead, be not giuen to any other. Whereby also appeareth what pure religion doeth differ from superstition. Eufebeia, in Greeke signifies as much as true worship, because alway euyn the blinde themselfes groping in darkenesse haue found that this rule ought to be holden, that God bee not vnorderly worshipped. The name of religion although Ciceror truly and well descriueth from relegere, to recorde, or gather vp together: yet is the reason that he assigneth enforced and farre fet, that good worshippers did often record and diligently wye what was the truth. I rather thinke that that name is set as a contrary to wandering liberty, because the greater part of the worlde vnadvisedly taketh hold of that which they first meete withall, and flight about hither and thither: but true godliness to the ende it may stand in steadfast state, Relegit, that is to say, doth gather vp it selfe together within her bonds. Likewise I thinke superstition to have her name hereof, that not being contented, with the maner & order prescrib'd, she heapeth vp together a superfluous number of vaine things. But to leave the words it hath alway bin agreed by the consent of all ages, that religion is with false errors corrupted and perverted. Whereupon we gather that it is a very fond colour which the superstitious doe pretend, when with vndifferente zeale we giue our felues leaue to doe all thine. And although this confession found in the

mouthes of all men: yet herein is a shameful ignorance bewrayeth itself, that neither they cleave to the one God, nor haue any regard of order in the worshipping of him, as we haue already shewed. But God, to claime his owne right vnto himselfe, crieth out that he is ialous, and that he will be a stued reuenger if he be mingled with any fained God. And then he setteth forth the lawfull maner of worshipping, to hold mankind in obedience. He conteneth both these points in his law, when first he bindeth the faithfull vnto himselfe that he only may be their lawmaker; and then he prescribeth a rule whereby to be worshipped after his owne minde. Of the law, because the vses & endes thereof are many, I will entreat in place fit for it. Now I only touch this point, that thereby men are bridled that they run not out of the way to wrong worshipping. Now as I first said, we must hold in mind, that if all yeuer properly belongeth to godhead doe not rest in God alone, he is spoyle of his honour, & his worshipping broken. And there must we somwhat heedfully marke with what subtleties superstition deceieth. For it doth not so rende vnto strange gods that it seemeth to forfake the highest God, or to bring him downe into the number of other gods: but while the grunteth vnto him the highest place, the setteth round about him a number of lesser gods, among whom the diuident his offices. And so (albeit clokedly & crafely) his glory of the godhead is cut in parts, that it remaineth not whole in him. So in the olde time, as wel they of the Jewes as of the Geros did set beneath the father and judge of gods a great route of gods which should euery one according to his degree in common haue with the highest God the government of the heauen and earth. So the Saints that in a few ages past departed this life, are aduanced to the fellowship of God, to be worshipped, called vp, and honored in stead of him. And yet with such abomination we thinke that the majesty of God is not so much as diuided, when in deed it is a great part suppressed and extinguished, suing that we retaine stil a poore opinion of his suprem power: and in the meane time deceived with entangled subtleties, we are funderfully caried to divers gods.

2. For this purpose also was invented the distinction of Latria and Dulia, as they terme them, that is worship and service, whereby they might freely seeme to giue away the honours of God to Angels and dead men. For it is evident, that the worship which the Papistes giue vnto Saintes differeth nothing indeede from the worship of God. For all alike without mixture they worship both God and them: fauing that when they be charged with it, they wind away with this exception, that they kepe still for God the honour that is due vnto him inviolate, because they leave vnto him the worship that they call Latria. But fift the question standeth vpon the matter, and not the word, who would permit them so carelessly to mocke in a matter of all matters most weighty? But to let that also passe, yet winne they nothing by this distinction, but to proue, that they giue worship to one God and service to an other. For Latria in Grecce signifieth as much as in Latine Cultus, and in English worship. Dulia, properly signifieth service. And yet sometime in Scripture this difference is confounded together without diversitie. But grante it be a perpetuall difference, then muste we search what what both the wordes may meane. Dulia is service, Latria is worship. Now no man doubteth that to serve, is more then to worship. For many times a man could hardly beare to ferue him whome he would not stick to worship. So is it an vnegal dealing to giue to the saints that which is the greater, & to leave to God that which is the lesser. But many of the ancients authors haue vsed this distinction. What maketh that matter, if all men do perceive it to be not onely vnfit, but altogether very fond?

3 Now leaving nice futilties, let vs wey the matter it selfe. When Paul putteth the Galathians in remembrance what they were before that they were lightened in the knowledge of God, he faith that they gaue Duliam service to those of that nature were no gods. Although he name not Latriam or worship, is therefore their superstition excusable? He doth newether leffe condemnne their peruerse superstition, which he termeth by the name of Dulia service, than if he had expressed the name of Latria, worship. And when Christ repulseth the assault of Satan with his buckler, that it is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, the name of Latria was not brought in question. Satan required but an adoration. Likewise when the Angel reproved Iohn, because he fell downe on his knees before him, wee ought not to thinke that Iohn was so madde that he would giue vnto the Angell the honor that was due onely to God. But because it was not possible, but that all worship that is ioyned with religion fauoureth somewhat as pertaining to God, therefore he could not adore the Angell, but that he must take away somewhat from the glory of God. We read in deede often, that men haue bene honoured; but that was a ciuil honor, as I may so call it. But religion hath an other rule, which so soone as it is ioyned with worship, bringeth with it a profane abuse of the honor of God. The same may we see in Cornelius. He had not so slenderly profeted in godlinesse; but that he had learned to giue the soueraigne worship to God alone. Therefore when he fell downe before Peter, he did it not of this meaning to worship him in this steede of God. And yet did Peter earnestly forbid him to doe that which he did. And why so; but because men do never so narrowly put difference betwene the worship of God and of his creatures: but that without diuerfitie they giue away that vnto the creature, which belongeth vnto God. Wherefore if we haue one God, we must remember that nothing be it neuer so little must be taken away from his glorie, but that he keepe still that which is properly his. Therefore Zachary when he preacheth of the repairing of the Church, in plaine wordes expresseth: That there shall not only be one God, but also there shalbe one name of that God, to the end that he haue nothing in common with idols. What manner of worship God requireth, we shall see in another place when it falleth in order. For it pleased him in his lawe to prescribeme what is lawful & right, & to binde them to a certaine rule, that every man should not giue hymselfe leue to devise what form of worship he list. But because it is not expedient to loade the readers with heaping many matters together, I will not touche that point yet. Onely let it suffice for this time to keepe in minde, that every carying away of the dutifull behaviours of Godlinesse to any other than to God alone, is not without robbery.
Of the knowledge of God. And first superstition devised to give divine honours to the Sunne, or other starrs or idoles: then followed ambitious pride, which garnishing mortall men with spoiles taken from God, presumed to prophanse all that ever was holy. And although this principle remained among them, to honour the soueraigne deitie, yet grewe it in vfe indifferently to offer sacrifces to spirtes, leffer gods, or dead men of honour. So slippery is the way to slide into this fault, to make common to a number which God seuerely chalengeth to himselfe alone.

That which is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the very creation, which essence consisteth in three persons.

That which is taught in the Scriptures concerning the incomprehensible and spiritual essence of God, ought to suffice not onely to overthrow the foolish errors of the common people, but also to confute the fine fultelties of prophane Philosophie. One of the olde writers seemed to haue faide very well, That God is all that we doe see, and all that we doe not see. But by this meane he hath imagined the godhead to bee powdered into all the partes of the worlde. Although God, to the intent to keepe men in sober minde, speaketh but scarcely of his owne essence, yet by these two names of addition that I haue rehearsed, he doth both take away al grosse imaginations, and alfo represse the presumptuous boldnes of mans minde. For surely his immefurable greatness ought to make vs afraide, that we attempt not to measure him with our sense: & his spirituall nature forbiddeth vs to imagine any thing earthly or feoffly of him. For the same cause he often assigneth his dwelling place to be in heauen. For though, as he is incomprehensible, he filleth the earth also: yet because he feareth our mindes by reason of their dulnes to lye still in the earth, for good cause he lifteth us vp above the world, to shake off our slouth and sluggifhnes. And here falleth to ground the errour of the Manichees, which in appoyning two originall beginnings haue made the diuell in a maner egall with God. Surely this was as much as to breake the vnity of God and restraine his vnmeasurablenes. For where they haue presumed to abuse certain testimonies: that theweth a fowle ignorance, as their errour it selfe theweth a deteetable madnesse. And both the Anthropomorphites are also easilly confuted which haue imagined God to consist of a body, because oftentimes the Scripture ascribeth unto him a mouth, eyes, ears, hands, and feete. For what man yea though he be slenderly witted dooth not understand that God doth so with vs speake as it were childishly, as nurses doe with their babes? Therefore such maners of speche do not so plainly express what God is, as they doe apply the vnderstanding of him to our slender capacity. Which to doe, it behooued of necceffitie that hee defended a great way beneath his owne height.

2 But he alfo setteth out himself by an other special mark whereby he may be more necerely knowne. For he so declareth himselfe to bee but one, that he yet giueth himselfe distinctly to bee considered in three persons: which except we learne, a bare and empty name of God without any true God fi-eth in our braine. And y no man should thinke that he is a threefold God, or that the one essence of God is diuided in three persons, we must here seeke a short and easie definition to deliuer vs from a errour. But because many doe make much a dooe about this word Person, as a thing inuened by man: how iustly they doe so, it is best first to see. The Apostel naming the nonne the engraved forme of the Hypoftasis of his father, he undoubtedly mea-neth, that the Father hath some being, wherin he differeth from the nonne.
For to take it for essence (as some expositours haue done), as if Christ like a pece of waxe printed with a feale did represent the substance of the father) were not onely hard but alfo an absurdity. For fith the Essence of God is single or one and vndivisible, he that in himselfe conteineth it all and not by pecesemale, or by deriation, but in whole perfection, should very vnpro-perly yea fondly be called the engraved forme of him. But because the father although he be in his owne property distinct, hath expressd himselfe wholly in his nonne, it is for good cause faid, that he hath giuen his Hy-poftasis, to be feeen in him. Wherewith aptly agreeeth that which by and by foweth, that he is sh brightnes of his glory. Surely by the Apostels words we gather, that there is a certaine proper Hypoftasis in the father, that thir-neth in the nonne: whereby alfo againe is eaily perceiued the Hypoftasis of the nonne that diuinguitheth him from the Father. Like order is in the holy ghost. For we shal by and by proue him to be God, and yet he must needs be other than the father. Yet this distinction is not of the essence, which it is vnlawfull to make manifold. Therefore if the Apostles testimony be credited, it followeth that there be in God three Hypoftases. This terme seeing the Latines haue expressed with the name of Person, it were too much pride & waywardnes to braule about to clear a matter. But if we lift word for word to translate, we may call it Subsiffence. Many in the same fense haue called it substance. And the name of Person hath not bin in vs among the Latines only: but alfo the Grecians, perhaps to declare a content, haue taught that there are three Prosopa, that is to say Perfsis in God. But they, whether they be Grecies or Latines that differ one from an other in the word, doe very well agree in the summe of the matter.

3 Now howoeuer the heretikes barke at the name of person, or some o-uermuch preife men doe carpe that they like not the word fained by deuife of men: Sith they cannot get of vs to fay, that there be three, whereof every one is wholy God, nor yet that there be many gods: what vnreafonable it is this, to like words, which exprefte none other thing but that which is testified & approved by the Scriptures: It were better (fay they) to confaine not onely our meanings but alfo our words within the boundes of Scripture, than to deuife strange names that may be the beginnings of disagreement and brawling: So doe we euer our felues with strife about wordes: So the truth is lost in contending: So charity is broken by odiously brawling together. If they call that a strange worde, which cannot be fceived in Scripture, as it is written in number of fillables: then they binde vs to a hard law, whereby is condemned all exposition that is not puced together, with bare laying
filed, which withdraweth from the simplicitie of the wordes of God, then with all my heart I embrace their sober minde. For I judge that we ought with no lesse devout reverence to take of God than to thinke of him, for as much as whatsoeuer we do of our felues thinke of him, is foolish; and whatsoever we speake is vsuauorius. But there is a certaine measure to be kept. We ought to learne out of the Scriptures a rule both to thinke & speake, whereby to examine all the thoughts of our minde and wordes of our mouth. But what with stedfastness, but that such as in Scripture are to our capacitie double full and entangled, we may in plainer words express them, being yet such words as doe reuerently & faithfully serue the truth of the Scripture, & be vset surely, modestly, & not without occasion? Of which sort there are examples enough. And where as it shal by proofe appearie the Church of great necessitie was enforced to vse the names of Trinitie, & Persones, if any shal then finde fault with the newnesse of wordes, shal he not be justly thought to be grieved at the light of the truth, as he that blameth only this that the truth is made so plaine and clear to discourse?

4 Such newnesse of wordes, if it be so to be called, commeth then chiefly in vs, when the truth is to be defended against wranglers that do mocke it out with caullations. Which thing we haue at this day too much in experience, who haue great businesse in vanquishing the enemies of true & sound doctrine. With such folding & crooked wending these slipperie snakes doe slide away, vnlesse they be strongly griped & holden hard when they be taken. So the old fathers being troubled with contending against false doctrines, were compelled to shew their meanings in exquisite plainnesse, least they should leave any crooked byways to the wicked, to whom the doubtful constructions of wordes were hiding holes of errours. Arrius confessed Christ to be God, & the sonne of God, because he could not againsay the evident wordes of God, and as if he had beene so sufficiently discharged did faine a certaine consent with the rest. But in the mean time hee called not to scatter abroad that Christ was create, & had a beginning as other creatures. But to the end they might draw forth his winding subtile out of his denne, the ancient fathers went further, pronouncing Christ to be the eternal sonne of the father & consubstantiall with the father. Hereat wickednes began to boile, when the Arrians began to hate & detest the name Omoousion, consubstantiall. But if in the beginning they had synereely and with plaine meaning confessed Christ to be God, they would not now haue denied him to be consubstantiall with the father. Who dare now blame these good men as brawlers and contentious, because for one little wordes sake, they were so whore in disputation, and troubled the quiet of the Church? But that little wordes shewed the difference betwene the true belieuing Christians, and the Arrians that were robbers of God. Afterward rose vp Sabellius which accempted in a maner for nothing the names of the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy ghost, saying in disputation they were not made to shewe any maner of distinction, but only were several additions of God, of which sort there are many. If he came to disputation, he confessed, that he believed the father God, the sonne God, the Holy ghost God. But afterward he would readily slip away with saying that he had in no otherwise spoken than as if he had named God, a strong God, a just God, and wife God: and so he sung another song, that the Father is the Sonne, and the Holy ghost is the father, without any order, without any distinction. The good doctors which then had care of godliness, to subdue his wickednes, cried out on the other side that there ought to be acknowledged in one God three properties. And to the end to fence themselves against the crooked writhen subtleties with plaine & simple truth, they affirmed, that there did truly subsift in one God, or (which came all to one effect) that there did subsift in the unity of God a Trinity of persons.

If then the names have not bin without cause intincted, we ought to take heed, that in rejecting them wee bee not justly blamed of proude presumptuoues. I would to God they were buried indeede, so that this faith were agreed of all men, that the Father and the Sonne, and the Holy ghost bee one God: and yet that the Father is not the Sonne, nor the Holy ghost the Sonne, but distinct by certaine property. Yet am I not so precise, that I can finde in my heart to sitrie for bare wordes. For I note, that the olde fathers, / which otherwise speake very religiously of such matters, did not everywhere agree one with an other, nor every one with himselfe. For what formes of speech vsed by the councells doth Hilary excuse? To how great liberty doth Augustine sometime breake soorth? How unlike are the Greekes to the Latins? But of this variance one example shall suffice for this time. When the Latins ment to expresse the word Omoousion, they called it Consubstanti-all, declaring the substance of the Father and the Sonne to be one, so vsing the word substance for essence. Wherupon Hierome to Damasus faith, it is sterrile to say, that there are three substacies in God: & yet about one hundred times you shall finde in Hilary, there are three substacies in God. In the word Hypostasis, how is Hierome accused? For he suspecteth that there lurketh poyston in naming three Hypostases in God. And if a man doe vs this word in a godly sense, yet he plainly saith that is an improper speech, if he speake vnframed, and did not rather wittinly and willingly seke to charge the Bishops of the Eastlandes, whom he sought to charge with an vntruft edland. Sure this one thing he speaketh not very truly, that in all prophane schooles, oius, essence is nothing else by hypostasis, which is proued falsely by the common and accustomed vs. Augustine is more modest and gentle, which although he say, that the word hypostasis in that sense is strange to latine eares, yet so far is it of that he taketh from the Greekes their usuall maner of speaking, that he also gently beareth with the Latins that had followed the Greeke phrase. And that which Socrates writeth in the first booke of the Tripartite historie, tendeth to this end, as though he ment that he had by vskulful men bin wrongfully applied vnto this matter. Yea and the same Hilary himselfe layeth it for a great fault to the heretics charge, that by their waiwardnes he is compelled, to put those things in peril of the speech of me, which ought to have bin kept in the religiosisnes of minds plainly ce-felling that this is to doe thinges vnlawfull, to speake that ought not to bee spoken, to attempt things not licenced. A little after, he excuseth himselfe with many wordes, for that he was so bold to utter new names. For after he had vied the naturall names Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, he addeth that whosoever is offended, is beyond the compas of speach, beyond the reach of offence, and beyond the capacite of understanding. And in an other place he saith, that happy are the Bishops of Gallia, which neither had nor received nor knew any other confession, but that olde and simple one, which frō the time of the Apostles was received in all Churches. And much like is the excuse of Augustine, that this word was wrong out of necessity by reason of the imperfection of mens language in so great a matter: not to express that which is, but that it should not be spoken how the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost are three. This modeste of the holy men ought to warne vs, that we doe not forthwith so feuerely like Censors, note them with infamy that refuse to subscribe & sweate to such words as we propound them: so that they doe it not of pride, of frowardnes, or of malicious craft. But let them againe consider, by how great necessity we are druen to speake so, that by little and little they may be enured with that profitable maner of speach. Let the also leerne to beware, lest we must meete on the one side with the Arrians, on the other side with Sabellians, while they be offended that we cut off occasion from them both to cauall, they bring themselves in suspicion, that they be the disciples either of Arrius or of Sabellius. Arrius faith that Christ is God, but he muttereth that he was create, and had a beginning. He faith Christ is one with the Father, but secretly he whispereth in the eares of his disciples, that he was made one as the other faithful be, although by singular prerogative. Say once that Christ is Consubstantial with his father, then pluck you of his visour from the disssembler, & yet you add nothing to the Scripture. Sabellius faith, that the feueral names, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost signifie nothing in God feuerally distinct: say that they are three: & he will cry out you name three gods. Say ye there is in one offence a Trinity of persons, then shall you in one word both say, what the Scripture speake, and stop their vaine babling. Now if any be holden with so curious superstition, that they cannot abide these names: yet is there no man, though he woulde never so fainge, that can deny but that when we heare of one, we must understand an unity of substance: when we heare of three in one offence, that it is ment of the persons of the trinitie. Which thing being without fraude confessed, we stay no longer vpon wordes. But I haue long ago found, and that often, that whosoever doe obstinately quarel about words, doe keepe within them a secret payson: so that it is better willingly to provoke them, than for their pleasure to speake darkely.

6 But leaung disputacion of wordes, I will now begin to speake of the matter it selfe. I call therefore a Person, a subsistence in the offence of God, which having relation to the other is distinguisht from them with incommunicable property. By the name of the Substituence we mean an other thing than the offence. For if the word had simpely bin God, & in the mean time had nothing seuerally proper to it selfe, John had said amisse: it was with God.

Where he forthwith addeth, that God himselfe was the same word, he calleth vs backe againe to the one single essence. But because it could not bee with God, but that it must rest in the father: hereof ariseth that subsistence, which though it be ioyned to the essence with an unseparable knot, yet hath it a speciall marke, whereby it doth differ from it. So of the three subsistences, I say that each having relation to other is in propretie distinguished. Relation is here expressly mentioned. For when there is simple and indefinite mention made of God, this name belongeth no leffe to the Sonne and the Holy Ghost, than to the Father. But when the Father is compared with the Sonne, the feuerall property of either doth absolute him from the other. Thirdly, whatsoever is proper vnto euery of them is vncommunicable. For that which is given to the Father for a marke of difference, cannot agree with, nor be given to the Sonne. And I dislike not the definition of Tertullian, so that it be rightly taken, That there is in God a certaine disposition or distribution, which yet chaungeth nothing of the unity of the essence.

But before that I goe any further, it is good that I prove the Godhead of the Sonne and of the holy ghost. Then after we shall see, how they differ one from another. Surely when the worde of God is spoken of in the Scripture: it were a very great absurditie to imagine it onely a fading and vanishing voyce, which sent into the aire, commaeth out of God himselfe, of which sort were the oracles given to the fathers, and all the prophecies: when rather the worde is meant to be the perpetuall wisdome abiding with the Father, from whence all the oracles and prophecies proceeded. For as Peter testifieth, no leffe did the old prophets speake with the spirit of Christ, than did the Apostles and all they that after them did distribuite the heauenly doctrine. But because Christ was not yet openly shewed, we must understand that the Word was before all worldes begotten of the Father. And if the Spirite was of the word, whose instrumentes were the prophets, we doe undoubtedely gather that he was true God. And this doth Moses teach plainly enough in the creation of the worldes, when he teacheth the worde as the meane, For why doth he expressly tell, that God in creating of all his works saide, Be this done: or that done: but that the inuerseable glorye of God may shinningly appearre in his images? The subtlefed and babbling men do easily mocke out this, with saying that the name Worde, is there taken for his bidding or commandement. But better expostors are the apostles, which teach that the worldes were made by the same, and that he suffrinheth them all with his mightie Worde. For here we see that the Worde is taken for the bidding or commandement of the Sonne, which is himselfe the eternall and essentiall Word to the Father. And to the wise and sober it is not darke that Salomon saith, where he bringeth in Wisdome begotten of God before all worldes, and bearing rule in the creation of things, and in all the workes of God. For to say that it was a certaine commandement of God, seruing but for a time, were very solifih and vaine: where as in deede it was Gods pleasure arthat time to shewe forth his stedfast and eternall purpose, yea and some thing more secrete. To which intente also maketh that saying of Christ: My Father and I doe worke euem to this daie. For in saying, That from the beginning of the world he was continually working with his Father, he doth more openly declare that which Moses had more shortly touched. We gather then by the meaning of God's speaking was this, that the Word had his office in the doing of things, & so they both had a common working together. But most plainly of all doth John speak, when he sheweth that the same Worde, which from the beginning was God with God, was together with God the Father the cause of all things. For he both giueth to the Worde a perfecte and abiding essence, and also assigneth vnto it some thing peculiar to it selfe, and plainly sheweth howe God in speaking was the creator of the worlde. Therefore as all revelations proceeding from God doe well bare the name of the word of God, so ought we yet to set in the hyelt place that substantiall Worde, the wellspring of all Oracles, which being subiecte to no alteration, abideth alwayes one & the selfe same with God, and is God himselfe.

8 Here manie dogges doe barke against vs, which when they dare not openly take from him his Godhead, doe secretly steal from him his Eternitie. For they say, that the Worde then beganne first to be, when God in the creation of the world opened his holy mouth. But verie vndiscreetly do they to imagine a certaine innovation of the substance of God. For as those names of God that haue relation to his outerarde worke, began to be giuen vnto him after the being of his worke, as for example, this that hee is called the creator of heaven and earth: so doeth Godlinest knowe or admit no name that shoulde signifie any newe thing in himselfe to haue channced vnto God. For if any shoulde come to him from else where than in him selfe, the this saying of Iames shoulde faile, yeuerie good giuing and everie perfect gift is from aboue, and commeth downe from the Father of lightes, with whom is no variablenesse neither shadowing by turning. Therefore nothing is lesse to be suffred, than to saine a beginning of that Word, which both alwayes was God, and afterwarde was creator of the worlde. But ful suddenly forthoof they reason, that Moses in saying that God then first spake, doth secretly shewe that there was no Worde in him before. Which is a most tryling argument. For it followeth not, because a thing at some one certaine time beginneth to be shewed openly, that therefore it had never any being before. But I conclude farre otherwise, and saye seeing that in the same moment that God saide, let light be made, the power of the word appeared and shewed it self : the same Worde was long before: but if a man aske howe long before, he shall finde no beginning. For hee appointed no certaine space of time when himselfe saide: Father, glorifie mee with the glory which I had with thee before the worlde was. And this thing John also lefte not vntouched, because hee first sheweth that in the beginning the worde was with God, before that hee commeth to the creation of the worlde. Wee say therefore againe, that the Worde which was conceived of G O D before any beginning of time, was continually remaining with him. Whereby both his eternitie, true essence, and Godhead is proued.

9 Although I do not yet touch the person of the Mediator, but do defer it it to that place where we shall specially entreat of the Redemption: yet because it ought to bee certeinly holden without controversie among all men, that Christ is the same Word clad with flesh, in this place will be very fit to recite all those testimonies that prove Christ to be God. When it is said in the xlv Pafme, thy throne O God is for ever and ever: the lewes do cauill and say, that the name Elohim is also applied to the Angels and sovereigne powers. But in all the Scripture there is not a like place, that raiseth an eternall throne to any creature. For he is here not simply called God, but also the eternall Lorde. Againe, this title is given to none but with an addition, as it is said: that Moses shall be for a God to Pharaon Some read it in the Genitiue case which is very foolish. I grant in deed: that oftimes a thing is called Divine or of God, that is notable by any singular excellence: but here by the tenour of the text it appeareth, that such a meaning were harde and forced, and will not agree. But if their stubbornesse will not so yelde: In Effeie is very plainly brought in for all one both Christ and God, and he that is adorned with the sovereigne power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (saith he) is the name whereby they shall call him, the strong God, the Father of the world to come, &c. Here the lewes arafe againe, and turne the text thus: this is the name whereby the strong God the father of the worlde to come shall call him: so that they leave this onely to the Sonne to be called the Prince of peace. But to what purpose should so many names of addition in this place be heaped vpon God the Father, seeing it is the purpose of the Prophet to adorn Christ with such speciall notes as may builde our Faith vpon him? Wherefore it is out of doubt that he is here in like sort called the strong God, as he is a little before called Immanuel. But nothing can be founde plainer than that Iere. 23. 6. place of Hieremie where he saith, that this shall be the name whereby the seede of Dauid shall be called Iehouah our righteousness. For where the lewes themselves do teach, that all other names of God are but adjective names of addition, and that this onely name Iehouah which they call unspakable is a substantiue name to express his essence: wee gather that the Son is the onely and eternall God, which faith in an other place that he will not giue his glorye to an other. But here also they seek to scape away because that Moses gaue that name to the Altar that hee builde, & Ezechiel gaue it to the newe citie Hierufalem. But who doth not see that the Altar was builde for a monument that God was the auancement of Moses, and that Hierufalem is not adornde with the name of God, but onely to testify the presence of God? For thus saith the Prophete: The name of the citie from that day shalbe Iehouah there. And Moses saith thus: He builde an altur and called the name of it, Iehouah my exaltation. But more businesse ariseth by an other place of Hieremie, where the same title is applied to Hierufalem in these wordes: this is the name whereby they shall call her Iehouah our righteousness. But this testimonie is so faire from making against the truth which wee defende, that it rather confirmeth it. For whereas he had before testified that Christ is the true Iehouah from whom floweth righteousness, nowe hee pronounceth that the Churche shall so verily

10 Now if this do not satisfie the Iewes, that Iehouah is so oft presented in the perfon of an Angell, I fec not with what cauillations they can mocke it out. It is fayd that the Angell appeared to the holy fathers: and the fame Angell chalengeth to him selfe the name of the eternal God. If any take exception and fay, that this is spoken in respect of the Perfon that hee repreffenth: this knot is not thus lofed. For being a fervant he would not suffer Sacrifice to be offered to him and take from God his due honour. But the Angell refusing to eate brede, commandeth Sacrifice to be offered to Iehouah. And then hee proueth that himselfe in deed was the fame Iehouah, and therefore Manoah and his wife by this token did gather, that they had feene not only an Angell but God. And thence came it that he fayd: we shall die because we have feene God. And when his wife aunfwereth, if Iehouah would haue slayne thee, hee would not haue received Sacrifice at our handes: in this the doth confefs that he was God which before was called the Angell. Befide this, the aunfweare of the Angell himfelfe taketh a way all doubt of it, faying: why doeft thou ask me of my name, which is maruellous? So much the more detestable was the wickednesse of Seruetto, when hee affirmed that God never appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an Angell was worshippd in place of him. But truely and wisely haue the true teaching doctiors of the Church expounded, that the fame principall Angell was the word of God, which then as aforehand began to execute the office of Mediator. For though he was not yet clothed with flesh, yet he came downe as a meane betweene God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithfull. Therefore his nye communicating himselfe made him to be called an Angell: yet still in the meane time hee returned that which was his owne, to be the God of unfeakeable glory. The same thing meaneth Ofseas, which after he had recitedit the waftling of Jacob with the Angell, fayth: Iehouah the God of hostes, Iehouah, worthy of memorie is his name. Here againe Seruetto carpeth, by God did beare thy perfon of an Angell. As though the Prophet did not confirme which Moses had fayd: why doeft thou ask me of my name? And the confefion of the holy Patriarche doth sufficiently declare he he was not a created Angel, but one in whom the ful godhead was reffident, when he fayd: I have seen God face to face. And for this caufe Paul fayth, that Christe was guide of the people in the wildernes. For though the time was not yet come of his abatement: yet that eternall word shewed a figure of that office to which hee was appointed. Now if the second Chapter of Zacharie be weyed without contention, the Angell that fent an other Angell was by and by pronounced to bee the God of hostes, and to him is foueraigne power ascrib'd. I omitte innumerable testimonies on which our Faith safely refetheth, although they doe not much move the Iewes. For when it is faide in Esiae: Behold, this is our God, this is Iehouah, we shall waite vpon him, and hee shall faue vs: they that haue eyes may fee, that herein is ment God which raifeth vp for the saluation tion of his people. And these vehement demonstrations twise repeated suffer it to be drawn no otherwhere but to Christ. And yet plainer and fuller is the place of Malachie where he promiseth that hee shall come the Lorde that was then defired, to his owne temple. But to none but to the onely soueraigne God was the temple dedicate, which temple yet the Prophet doth claime for Christ. Whereupon followeth that Christ is the fame God that was ever honored among the Jewes.

II As for the new Testament, it swarmeth with innumerable testimonies, therefore we must trauaile rather shortly to choose out fewe, than largely to heape vp all. For though the Apostles speake of him since he was now become the Mediator in flesh; yet all that I shall bring forth shall aptly serve to prove his godhead. First this is worthy to be singularly marked, y those things which were before spoken touching the eternall God, the Apostles doe shew they are either already performed, or hereafter to be performed in Christ. For where Efaie prophesie that the Lorde of hostes shalbe to the Jewes and Israelites a stumbling stone and a rocke to fall vpon: Paul affirmeth that the same is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore he declareth him to be the Lord of hostes. Likewise in another place, We must all (faith he) once be brought to appeare before the judgement throne of Christ. For it is written, to me shall all knees bow, and to me shall all tongues swear. Seeing God in Efaie speaketh this thing of himselfe, and Christ in deede performeth it in himselfe, it followeth that he is the selfe fame God whose glory may not be withdrawn to an other. And that thing which writing to the Ephesians he allegeth out of the Pfalmes, is evidente that it can be applied to none but to God alone. Ascending on hee hath caried captuirtie captuie, meaning such ascending was in shadow shewed, whe God in notable victory against forein nations did shew forth his power, but he declareth that in Christs it was more fully performed. So John testifieth that it was the glorie of the Sonne that was recuiled to Esay by a vision, whereas in deed Chri hisfelfe writeth that the maieftie of God appeared vnto him. And it is evident that those things which the Apostle writing to the Hebrues applieth to the Sonne, are the plaine titles of God: as, Thou Lord in the beginning didest laie the foundations of heauen and earth. &c. Againe,worship him al ye his Angels. And yet he abueth not those titles when hee draweth them to Christ. For all those things that are spoken of in those Pfalmes, hee himselfe alone hath fulfilled. For it was he that rose vp and had mercy on Si-on. It was he that claimed to himselfe the kigneomde of all the nations & slandes. And why should John sticke to apply the maieftie of God to Christ which in his preface had sayd that the worde was alway God? Why should Paul feare to fer Christ in the judgement throne of God, having before with so open proclamation declared his Godhead, where he sayd that he was God blessed to the ende of worldes? And to make appeare, how well he agreeh in this point with himselfe, in another place he writeth that Christ is God openly shewed in the flesh. If he be God to be prayed to the ende of worldes, then he is the fame to whom in an other place hee affirmeth all glorie and honour to be due. And thus he hideth not, but plainly cryeth our, out, that he woulde have counteined it no robberie, if he had shewed himselfe egall with God, but that he willingly abased himselfe. And that the wicked shoulde not carpe that hee is some made God, Iohn goeth further and faith: He is the true God and the eternall life. Although it ought abundantly to fastifie vs, that he is called God, specially of that wittnesse which expressly affirmeth vnto vs that there are no more Gods but one. That same witnesse is Paul, which faith thus: Howe manie focuer be called gods, either in heauen or in earth, to vs there is but one God from whom are all things. When we heare of the fame mouth, that God was openly shewed in the flesh, that God with his owne bloode purchased the Church to himselfe: why shoulde we imagine a seconde God which he himselfe acknowledge not? And it is no doubt that all the godly were of the same meaning. Likewifie Thomas in protesting him to be his Lorde and his God, doth profess that he is that onely one God whom hee had always worshipp'd.
Cap. 13.

12 Nowe if wee esteeme his Godhead by the worke that in the Scripture are ascribed vnto him, it shall therby more evidently appeare. For whе he saie that from the beginning hee was thither to working with his Father: the Jewes which were most dull in understanding of all his other sayinges, yet then perceived that hee tooke vpon him the power of God. And therefore, as Iohn telleth, they sought the more to kill him, because he did not onely breake the Sabbath, but also did call God his father, making himselfe egall with God. Howe dull shal wee be then, if wee doe not perceive that his Godheade is herein plainly affirmed? And truely to order the world with prouidence and power, & to goerne all things with the authoritie of his owne might, which Apostle afferibeth vnto him, belongeth to none but onely to the creator. And he onely enterparteneth the government of the worlde with his Father, but also all other offices which can not be made common to God with his creatures. The Lorde crieth out, by the Prophete: I am hee, I am he, that doe awaye thine offences for mine owne sake. According to the meaning of this sentence when the Jewes thought that wrong was done to God for that Christ did forgive sinnes, Christ not onely affirmed in worde but also proued by miracle that this power belonged vnto himselfe. Wee see therefore that hee hath, not the ministration, but the power of forgiuenesse of sinnes, which the Lord faith hee will not suffer to passe awaye from himselfe to any. What shall we say of searching, & pearling the secrete thoughts of harts? Is it not the propertie of God alone? But the same had Christ: whereby is gathered that he is God.

13 Now, in his miracles howe plainly and clearly doth he appeare? And though I graunt that as well the Prophetes as the Apostles did egall & like miracles to these that hee did: yet this great difference is there, that they by their ministration disposed the gifts of God, hee shewed forth his owne power. He vfed sometime prayer, to the ende to give glorious vnto his Father. But we see for the most part his owne power shewed vnto vs. And how could it otherwise be but he was very author of miracles that by his owne authority gaue power to other to deale miracles abrode? For he

heale the leprous, to cast out devils, &c. And they so vised the ministrathereof that they sufficiently shewed by this power came not from els where but from Christ. In the name of Iesus Christ (iayeth Peter) rise and walke.
It is therefore no maruell if Christ alleged his miracles to confound the vnbeleuvingnesse of the Iewes: forasmuche as they were such as being done by his owne power did give a moft plain testimonie of his godhead. If else where then in God there is no saluation, no righteousnesse, no life: & Chrif conceieth all these thing in him, surely he is thereby declared to be God:
And no man can object against me and say, that life and saluation is powred into him by God: for it is not said that he received saluation, but that he is saluation himselfe. And if none be good but only God: how can he be only man, being I will not say good and just, but selfe goodnes and iustice: Ye from the first beginning of the creation as the Evangeliffe witnesseth, in him was life: and he even then being life was the light of men. Wherefore being supported with such proue we are bolde to repose our faith and hope in him when yet we know that it is an vnGodlinessse that robbeth God for any man to fasten his confidence in creatures. Beleeue ye in God: sayth he.
Beleeue then also in me. And fo doth Paul expond these two places of Eſay, Whosoeuer trusteth in him, shall not be put to shame. Againe, Out of the roote of Iſay shall he come that shall rife to rule peoples, in him the nations shall truft. And why should we seeke out more testimonies of Scripture for this matter, when we so often meete with this sentence? He that beleeueth in me hath eternal life. Moreover the invocacion which hangeth vnpon Faith belongeth also to him, which yet is proper to the maieftie of God if he haue any thing at all proper to himselfe. For one Prophet sayth: Whosoeuer calleth vnpon the name of Iehouah shall be saved: and another sayth: a moſt strong tour is the name of Iehouah: to it the righteous shall flee: and hee shall be saved: but the name of Christ is called vnpon for saluation: it followeth therefore that he is Iehouah. As for invocacion we haue an example of it in Stephen, when he sayeth, Lorde Iefu receive my spirit. Againe in the whole Church, as Ananiah testifieth in the fame booke. Lord (faith he) thou knowest how great eues this man hath done to thy Saintes that call vnpon thy name. And that it may be more plainly understood that the whole fulnesse of the Godhead doth corporally dwell in Christ, the Apostle doth confeffe that he brought no other doctrine among the Corinthisans but the knowledge of him; and that he preached no other thing but that knowledge.
What, I pray you, and howe great a thing is this, that the name of the Sonne onely is preached vnto vs whom he willeth to glory in the knowledge of himselfe alone? Who dare say that he is but a creature, of whom the onely knowledge is our whole glory? Beside that, the salutations set before the Epistles of Paul, with the same benefits from the Sonne which they do from the Father, whereby we are taught not only that those things which the Father giueth vs do come vnto vs by his interceffion, but also by communicatie of power, he is the author of them. Which knowledge by practise is without doubt more certaine and perfect than any idle speculation. For there the godly minde doth beholde God most present, and in maner handle him where it feeleth it selfe to be quickened, lightned, saued, justified and sanctified.

14 Wherefore out of the same fountains we must fetch our meane of proving to confirme the Godhead of the Holy ghost. Vertue plaine is the testimonie of Moses in the historie of the creation, that the Spirtue of God was upon the depths, or upon the vunfashioned heap: because he sheweth that not only the beautie of the world that is now to be seen is prefervd by the power of the Spirtue, but ere this beautie was added, the Spirtue was then busied in prefervmgs that confufed lumpe of things. And that saying of Efai cannot be cauilled againft, And now Ichoham and his Spirtue hath lent me. For he communique with the Holy ghost his chief power in sending of Prophets. Whereby appeareth the divine majestie of the Holy ghost. But our best profe, as I have said, shalbe by familiar vfe. For that which the Scriptures promiseth vnto it, is farre from the proprie of creatures, and such a thing as we our felues doe learne by assured experience of godliness. For he it is being eche where poured abroade, doth sustaine and guethest growing and life to all things in heaven and in earth. And by this point he is procureth to be one of the number of creatures, for that he is not comprehended within any boundes: but by pouring his liuely force into all things to breath into them life and motion, this is the vertie worke of God. Moreover, if regeneration into an incorruptible life be better and more excellent then any present quickening: what shall we judge of him from whose power the same proceedeth? And that he is the author of regeneration, not by a borrowed, but by his owne force, the Scripture in many places teacheth: and not of that onely, but also of the immortalite to come. Finally, as vnto the Sonne, so vnto him also are applied all those offices that are most of all properly belonging to the Godhead. For he searcheth the depe secretes of God, wherewith none of all the creatures is of countell. He giueth wisdome and skill to speake, whereas yet the Lorde pronounceth to Moses it is one lyke his worke to do it. So by him we come to a partaking of God, so that we may feel his power as it were working life in vs. Our justification is his worke. From him is power, sanctification, truth, grace, & what good thing souer may be thought of because it is the Holy ghost onely from whom proceedeth all kinds of gifts. For that sentence of Paul is right worthie to be noted. Although there be divers gifts, and manifolde and sundrie is the distribution of them, yet is there but one holy Spiritte: because he maketh him not onely the original or beginning, but all the author. Which a little after is more plainly expressed in these wordes. One & the same Spirtue distributeth all things as he will. For if he were not something subsisting in God, he would not attribute vnto him choise of minde and will. Therefore most evidently doeth Paul giue to the Holy ghost divine power, and sheweth that he is substantially resident in God.

15 And the Scripture it selfe, when it speaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paul hereby gathereth that wee are the temple of God, because his Spirtue dwelleth in vs: which thing is not lightly to be past over. For whereas God so often promiseth that he will choose vs for a temple of the Lord of hosts speaking, Paul teacheth that it is the Holy ghost that speaketh. Yea, where commonly the Prophets say, that the words which they utter are the words of the Lord of hosts, Christ, & the Apostles doe referre them to the Holy ghost. Whereby it followeth that he is the true Jehovah that is the chiefest author of prophecies. Again, where God complaineth that he was provoked to wrath by the stubbornesse of his people, in stead of that Esay faith that his holy Spirite was grieved. Lest of all, if blasphemie against the Holy ghost be not forguen in this world, nor in the world to come, whereas he may obteine pardon that hath blasphemed against the Sonne; his divine maieftie is here plainly proued, the offence or diminishment whereof is an unpardonable crime. I do wittingly and of purpose omit many testimonies that the auncient writers haue vsed. They haue thought it a maruellous meete place to alleage out of Daud : with the worde of the Lord the heauenes were stablised, and all the power of them with the spirite of his mouth, to prooue that the worlde was no lesse the worke of the Holy ghost than of the Sonne. But for as much as it is commonly vsed in the Psalmes to repeate one thing twise : and in Esay the spirite of his mouth is as much to say as his worde, that reason is very weake. Therefore I thought good to toche a fewe such things as godly minde might soundly rest upon.

16 And as God hath more plainly discloshed himselfe by the comming of Christ, so is he also in the three Persons become more familiarly known. But of all the testimonies let this one suffice vs for this present. Paul so knitteth these three together, God, Faith, and Baptisme, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this manner. Because there is but one Faith, he thereby sheweth that there is but one God, And because there is but one God, he thereby proue that there is but one Faith. Therefore if we be entred into the Faith and religion of one God by Baptisme: we must needs think him the true God in whose name we are baptised. And it is not to be doubted, but that in this solemn protestation, Christ meant to testifie that the perfect light of Faith was already delivered, when he sayd: Baptise them in my name of the Father and of the Sonne and of the Holy ghost. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of one God, which with perfect brightness hath appeared in the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost. Whereby is evident that in the essence of God abide three Persons in which the one God is known. And surely, forasmuch as our faith ought not to looke hither & thither, nor diuerfly to wander about, but to haue regard to the one God, to be applied to him, & to sticke fast in him: it is hereby easly proued,

that if there be divers kinds of faith, there must also be many gods. Now whereof baptism is a Sacrament of faith: it prooveth unto vs the oneness of God, because it is but one. And therefore followeth, that it is not lawful to be baptized but into one God, because we embrace the Faith of him, into whose name we are baptized. What mean Christ then, when he commanded to be baptized, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy ghost, but that we ought with one Faith to believe in the Father, Sonne, and the Holy ghost? Therefore sith this remaineth certain, that there is but one God, and not many, we determine that the Word and the Spiritre are nothing else but the very selfe essence of God. And very foolishly did the Arrians prate, which confesst the godhead of the Sonne did take from him the substance of God. And such a like rage vexed the Macedonians, which would haue to be understanded by the Spiritre, onely the gifts of grace that are poured forth into men. For as wisdom, understanding, prudence, fortitude, &c. of God do proceede from him: so he only is the Spirit of wisdom, prudence, fortitude, and godlinesse. Yet is not he divided according to the distribution of his graces: but how souer they be diversely dealt abroad, yet he remaineth one and the same, as the Apostle faith.

17. Again there isfewed in the Scriptures a certaine distinction of the Father, from the Word, and of the Word from the Spiritre. In discussing whereof, how great religiousnesse and sobriety we ought to use, the greatnesse of the mystery it selfe doth admonish vs. And I very well like that saying of Gregorie Nazianzene: I cannot thinke upon the one, but by and by I am compassed about with the brightnesse of the three: And I cannot severally discern the three, but I am sodenely druen backe to one. Wherefore let it not come in our mindes once to imagine such a Trinitie of Persons as may holde our thought withdrawn into severalities, and doeth not forthwith bring vs againe to that oneness. The names of Father, Sonne, and Holy ghost, doe prove a true distinction, that no man shoulde thinke them to be bare names of addition, whereby God according to his works is diversely entitled: but yet it is a distinction, not a division. The places that we have already cited, do shewe that the Sonne hath a property distinct from the Father, because the Word had not bin with God, if he had not bin an other thing than the Father: neither had he had his glory with the Father, but being distinct from him. Likewise he doth distinguish himselfe from the Father, when he faith, that there is an other which beareth him witness. And for this purpose maketh that which in another place is saide, that the Father created all things by the Word, which he could not, being after a certaine manner distinct from him. Moreover if Father came not downe into the earth, but he that came out from the Father. The Father died not nor rose again, but he that was sent by him. Neither yet did this distinction begin at the taking of flesh: but it is manifest that he was also before, the onely begotten in the bosome of the Father. For who can abide to say, that then the Sonne entered into the bosome of the Father, when he descended from heaven to take manhode upon him? Hee was therefore before in the bosome of the Father, and enjoyed his glory with the Father. As for the the distinction of the holy ghost from the Father. Christ speaketh of it when he saith, that it proceeded from the Father. And how oft doth he shew it to be an other beside himself? as when he promiseth that he will send the other comforter, and often in other places.

18 But to borrow similitudes from matters of men, to express the force of this distinction, I know not whether it be expedient. In deed the old fathers are wont so to do sometime: but with all they do confess, that whatsoever they bring forth for like, doth much differ. For which cause I am much afraid to be any way bold, least if I bring forth any thing vifibly, it should give occasion either to the malicious to caull, or to the unskillfull to be deceived. Yet such distinction as we have marked to be set out in Scriptures, it is not good to have left unsaid. And that is this, that to the Father is given the beginning of working, the fountain & spring of all things: to the Sonne wisdome, counsell, & the very disposition in doing of things: to the holy ghost is assign'd power and effectual working. And although eternity belong unto the Father, and eternity to the Sonne and to the holy ghost also, for as much as God could never haue bin without his wisdome and power, and in eternity is not to be sought, which was first or last: yet this observation of order is not vaine or superfluous, wherein the Father is reckned first, and then of him the Sonne, and after of them both the Holy ghost. For every mans minde of it selue enclineth to this, first to consider God, then the widsome rising out of him, and last of all the power whereby he puttheth the decrees of his purpose in execution. In what sort the Son is said to be of the Father onely, and the Holy Ghost both of the Father and the Sonne, is shewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the viii. Chapter to the Romanes, where the same Spirit is without difference sometime called the Spirit of Christ, and sometime of him raised vp Christ from the dead: and that not without cause. For Peter doth also testify that it was the Spirit of Christ where with the Prophetes did prophecy, whereas the Scripture so often teacheth, that it was the Spirit of God the Father.

19 Now this distinction doth not so stand against the single oneness of God, that thereby we may prove that the Sonne is one God with the Father, because he hath one Spiritu with him, & that the Holy Spirit is not a thing divers from the Father and the Sonne. For in each Hypothesis is understood the whole substance, with this that every one hath his owne property. The Father is whole in the Sonne, & the Sonne is whole in the Father, as himselfe affirmeth. I am in the Father and the Father is in me. And the Ecclesiastical writers do not grant the one to be seperated from the other by any difference of essence. By these names ye betoken distinction (faith Augustine) ye is meant whereby they haue relation one to an other, & not ye very substance wherein they are alone. By which meaning are the sayings of ye old writers to be made agree, which otherwise would seeme not a little to disagree. For sometime they say ye the Father is the beginning of the Son, & sometime that the Son hath both godhead & essence of himselfe, and is all one beginning with ye Father. The cause of this diversity Augustine doth in an other place well & plainly declare, who he faith: Christ having respect to himselfe, is called

God,
Cap. 13. Of the knowledge of God, and to his Father is called the Sonne. And againe, the Father as to himselfe is called God, as to his Son is called the Father, where hauing respect to the Son he is called the Father, he is not the Sonne: & where as to the Father he is called the Sonne, he is not the Father: & where he is called as to himselfe the Father, & as to himselfe the Son: it is all one God. Therefore when we simply speake of the Sonne, without hauing respect to the Father, we do well and properly say, that he is of himselfe: & therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mention of the relation betwene him and his Father, then we rightly make the Father the beginning of the Sonne. All the whole fifth booke of Augustine concerning the Trinity doth nothing but set forth this matter. And much fader it is to rest in that relation that he speaketh of, than in too futtely pearing vnto the hie mystery to wander abroade by many vaine speculations.

20 Let them therefore that are pleaed with sobernesse, and contented with measure of Faith, shortly learne so much as is profitable to be known: that is, when we profeffe that we beleue in one God, vnder the name of God, we understaunte the one only and single essence in which we compr reprehend three Persons or Hypotheses. And therefore so oft as we do indefinitely speake of the name of God, we meane no leffe the Sonne and the holy ghost than the Father. But when the Sonne is joyned to the Father, then commeth a relation, and so we make distinction betwene the Persons. And because the properties in the Persons bring an order with them, so as by beginning and original is in the Father: so oft as mention is made of the Father and the Sonne, or the Holy ghost together, the name of God is peculiarly giuen to y Father. By this meane is retaine the vnitie of the essence, & regard is had to the order, which yet doth minish nothing of the godhead of the Sonne and of the Holy ghost. And whereas we have already feene that the Apostles doe affirme, that the Sonne of God is he, whom Moses and the Prophetes do testifie to be Jehovah the Lord, wee must of necessitie alwaye come to the vnitie of the essence. Wherefore it is a detettable facriledge for vs to call the Sonne a feuerall God from the Father, because the simple name of G O D, doth admitte no relation, and God in respect of himselfe can not be sayd to be this or that. Now, that the name of Iehovah the Lord indifinitely taken is applied to Chrift, appeareth by the worde of Paul, where he faith: Therefore I have thrife prayed the Lorde, because that after he had receiued the answere of Christ, My grace is sufficient for thee: he fayth by and by, that the power of Chrift may dwell in me. It is certeine that the name Lord is therfore for Iehovah, and therefore to restraine it to the person of the Mediatour were very fonde and childifh, for so much as it is an absoolute sentence that compareth not the Father with the Sonne. And we knowe that after the accustomed maner of the Greeks, the Apostles do commonly sette the word Kyrios, Lord, in stead of Iehovah. And, not to fetch an example farre of, Paul did in no other fente pray to the Lorde, than in the same fente that Peter cite the place of Ioe: whofoever calleth upon the name of the Lorde shall be saued. But where this name is peculiarily giuen to the Sonne, we fhall see that there is an other other reason thereof, when we come to a place fit for it. Nowe it is enough to have in minde, when Paul had absolutely prayed to God, hee by and by bringeth in the name of Christ. Even so is the whole God called by Christ himselfe the Spirit. For there is no caufe against it, but that the whole essence of God may be spirittually, wherein the Father, the Sonne & the Holy ghost be comprehended. Which is very plaines by this Scripture. For euery one as there we heare God to be made a Spiritre: so we do heare the Holy ghost, for so much as it is an Hypothetis of the whole essence, to bee called both God, and proceeding from God.

21 But for as much as Satan, to the end to roote out our Faith, hath alway moued great contentions, partly concerning the divine essence of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost, and partly concerning their distinction of Persones: And as in a maner in all ages hee hath stirred vp wicked spirits to trouble the true teachers in this behalfe: so at this day hee travaileth out of the old embers to kindle a newe fire: therefore here it is good to answeare the perverse foolish errors of some. He herto it hath bene our purpose, to leade as it were by the hand those that are willing to learne, and not to strive hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. But now the truth which we have already peaceably shewed, must be reskued from the caullations of the wicked: All be it my chiefestaufall shall yet be applied to this ende, that they which give gentle and open cares to the wordes of God, may have whereupon steadily to rest their foote. In this point, if any where at all in the secret mysteriies of Scripture, we ought to dispute soberly, and with great moderation, and to take great heede that neither our thought nor our tongue proceede any further than the boundes of Gods word do extende. For howe may the minde of man by his capacity define the immeasurable essence of God, which never yet could certeinly determine how great is the body of the Sonne which yet he daily feeth with his eyes? yea how may she by her own guiding attaine to discerne the substance of God, that cannot reach to know her owne substance? Wherefore let vs willingly giue ouer unto God the knowledge of himselfe. For he only, as Hilarie layth, is a conuenient witnesse to himself, which is not known but by himself. We shall giue it ouer unto vs, if we shall both conceive him to be such as he hath opened himself vs unto, & shall not else where search to know of him, then by his own word. There are to this ende written five homilies of Chryſſome against the Anomes. Yet the boldnesse of Sophisters could not bee restrayned by them from babling unbridledly. For they have belaued themselves in this behalfe no whit more modelly than they are wonted in all other. By the unhappye succes of which vndiscretion, we ought to be warned to take care that we bend our felues to travaile in this question rather with tractable willingnesse to learne, than with sharptnesse of wit, and never have in our minde either to search for God any where else than in his holy worde, or to thinke any thing of him, but hating his Worde going before to guide vs, or to speake any thing but that which is taken out of the same Worde: The distinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, as it is verie harde to know, so doeth it bring more businesse and Combene to some wittes than is expedient. Let them remember that the minde of men do enter into a maze when they followe their owne curriositie, and so let them suffer themselves to be ruled with the heauenly oracles, how soever they cannot attaine the height of the mystery.

22 To make a registre of the errours, wherewith the puroiilfe of Faith in this point of doctrine hath in times past beene assailed, were too long & full of vnprofitable tediousse: and the most parte of heretikes haue fa attempted to overwhelme the glory of God with grosse doting errours, that they haue thought it enough for them to shake and trouble the vn-skillfull. And from a fewe men haue sprong vp many sectes , whereof some doe teare in sunder the essence of God, some doe confounde the distincen that is betwene the PERSONS. But if wee holde fast that which is already sufficiently shewed by the Scripture,that the essence of the one God which belongeth to the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy Ghost, is single & vn divid ed: Againe, that the Father by a certaine property different from the Sonne, & the Sonne from the Holy ghost: we shall stop vp the gate not onely against Arrius & Sabellius, but also the other old authors of errours. But because in our time there be risen vp certaine phrentike men, as Seruett & other like, which haue encombred all things with new deceites: It is good in few words to discusse their falshodes. The name of the Trinitie was so hateful, yea so detestable to Seruett, that he sayd, that all the Trinitaries, as hee called them, were vterly godlesse. I omit the foolish words that he had devised to raile withall. But of his opinions this was the summe. That God is made Tripartite, when it is said, that there abide three persons in his essence, and this Trinitie is but a thing imagined, because it disagreeeth with the vniti of God. In the mean time the PERSONS he would haue to be certeine outward conceptions of Forme, which are not truely subsisting in the essence of God, but do represent God unto vs in this or that fashion. And at the beginning y there was in God nothing distinct because once the Word & the Spirit were all one: but since that Chrift arose God out of God, the holy Ghost sprong also an other God out of him. And though sometime he colour his follies with allegories, as when he faith, that the eternall Word of God was the spirirte of Chrift with God, & the bright shining of his forme: Againe, that the Holy ghost was the shadow of the godhead, yet afterward he bringeth the godhead of them both to nothing, affirming that after the rate of distributio there is both in the Sonne and in the holy Spirit a part of God, even as the same Spirit in vs, & also in wood & stones is substantially a portion of God.
What he babbleth of the Person of the Mediator, we shall hereafter see in place convenient. But this monstrous forgot devise, that a Person is nothing else but a visible forme of the glory of God, needeth no long consideration.
For where as John pronounseth, that the Word was God before the world was yet creat, he maketh it much differing from a conception of forme. But if then also, yea, and from farthest Eternitie of time, that Word which was God was with the Father, and had his owne proper glory with the Father, he could not be an outward or figurative shining: but it necessarily followeth that he was an Hypostasis that did inwardly abide in God. And although there be no mention made of the Spirit, but in the historic of the creation of the world: yet he is not there brought in as a shadow, but an essential power of God, when Moses sheweth that the very unfashioned lump was sustaine in him. Therefore it then appeared, that the eternall Spirit was always in God, when he preferred and sustaine & confused matter of heaven & earth, untill beautie & order were added unto it. Surely he could not yet be an image or representatit of God as Servetus dreameth. But in other points he is compelled more openly to disclose his wickednesse, in saying that God by his eternall purpose appointing to himselfe a visible Sonne, did by this means shewe himselfe visible. For if that be true there is no other godhead left unto Christ, but so far as he is by the eternall decree of God ordained his Sonne . Moreover he so transformeth those imagined shapes he sticketh not to saine new accidents in God. But this of all other is most abominable, that he confusely mingleth as well the Sonne of God, as the holy ghost, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be part, and partitions in the essence of God, of which every portion is God. And namely he saith, that the Spirits of the faithful are coeternall and consubstantial with God: albeit in an other place he assigneth the substantiall Deitie, not onely to the soule of man, but also to other creatures.

23 Out of this sinke came forth an other like monster. For certeine lead men meaning to escape the hatred and shame of the wickednesse of Servetus, haue in deede confesed, that there are three Persons, but adding a manner how al that the Father which truly and properly is the one onely God, informing the Sonne & the holy ghost, hath powred his godhead into them. Yea they forbear not this horrible manner of speech, that the Father is by this marke distinguished from the Sonne and the holy ghost, that he is the onely essentialiat or maker of the essence. First they pretend this colour, that Christ is ech where called the Sonne of God: whereof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they marke not, that though the name of God be also common to the Sonne, yet by reason of preeminence it is sometime given to the Father onely, because he is the fountain and original of the Deitie, and that for this purpose, to make the single visirie of the essence to be thereby noted. They take exception & say: If he be truly the Sonne of God, it is inconvenient to haue him reckned the Sonne of a Person. I answere that both are true: that is, that he is the Sonne of God, because he is the Worde begotten of the Father before all worldes (for we come not yet to speake of the Person of the Mediator) and yet for explications sake we ought to haue regarde of the Person, that the name of God simply be not taken, but for the Father onely. For if we meane none to be God but the Father, we plainly throwe down the Sonne from the degree of God. Therefore so oft as mention is made of the godhead, we must not admit a comparison betweene the Sonne and the Father, as though the name of God did belong onely to the Father. For truly Ebr. c.1. the God that appeared to Esiae was the true and onely God, and yet John John. 12, 41. affirmed that the same was Christ. And he that by the mouth of Eby testified, that he should be a stumbling stone to the Iewes, was the only God; and yet Paul pronounceth that the same was Christ. He that cryeth out by Esay: I live, and to me all knees shall bowe, is the onely God: and yet Paul expoundeth that the same was Christ. For this purpose sette the testimonics that the Apostle reciteth. Thou O God haft layd thy foundations of heauen and earth. Againest, let all the angels of God worship him, which things belong to none, but to the onely God. And yet he fayeth, that they are the proper titles of Christ. And this casuallation is nothing worth, that is given to Christ, which is proper to God, because Christ is the shining brightness of his glory. For because in each of these places is set thy name of Iehouah, it followeth, that it is so sayd in respect that he is God of himself.
For if he be Iehouah, it can not be denied that he is the same God that in an other place cryeth out by Esay: I, I am, and beside me there is no GOD.
It is good also to consider that saying of Hieremic: The gods that have not made the heaven and earth, let them perish out of the earth that is under the heaven. Whereas on the other side we must needs confesse, that the Sonne of God is he, whose godhead is oft praised in Esay by the creation of the worlde. And how can it be that the Creator, which Iusteth being to all things, shall not be of himselfe, but borrowe his being of another? For who-focuer faith that the Sonne was essentiate or made to be of his Father, denieth that he is of himselfe. But the Holy ghost saith the contrary, naming him Iehouah. Now if we grant, that the whole essence is in the Father ony, either it must be made partable, or be taken from the Sonne, and so shall the Sonne be spoyle of his essence, and be a God onely in name and title.
The essence of God, if we beleue these triflers: belongeth onely to the Father, for as much as he is onely God, and is the essencemaker of the Sonne.
And so shall the godhead of the Sonne be an abstract from the essence of God, or a derivation of a part out of the whole. Now must they needs grant by their owne principle, that the holy ghost is the Spirite of the Father ony. For if he be a derivation from the first essence, which is onely proper to the Father, of right he can not be accounted the Spirit of the Sonne: which is confuted by the testimonie of Paul, where he maketh the Spirite common to Christ and the Father. Moreover if the person of the Father be wiped out of the Trinitie, wherein shall he differ from the Sonne and the holy ghost, but in this, that he onely is God: They confesse Christ to be God, & yet they say he differeth from the Father. Again, there must be some mark of difference to make that the Father be not the Sonne. They which say that mark of difference to be in the essence, doe manifestly bring the true godhead of Christ to nothing, which can not be without essence, yea and y the whole essence. But they say that the essence, doe not communicate the same to the Son.
That now will they finde wherein to make him different? If the difference be in the essence, let them answere if he haue not communiated the same to the Son.
That could not be in part, for to say that he made halfe a God were wicked. Beside that by this meanes they do sowe trewe in sundre the essence of God. It remaineth therefore that the essence is whole, and perfectly common to the Father & the Sonne. And if that be true, then as touching the essence there is no difference of the one of them from the other. If they say that the Father in giving his essence, remaineth notwithstanding the only God, with whom the essence abideth: then Christ shall be a figurative God, and a God onely in shew and in name but not in deed: because nothing is more proper to God than to be, according to this saying: He that is hath sent mee unto you.

24. It is ease by many places to prooue that it is false which they hold, that so oft as there is in scripture mention made absolutely of God, none is meant therby but the Father. And in those places that they themselves do allledge, they slowly bewray their owne want of consideration, because there is also set the name of the Sonne. Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatly taken, and therefore restrayned to the Person of the Father. And their objection where they say, If the Father were not onely the true God, he should himselfe be his owne Father, is answered with one worde. It is not inconvenient for degree and orders sake, that he be peculiarly called God which hath not onely of himselfe begotten his wisdom, but also is the God of the Mediatour, as in place fit for it, I will more largely declare. For ift Christ was openly shewed in the fleffe, he is called the Sonne of God, not onely in respecte that he was the eternall Worde before all worldes begotten of the Father; but also because he tooke vppon him the Person and office of the Mediatour to joyn vs vnto God. And because they do boldly exclude the Sonne from the honour of God, I would say, knowe whether the Sonne when hee pronounceth, that none is good but God, doe take goodnesse from himselfe? I doe not speake of his humane nature, least perchapse they shoulde take exception, and say, that whatsoever goodnesse was in it, it came of free gifte. I aske whether the eternall Worde of God be good or no? If they say, nay, then wee holde their vngodlinesse sufficently convinced: in saying yea, they confounde themselves. But where as at the first sight, Christ seemeth to put from himselfe the name of God, that doth y more confirme our meaning. For sith it is the singular title of God alone, forasmuch as he was after the common manner saluted by the name of Good, in refusing false honour, hee did admonish them, that the goodnesse wherein hee excelled, was the goodnesse that God hath. I aske also, where Paul affirmeth that onely God is immortall, wise, and true, whether by these worde Christ be brought into the number of men mortall, foolish, and false? Shall not he then be mortall, that from the beginning was life to give immortality to Angels? Shall not hee be wise, that is the eternall wisedome of God? Shall not the truth it selfe be true? I aske furthermore, whether they thinke that Christ ought to be worshipped or no? For he claimeth this vnto himselfe, to haue all knees bowe before him; it followeth that he is the God which did in the lawe forbid any other to be worshipped but himselfe. If they will have that meant of the Father onely which is spoken in Esay: I am, and none but I this testimonie I turne against themselves, forasmuch as we see, that whatsoever pertayneth to God is given to Christ. And their caullation hath no place, that Christes was exalted in the fleffe, wherein hee had beene abased.
abased, and that in respecte of the flesh, all authoritie is given him in heaven & in earth: because although the majestie of king & judge extend to the whole Person of the Mediator, yet if he had not beene God openly shewed in flesh, he could not have beene aduounced to such height, but that God shoulde have disagreed with himselfe. But this controversy Paul doth well take away, teaching that he was egall with God before he did abase himselfe vnder the shape of a seruant. Nowe howe could he this equalitie haue stande together, vnlesse hee had beene the same God whose name is Jahu & Ichouah: that rideth vpon the Cherubin, that is king of all the earth and Lorde of the worldes? Nowe howsoever they babble against it, it cannot be taken from Christ which Esiae faith in an other place: He, he, is our God, for him wee haue wayted, whereas in these wordes he describeth the coming of God the Redeemer, not onely that shoulde bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but also fully in all pointes restore the Church. And with their other cauillation they nothing preuaile, in saying, that Christ was God in his Father. For though wee confess that in respecte of order and degree the beginning of the Godhead is in the Father, yet we say that it is a detestable intention to sayne that the essence is onely proper to the Father, as though hee were the onely Godmaker of the Sonne. For by this meanes either hee shoulde haue more essences than one, or else they call Christ God onely in title and imagination. If they graunt that Christ is God, but next after the Father, then shall the essence be in him begotten and fashioned, which in the Father is vnbegotten and vnfashioned. I knowe that many quicke nofed men doe laugh at this that wee gather the distinction of Persones out of the wordes of Moses, where hee bringeth in God speaking thus: Let vs make man after our image. But yet the godly readers doe see howe vaineely and fondly Moses shoulde bring in this as a talke of diverse together, if there were not in God noe Persones than one. Now certaine is it, that they whome the Father spake vnto, were vncreate: but nothing is vncreate but God himselfe, yea the one onely G O D. Now therefore vnlesse they grant that the power of creating was common, & the authoritie of commandung common, to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost: it shall followe that God did not inwardly thus speake to himselfe, but directed his speach to other forcyne workemen. Finally one place shall eaily aunswere were two of their objections. For where as Christ himselfe pronounceth that God is a Spiritte, this were not conuenient to be restrayned to the Father onely, as if the Worde himselfe were not of Spirituall nature. If then the name of Spiritte doth as well agree with the Sonne as with the Father, I gather that the Sonne is also comprehended vnder the indefinite name of God. But he addeth by and by after that, none are allowed for good worshippers of the Father, but they that worshipphe him in Spiritte and truth, wherevpon followeth an other thinge, because Christe doeth vnder a heade execute the office of a teacher, hee doeth giue the name of G O D to the Father, not to the entente to destroyc his owne Godheade, but by degrees to lifte vs vppe vnto it.
25 But in this they are deceived, that they dream of certain singular things whereof each have a part of the essence. But by the Scriptures, we teach, that there is but one essentially God, and therefore that the essence as well of the Sonne as of the Holy ghost is vnbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first and hath of himselfe begotten his wise-dome, therefore rightfully as is above said, he is counted the original and fountaine of all the godhead. So God indefinitely spoken, is vnbegotten, and the Father also in respect of person is vnbegotten. And foolishly they think, that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quarrtertie, because falsely and cauleously they acribe vnto vs a deuice of their owne braine, as though we did faine that by derivation there come three persons out of one essence: whereas it is evident by our writings that we doe not draw the persons out of the essence, but although they be abiding in the essence we make a distinction betwene them. If the Persons were fewered from the essence, then peradventure their reason were like to be true. But by that meanes it should be a Trinity of gods and not of Persons, which one God containeth in him. So is their fond question answered, whether the essence doe meete to make vp the Trinity, as though we did imagine that there descend three gods out of it. And this exception growth of like foolishlinesse where they say, that then the Trinitie should be without God. For though it meete not to make vp the distinction as a parte or a member, yet neither are the Persons without it nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God could not be the Father, and the Sonne is none otherwise the Sonne but because he is God. We say therefore, that the godhead is absolutely of itselfe. Whereby we grant that the Sonne in so much as he is God, is of himselfe without respect of his person, but in so much as he is the Sonne, we say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his person is God himselfe. And the true teaching writers that in old time haue spoken of the Trinity, haue onely applied this name to the Persons, forsoomuch as it were not onely an absurde error but also a groffe vnGodlinesse to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will have these three to meete, the essence, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost, it is plaine that they doe destroy the essence of the Sonne and the Holy ghost, for else the partes ioyned together would fall in sunder, which is a fault in every distinction. Finally if the Father and the Sonne were Synonimes or several names signifying one thing, so the Father should be the Godmaker, and nothing should remaine in the Sonne but a shadow, and the Trinity should be nothing else, but the ioyning of one God with two creatures.

26 Whereas they obiect, that if Christ be properly God, he is not rightfully called the Sonne, to that we have already answered, that because in such places there is a comparison made of the one Person to the other, the name of God is not there indefinitely taken, but restrained to the Father onely, in so much as he is the beginning of the Godheade, not in making of essence as the mademen doe fondly imagine, but in respect of order. In this meaning is conftrued that laying of Christ to the Father; this is the
The eternall life, that men beleue in thee the one true God, and Jesus Christ whomstou hast sent. For speaking in the Person of the Mediatour, he keepest the degree that is meane betwene God and men: and yet is not his maisterfie thereby diminished. For though he abased himselfe, yet he left not with the Father his glory that was hidden before the world. So the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Hebrues, though he confesseth that Christ for a shorte time was abased beneath the Angels, yet he sticketh not to affime withall, that he is the same eternall God that founded the earth. We must therefore hold, that so oft as Christ in the Person of the Mediatour speaketh to the Father, vnnder this name of God is comprehended the godhead which is his also. So when he sayd to the Apostles: It is profitable that I goe vp to the Father, because the Father is greater: He quoth not vnto himselfe onely the second degree of godhead to be as touching his eternall essence inferior to the Father, but because having obtained the heavenly glory, he gathereth together the faithfull to the partaking of it. He setteth his Father in the higher degree, insomuch as the glorious perfection of brightness that appeareth in heaué, differeth from that measure of glory that was seen in him being clothed with flesh. After like manner in another place Paul faith: that Christ shall yeelde vp the kingdome to God and his Father, that God may be all in all. There is nothing more absurd than to take away eternall continuance from the godhead of Christ. If he fall not ceafe to be the Sonne of God, but shall alway remaine the same that he was from the beginning, it followeth that vnnder the name of the Father is comprehended the one essence that is common to them both. And surely therefore did Christ descend vnto vs, that lifting vp vp vnto his Father, he might also lift vp vp vnto himselfe, insomuch as he is al one with his Father. It is therefore neither lawful nor right so exclusively to restraine the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Sonne. For John doth for this cause affirm that he is true God, that no man should thinke that he is vnder in a second degree of godhead beneath his Father. And I maruell what these framers of newe Gods doe meane, that while they confess Christ to be true God, yet they foorthwith exclude him from the godhead of his Father. As though there could be a true God but he that is the one God: or as though the godhead powred from one to another, be not a certaine newe forged ima- gination.

27 Whereas they heape vp many places out of Irenesus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Christ is the onely and eternall God of Israel: that is either done of a shamefull ignorance, or of an extreme wickednes. For they ought to have considered, that then the holy man had to do in disputa- tion with those frantike men that denied that the Father of Christ was the same God that in olde time spake by Moses and the Prophete, but that he was I wor not what imagined thing brought out of the corruption of the worlde. Therefore he altogether trouaileth in this point, to make it plaine that there is no other God preached of in the Scripture but the Father of Christ, and that it is amisse to deuise any other, and therefore it is no marueil if he so oft conclude that there was no other God of Israel, but he that was spoken spoken of by Christ and the Apostles. And in like manner now, whereas we are to stand against an other sort of error, we may truly say that the God which in olden time appeared to the Fathers, was none other but Christ. But if any man object that it was the Father, our answer is in readiness, that when we strive to defend the godhead of the Sonne, we exclude not the Father. If the readers take heed to this purpose of Ireneus, all that contention shall cease. And also by the first Chapter of the thirde booke, this whole strife is ended, where the good man standeth al vpon this point, to prove that he which is in Scripture absolutely and indefinitely called God: is verily the one only GOD, and that Christ is absolutely called God. Let vs remember that this was the principal point whereupon stood all his disputation, as by the whole procedeth thereof doth appeare: and specially the 46. Chapter of the second booke, that he is not called the Father by darke similitude or parable, which is not very God in deede. Moreover in another place he faith, that as well the Sonne as the Father were ioynently called God by the Prophets and Apostles. Afterwarde he defineth howe Christ which is Lord of all, and king, and God, and judge, received power from him which is the God of all, that is to say in respect of his subjection, because he was humbled even to death of the cross. And a little after he affirmeth, that the Sonne is the maker of heauen and earth, which gave the lawe by the hand of Mofes and appeared to the Fathers. Nowe if any man do prate that with Ireneus only the Father is the God of Israel, I will turne againe vpon him that which the same writer plainlye teacheth, that Christ is all one and the same: as also he applieth vnto him the Prophecie of Habacuc, God shall come out of the South. To the same purpose saith that which is read in the ninth Chapter of the fourth booke. Christ himselfe therefore with the Father is the God of the liuing. And in the twelfe Chapter of the same booke he expoundeth that Abraham beleued God, because Christ is the maker of heauen and earth and the onely God.

28 And with no more trueth doe they bring in Terrullian for their defender. For though he be rough sometime and crabbed in his maner of speech, yet doeth he plainlye teach the summe of that doctrine that we defende. That is to say, where as he is the one God, yet by disposition and order he is his Worde: that there is but one God in vnitie of substance, and yet that the same vnitie by mysterie of orderly distribution is dispofed into Trinitie, that there are three, not in state, but in degree, not in substance, but in forme, not in power, but in order. He faith that hee defendeth the Sonne to bee a seconde next to the Father, but he meaneth him to bee none other than the Father, but by way of distinction. In some places he sayeth that the Sonne is visible. But when he hath reasoned on both partes he defineth that he is invisible as much as hee is the Worde. Finallie where he affirmeth that the Father is determined in his owne person, he prooueth himselfe farre from that error which we confute. And though he doeth acknowledge none other God but the Father, yet in the nexte pece of his writing expounding himselfe, he faith, that he speaketh not exclusively in respect of the Sonne, because he denieth that the Sonne is any other God, beside the Father, and that therefore their sole government is not broken by distinction of Person. And by the perpetual course of his purpose it is easy to gather the meaning of his words. For hee disputeth against Praxcas, that though God be distinguished into three persons, yet are there not made many gods nor the name tone in fudder. And by the imagination of Praxcas Christ could not be God, but hee must also be the Father, therefore hee somuch laboureth about the distinction. Whereas he calleth the Word and the Spirit a portion of the whole although it be a hard kinde of speech, yet is it excusable, because it is not referred to the substance, but only theveth the disposition and order of belonging only to the Persons, as Tertullian himselfe witnesseth. And hereof hangs that: How many persons thinke thou there are, O molt froward Praxcas, but even so many as there be names? And so a little after, they may beleue the Father and the Sonne in their names & Persons. Hereby I thinke may be sufficiently confuted their impudencie that seek to beguile the simple with colour of Tertullians authoritie.

29 And surely whosoever shall diligently compare together his writings of the old authors, shall finde no other thing in Irenæus than that which hath bene taught by other that came after. Iustine is one of the ancients, and he in all things doeth agree with vs. Yet let them object that hee as the rest do, calleth the Father of Christ the onely God. The same thing doeth Hilarie teach, yea, and speakest more hardly, that the eternity is in the Father. But doth hee that to take away the essence of God from the Sonne? And yet hee altogether in defence of the same Faith that we follow. Yet are they not ashamed to picke out certaine mangled sentences whereby they woulde perwade that Hilarie is a Patrone of their errour. Where they bring in Ignatius: if they will haue that to bee of any authoritie, let them proove that the Apostles made a lawe for lent and suchlike corruptions of religion. Nothing is more vnfaucier than those fonde trifles that are published under his name of Ignatius, Wherefore their impudencie is somuch lesse tolerable that disguise the Flues with such visers to deceite. Moreover the consent of the ancients Fathers is plainly perceived by this, that at the council of Nice, Arrius neuer durft allege for himselfe any authoritie of any one allowed writer. And none of the Grekes or Latines doth excuse himselfe and say, that he differeth from them that were before. It needeth not to be spoken how Augustine, whome these loselles doe most hate, hath diligently searched the writings of them all, and howe reuerently he did embrace them. Truely euon in matters of least weight hee visite to shewe what compelleth him to differ from them. And in this matter, if he have read any thing doubfull or darke in other, he hydeth it not. But the doctrine that these men strive against, he taketh it as confess'd, that from the farthest time of antiquitie it hath bene without controversie received. And by one worde it appeareth that he was not ignorant what other had taught before him, where hee faith that in the Father is vnitie, in the first booke of Christian doctrine, will they say that hee then forgave himselfe? But in another place hee purgeth himselfe from such reproch, where hee calleth calleth the Father the beginning of the whole Godhead, because he is of none: considering in deed wisely that the name of God is specially ascribed to the Father, because if the beginning should not be reckoned at him, the single vanity of God cannot be conceived. By this I trust the godly reader will perceive that all the caviliations are confused where with Sathan hath hitherto attempted to pervert or darken the pure truth of doctrine. Finally I trust that the whole summe of doctrine in this pointe is fully declared, if the readers will temper them of curiousitie, and not more greedily than met is seek for comebome and entangled disputations. For I take not in hande to please them, that doe delight in an vntemperate desire of speculatiou. Truly I have omitted nothing of stature purpose that I thought to make against mee. But while I studie to edifie the Church, I thought it best, to leave many things untouched which both finally profited, and woulde greete the readers with superfluous tediousnesse. For to what purpose were it to dispute, whether the Father doe alwayes beget? For as much as it is folly to faine a continuall acte of begetting, fith it is evident that from eternitie there have bene three Persons in God.

The xiiiij. Chapter.

That the Scripture even in the creation of the world and of all things doth by certaine marks put difference between the true God, and fained Gods.

Although Eas doth worthily reproche the worshippers of falle Gods with froutfulnesse, for that they have not learned by the very foundations of the earth, and rounde compass of the heauens, which is the true God: yet such is the dulnese & grossenes of our wite, leaste faithfull should fall away to the inventions of the Gentiles, it was necessarie to hate God more expressly painted out vnto them. For whereas the saying that God is the minde of the worlde, which is compt the moat tolerable description that is founde among the Philosophers, is but vaine, it behouth vs more familiarly to knowe him, leasst wee always wauer in doubtablenesse. Therefore it was his pleasure to have a historie of the creation remaining, whereupon the Faith of the Church might rest, and seek for none other God but him, whom Moses hath declared to be the maker and buylder of the worlde. There is first set foorth the time, that by continuall proceeding of yeres the faithfull might come to the first originall of mankinde, and of all things. Which knowledge is verie necessarie, not onely to confute those monstrous fables that sometime were sired in Egypte and other partes of the worlde, but also, that the beginning of the worlde once being known, the eternitie of God may more clearely shine foorth and rauihe vs in admiration of it. Neither ought we to be any thing moved with that vngodly mooke, that it is maruell why it came no sooner in the minde of God to make the heauen and the earth, and why he sitting idle did suffer so immeasurable a space to passe away, fith hee might have made it many thousande ages before: whereas the whole continuance of the worlde that nowe draweth to an ende, is not yet come to fixe thousande yeares. For why God so long deferred it, is neither lawfull nor expedient for vs to enquire. Because cause if mans minde will travaile to attaine thereunto, it shall fayle an hundred times by the way, nether were it profitable for vs to know that thing which God himselfe to proue the modestie of our faith, hath of purpose willed to be hidden. And well did that godlie olde man speake, which when a wanton fellowe did in scorne demande of him, what God had done before the creation of the world, answered that hee buylde Hell for curiousfooles. Let this graue and seuerle warning represse the wantonnesse that tickleth many yeares and driueth them to cuill and hurtfull speculations. Finally let vs remember that the fame invisible God whose wisdome, power and justice is incomprehensible, doth set before vs the historie of Moses as a looking glasse, wherein his luyly image appeareth. For as the eyes that either are growen dimme with age or dulled with anie disease, doe not discern any thing plainely vnlesse they be holpen with spectacles: so such is our weakenesse, that vnlesse the Scripture direct vs in seeking of God, we doe foorthwith runne out into vanitie. And they that followe their owne wantonnesse, because they be nowe warned in vaine, shall all too late feele with horrible destruction, howe much it had beene better for them reuently to receiue the secrete counsels of God, than to vomite out our blaspheymes, to obscure the heauen withall. And rightlie doeth Augustine complain that wrong is done to God when further cause of thinges is sought for, than his onely will. The same man in another place doth wisely warne vs, that it is no lesse cuill to moue question of immeasurable spaces of times than of places. For howe brode loue the circuit of the heauen is, yet is there some measure of it. Nowe if one shoule quarell with God for that the emptiness wherein nothing is conteyned, is an hundred times more, shall not all the godly abhorre suche wantonnesse? Into like madnesse runne they that busie themselves about Gods sitting still, because at their appointment he made not the worlde innumerable ages sooner. To satisfie their owne greedinesse of mind, they couet to passe without the compasse of the world, as though in so large a circuite of heauen, and earth, they could not finde thinges enough that with their insatiable brightness may overthrow all our senses: as though in sixe thousande yeares God hath not fiewed examples in continuall consideration, whereof our minde may be exercisied. Let vs therefore willingly abide enclosed within those boundes where-with it pleased God to enuiron vs, and as it were to penne vp our minde that they should not fray abrode with libertie of wandring.

2 For like reason is it that Moses declareth, that the worke of God was not ended in a moment but in suche dayes. For by this circumstance we are withdrawn from forged intentions to the one onely God that deuised his worke into suche dayes, that it should not greeue vs to be occupied all ye time of our life in considering of it. For though our eyes, what way soever wee turne them, are compelled to looke vppon the worke of God, yet se we howe fickle our hede is, and if any godly thoughts, do touch vs, howe soon they passe away. Here againe mans reason murmur eth as though such proceedings were disagreing from the power of God, vntill such time as being made subiect to obedience of faith, the learne to keep ye rest wherunto ye hallowing lowing of the seuenth day calleth vs. But in the very order of things, is diligently to be considered the Fatherly love of God toward mankind, in this: that he did not creat Adam untill he had stored the world with all plentie of good things. For if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren & empty, if he had given him life before that there was any light, he should have seemed not so well to provide for his commoditie. But now where he first disposed the motions of the Sunne and the Planets for the use of man, and furnished the earth, the waters and the aire with living creatures, & brought forth abundance of fuites to suffice for foode, taking vpon him the care of a diligent and prudent householder, he shewed his marvellous bountie toward vs. If a man do more heedfully vey with himselfe those things that I do but shortly touch, it shall appeare that Moses was the sure witnesse & publisher of the one God the creator. I omit here that which I have alreadie declared, that he speaketh not there onely of the bare essence of God, but also fereth forth vs to his eternall Wildome & Spiritue, to the end we should not dreame that God is any other, than such as he will be known by the image that he hath there expressed.

3 But before that I begin to speake more at large of the nature of man, I must say somewhat of Angels. Because though Moses applying himselfe to the rudenesse of the common people reciteth in his historie of the creation no other workes of God but such as are scene with our eyes, yet whereas afterward he bringeth in Angels for ministers of God, we may easilly gather that he was the creator of them in whose feruice they employ their trauell and offices. Though therefore Moses speaking after the capacitie of the people doth not at the very beginning rehearfe the Angels among the creatures of God: yet that is no caufe to the contrary, but that we may plainly & expressly speake those things of them, which in other places the Scripture commonly teacheth. Because if we desire to know God by his works, noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Befide that this point of doctrine is verie necessarie for the confuting of many errors. The excellency of the nature of Angels hath so dafed the minde of many, that they thought the Angels had wrong offered them, if they should be made subject to the authoritie of one God, and brought as it were in obedience. And here upon were they fained to be Gods. There rofe vp also one Manicheus with his sect, which made themselves two originall beginnings of things, God, & the Diuel, and to God he assigneth the beginning of good things, & of things of evil nature he determined the Diuel to be the author. If our minds should be entangled with this error, God should not kepe whole his glory in the creation of the world. For where as nothing is more proper to God than eternitie and a being of himselfe as I may so terme it, they which gue that unto the diuel, do they not in a maner give him the title of godhead? Now where is the almightieflie of God become, if such authoritie be granted to the diuel, that he may put in execution what he will though God say nay & withstand it. As for the onely foundation that the Manichees have, that it is unlawfull to ascribe vnto God that is good, the creation of any thing that is evil, that nothing hunteh the true Faith, which admitteth not that there is any thing naturally quill in the whole universalitie of the world, because neither the frowardnesse and malice both of man and the devil, nor the sins that proceed therefrom, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning, wherein God hath not shewed an example both of his wisdom and justice. Therefore to answer these peruerse devises: it behoeth vs to lift vp our minde hire than our eyes can attaine to see. For which cause it is likely, that where in the Nicene creede God is called the creator of all things, things invisibl are express. Yet will we be carefull to keepe the measure that the rule of godliness appeareth, least the readers with searching to understand further than is expedient, should wander abroad, being ledde away from the simplicitie of Faith. And surely for as much as the Holy ghost teacheth vs alwaies for our profit, and such things as are finally auayable to edifie, hee doeth either leave wholly unspoken, or but lightly, and as it were overturnedingly touch them: it shalbe also our dutie to be content not to knowe those things that do not profit vs.

4. That the Angels, for as much as they are the ministers of God ordeined to execute his commandementes, are also his creatures, it ought to be certeincly out of all question. To move dout of the time and order that they were created in, should it nor rather be a busie waiwardnesse than diligence? Moses declareth that the earth was made, and the heauen were made, with all their armies, to what purpose than is it, curiously to searche, what day the other more secret armies of heauen before the staries and planettes first began to be? But, because I will not be long: let vs, as in the whole doctrine of religion, so here also remember that we ought to keepe one rule of modestie & sobriety, that of obscure things we neither speake, nor thinke, nor yet desire to knowe any other things than that hath bin taught vs by the word of God: and on other point, that in reading of Scripture we continually rest upon the searching and studying of such things as perecone to education, & not give our soluces to curiositie or study of things vnprofitable. And because it was Gods pleasure to instruct vs, not in trifling questions, but in sound godliness, feare of his name, true confidence, and duties of holines: let us rest upon such knowledge. Wherefore, if we will be righte wife, wee must leave those vanities that idle men haue taught without warrant of the word of God, concerning the nature, degrees, and multitude of Angels. I knowe that such matters as this, are by many more greedily taken hold of, & are more pleasant vnto them than such things as lie in daily vs. But if it greeue vs not to be the scholers of Christ, let it not greeue vs to folowe that order of learning he hath appointed. So shal it so come to passe, that being contented with his scholing, we shal not onely forbear but also abhorre superfluious speculations, from which he calleth vs away. No man can deny, that the same Denyfe, whatsoever man he was, hath disputed many things both subtilely & wittily in his Hierarchie of heauen: but if a man examine it more neerely, he shall finde that for the most part it is but meere babbling. But the dutifull purpose of a divine is, not to delite cares with prating, but to stablish consences with teaching things true, certaine, and profitable.
If one should read that booke, he would thinke that the man were flipp'd downe from heauen, & did tell of thinges not by heare, but that he had seene with his eyes. But Paul which was rais'd aboue the third heauen, hath ytter'd no such thing, but also protesteth, that it is not lawfull for man to speake the secrete that he had seene. Therefore bidding farewell to that trifling wisdome, let vs consider by the simple doctrine of the Scripture, what the Lord would have vs knowe concerning his Angels.

5 It is commonly read in the Scripture, that Angels are heavenly Spirites, whose ministration and service God vseth for putting in execution of those thinges that he hath decreed. For which reason that name is giuen them, because God vseth them as messengers, to shew himsellf vnto men. And upon like reason are derived the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they do like a gard environ their prince, & do adorn & set forth the honorable shew of his maieftie, and like soldiers they are alway attending upon the ensigne of their captain, and are euer so prepared & in readiness to do his commandements, that so soone as he doth but beeke to them, they prepare themselves to worke, or rather be at their worke already. Such an image of the throne of God to set out his royaltie, the other prophets do describe, but principally Daniel where he faith, that when God fate him downe in his throne of judgement, there ftoode by a thousand thousand, & ten thousand companies of ten thousands of Angels. And because God doth by them marausly shew forth & declare his might and strength of his hand, therefore they are named strengths, because he exerciseth and vseth his authority in his world by them, therefore they are sometimne called principaftities, sometimne powers, sometimne Dominions. Finally because in them as it were sitteth the glory of God, for this cause also they are called Thrones: though of this last name I will not certeinly say, because an other exposition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (speaking nothing of that name) the Holy ghost often vseth those other former names to auance the dignitie of the ministerie of Angels. For it were not reall those instruments should be let passe without honor by whom God doth specially shew the presence of his maieftie. Yea for that reason they are many times called Gods, because in their miniftary as in a looking glaftis, they partly represent vnto vs the godhead. Although in deed I mislike not this that the old writers do expound, that Christ was the Angel, where the Scripture faith, that the Angel of God appeared to Abraham, Jacob, Moses, & other yet oftentimes where mention is made of all the Angels in deed this name is giuen vnto them. And that ought to seeme no meruicile. For if this honour be giuen to princes and governours, that in their office they stanđe in the stead of God that is foueraigne king & judge, much greater cause there is why it should be giuen to the Angels, in whom the brightness of the glory of God much more abundantly shineth.

6 But the Scripture standeth most vpon teaching vs that, which might most make to our comforte and confirmation of Faith: that is to wit, that the Angels are the distributers & administratours of Gods bountie toward vs. And therefore the Scripture reciteth, that they watch for our safetie: they they take upon them the defence of vs, they direct our waies, they take care that no hurtfull thing betide vnto vs. The sentences are univerfall, which principally pertaine to Christ the heade of the Church, and then to all the faithfull. He hath giuen his Angels charge of thee, to keepe thee in all thy waies. They shall beare thee vp in their handes, least thou chance to hit thy feete against a stone. Again, The Angel of the Lord standeth round about them that feare him, and he doth deliuer them. Wherby God sheweth that he appointeth to his Angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to keepe. After this order the Angel of the Lord doth comfort Agar when she fled away, & commandeth her to be reconciled to her maistres. God promiseth to Abraham his seruante an Angel to be the guide of his jour- ney. Jacob in blessing of Ephraim & Manasses prayeth, that the Angel of the Lord by whom he himselfe had bin deliuered from all euill, may make them prosper. So the Angell was set to defende the tentes of the people of Is- rael. And so oft as it pleased God to resue Israel out of the handes of their enemies, he raised vp resenvengers by his ministerie of Angels. So finally (to y end I neede not to rehearse many more) the Angels ministred to Christ and were ready assistent to him in all necessitie. They brought tidings to the women of his resurrection, & to y disciples of his glorious comming. And so to fullfyl their office of defending vs, they fight against the devill and all enemies, and do execute the vengeance of God vpon them, that are bent against vs. As we reade that the Angell of God to deliuer Hierusalem from y siefe, flew in one night a hundred thousand & five thousand in y campe of the king Assyria.

thing that there appeareth, that we may think it was any one Angel, to whom God had given charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his continual keeper: as the common people do imagine that there are appointed to every one two Angels, as it were diverse ghosts, a good Angel and a bad. But it is not worth trouble, curiously to search for that which doeth not much import vs to know. For if this do not content a man, that all degrees of the army of heaven do watch for his safetie, I doe not see what hee can be the better, if he understand that there is one Angel peculiarly appointed to keepe him. And they which restraine vs to one Angel's care that God hath to every one of vs, do great wrong to themselves: & to all the members of the Church: as if that power to succour vs had beene vainly promised vs, wherewith being enviromed and defended, wee should fight the more boldly.

8 They that dare take vpon them to define of the multitude and degrees of Angels, let them looke well what foundation they haue. I grant Michael is called in Daniel, the Great prince, & with Iude, the Archangel. And Paul faith, it shal be an Archangel that shal with sound of trumpeter call men to judgment. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours betweene Angels, or differne one from another by speciall markes, & appoint every one his place & standing? For the two names that are in Scripture, Michael, & Gabriel: and if you lift to adde the third out of the historie of Thobie, may by their significacion seeme to be given to the Angels, according to the capacitie of our weakenesse, although I had rather leaue that exposition at large. As for the number of them, we heare by Christes mouth of many Legions, by Daniel many companies of ten thousands, the servant of El-zeus law many chariots full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude, that it is fai'd, they do camp round about them that fear God. As for shap'e, it is ceraine, that Spirites haue none, and yet the Scripture for the capacitie of our wit doth not in vain vnder Cherubin and Seraphin paint vs our Angels with wings, to the intent we should not dout that they will be ouer with incredible swiftnesse, redie to succour vs: so loone as neede shall require, as if the lightning fent from heauen should fly vnto vs with such swiftnesse as it is wornde. Whatsoever more than this may be sought of both these points, let vs belceme it to be of that sort of mysteries, whereof the full revelation is deferred to the last day: Wherefore let vs remember to take heed both of too much curiositie in serching & to much boldnes in speaking.

9 But this one thing which many troublesome do call in doubt, is to be holden for ceretnie, that Angels are miniftring spirits, whose service God vseth for the defence of his, and by whom he both distributeth his benefits among men, and also purtellth his other workes in execution. It was in the olde time the opinion of the Sadducess, that by Angels is meant nothing els, but either the motions that God doth inspire in men, or the tokens that he sheweth of his power. But against this erroneous crye out so many testimonies of Scripture, that it is manuicel that so grosse ignorance could be suffred in that people. For to omit those places that I haue before alleged, where are recited thousands & Legions of Angels: where ioy is giuen vnto them, where... it is sayd that they uphold the faithful with their hands, & carry their soules into rest: that they fee the face of the Father, and such like: there are other places whereby is clearly proued, that they are in deede spirits of a nature that hath substance. For where as Stephen & Paul do say, that the law was given by the hand of Angels, and Christ faith,y the elect after the resurrection shall be like vnto Angels: that the day of judgement is not known to the very Angels: that he shall then come with his holy Angels: how soever they be writhed, yet must they so be vnderstanded. Likewise when Paul charged Timothie before Christ and his chosen Angels, to keepe his commandements, he meaneth not qualities or inspirations without substance but very spirites. And otherwise it standeth not together that is written in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, that Christ is become more excellent than Angels, that the world is not made subjicet vnto them: that Christ tooke upon him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we mean not y blessed spirites, to whom may these comparisons agree? And the author of y Epistle expoudeth himselfe where he placeth in the kingdom of heaven the soules of the faithfull and the holy Angels together. Also the same that we have already alleged, that the Angels of children do alway behold the face of God, that they do reioyce at our fastenie, that they maruell at the manifolde grace of God in the Church, that they are subjicet to Christ, the heade. To the same purpose fetteuch this, that they so oft appeared to the holy Fathers in the forme of men, that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Christ himselfe for the principal preeminence that he hath in the perfon of the Mediatour, is called an Angel. This I thought good to touch by the way, to furnish the simple with defence against thowe foolish and reasonlesse opinions, that many ages agoe raised by Satan do now and then spring vp againe.

10 Now it resteth, that we seeke to meete with that superstition which is commonly wont to creep in, where it is said: that Angels are the ministers and deliuerers of all good things vnto vs. For by and by mans reason falleth to this point, to thinke y therefore all honour ought to be given them. So commeth it to passe, that thowe things which belong only to God & Christ, are conciued away to Angels. By this meanes we see that in certaine ages past, the glory of Christ hath bin many wayes obscured, when Angels without warrant of Gods word were loden with immeasurable titles of honour. And of all the vices that we speake against, there is almost none more aurient than this. For it appeareth, that Paul himselfe had much to do with some which so auranced Angels, that they in manner would have brought Christ vnder subjicetion. And therefore he doth so carefully presse this point in his Epistle to the Colossians, that Christ is not onely to be preferred before all Angels, but that he is also the author of all the good things that they haue: to the end we should not forfake him and turne vnto them, which can not sufficiently helpe them sufficing, but are faine to drawe out of the same fountaine that we do. Surely forasmuch as there shineth in the a certain brightnes of the majesty of God, there is nothing whereunto we are more easly enclined, than with a certaine admiration to fall downe in worshipping of them, & to give vnto them all things that are due only to God. Which thing John in the Revelation confesseth to have chaunteded to himselfe, but he addeth withall, that he received this answer. See thou doe it not. For I am thy fellowe servant, Worship God.

II. But this danger we shall well beware of, if we doe consider why God vseth rather by them than by himselfe without their service to declare his power, to provide for the safety of the faithfull, and to communicate his gifts of his liberality among them. Surely he doth not this of necessity, as though he could not be without them: for so oft as pleaseth him, he letteth them alone, and bringeth his works to passe with an only becke: so far is it of, that they be any aide to him, to cace him of the hardnesse therof. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weakenes, so that we want nothing that may auaile our mindes, either in raising them vp in good hope, or confirming them in assurance. This one thing ought to be enough & enough againe for vs, that the Lord affirmeth he is our protector. But while we see our selves besieged with so many dangers, so many hurtesfull things, so many kindes of enemies: it may be (such is our weakenesse and frailtie) that we be sometime filled with trembling feare, or fall for despaire, unless the Lord after the proportion of our capacity do make vs to conceive his presence. By this meanes he not onely promiseth that he will haue care of vs, but also that he hath an imnumerable garde to whom he hath giuen in charge to trauail for our safetie, and that so long as we be compaied with the garrifon & support of them, whatsoever danger betideth, we be without all reach of hurtes. II graunt we do amisse that after this simple promise of the protection of God alone, we still looke about from whence other help may come vnto vs. But for as much as it pleaseth the Lord of his infinite clemencie and gentlenes to helpe this our fault, there is no reason why we should neglect his so great benefit. An example there of we haue in the servant of Elizeus, which when he sawe the hill besieged with the army of the Syrians, and that there was no way open to escape, was stricken downe with feare, as if his maister and he, were then vterly destroyed. Then Elizeus prayed God to open his servants eyes, and by & by he sawe the hill furnisheed with horsees and fiery chariotes, that is with a multitude of Angels to keepe him and the prophet safe. Encouraged with this vision he gathered vp his heart againe, & was able with a dreadlesse mind to looke downe vp on his enemies, with fight of whom he was before in a manner drunen out of his witte.

II. Wherefore whatsoeuer is said of the ministerie of Angels, let vs apply it to this ende, that outcomming all distrust, our hope may be the more strongly stablished in God. For these succours are herefore providened vs of God, that we shold not be made afraid with multitude of enemies, as though they could prevaine against his helpe, but should see vnto that saying of Elizeus, that there be mo on our side than be against us. How much then is it against order of reason, that we should be ledde away from God by Angels which are ordene to for this purpose, to testifie that his helpe is more present among vs. But they doe leade vs away in deede, if they do not straight lead vs as it were by the hand to him, that we may haue eyes vnto, call vpon, and publish him for our onely helper: if we consider not them to be as his hands
Gen. 24.7.  Therefore the servant of Abraham being committed to the custody of the Angel, doth not therefore call upon the Angel to help him, but holpen with \\nCommendation, he praieth to the Lord, and beseecheth him to shew his mercy to Abraham. For as God doth not therefore make them ministers of his power & goodnes, to the intent to part his glory with them: so doth he not therefore promise vs his helpe in their ministration, that we should divide our confidence betweene him & them. Let vs therefore forsake that Platonicall philosophie, to seeke \\nway to God by Angels, and to honour them for this purpose that they may make God more gentle vs, which superstitious and curious men hate from the beginning gone out, and to this day do continue to bring into our religion.

13 As for such things as the Scripture teacheth concerning devils, they tende in a manner all to this ende, that we may be carefull to beware afofe hand of their waives and preparations, & furnish our selues with such weapons as are strong & sure enough to drive away euem the strongest enemies. For whereas Sathan is called the God and prince of the worlde, whereas he is named the strong armed man, the Spirit that hath power of the aire, and a roaring lion: these descriptions serue to no other purpose, but to make vs more ware and watchfull, and readier to enter in battayle with him. Which is also sometime set out in expresse wordes. For Peter after he had sayde, that the devill goeth about like a roaring lyon, seeking whom hee may devour, by & by addeth this exhortation, we strongly refite him by Faith. And Paul after he had given warning that we wratht not with flesh & bloud, but with the princes of the aire, the powers of darkness, and spirittual wickedneses, by and by biddeth vs put on such armour as may serue for so great and daungerous a battayle. Wherefore let vs also appic all to this ende, that being warned howe there doth continually approch upon vs an enemie, yea an enemie that is in courage most hardy, in strength most mightie, in policies most farte, in diligence and celeritie vnweariable, with all fortes of engins plenteously furnished, in skill of warre most ready, we suffer not our selues by slouthe and cowardice to be surprisef, but on the other side with bold and hardy mindes set our foote to refite him: and (because this warre is onely ended by Death) encourage our selues to continue. But specially knowing our owne weakenesse and vnskillfulness, let vs call vpon the helpe of God and enterpriffe nothing but vpon truit of him, for as much as it is in him onely to giue vs policie, strength, courage and armoure.

14 And that we should be the more stirred vp and enforced so to do, the Scripture Scripture warneth us, that there are not one or two or a fewe enimes, but great armies that make warre with us. For it is saide, that Mary Magdalene was delivered from feuen diuels, wherewith she was possesse. And Christ faith, that it is his orddary enimie, that if after a diuell be once cast out, a newe make the place open againe, he bringeth feuen spirits worse than himselfe, and returneth into his possession, finding it empty. Yea it is said that a whole legion besieged one man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that wee must fight with an infinite multitude of enimes, lest deprevinge the fewenesse of them we should be more slacke to enter in battle, or thinking that we have some respite in the mean time granted, we should give our felues to idlenesse. Where as many times Satan or the diuell is named in the singular number, thereby is ment that power of wickednes which standeth against the kingdom of Justice. For as the Church and his fellowship of Saints have Christ to their head, so the faction of the wicked is paint out vs with their prince, that hath the chiefe authority among them. After which manner this is spoken. Go ye cursed into eternall fire that is prepared for the diuell and his angels.

Here also this ought to stirre vs vp to a perpetuall warre with the diuell, for that he is every where called the enimie of God and of vs. For if we haue regarde of Gods glory, as it is meete we should, then ought we with all our force to bend our selues against him, that goeth about to extinguish the it. If we be affectioned to maintaine the kingdom of Christ as we ought, then must we needs have an unappeasable warre with him that conspireth the ruine thereof. Againe, if any care of our owne saftie doe touch vs, then ought we to haue neither peace nor truce with him that continually lieth in waiue for the destruction of it. Such a one is he described in the 3. chap. of Genesis where he leadeth man away from the obedience that he did owe to God, that he is both robeth God of his due honor, and throweth man himselfe headlong into destruction. Such a one also is he set forth in the Evangelistes, where he is called an enimie, and is saide to scatter tares, to corrupt the seede of eternall life. In summe, that which Christ testifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murderer, and a lyer, we finde by experience in all his doinges. For he affaileth the truth of God with lyes, obscureth the light with darkenesse, entangleth the minde of men with errors, raiseth vp hatredes, kindleth contentions and stirs, doeth all thinges to this end to overthrow the kingdom of God and drown men with himselfe in eternall destruction. Wherby appeareth, that he is of nature frowarde, spiritfull & malicious. For needes must there be great frowardnes in that wit, that is made to affaile the glory of God and salvation of men. And that doth John speake of in his epistle, when he writeth, that he sinnteth from the beginning. For he meaneth that he is the authour, captaine and principall workman of all malice and wickednesse.

But forasmuch as the diuell was created by God, let vs remember that this malice which we affigne in his nature, is not by creation but by depravation. For what so ever damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himselfe by his owne revolting and fall. Which the scripture therefore giueth vs warning of, least thinking that he came out such a one from God, wee should do ascribe that to God himselfe which is farthest from him: For this reason doth Christ say that Satan spoketh of his owne when he speaketh liues, and addeth a cause why, for that he fled not still in the truth, Now when he faith that he stood not still in the truth, he sheweth that once he had beene in the truth. And when he maketh him the Father of lying, he taketh this from him, that he cannot lay that fault to God whereof he himselfe is cause to him selfe. Although these things be but shortly and not very plainly spoken, yet this is enough for this purpose to deliuer the majestie of God from all slander. And what maketh it matter to vs, to know more or to any other purpose concerning devils? Many perhaps doe grudge, that the Scripture doeth not orderly and distinctly in many places set forth that fall and the cause, manner, time, and fashion thereof, But because these things doe nothing pertaine to vs, it was better, if not to be suppressed wholly, yet to bee but lightly touched, and that partly, because it was not be seming for his holy ghost to feed curiositie with vaine histories without any fruit: and wee see that it was the Lords purpose to put nothing in his holy oracles but with which we should learne to edification. Therefore, least we our selves should take long vpon thinges superfluous, let vs be content shortly to know thus much concerning the nature of Devils, at the first creation they were the Angels of God: but by warning out of kinde they both destroyed themselfes and are become instruments of destruction to other. Thus much, because it was profitable to be known, is plainly taugnt in Peter and Iude, God spared not (say they) his Angels which had sinned, and nor kept their beginning, but had forsaken their dwelling place, And Paul naming the elect Angels doeth without doubt secretly by implication set the reprobate Angels in comparison against them.

17 As for the discorde & strife that we say is betwene God & Satan, we must so take it, still wee hold this for certain, that hee can doe nothing but by the will & sufferance of God. For we read in the historie of Iob, that he presented himselfe before God to receyue his commandements, & durst not go forward to do any enterprize till he had obtained licence. So when Ahab to be deceived he tooke vpon him that he would be the Spirit of lying in the mouth of all the Prophets, and so being sent of God he performed it. For this reason he is called the euill spirite of the Lord, tormented Saul, because by him as with a scourge the sins of the wicked king were punished. And in another place it is written, the plagues were laid vpon Egyptians by euill angels, According to these particular examples Paul doth generally testify, that the blinding of wicked is the worke of God, whereas before he had called it the working of Satan. It is evident therefore Satan is under the power of God, & so governed by his authority he is compelled to doe him service.

Now when we say that Satan resiteth God, the works of Satan disagree with the worke of God, wee doe therewithall affirme that this disagreement and strife hangeth vpon the sufferance of God. I speake not nowe of his will, nor of his endore, but of the effecte onely. For sith the devil is wicked of nature, he is not enclined to obey the wil of God, but is wholly caried to stubbornesse stubborneffe and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himselfe and of his owne wickedneffe, that of desire and purpose he withstandeth God. And by this wickedneffe he is stirred vp to the enterprizing of those things that hee knoweth to be most against God. But because God hолedeth him fast tyed & restrayned with the bridle of his power, he executeth onely those things that are granted him from God. And so doeth he obey his creator whether he will or no, because he is constrained to applie his service whithersoever God comptelleth him.

18 Nowe becaufe God boweth the vnclene Spirites hither & thither as pleaseth him, he so tempereth this government, that they exercise the faithfull with battell, they fet upon them out of ambushes, they assayle them with invasions, they prite them with fighting, and oftentimes wearie them, trouble them, make them affraide, and sometime wounde them, but neuer overcome nor oppresse them. But ye wicked they subdue & draw away, they raigne vpon their foules and bodies, & abuse them as bondslaves to al mischevous doings. As for the faithfull, because they are vnquieted of such enimes, therefore they heare these exhortations. Doe not giue place to the Deuill. The devill your enimie goeth about as a roaring lyon seeking whom hee may denoue, whom resiſt yee being strong in faith, and such like. Paul confesseth that he himselfe was not free from this kinde of strife, when hee faith, that for a remedye to tame pride, the Angel of Satan was giuen to him by whom he might be humbled. This exercife therefore is common to all the children of God. But because that same promise of the breaking of Satan was made perteineth generally to Christ and to all his members, therefore I say that the faithfull can neuer be overcome nor oppressed by him. They are many times stricken downe, but they are neuer so astonnied withall but that they recover themselves. They fall downe many times with violencé of strokes, but they are after raised vp againe: they are wounded but not deadly. Finally they doe labour in all the course of their life that in ye end they obteyne the victorie: but I speake not this of cuerie doing of theirs. For we knowe ye by the iuft vengeance of God Daviſ was for a time giuen ouer to Satan, by his motion to number the people: and not withoutcause Paul faith there is hope of pardon, leaſt if any haue bene entangled with ye snares of the devill. Therefore in another place the same Paul faith, that the promise aforesaid is begonne in this life, wherein we must walke, and is performed after our walting ended: when he faith the God of peace shall shortly beare downe Satan under your feete. This victorie hath alway fully beene in our heades Christ, because the Prince of the world had nothing in him, but in vs that are his members it doeth now partly appeare and shall be perfirshed, when being vnclothed of our flesh by which wee are yet subject to weakenes, we shall be full of the power of the Holy ghost. In this manner when the kingdom of Christ is raife vp and advanced, Satan with his power falleth downe as the Lord himselfe faith. I haue Satan faith as a lightning downe from heauen. For by this aunfwere hee confirme that which the Apostles had reported of the power of his preaching. Again, 2. Sam. 7. 17. 2. Pet. 5. 3. 2. Cor. 12. 7. Gen. 3. 15. 2. Sam. 7. 4. Rom. 26. 10. Iuk. 1. 18. When the Prince posseſseth his owne palace, all things that he posseſseth are are in peace, but when there commeth a stronger, he is thrown out &c. And to this ende Christ in dying overcame Satan which had the power of death, and triumphed upon all his armies that they should not hurt the Church, for otherwise they would every moment an hundred times destroy it. For (considering what is our weakness, and what is his furious strength) howe could we stande, yea nearer so little time against his manifold and continual assaults, but being supported by the victorie of our captaine? Therefore God suffereth not the Devil to rage over the foules of the faithfull, but only deliuereth him the wicked and unbelieving to gouerne, whome God doeth not vouchsafe to haue reckened in his flocke.

For it is laide that hee possesth this worlde without controversie till he be thrust out by Christ. Againe, that hee doeth blinde all them that beleue not the Gospell, againe, that hee performeth his worke in the stubborne children, and worthless, for all the wicked are the vessels of his wrath. Therefore to whome shoulethey be rather subject then to the minister of Gods vengeance? Finally they are fayde to bee of their Father the Devil, because as the faithfull are hereby known to bee the children of God, because they bear his image: so they by the image of Satan into which they are gone out of kinde, are properly discerned to be his children.

19 As wee haue before confuted that withling Philosophie concerning the holy Angels, which teacheth that they are nothing else but good inspirations or motions, which God stirceth vp in the minde of men: so in this place must wee confute them that fondly say that Devils are nothing else but euill affections or perturbations of minde, that are thrust into vs by our flesh. That may we shortly doe, because there bee many testimonies of Scripture, and those plaine enough vpon this pointe. Firft where the unholy Spirites are called, Angels, Apolltaces, which hauing swarmed out of kinde from their beginning, the verie names doe sufficiently express that they are not motions or affections of minde, but rather in deede as they bee called minde or Spirites endued with sente and understanding.

Likewise whereas both Christ and John doe compare the children of God with the children of the Devill: were it not an vnfit comparison, if the name of y Devill signified nothing else but euill inspirations? And John addeth somewhat more plainly, that the diuell finneth from the beginning. Likewise when Iude bringeth in Michael y Archangel fighting with y devill, doubtles he setteth against y good Angel an euil & rebellious Angel.Wherewith agreeth that which is read in the historie of Tob, that Satan appeareth with the holy Angels before God. But most plaine of all are thoes places that make mention of the punishment which they begin to feel by the judgement of God, and specially shall feel at the resurrection. Sonne of David, why art thou come before the time to torment vs? Agayne, God ye cursed into eternall fire that is prepared for the Deuill and his Angels. Againe, If hee spared not his owne Angels that had sinned, but cast them downe into hell and deliuered them into chines of darkenesse to bee kept vnto damnation. &c. Howe fonde shoule these speeches bee, that the Deuillles are ordeyned to eternall judgement, that fire is prepared for for them, that they are nowe already tormented and vexed by the glorie of Christ: if there were no diuels at all? But because the matter needeth no disputation among them that beleue the worde of the Lord, and little good is done with testimonies of Scripture among those vaine students of speculation, whom nothing pleaseth but that which is new: I suppose I have performed that which I purposed, that is that the godlie minds should be furnished against such fond errors, wherewith vnquiet men do trouble both themselves and other that be more simple. But it was good to touch this, least any entangled with that errour, while they thinke they have none to stand against them, should waxe more flowe and unprovided to resist.

20 In the mean time let it not be wearisome unto vs, in this so beautifull a stage to take godly delight of the manifest and ordinary workes of God. For, as I have elsewhere already saide, though this be not the chiefe, yet is it in order the first doctrine of Faith, to remember that what way soever we turne our eyes, all that we see are his workes of God, and with godly consideration to woe for what ende God did make them. Therefore that we may conceive by Faith so much as behoueth vs to knowe of God, it is good first of all to learne the historie of the creation of the worlde, how it is shortly rehearsed by Moses, and afterwaide more largely set out by holy men, specially by Bafile and Ambrofe. Out of it we shall learne that God by the power of his word and Spirite created heauen and earth of nothing, and thereof brought forth all living creatures and thinges without life, with marvellous order disposed the innumerable varietie of thinges, to everie thing he gaue the proper nature, assigned their offices, appointed their places and abidinges, and where all thinges are subject to corruption, yet hath he so provided that of all sortes some shalbe preferred to the last day, and therefore some he chooseth by secrett means, and powreth nowe and then as it were a newe liuelinesse into them, and to some he hath given the power to encrease by generation, that in their dying that whole kinde should not dye together. So hath he marvellously garnished the heauen and the earth, with so absolutely perfect plenty, variety and beauty of all thinges as possibly might be, as it were a large & gorgeous house furnished and store with abundance of most finely chosen stuffe, last of all howe in framing man and adorning him with so godly beauty, & with so many and so great giftes, he hath shewed in him the most excellent example of all his workes. But because it is not my purpose at this present to set forth at large the creation of the world, let it suffice to have once againe touched these fewe thinges by the way. For it is better, as I haue already warned the readers, to fetch a fuller understanding of this matter out of Moses and other, that haue faithfully and diligently conuied the historie of the world by writing to perpetuall memorie.

21 It is to no purpose, to make much a doe in disputing, to what ende the consideration of the workes of God ought to tende, or to what marke it ought to be applied: forasmuch as in other places already a great part of this question is declared, and so much as belongeth to our present purpose may in fewe wordes be ended. Truely if we were minded to set out as it is worthie, how inestimable wisedome, power, justice and goodnes of God appeareth in the framing of the worlde, no eloquence, no garnishment of speech, could suffice the largenes of so great a matter. And no doubt it is Gods pleasure we should be continually occupied in so holy a meditation, that while we beholde in his creatures as in looking glasse the infinite riches of his wisedome, justice, bountie and power, we should not runne ouer them as it were with a flying eye, or with a vaine wandering looke as I may so call it, but that wee shoulde with consideration rest long upon them, cast them vp and downe earnestly and faithfully in our mindes, and oft repeate them with remembrance. But because we are nowe busied in y ende that pertaineth to order of teaching, it is met that we omit those things that require long declamations. Therfore, to be short, let the readers know, that then they have conceiued by Faith, what this meaneth, that God is the creator of heauen & earth, if they first follow this vniuerfall rule, that they passe not ouer with not considering or forgetfulnesse of those vertues, that God presenteth to be seene in his creatures, then, that they so learne to applie themselves that they may therewith bee throughly moued in their hartes. The first of those we do when we consider how excellent a workmans worke it was to place & aptly set in so well disposed order the multitude of y starres that is in heauen, that nothing can be deuised more beautifull to behold: to set & fasten some of them in their standings so that they cannot moue, and to othe some to graunt a free course, but so that in mouing they wander not beyond their appointed space, so to temper the motion of them all that it may diuide in measure the dayes and nightes, monethes, yeares, and seaons of the yeare, and to bring this inequality of dayes which we dayly see to such a tempered order yt hath no confusion. Likewise, when we mark his power in susteyning so great a body, in governing the so swift whirling about of the engine of heauen, and such like. For these fewe examples do sufficiently declare what it is to recorde the power of God in the creation of the worlde. For else if I should trauell as I faide to express it all in wordes I should never make an end, forasmuch as there are so manie miracles of the power of God, so many tokens of his goodnesse, so many examples of his wisedome, as there be formes of thinges in the world,yea as there be things either great or small.

22 Now remaineth the other part which cometh neerer to Faith, that while we consider that God hath ordained al things for our guard & safety, and therewithall do feele his power and grace in our felues, and in so great good thinges that he hath bestowed vpon vs: we may thereby firre vp our felues to the trust, invocation, prayse and loue of him. Nowe as I haue before faide,God himselfe hath shewed in the verie order of creation, that for mans sake he created all thinges. For it is not without cause that he diuided the making of the world into five dayes, whereas it had been as eafe for him in one moment to haue in all pointes accomplished his whole worke, as it was by such proceeding from peace to peace to come to y end of it. But then it pleased him to shewe his prouidence & fatherly carefulnesse toward vs, y before he made man he prepared all that he forefay should be profitable for him him and fit for this prefervation. Howe great vnthankfulnese nowe should it be to doubt whether this good Father doe care for vs, whome we see to haue ben careful for vs ere that we were borne: How wicked were it to tremble for diuifion leaft his goodnese woule with anitie leave vs deftitute in neceffitie, which we see was displayed for vs being not yet borne, with great abounding of all good things? Befide that we heare by Moses, that by his liberalitie all that euer is in the world is made subiect to vs: Sure it is that he did it not to mocke vs with an emptie name of gift. Therefore wee fhall never lacke any thing, fo far as it fhall be available for our prefervation. Finallly to make an end, to oft as we name God the creator of heauen & earth, let this come in our mindes withall, that the dispoition of all things which he hath create, is in his hande and power, and that we are his children who he hath taken into his owne charge and keeping to fofter and bring vp: that we may looke for all good things at his hande, and assuredly that he will never suffer vs to lacke thinges needful for our safetie, to the ende our hope fhould hang vpon none other: whatfoever we desire our prayers may be directed to him: of what thing heuer wee receive profite we may acknowledge it to be his benefite, and confesse it with thankes giving: that being al- lured with so great sweetnesse of his goodnesse and liberalitie, we may study to loue and honour him with all our heart.

What a one man was created, wherin there is entreated of the powers of the soule, of the image of God, of free will and of the stifte inegritie of nature.

Nowe must we speake of the creation of man, not onely because he is among all the worke of God the moft noble and moft excellent example of his justice, wife dome and goodnes: but alfo because as we haue faide in the beginning, we cannot plainly and perfectly know God, ynlesse wee haue withall a mutuall knowledge of our selues. Although the same knowledge be of two sortes, the one to know what we were created at the first beginning, the other to know what our estate began to bee after the fall of Adam (for it were but to small profite for vs to know our creation), ynlesse wee did alfo in this lamentable fall knowe what is the corruption and deformitie of our nature:) yet at this time we will be content with description of our nature when it was pure. And before wee descende to this miserable estate whereunto man is nowe in thraldome, it is good to learne what a one he was created at the beginning. For we must take heed that in precifely declaring onely the naturall evils of man, we seeme not to impute them to the author of nature. For vnGodlines thinketh her selfe to haue sufficient defense in this colour, if it may lay for her selfe what harfhover fault the hath, the same did after a certaine manner proceede from GOD, and sticketh not if she be accused, to quarrell with GOD, and to lay the fault vpon him whereof she is worthily accused. And they that would seeme to speake somewhat more reuerently of her maiestie of God, yet do willingly seek to excuse their owne wickednesse, by nature, not considering that therein though not openly they blame God also, to whose reproch it shoulde fall if it were proued that there is any fault in nature. Sith then we see that our flesh gapeth for all the wayes to escape, whereby she thinketh the blame of her owne euils may any waye be put of from her, wee must diligently trauell to meet with this milcheete. Therefore wee must so handle the calamitie of mankinde that we cut off all excuse, and deliever the iustice of God from all accusation. Afterwarde in place convenient wee shall see howe far men be nowe from that purenesse that was giuen to Adam. And first wee must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth and claye, a bridle was put vpone his pride, for there is no greater absuditie, then for them to glory in their excellencie that doe not onely dwell in a cottage of claye, but also are themselves in parte but earth and ashes. But forasmuch as God did not onely vouchsafe to giue life vnto an earthen vessel, but also it was his pleasure that it shoulde bee the dwelling house of an immortall Spirite, Adam might iustly glory in so great liberalitie of his maker.

Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soule & body, and by the name of soule I meane an immortall essencie, and yet created, which is the nobler part of him. Sometime it is called the Spirite. Albeit these two names Soule and Spirite are joyned together, they differ one from the other in signification, yet when Spirite is set by it selfe it meaneth as much as Soule. As, when Salomon speaking of death, faith that then the spirite returneth to him that gave it. And Christ commending his Spirite to his Father, and Stephen his Spirite to Christ doth also meane none other thing, but that when the Soule is delivered from the prison of the flesh, God is the perpetuall keeper of it. As for them that imagine that the Soule is therefore called a Spirite because it is a breath or a power by God inspired or poured into bodies which yet hath no essencie: both the thing it selfe and all the Scripture sheweth that they doe too much groosly erre. True it is that while men are fastened to the earth more than they ought to bee, they waxe dull, yea because they are estranged from the Father of lightnes they are blinded with darkenesse, so that they doe not thinke vpon this, that they shall remaine aliope after death. And yet is not that light so quenched in darkenesse, but that they be touched with some feeling of immortalitie. Surely the confidence which discerning betwenee good and euillauntwereth the judgement of God, is an undoubted signe of an immortall Spirite. For howe could a motion without essencie attaine to come to the judgement seat of God, and throwe it selfe into seare by finding her owne guiltinesse? For the bodie is not moued with seare of a Spirituall paine, but that falleth onely vpon the Soule. Whereby it followeth that the soule hath an essencie. Moreover the verie knowledge of God doeth proue that the soules which ascende ypp about the worlde are immortall: for a vanishing liuilinesse were not able to attaine to the fountain of life. Finally forasmuch as so many excellent giftes wherewith mas munde is endued, doe crie out that there is some divine thing engraven in it, there are eu[e] so many testimonies of an immortal essencie. For sense which is in brute beasts, goeth not out of the body, or at least extendeth no further than to things presently set before it. But the nimblenesse of the minde of man which vieweth the heaven and earth and secrets of nature, and comprehending all ages in understanding and memory, digests euy thing in order and gathereth things to come by things past, doth plainly shew that there lyeth hidden in man a certaine thing feueral from the body. We conceiue by understanding the invisible God and Angels, which the body can not do. We knowe things that be right, just, and honest, which are hidden from his bodily senses. Therefore it must needs be that the Spirit of life is the seat of this understanding. Yea and our sleep erwells, which astonieth a man and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plaine witness of immortality, forasmuch as it doth not onely minister unto vs, thoughts of those things that never were done, but also foreknowinges of things for time to come, I touch these things shortly which euen prophane writers do excellendy set out with more gorgeuou garnishment of worudes: but with the godly readers a simple putting in minde of them shall be sufficient. Now if the foule were not a certaine thing by it selfe fefueral from the body, the Scripture would not teach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death wee remove out of the Tabernacle of the flesh, that we do put of that which is corruptible, but finally at the last day we may receive reward euery man as he hath behaued himselfe in his body. For these places and other that we do ech where commonly light uppon, do not only manifestly distinguish the foule from the body, but also in giving to the foule the name of man do shew that it is the principall part. Now whereas Paul doth exhort the faithful to cleanse themselves from all defling of the flesh and the Spirit, he maketh two partes of man where-in abideth the fikthiness of sin. And Peter where he calleth Christ his shepheard and bishop of foules, shold have spokon fondly if there were no foules about whom he might execute that office. Neither that conveniently stonde together which he sayeth of the eternall salvation of foules, and where he biddeth to cleanse our foules, and where he sayth that euill defires do fight against the foule, and where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues sayth, that the Pastors do watch that they may yelde account for our foules, vnselue it were true that foules had a proper effence. To the fame purpose serueth it that Paul calleth God for witnesse to his owne soule, because it could not bee called in judgement before God vnselue it were subject to punishment. And this is also more plainly expressed in the words of Christ, when he biddeth vs to feare him which after that he hath killed the body, can throwe the foule into hell fyer. Now where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth distiguish the Fathers of our flesh from God, which is the only Father of Spirits, he would not otherwise more plainly affirme the essence of foules. Moreover, if the foules remained not alue being deliuered from the prisons of their bodies, Christ should very fondly haue brought in the foule of Lazarus joying in the bosome of Abraham, and againe the foule of the rich man subject to horrible tormentedes. The fame thing doth Paul confirm when he teacheth that wee wander abroade from God, so long as we dwell in the flesh, and that we enjoy his presence being out of the flethe.
But, because I will not be long in a matter that is not obscure, I will add only this out of Luke, that it is reckened among the errors of the Sad-duces that they did not believe that there were any Spirits and Angels.

3 Also a strong prove hereof may be gathered of this where it is sayde, that man is create like to the image of God. For although the glory of God do appear in the outward shape of man, yet is it no dout that the proper specie of the image of God is in the soule. I do not deny that as concerning our outward shape, inasmuch as the same doth distinguish and feuer vs from brute beasts, we doe also therein more necerely approach to God than they: neither will I much stand against them which think ye this is to be accounted of the image of God, that where all other living creatures doe groerly wife behold the ground, so man is giuen an upright face, & he is commanded to looke vpon the heauen, & to advance his countenance towards the starrs: so that this remaine certaine, ye the image of God which is seene appeareth in these outward signes, is spiritual. For Osander (whose his writings declare to haue bin in fickle imaginations fondly witti) referring the image of God without difference as well to the body as to ye soule, ming-leth heauen and earth together. For he sayth, that the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy ghost did settle their image in man, because though Adam had stand without falling, yet should Christ have become man. And so by their opinion the body that was appointed for Christ, was but an example or fi-ure of that bodily shape which then was formed. But where shall he finde that Christ is the image of the Spirite? I grant in deede ye in the Person of the Mediator shineth the glory of the whole Godhead. But how shal all the ex-ternall word be called the image of the spirite whom he goeth before in order? Finally it overthroweth the distinction betweene the Sonne & the Holy ghost, if he do here call him his image. Moreover I would saine learn of him how Christ doth resemble the Holy ghost in the flesh that he tooke vp on him, and by what markes & features he doth express ye likeness of him.

And whereas this sayeing: Let vs make man after our image, doth also belong to the Person of the Sonne, it followeth, that he must be the image of himselue: which is against all reason. Beside that, if Osanders invention be be-exeeed, man was fashioned onely after the figure and paterne of Christ in that he was man, & so that forme out of which Adam was taken, was Christ, in that that he was to be clothed with flesh, where as the Scripture in a farre other meaning teacheth, that he was create in the image of God. But their futtle invention is more colourable which do thus expounde it, that Adam was create in the image of God, because he was fashioned like vnto Christ, which is the onely image of God. But that expostition also is not founde.
Also some interpreters make a great disputation about Image and Likenes, while they seake a difference betweene those two wordees, where is no diffERENCE at all, saying that this word Likenes is added to expound the other.
First we know that among the Hebrues such repetitions are common, wherein they expresse one thing twise: and in the things it selfe there is no doubt, but that man is threfore called the image of God, because he is like to God.
Wherby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, which do so litelie argue about about the words, whether they appoint Zelem, that is to say, Image in the substance of the soule, or Demuch, that is to say, Likenesse in the qualities, or what other thing beuer it be that they teach. For where as God determin-ted to create man after his owne image, this being somewhat darkely spoken, he doth as by way of explication repete it in this sayyng. After his like-nesse, as if he would haue sayd, that he would make man, in whom he would repreffent himselfe, as in an image, because of the markes of likenesse graten in him. And therefore Moses a little after reciting the same thing, doeth repeate the Image of God twise, leaung out the name of Likenes. And it is a triffing objection that Ofander maketh, y not a part of man, or the soule only with the gifts thereof, is called the Image of God, but the whole Adam which had his name gien him of the earth, from whence hee was ta-ten. Triffing, I say, wil all readers that haue their found wit judge this objection. For whee whole man is called mortall, yet is not the soule thereby made subject to mortality. Again, where he is called a liuing creature encuued with reason, it is not therby ment, y the body hath reason & understanding. Although therefore the soule is not the whole man, yet is it not inconvenient, that man in respect of the soule be called the image of God, albeit I hold still that principle which I haue before stablished, that the Image of God extendeth to the whole excellency, whereby the nature of man hath preeminence among all kinds of liuing creatures. Therefore in that word is noted the integrity that man had when he was endued with right understanding, when he had his affection framed according to reason, and all his gifftes governed in right order, and when in excellent gifftes he did true-ly resemble the excellency of his Creator. And though the principal feate of the image of God were in the minde and heart, or in the soule and the powers thereof, yet was there no part of man, not so much as the body, wherein did not some sparkes thereof appeare. Certaine it is that also in all the partes of the worlde, there do shone some resemblance of the glorie of God: whereby we may gather that where it is sayde, that his Image is in man, there is in so sayyng a certaine secret comparision, that enuanceth man above all other creatures, and doth as it were feuer him from the common sort. Neither is it to be denied, that the Angels were create after the like-nesse of God, sith (as Christ himselfe testifieth) our chiefe perfection shall be to become like vnto them. But not without cause doth Moses by that pecular title set forth the grace of God toward vs, specially where he compareth onely visible creatures with man.

4 But yet it seemeth that there is not gien a full definition of the image of God, vnlesse it plainly appeare in what qualities man excelleth: & theraby he ought to be counted a glasse, resembling the glory of God. But y can be by no other thing better known, than by the repayring of mans corrupted nature. First it is doubtlesse, y when Adam fell from his estate, he was by that departure estranged from God. Wherefore although we grant y the Image of God was not altogether defaced and blotted out in him, yet was it so corrupted, that all that remaineth, is but vgly deformity. Therefore the beginning of recovery of safety for vs, is in that restoring which we obtraine by by Christ, who is also for the same cause called the second Adam, because he restored us unto true and perfect integrity. For although where Paul doth in comparison set the quickning Spirit that Christ giveth to the faithfull, against the living foule wherein Adam was created, he setteth forth the more abundant measure of grace in the regeneration: yet doth he not take away this other principal pointe, that this is the ende of our regeneration, that Christ should new fashion vs to the image of God. Therefore in another place he teacheth, that the new man is renewed according to the image of him that created him. Wherewith this saying: put on the newe man which is create according to God. Now it is to be seene what Paul doth principally comprehend vnder this renewing. First he speaketh of knowledge, and after of pure righteousnesse and holinesse. Whereby we gather that the image of God was first of all to be seene in the light of the minde, in the brightness of heart, and soundnesse of all the partes. For although I graunt that this is a figurative phrase of speech to set the part for the whole: yet can not this principle be overthrown, that that thing which is chief in the renewing of the image of God, was also principal in the creation of him. And for the same purpose maketh it that in another place he teacheth, that we beholding the glorie of God with open face, are transformed into the same image. Nowe do we see how Christ is the most perfect image of God, according to the which we being fashioned are restored, that in true godliness, righteousness, purity and understanding, we bear the image of God. Which principle being establisshed, Osanders imagination of the shape of our body doth easily vanish away of itself. Whereas the man alone is in Paul called the Image and glory of God, & the woman is excluded from that degree of honor, it appeareth by the rest of the text, the same is to be applied only to ciuile order of policy. But that vnder the name of image, whereof we speake, is comprehended all that belongeth to the spiritual and eternall life, I thynke it be already sufficiently proved. And the same thing doth John confirme in other words: saying that the light which was from the beginning in the eternall word of God was the light of men. For where his purpose was to praise the singular grace of God, whereby man excelleth all living creatures to seuer him from the common sorte, because he hath attained no common life, but joyned with the light of understanding, he therewithall theweth how he was made after the image of God. Therefore the image of God is the uncorrupted excellency of the nature of man, which shined in Adam before his fall, and afterward was so corrupted and almost defaced, that nothing remaineth since that vnine, but disordered, mangled, and filthly spotted: yet the same doth in some part appear in the elect, inasmuch as they are regenerate, & shall obtaine her ful brightness in heaven. But we may know in what partes it consisiteth, it shall be good to entreate of the powers of the soule. For that speculatiue deisme of Augustine is not found, where he faith that the soule is a glasse of the Trinitie, because that there are in it understanding, will, and memorie. Neither is their opinion to be approvd, which saith the Image of God in the power of domi-

dominion given vnto him, as if he resembled God onely in this marke, that he is appointed lord and possessor of all things, where as in deede the Image of God is properly to be sought within him, and not without him, and is an inward good gift of the soule.

But before I goe any further, it is needeful that I meet with the doting error of the Manichees, which Scuettro hath attempted to bring in againe in this age. Where it is sayd, that God breathed the breath of life into the face of man, they thought that the soule did conuey into man the substance of God, as if some portion of the immeasurable God were come into man. But it is easie even shortly to shewe how many groffe and soule absurdities this deuilshe error draweth with it. For if the soule be by derivation part of the essence of God, it shal follow that the nature of God is subject, not only to change and passions, but also to ignorance, euill lustes, weakesness, and all kinds of vices. Nothing is more inconstant than man, because contrary motions do oppose and dierently drawe his soule, oftentimes he is blinde by ignorance, oft he yeeldeth as vanquished euén to final tentations, and we knowe that the soule it selfe is the sinke and receuier of all filthines, al which things we must acribe to the nature of God, if we graunt that the soule is of the essence of God, or a secret inflowing of godhead. Who would not abhorre this monstrous deuise? Truely in deede doth Paul allledge out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God, but in quality and not in substance, inasmuch as he hath garnished vs with godly giftes. But in the meane time to teare in funder the essence of the Creator, as to say, that every man doth possesse a part of it, is too much madness. Therefore we must certainly hold, that the soules, although the image of God be grauen in them, were no lesse created then the Angels were. And creation is not a pouring out of one substance into an other, but a beginning of essence made of nothing. And although the spirit of man came from God, and in departing out of the flethe returneth to God, yet is not fortheom to be saide, that it was taken out of his substance. And in this point also Osfander, while he glorieth in his illusions, hath entangled hisselefe with an vnGodly error, not acknowledging image of God to be in man without his essentiaiuiftice, as though God by the infinitable power of his holy spiritie could not make vs like vnto him selfe, vnlesse Christ shoule substantially powere himselfe into vs. With whatsoever colour many do goe about to disguise these deceites, yet shal they never so beguile the eyes of the readers, that are in their right wittes, but that they will easily see that these thinges favour of the Manichees error. And where saint Paul entreateth of the restoring of this image, it may be readily gathered out of his wordes, that man was made of like forme to God, not by inflowing of his substance, but by grace and power of his Spiritie. For he sayeth, that in beholding the glory of Christ we are transformed into the same Image, as by the Spiritie of God, which surely so worketh in vs, that it maketh vs of one substance with God.

It were but folly to borrow of the Philosophers a definition of the soule, of whom almost none, except Plato, hath perfectly assered it to bee an immortall substance. In deede some other also, is the Socratians, do touch it, but so as none doth plainly teach to other, which himself was not persuaded.

But therefore is Plato of the better judgement, because he doth in his soul consider the image of God. Some other do to bind the powers & vertues of his soul to this present life, being out of the body they leave to it nothing. Now we have already taught by the Scripture, it is a bodilie substance, now must we add, although properly it is not comprehended in place, yet it is seen in his body, doth there dwell as in a house, not only to minister life to all parts of his body, but to take the instruments thereof merely & solely serving for the actions they are appointed for, but also to beare his chief office in governing the life of man, and not only about the duties in this earthly life, but also to stir vs vp to the service of God. Although this latter point in this, corrupt, is not plainly perceived, yet even in vs vices themselves there remaine emprints some leaunings thereof. For whence cometh it but of shame, men have so great care what be reported of the? And whence cometh shame, but of regard of honesty? Whereas the beginning & cause is, they understand that they are naturally born to observe justice, in which perdition is enclosed, and dreads of religion. For as wot all controversy of man was made to meditation of his heavenly life: so is it certain the knowledge thereof was engraven in his soul. And surely man should want the principal use of his understanding, if he should be ignorant of his own felicity, whereof the perfection is he be joyned with God, and therefore it is the chief action of the soul to aspire therunto. And so the more every man studieth to approch vnto God, the more he thereby prooueth himselfe to be endued with reason. As for them they would have divers foules in man, that is, a feeling soul, & a reasonable soul, although they feme to say for what by reason possible, yet because there is no stedfast certainty in their reasons, we must receive the, unless we lift to accober our selves in things triuing & unstable. A great dissagreement say they, there is betwene instrument motions & the parts of the soul endued with reason. As though reason itself did not also different frome itself, & some deuises of it do struie with other some, as they were armies of enemies. But forasmuch as any troublefomes proceedeth of its corruption of nature, it were amisse to gather thereby, there are two foules, because the powers of the soul do not agree together, in such well framed order as they ought. But as for more subtle disputatio of its powers themselves, I leave it to the Philosophers. A simple definition shall suffice vs for edification of godlines. I grave the things that they teach are true, not only pleasant but also profitable to be known, and well gathered of them, & I forbide not such as are desirous to learn to study them. First therefore I admonish you there are five Senses, which Plato better liked to call Instrumentes, whereby all objects, are powered into Common sense, as into a place of receive: then foloweth Phantaffie, which judgeth those things one from other. Common sense hath conceived, next is Reason, to which belongeth the universal judgment of things: last is the Understanding mind, which with earnestly bent & quiet viewing beholdeth all those things, that Reason is wont to discourse upon, & consider. And to the Understanding mind, Reason, & Phantasm, which are the three powers of the soule, rest in knowledge, there do answer three other and in Appetite, that is to say, Will, the parts whereof are to coact those things the Understanding mind & Reason do lay before its power of Anger, which catcheth those things Reason & Phantasm do minister vnto it.
The power of Desiring, which taketh hold of those things Phanifie and Sense, presenteth it. Although these things be true, or at least likely to be true, yet because they shall more entangle us with obscurities than further us, I think it best to ouerpass them. If any man lift otherwise to divide the powers of the soule, & to call the one power of Appetite, which although it be without reason it selfe, yet doth obey reason, if it be by other meanes directed, & to call the other the power of Understanding, which is by it selfe particter of reason, I am not much against it, neither wil I confute this opinion, y there are three beginnings of doing: that is to say Sense, Understanding, & Appetite. But let us rather choose a division, that is within y capacitie of all men, which can not be had of the Philosophers. For they when they meane to speak most plainly, do divide the soule into Appetite & Understanding, but either of these they make of two sortes. Understanding they say, is sometime Contemplative, which being contented with onely knowledge, hath no moving of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expressed by this word ingenii, wit. Somtime they say it is practice, which by conceiuing of good or evil doth diversly move the Will. And appetite they do divide into Will & Luft. Wil they call when Appetite which they call Hume, obeyeth to reason, and Luft they call that when the appetite shaketh off the yoke of reason, runneth out to intemperance. So alway they imagine reason to be that in man, wherby man may rightly gouerne himselfe.

But we are confayned somwhat to swarde from this maner of teaching, because the Philosophers which knew not y corruption of mans nature, which came for punishment of his fall, do wrongfully confound y two very diuerse states of man. Let vs therefore thus thinke of it, y there are in y soul of man two parts, which shall serve at this time for our present purpose, y is to say Understanding and Will. And let it be the office of Understanding, to discern betweene objects, or things set before it, as each of the shall seem worthy to be liked or disliked: and the office of Will to chose & follow that which understanding faith to be good, and to refuse and flee y which Understanding shall disallowe. Let vs not here be stayed at all with the nice subtleties of Arifotle, that the minde hath of it selfe no moving, but that it is chose which moueth it, which chose he calleth the desiring understanding. But to the ende we be not entangled with superfluous questions, let this suffice vs, that the Understanding is as it were the guide and gouernour of the soule, and that Will hath always regard to the appointment of Understanding, and abideth the judgement therof in her desires. According whereunto, Arifotle himselfe hath truly sayd, y fleeing or following is in Appetite such a like thing, as in y understanding minde is affirming and denying. Now how certaine the gouernment of Understanding is to direct the Will: that we will consider in another place. Here we meane onely to shew, that there can be found no power in the soule but that may well be sayde to belong to the one of these two members. And in this part Understanding we comprehend Sense, which other doe so distinguishe, that they say Sense is exclued to pleasure, for which Understanding followeth that which is good: and that so it commeth to passe, that the Appetite of Sense is Concepcion and Luft, the affection of Understanding is Will. Againe in stead of the name of Appetite, which they better like, I let the name of Will, which is more commonly vs'd.
8 God therefore hath furnished the soul of man with an understanding minde, whereby he might discern good from evil, and right from wrong, and having the light of reason going before him, might see what is to be followed or forsaken. For which cause the Philosophers have called this directing part the Guider. To this he hath adjoinnd Will, to which belonging choise. With these noble gifts the first state of man excelled, so that he not only had enough of reason, understanding, wisdom, and judgment, for the government of this earthly life, but also to elime vp even to God & to eternall felicity. Then to have Choise added vnto it, which might direct the appetites, & order all the instrumental motions, and that so Wise might be altogether agreeable to the government of reason. In this Integritie, man had freewill, whereby if he would he might have attained eternall life. For here it is out of place to moue question of the secret predestination of God: because we are not now about to discouer what might haue chance or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therefore might haue stood if he would, because he fell not but by his owne will. But because his will was pliable to either side, and there was not given him constancy to continue; therefore he so easily fel. Yet his Choise of good and evil was free. And not that only, but also in his understanding minde, and in his will was most great vprightnesse, & all his instrumental partes orderly framed to obedience, vntil by destroying himselfe he corrupted his good things that were in him. From hence commeth it that all the Philosophers were so blinded, for that in a ruine they sought for an vpright building, and for strong ioynts in an vnoynted overthrowe. This principle they helde, that man could not be a living creature, endued with reason, vnslesse there were in him a free choise of good and evil: and they considered, that otherwise all the difference should be taken away betweene vertues and vices, vnslesse man did order his owne life by his owne aduise. Thus farre had they sayd well if there had bin no change in man, which chaunge because they knewe not of, it is no maruicile though they confounde heauen and earth together. But as for them which professing themselves to be the disciples of Christ, doe yet secke for freewill in man, that hath bin lost and drowned in spirituall destruccion, they in going meane between the Philosophers opinions and heavenly doctrine are plainly deceuied, so that they touche neither heauen nor earth. But of these things we shall better speake in place fitte for them: now only this we haue to holde in minde, that man at his first creation was far other than his posteritie euer since, which taking their beginning from him beeing corrupted, hath from him received an infection derived to them as it were by inheritance. For then all the partes of his soule were framed to right order, then stoode safe the soundnesse of his understanding minde, and his will free to choose the good. If any do obiect that it stoode but in slippery state, because his power was but weake, I answeare that that state was yet such as sufficid to take from him all excuse, neither was it reasonable to restrayne God to this point, to make man such a one as either could not or would not sinne at all. I grant such a nature had beene better, but therefore precisely to quarel with God, as though it had bin his dutie to

To have given that vnto man, is too much vnjustice, forasmuch as it was in his owne choyse to giue howe much pleased him. But why hee did not uphold him with the strength of steadfast continuance, that resteth hidden in his owne secrete counsell; it is our part onely to bee so farre wise as with sobrietie we may. Man receaued in deede to bee able if hee woulde, but hee had not to will that hee might be able. For of this will shoulde have followed steadfast continuance. Yet is hee not excuseable, which receaued so much that of his owne will hee hath wrought his owne destruction. And there was no necessitie to compell God to giue him any other than a meane will and a frayle will, that of mans fall hee might gather matter for his owne glorie.

That God by his powre doth nourish and maintaine the worlde, which himself hath created, and by his prouidence doth governe all the partes thereof.

But it were verie fonde and bare to make God a creature for a moment, which doeth nothing since hee hath once made an ende of his worke. And in this point principally ought wee to differ from the prophane men, that the presence of the power of God may shine vnto vs no lesse in the continuall state of the worlde, than in the first beginning of it. For though the mindes of the verie wicked in onely beholding of the heaven and earth are compelled to rise vp vnto the creator, yet hath faith a certaine peculiar maner by it selfe whereby it giueth to God the whole praise of creation. And therefore righte that laying of the Apostle, which wee before alleaged, that wee doe not vnderstande but by faith, that the worlde was made by the word of God. For vsleffe wee passe forwarde euen vnto his prouidence, we doe not yet rightlie conceive what this meane that God is the creator, howe souer we doe seeme to comprehande it in minde, and confesse it with tongue. When the sense of the fleithe hath once set before it the power of God in the verie creation, it resteth there, and when it proceedeth furthest of all, it doeth nothing but wye and consider the wisdome, powere, & goodnesse of the workeman in making such a peece of worke (which things doe of themselues offer and thunto them selues in sight of men whether they will or no) and a certayne generall doing in preservering and governynge the same, vpon which dependeth the power of movinge. Finally it thinketh the lively force at the beginning put into all thinges by God, doth suffice to susteyne them. But faith ought to perce deeper, that is to say, whom he hath learned to bee the creator of all thinges, by and by to gather that the same is the perpetuall gouernor and preserver of them: and that, not by stirring with an vnuerfall motion as well the whole frame of the worlde, as all the partes thereof, but by susteyning, cherisheing and careing for, with singular prouidence everie one of those thinges that hee hath created euene to the leaft spawre. So Dauid after hee had first faide that the worlde was created by God, by & by descendeth to the continuall course of his prouidence. By the worde of the Lorde (layth hee) the heauens were stablished, and all the power thereof by the spirit of his mouth. By and by hee addeth, The Lorde looked downe vpon the sonses of men, and so the rest that he faith further to the same effect. For although they doe not all reason so orderly, yet because it were not likelee to bee beleued that God had care of mens matters, vnlesse heere were the maker of the worlde, nor any man doeth earnestly beleue that God made the worlde, vnlesse he be perswaded that God hath also care of his workes: therefore not without cause Dauid doeth by good order conuey vs from the one to the other. Generallly indeed both the Philosophers doe teach, and mens mindes do conceiue that all partes of the world are quickened with the secret inspiration of God. But yet they attene not so farre as Dauid both himselfe proceeddeth and carrieth all the godly with him, laying: all things waite vpon thee, that thou maist giue them foode in due season. Thou giuest it to them and they gather it. Thou openest thy handes and they are filled with good things. But if thou hide thy face, they are troubled. If thou take away their breath, they die and returne to their dust. Againe, if thou sende forth thy Spirite, they are created and thou renewest the face of the earth. Ye although they agree to the saying of Paul, that we haue our being and are moued, and doe live in God, yet are they farre from that earnest feeling of grace which he commendeth vnto vs: because they ta\textsuperscript{t} not of Gods speciall care whereby alone his fatherly fauour is known.

2 That this difference may the better appeare, it is to be known, that the Providence of God, such as it is taught in the Scripture, is in comparison set as contrarie to fortune and chaunces that happen by adventure. Nowe forasmuch as it hath bee commonly beleued in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in a maner in all men, that all things happen by fortune, it is certaine, that that which ought to have bene beleued concerning Providence, is by that wrong opinion not onely darkened but also in manner buried. If a man light among theeues or wilde beasts, if by winde sodenly rising he suffer shipwracke on the sea, if hee bee killed with the fall of a house or of a tree, if an other wandering in deserte places finde remedie for his pouertrie, if hauing beeene tossed with the waues, he attirenec to the hauen, if miraculously he escape but a finger breadth from death, all these chaunces as well of prosperitie as of adversitie the reason of the \textit{He} he doth aferibe to fortune. But whosoever is taught by the mouth of Chriſte, that all the heares of his head are numbred, will seek for a cause further of, and will firmly beleue that all chaunces are governed by the secret counsell of God. And as concerning things without life, this is to be thought, that although every one of them haue his owne propertie naturally put into it, yet do they not put forth their power but only so farre, as they be directed by the present hand of God. They are therefore nothing efts but instruments, whereby God continually poureth in so much effect as pleaseth him, and at his will boweth and turneth them to this or that doing. Of no creature is the power more miraculous or more glorious than of the sunne. For besides that it giueth light to the whole worlde with his brightenes, howe great a thing is this that hee creatheth and quickeneth all living creatures with his heate? ye hee breatheth fruitfullye into the earth with his beames? that out of seedes weawarmed in the bosom of the grounde, he draweth a budding greeneness, and susteining the same with new nourishmentes doth increaseth and strengthen it, till it riseth vp in stalkes. That hee feedeth it with continual vapor, till it groweth to a flower, and from a flower to fruite. That then also with baking it he bringeth it to ripeness? That trees likewise and vines being warmed by him, do first bud and shoot forth branches, and after send out a flower & of a flower doe engender fruite? But the Lorde because he would chaine the whole glorie of all these things to himselfe, made the light first to bee, and the earth to be furnished with all kindes of beeves and fruits before he created the sunne. A godly man therefore will not make the sunne to be either a principal or a necessarie cause of those things which were before the creation of the sunne, but onely an instrument which God vseth because it so pleaseth him, whereas he might leave it and doe all things as easily by himselfe. Then when we read that the sunne firste stood still two dayes in one degree at the prayer of Josia, and that the shadow thereof went backe ten degrees for Ezekielias his sake, by those few miracles God hath declared that the sunne doeth not dayly forsake and goe downe by blind instinct of nature, but that he to renewe the remembrance of his fatherly favor toward vs, doth governe the course thereof. Nothing is more natural than spring tide to come immediatly after winter, sommer after spring, & harvest after sommer. But in this orderly course is plainly seene so great and so vegall diuerseisure, that it may easely appeare that euerie yeare, moneth & day, is governed by a newe and speciall Providence of God.

3. And truly God doeth claime and will have vs giue vnto him an almightinesse, not such as the Sophisters doe imagine, vaine, idle, and as it were sleepeing, but waking, effectuall, working and busied in continual doing. Nor such a one as is onely a generall beginning of a confussed motion, as if hee would commande a ruer to flowe by his appointed chanel, but such a one as is bent and readie at all his particular mouinges. For he is therefore called almightie, not because hee can doe and yet fitteth still and doth nothing, or by generall instinct onely continueth the order of nature that he hath before appointed: but because he governeth both heaven and earth, by his Providence so ordereth all things that nothing chanceth but by his aduised purpose. For whereas it is said in the Psalm that hee doth whatsoever he will, therein is meant his certaine and determined will. For it were verie fond to expounde the Prophets wordes after the Philosophers manner, that God is the first Agent or doer, because he is the beginning & cause of all mouinge: whereas the faithfull ought rather in diuerseitie to eate themselues with this comfort, that they suffer nothing but by the ordinance and commandement of God, because they are under his hand. If then the government of God do so extende to all his workes, it is a verie childish caution to enclose it within the influence of nature. And yet they do no more defraud God of his glorie than the slues of a most profitable doctrin, who ouer do restrain y Providence of God within so narrow bounds, as if he suffred al things to be caried with an ungoverned course according to a perpetuall law of nature. For nothing were more miserable than man if hee shoulde be left subiect to every motion of the heaven, the aire, the earth, & the waters.

Besoide that by that meanes the singular goodnesse of God towadges every man is too much vnhonorablely diminished, Davud crieth out that babes yet hanging on their mothers brastes are eloquent enough to magnifie the glore of God, because even so soone as they be come out of the wombe, they finde foode prepared for them by his heauenly care. This is in deed generally true, so that yet our eyes & senses overpasse not that vnmarked which experience plainly sheweth, that some mothers haue full and plentifull brastes, some other almost drie, as it pleaseth God to feede one more liberally, and an other more scarcely. But they which giue the due praysse to almightinesse of God, doe receive double profite thereby, the one that he hath sufficiently large abilitie to do them good, in whose possession are both heauen and earth, and to whose becke all creatures do attende vppon, to yecle themselves to his obedience; the other that they may safely rest in his protection, to whose will are subject all these hurtefull things that may any way be feared, by whose auritie as with a bridle Sathan is refrayned with all his furies and all his preparation, yppon whose backe doth hang all that euer is against our saffetie. And no other way but this can the immeasurable and superflitious feares be corrected or appeased, which wee oftentimes conceyue by daungers happening vnto vs. Superstitiously fearefull I say we bee, if where creatures doe threaten vs or giue vs any caufe of feare, we be so affraide thereof, as if they had of themselues any force or power to doe vs harme, or did vnuforeseen or by chaunce hurt vs, or as if against the hurtes that they doe, there were not sufficient helpe in God. As for example. The Prophete forbiddeth the children of God that they shoulde not feare the starres and signes of the heauen, as the vnbeleuethers are wont to doe. Hee condemneth not euer kinde of feare. But when the vnbeleuethers to giue awaie the gouernement of the worlde from God vnto Planets, doe faine that their felicitie or miserie doeth hang on the decrees and foreszewings of the starres, and not of the will of God, so commeth it to passe that their feare is withdrawn away from that onely one, whom they ought to haue regarded, vnto the starres and comets. Whoso therefore will beware of this vnafaithfulnesse, let him keepe always in remembrance that there is not in creatures a wandering power, working or motion, but that they are gouerned by the secret counsell of GOD, fo that nothing can chaunce but that which is decreed by him both witting and willing it so to bee.

First therefore let the readers learne, that Prudence is called that, not wherewith God idlely beholdeth from heauen what is done in the world, but wherewith as guiding the starre hee seteth and ordreth all things that come to passe. So doeth it no lesse belong to his handes than to his eyes. For When Abraham sayde vnto his sonne, God shall prouide, hee meant not onely that God did forknowe the successe then to come, but that hee did cast the care of a thing to him vnknowen vpon the will of God, which is wont to bring things doubtfull and confused to a certaine ende. Whereby followeth that Prudence consisteth in doing: for too much fondely do many trifle in talking of bare foreknowledge. Their error is not altogether so groffe which giue vnto God a gouernment but disordered, and without advised choyse, (as I haue before sayde,) that is to say such as whirleth and driueth about with a generall motion the frame of the world with all parts thereof, but doeth not peculiarly direct the doing of euery creature. Yet is this error not tollerable. For as they teach, it may bee (notwithstanding this Prouidence which they call vniterfall) that all creatures may bee moved by chance, or man may turne himselfe hither or thither by free choyse of his will. And so doe they parte the government beuenee God and man, that God by his power inspireth into man a motion whereby he may work according to the nature planted in him, and man ordereth his owne doings by his owne voluntarie aduise: Briefly they meane that the worlde, mens matters, and men themselves are governed by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I speake not of the Epicureans (which pestilence the worlde hath alwayes beeene filled with) which dreame of an idle and slouthefull God: and other as mad as they, which in olde time imagined that God did so rule about the middle region of the ayre, that he left things beneath to Fortune: For against so euident madness the damme creatures themselves doe sufficiently cry out. For nowe my purpose is to confute that opinion that is in a manner commonly beleued, which giveth to God a certayne blind, and I wot not what vnckerne motion, taketh from him the principal thing, that is by his incomprehensible wisdome to direct and dispose all things to their ende: and so in name onely and not in deede it maketh God a ruler of the worlde, because it taketh from him the government of it. For what (I beseech you) is it else to governe, but so to bee ouer them that are vnder thee, that thou maist rule them by appoin ted order? Yet doe I not altogether reiect that which is spoken of the vniterfall Prouidence: so that they will againe graunt mee this, that the world is ruled by God, not onely because hee mainteyneth the power of nature which himself hath set, but also because he hath a peculiar care of euery one of his workes. True it is that all sortes of things are moved by a secrete instinct of nature, as if they did obey the eternall commandemente of God, and that which God hath once determined doeth of it selfe proceede forward. And hereunto may that be applied which Christ saith, that hee and his Father were euen from the beginning alwayes working. And that which Paul teacheth that in him wee finke, are moved and haue our being, and that which the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, meaning to prooue the Godhead of Christ, faith, that by his mightie commandemente all things are fastened. But they doe wronge which by this colour doe hide and darken the speciall Prouidence, which is confirmed by so certaine and plaine testimonies of Scripture, that it is manifest that any man couldie doubt of it. And surely they themselves that drawe the same veil which I speake of to hide it, are compelled by way of correstion to adde, that many things are done by the peculiar care of God, but then they do wrongfully reftrayne the same only to peculiar doings. Wherefore we must prooue that God doeth so giue heed to the government of the successse of all things, and that they all doe so proceed from his determinate coun tell that nothing happeneth by chance.
If we grant that the beginning of motion belongeth to God, but that all things are either of themselves or by chance carried whither the inclination of nature drieeth them, the mutual succeeding by tunes of days and nights, of winter and somet, shall be the worke of God, in somuch as he appoynting to every one their duties hath set them a certaine law, that is if they should alway kepe one measure in egall proportion, as well the dayes y come after the nights, the monethes after monethes, & yeres after yeres. But whè sometimes immoderate heats with dines do burne vp all y graine, sometime vnoiseable raines doe marre the corn, when sodaine harme commeth by haile and tempestes: that shal not be the worke of God, vnlesse perhaps it be because the clouds or faire whether or colde or heate have their beginning of the meting of the planetes or other natural causes. But by this meane is there no roune lefte, neither for the fatherly fauour nor for the judgements of God. If they say that God is beneficial enough to mankinde because hee powreth into the heaven and earth an ordinaire power, whereby they do finde him nourishment: that is too vaine and prophane an inuention, as though the fruitfulness of one yere were not the singular blessing of God, and deearth and famine were not his curse and vengeance? But because it were too long to gather together all the reasons that serve for this purpose, let the authoritative of God himself suffice vs. In the law and in the Prophets hee doth oftentimes pronounce, that so oft as he watereth the earth with deaw and raine, he declareth his fauour, and that when by his commandement the heaven is hardened like yron, when corn is consumed with blasting & other harmes, when the fieldes are stricken with haile and tempestes, it is a token of his certaine and speciall vengeance. If we graunt these things, then is it assured that there falleth not a droppe of raine but by the certaine commandement of God. David prayseth the generall Prudence of God, that he giuest meat to the rauens, birds that call vpon him: but when GOD himselfe threateneth famine to living creatures, doeth he not sufficiently declare that he fedeth all living things sometyme with scarce and sometyme with more plentiful portion as hee thinketh good? It is a childlish thing, as I said before, to restraine this to particular doings, whereas Christ speaketh without exception, that not a sparowe of neuer so small a price doth fall to the ground without the will of his Father. Surely if the flying of birds be ruled by the purpose of God, then must we needs confesse with the Prophet, that hee so dwellet h on hie, that yet he humbleth himselfe to looke vpon all things that chaunce in heaven and earth.

But because we knowe that the worlde was made principally for mankinde sake, we must therefore consider this end in the governance of man. The Prophete Hicemie crieth out: I know, Lord, that the way of man is not his owne, neither belongeth it to man to direct his owne steppes. And Solomon faith, the steppes of man are ruled by the Lorde, and howe shall a man dispose his owne way? Nowe let them say that man is moued by God according to the inclination of his owne nature, but that man himselfe doth turne that mowing whither it pleaseth him. But if that were truely saide, then shoulda man have the free chosse of his owne yeways. Paradouenture they wil denie deny that, because he can do nothing without the power of God. But seeing it is certain that the Prophet and Salomon do give vnto God, not one

... another Prophet rebuketh the vngodly men, which ascribe to the diligence of men or to Fortune, that some lie in miserie and some arise vp to honour. To come to preferment is neither from the east nor from the South, for God is the judge, he maketh low and he maketh high. Because God cannot put of the office of a judge, thereupon the Prophet proueth that by his secrete purpose some are in honour, and others some remaine in contemp. **

... of Gods singular prudence. God raised in the deserte a south winde to bring people plente of foules; when his pleasure was to have Jonas thrown into the sea, he sent out a winde to raise vp a tempest. But they...
thereof, and then hee turneth the storme to calme, so that the \textit{waves thereof} are still. As in an other place hee saith, that \textit{hee scourged the people with burning windes.} So whereas the power of engendering is naturally given to men, yet \textit{God willeth it to bee imputed to his special grace,} that he \textit{leaueth some in barrennesse,} and \textit{vouchsafeth to graunt issue to other some.} \textit{fruite of the wombe} is \textit{his gift.} Therefore \textit{saide Jacob to his wife, am I as \textit{God that I can giue thee children? \textit{But to make an ende:} there is nothing more or warming in nature than that wee be fed with breade. But the Holy Ghoste pro-nounceath that not onely the growing of the fruite of the earth is the special gift of \textit{God, but also that men live not by onely bread, because it is not the verie full feeding that nourisbeth, but the secrete blessing of \textit{God:}} as on the otherside hee threateneth that hee will brake the \textit{stay of breade. Neither could wee earnestly pray for our daily bread, vnlesse God did giue vs foode with his fatherly hande. Therefore the Prophete, to perswade the faithfull, that \textit{God in feeding them doeth full} the office of a \textit{good father of householde, doeth put them in minde that hee giueth meate to all flesh.} Finally when wee haue on the one side: The \textit{eyes of the Lorde are vpon the righteous, and his ears bent to their prayers: on the other side: The eye of the Lorde is vpon the vngodly to destroy the memorie of them out of the earth: let vs know that all creatures both aboute and beneath are rea-die to obedience that he may applie them to what vs fоueuer he will, where-vpon is gathered that not onely his generall providence remayneth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but also by his meruellous coun-sell is applie to a certaine and proper end.

8 They which woulde bring this doctrine in hatred, doe cull that this is the learning that the Stoikes teach of Fatum or Deftene, which also was once layde for reproch to Augustine. As for vs, although wee bee loth to striue aboute worde, yet wee allowe not this worde Fatum, both because \textit{it is one of those whole prophane noueltie Saint Paul teacheth vs to flie, and because some men doe goe about with the odiousnesse thereof to bring Gods true in hatred. As for the venie opinion of the Stoikes, it is wrongfully laide to our charge. For wee doe not, as the Stoikes doe, imagine a necessi-tie by a certayne perpetuall knot and entangled order of causes which is con-teyned in nature: but wee make God the judge and gouernour of all thinges, which according to his wisedome hath even from the furthest ende of eternitic decreed what hee woulde doe, and nowe by his power putteth in execution that which hee hath decreed. Wherevpon we affirme that not onely the heauen and earth and other creatures \textit{without life, but also the purposes and wille of men are go gouerned by his Proutidence: that they bee directly carried to the ende that it appointeth. What then? we one say, doeth nothing happen by fortune or by chaunce? I answeare that Basilius Magnus hath truely saide that fortune and chaunce are heathen mens worde, with the signification whereof the minde of the godly ought not to bee occupied. For if ever good successe be the blessing of \textit{God, and querie calamitie and aduersitie be his curse, noe is there in mens matters no place lefte for fortune or chaunce. Wee ought also to bee moved with this} this saying of Augustine. In his books against the Academikes he faith: It doth displeafe me that I haue fo oft named fortune, albeit my meaning was not to haue any goddesse meant thereby, but only a chancable happening in outward things either good or euill. Of which word Fortune are derived those wordes which no religion forbiddeth vs to vs, forte, forfan, forstian, fortasfe, fortuito, that is parhaph, paraduentaure, by fortune and by chaunce, which yet must all be applied to the Prouidence of God. And that did I not leaue unspoken when I said, for parchance euuen the same y is commonly called Fortune is also ruled by secret order. And we call chance in thinges nothing els but y where of the reaon and cause is vnowne. I said this in dede, but it repented me that I did there to name Fortune. Forasmuch as I se that men haue a very euil custome, y where they ought to say, thus it pleased God, they say, thus it pleased fortune. Finally he doth commonly in his books teach, that the world shoule be vnorderly whirled about if any thing were left vnto Fortune. And although in an other place he determines that all things are done partly by the free will of man, & partly by the Prouidence of God, yet doth he a little after sufficiently shew that men are subject vnto & ruled by Prouidence, taking this for a princible, that nothing is more against conuenience of reaon, than to say that any thing chanceth but by the ordinance of God, for els it shold happen without cause or order, by which reaon he also exclueth that happening that hangeeth vpon the will of men: and by & by after he plainliuer faith that we ought not to secke a cause of the will of God. And so oft as he maketh mention of sufferance, how that is to be understanded, shal very well appeare by one place where he pro- ueth that the will of God is the soueraigne and first cause of all thinges, becaufe nothing happeneth but by his commandement or sufferance. Surely he faineth not God to sit still idle in a watch toure, when it is his pleasure to suffer any thing, whereas he flieth an actual wil (as I may so call it) which otherwise could not be called a cause.

9 But forasmuch as the dulleffe of our understanding can not by a great way atteaine to the height of Gods prouidence, wee must vs a distinction to helpe to lift it vp. I say therefore, how euer all things are ordened by the purpose and certaine disposition of God, yet to vs they are chancable, not that we thinke that fortune ruleth the world & men, and vnaduitedly tosteth all things vp & downe (for such beastlienesse ought to be farre from a Christi- an heart) but because the order, meane, ende and necessity of those things that happen, doth for the most partlie secret in the purpose of God, and is not comprehended with opinion of man, therefore those things are as it were chancable, which yet itis certaine to come to paffe by the wil of God. For they sene no otherwise, whether we consider them in their own nature, or whether we esteeme them according to our knowledge & judgement. As for an example, let vs put the case, y a marchant being entred into a woode in companie of true men, doth vnwisely stray away from his fellowes, & in his wandering chanceeth vpon a den of robbers, lighteth among theues & is killed, his death was not onely forescene with gods eye, but also determined by his decree. For it is not said that he did foresee how farre ech mans life should extende, but that hee hath set and appointed markes which can not be passed. And yet so farre as the capacitie of our minde conceiueth, all things herein seme happening by chaunce. What shal a Christian here think? euen this, whatsoever happened in such a death, he will thinke it in nature chauncing by fortune as it is in deede, but yet he will not doubt that the providence of God did gouerne to direct fortune to her end. In like maer are the happenings of things to come. For as all things that be to come are vncertaine vnto vs, so we hang them in suspense, as if they might fall on either parte, yet this remaineth settled in our hearts, that nothing shall happen but that which God hath alreadie foreseen. In this meaning is the name of chaunce oft repeeted in Ecclesiastes, because the first sight men do not atteine to see the first caufe which is farre hidden from them. And yet which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the secret providence of God, was neuer so blotted out of the hearts of men, but that even in the darknesse there alway shined some sparkes thereof. So the soothsayers of the Philistians, although they warre in doubtfulnesse, yet they ascribe aduerstie partly to God, partly to fortune. If (say they) the arke go that way, we shall know that it is God that hath striken vs; but if it go the other way, then a chaunce hath light vpon vs. In deed they did foolishly, when their cunning soothsaying deceived them, to flee to fortune, but in the meanle while wee see them constrained, so that they dare not thinke that the euill hap which chaunced vnto them did come of fortune. But how God with the bridle of his providence turneth all successies whither pleaseth him, may appeare by one notable example. Behold euon at one momet of time, when David was found out & neere taken in the desert of Mahon, euon then the Philistines inuaded the land, and Saul was compelled to depart. If God meaning to prouide for the safeitie of his seruant did caft this let in Saules way, surely although the Philistines going to armes were sodain, & beside the expectatio of men, yet may we not say that it came by chance. But those things that seeme to vs to happen by chance, faith wil acknowledge to have beene a secret movine of God. I grant there doth not alway appeare the like reason, but vndoubtedly we ought to beleue that whatsoever changes of things are seen in this world, they come by the secret stirrings of God. But that which God purposeth is so of necessitie to come to passe, that yet it is not of necessitie preciely nor by the nature of it self. As thereof is a familiar example in the bones of Chrift. Forasmuch as he had put on a bodie like vnto ours, no wise man wil deny that his bones were naturally able to be broken, yet was it impossible they should be broken: whereby we see against y not without caufe were in scholes inuanted the distinctions of necessitie in repect, & necessitie absolute, of consequent and consequence, whereas God had subjeect to briddelens the bones of his sonne, which he had exempted from being able to be broken, & so brought to necessitie by reaon of his own purpose, that that thing could not be, which naturally might haue bin.

The xvij. Chapter.

Wherefore and to what ende this doctrine is to be applied, that we may be certaine of the profit thereof.

NOW forasmuch as mens wits are bent to vaine curious suttleties, it is scarcey possible but that they shall encomber themselves with
entangled doubts, whosoever does not know the true and right use of this Doctrine. Therefore it shall be expedient here to touch shortly to what ends the Scripture teacheth, that all things are ordered by God. And first of all is to be noted, that the providence of God ought to be considered as well for the time to come as for the time past: secondly that the same is in such sort the governour of all things, that sometime it worketh by means, sometime without means, and sometime against all means. Last of all, that it tendeth to this end, that God may shew he hath care of all mankind, but specially that he doth watch in ruling of his Church, which he vouchsafeth more nerely to looke unto. And this is also to be added, that although either the fatherly favour and bountifullesse of God, or oftentimes the severitie of his judgement do brightly appeare in the whole course of his Providence: yet sometime the causes of those things that happen are secret, so that this thought creepeth into our minds, that mens matters are turned and whirled about with the blinde sway of fortune, or so that the flesh stirreth vs to murmure, as if God did to make himselfe pastime tostie them like tennise balles. True it is that if we were with quiet and still minde ready to learne, the very success of himself would at length plainly shew, that God hath an affur'd good realson of his purpose, either to traine them that be his to patience, or to correct their wull affections & tame their wantonnesse, or to bring them downe to the renouncing of themselves, or to awake their dowsynesse: on the other side to overthrow the proude, to disappoynt the suctetie of the wicked, to confounde their deuises. But howsoever the causes be secret and vnknowne to vs: wee must affur'dly holde that they are layd vp in hidden store with him, and therefore we ought to cry out with Dauid, God, thou hast made thy wonderful works so many, that none can count in order to these thy thoughtes toward vs. I woulde declare & speake of them, but they are more than I am able to express. For although alwaies in our miseries we ought to thinke vpon our sins, that very punishment may move vs to repentance, yet doe we see how Christ giuseth more power to the secret purpose of his father, than to punish every one according to his deserving. For of him that was borne blinde he saith: neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but y the glory of God may be shewed in him. For here natural sense murmureth when calamitie commeth even before birth, as if God did vnmercifully so to punish the silly innocent, that had not deserved it. But Christ doth testify in this looking glasse the glory of his father doth shine to our sight, if we haue cleere eyes to behold it. But we must keepe modestie, that wee drawe not God to yeeld cause of his doinges, but let vs so reuerence his secret judgementes, that his will be vnto vs, a most just cause of all things. When thicke clouds do couer the heauen, and a violent tempest ariseth, then because both a heauifome myrteenesse is cast before our eyes, and the thunder troubleth our eares, & al our senses are amazed with terroure, we thinke that al things are confounded and tumbled together: and yet all the while there remaineth in heauen the fame quietnesse and calmenesse, that was before. So must we thinke that while the troublesome state of things in heauen taketh from vs abilitie to judge, God by the pure light of his righteousnesse and wisdom, doeth in well framed order.
order gouerne & dispose even those very troublesome motions themselves to a right end. And surely very monstrous is the rage of many in this behalfe, which dare more boldly call the works of God to account and examine his secret meaninges, and to give vnadvised sentence of things vnknownen, than they will doe of the deedes of mortall men. For what is more vnorderly than to use such modestie toward our egals, that we had rather suspende our judgement than to incurre the blame of rashenesse, and on the other side proudly to triumph vppon the darke judgements of God, which it became vs to regarde with reuerence?

2 Therefore no man shall wel and profitably wey the Providence of God but he that considering that he hath to doe with his creator and the maker of the worlde, doth with such humility as he ought submittte himselfe to feare and reuerence. Hereby it commeth to passe, that so many dogs at this day do with venimed bitings, or at left barking aflail this doctrine, because they will have no more to be lawfull for God, than their owne reafon informeth them. And also they raile at vs with all the spitefulnesse that they are able, for that not contented with the commandementes of the lawe, wherein the will of God is comprehended, we do further say, that the world is ruled by his secret counsels. As though the thing that we teach were an invention of our owne braine, & as though it were not true that the holy Ghost doth eue every where expressely fay the fame, and repeteth it with innumerable formes of speeche. But because some shame restraineth them, that they dare not vomit out their blasphemies against the heauen: they faine that they contend with vs, to the end they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they do not graunt that what fouter happeneth in the world, is governed by the incomprehensible purpose of God, let them answere to what end the Scripture faith, that his judgementes are a deepe bottomlesse deapth. For whereas Moses crieth out that the will of God is not to bee sought afarre of in the cloudes, or in the depths, because it is familiarly set forth in the lawe, & foloweth, that his other hidden will is compared to a bottomlesse deapth. Of which Paul also faith: O deapth of the richnesse & of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God: how vnsearchable are his judgements, & his waies past finding out? For who hath known the mind of the Lorde, or who hath bin his counsellour? And it is in deede true, that in the Gospell and in the lawe are contained mysteries which are farre aboue the capacity of our fense: but forasmuch as God for the comprehending of these mysteries which he hath vouchsafed to open by his word, doth lighten the mindes of them that bee his, with the Spirit of Vnderstanding: now is therein no bottomlesse deapth, but a way wherein we must safe walke, and a candle to guide our feete, and the light of life, and the schoole of certaine and plainly discernable trueth. But his marvelous order of gouerning this worlde is worthily called a bottomlesse deapth: because while it is hidden from vs, we ought reuerently to worshipp it. Right well hath Moses expressed them both in fewe wordes. The secret things (saith he) belong to the Lorde our God: but the things receiued belong to vs and to our children for ever. We see how he biddeth vs not onely to studie in meditation of the law, but also reuerently to looke vp vnto the secret Providence of God. And in the booke of Job is rehearsed rehearsed one title of this death, that it humbleth our minde. For after that the author of that booke in surveying vp and downe the frame of the world, had honorably entreated of the worke of God, at length he addeth: Loc, these be part of his wayes, but how little a portion heare wee of him?
According to which reaon in another place he makest difference between the wisedome that remayneth with God, and the measure of wisedome that he hath appoynted for men. For after he hath preached of the secretes of nature, he sayeth that wisedome is known to God onely, and is hidden from the eyes of all living creatures. But by and by after he sayeth further, [yt is publisht to the end it should be searched out, because it is sayd vnto man, behold the feare of God is wisdom. For this purpose makest the sayings of Augustine: Because we know not all things which God doth concerning vs in most good order, that therefore in only good will we doe according to the law, because his Providence is an vnchangeable lawe. Therefore fith God doth claime vnto himselfe the power to rule the world, which is to vs vnknown, let this be to vs a lawe of soberneffe and modesty,quietly to obey his soueraigne authoritie, that his wil may be to vs the onely rule of justice, and the moft iuft cause of all things. I meane not that absolute will, of which the Sophisters do babble, separating by wicked and prophan disagreeement his justice from his power, but I mean that Providence, which is the gouer-neffe of all thinges, from which proceedeth nothing but right: although the causes thereof be hidden from vs.

3 Whosoever fhall be framed to this modestie, they neither for the time past will murmur against God for their aduersitie, nor lay vpon him the blame of wicked doings, as Agamemnon in Homer did, saying, I am not the caufe, but Jupiter and Defteni: nor yet againe as caried away with Desteni, they will by desperation throwe themselves into destruction, as that yon man in Plautus which sayd: Unstable is the chance of thinges, the De-stenies drive men at their pleasure, I will get me to some rocke there to make an end of my goods and life together. Neither yet (as an other did) they will pretende the name of God to couer their owne mischievous doings: for so faith Lyconides in an other comedie: God was the mourer. I beleue it was the will of the gods: for if it had not beene their will, I knowe it should not so come to passe. But rather they will search and learne out of the Scripture what pleaseth God, that by y guiding of the Holy ghost they may traualie to attaine therunto. And also being ready to followe God, whither foever he calleth, they flowe in deede that nothing is more prof-table than the knowledge of his doctrine. Very foolishly do prophan men turmoile with their fondnesse, so that they in maner confound heauen and earth together as the saying is: If God haue marked the point of our death, we can not escape it: then it is labour vainly lost in taking heed to our selves: Therefore whereas one man dareth not venture to go the way y he heareth to be dangerous, left he be murthered of theues: an other fende for Phistians, and wearie himselfe with medicines to succour his life: an other forbeareth groffe meates for feare of appeiring his feeble health: an other dreadeth to dwell in a ruinous house: Finally where as men deuide all wayes and endeuour with all diligence of minde whereby they may attaine that which they desire: either all these remedies are vaine, which are sought, as to reforme the will of God, or els life and death, health and sickenes, peace and warre, and other things, which men as they couet or hate them, do by their trauaille endeouer to obtaigne or escape, are not determined by his certaine decree. And further they gather, that the prayers of the faithfull are disordered, or at the leaft superfluous, wherin petition is made that it will please the Lorde to prouide for those things which he hath already decreeed from eternity. To be short, they destroy all counsells that men doe take for time to come as things against the Providence of God, which hath determined what he would haue done, without calling them to counsell. And then what fouer is already happened, they so impue it to the Providence of God, that they winte at the man whom they know to have done it. As hath a ruffian slaine an honest citizen? he hath executed (say they) the purpose of God. Hath one stolen, or committed fornication? because he hath done the thing that was forefeene and ordained by the Lorde, he is a minister of his Providence. Hath the sonne carelessly, neglecting all remedies, waited for the death of his father? he could not resit God that had so before appointed from eternity. So all mischeuus doinges they call vertues because they obey the ordinance of God.

4 But as touching things to come, Salomon doth well bring in agreement together, the purpofes of men with the Providence of God. For as he laugheth to scorne their folly, which boldly doe enterprise any thing without the Lord, as though they were not ruled by his hande: so in another place he speaketh in this maner: The heart of man purposeth his way, but the Lord doth direct his steppes, meaning that we are not hindered by the etemal Decrees of God, but that under his will wee may both prouide for our selves, & dispone all things belonging to vs. And y is not without a manifest reaon. For he hath limited our life within appointed boundes, hath therewithall left with vs the care thereof, hath furnished vs with meanes & helps to preserve it, hath made vs to haue knowledge before hand of dangers, & that they should not oppose vs vnware, he hath giuen vs provisions & remedies. Now it is plaine to see what is our dutie: that is to say: If God hath committed to vs our owne life to defende, our dutie is to defende it. If he offer vs helps, our dutie is to vs them. If he shew vs dangers before, our dutie is not to runne rashly into them. If he minister vs remedies, our dutie is not to neglect them. But no daunger shall hurt, vnlesse it be fallall, which by all remedies can not be overcome. But what if dangers bee therefore not fatal, because God hath assignd thee remedies to repulse and overcome them? See how thy maner of reasoning agree with the order of Gods disposition. Thou gatherest that daunger is not to be taken heed of, because forasmuch as it is not fatal, we shall escape it without taking heed at all: but the Lord doth therefore enioyne thee to take heed of it, because he will not haue it fallall vnto thee. These madde men do not consider that which is plaine before their eyes, that the skil of taking counsell and heed is inspired into men by God, whereby they may serue his Providence in preserving of their owne life: as on the other side by negligence and slouth they procure to themselves those evils that he hath appointed for the. For how how commeth it to passe, that a circumpect man, while he prouideth for himselfe, doth winde himselfe out of euils that hang ouer him, and the foolie persifhet by vnaduised rashneffe, but for that both folly and wisedome are the instrumentes of Gods disposition on both partes? Therefore it pleased God to hide from vs all things to come, to this ende that wee should meete with them as things doubtfull, and not cease to fet prepared remedies against them, til either they be overcome or be past all helpe of care. And for this cause I haue before admonished that the Providence of God doeth not alway thewe it (else naked, but as God by vsing of meanes doeth in a certaine manner clothe it.

5 The same men do vnoorderly & vnaduisedly draw the chanches of time past to the naked providence of God. For because vpon it do hang all things whatsoever happen, therefore (say they) neither robberies nor adulteries, nor manslaughters are committed without the wil of God. Why then (say they) shall a thief be punished, for that hee spoyled him whom the Lordes will was to punish with poorety? Why shall the murderers be punished which hath flame him whose life the Lord had ended? If all such men doe serue the will of God, why shal they be punished? But I deny that they serue the will of God. For we may not lay that he which is caried with an euil mind doeth service unto God as commander of it, where in deed he dooth but obey his owne wicked lust. He obeyeth God, which being enformed of his will doth labour to that ende, whereunto Gods will calleth him. But whereby are we enformed of his will, but by his worde? Therefore in doing of thinges wee must see that same will of God, which he declareth in this worde. God requireth of vs onely that which he commandeth. If we do any thing against his commandement, it is not obedience but obstinacie and tranegression. But vnaelele he would, we shoule not do it. I grant. But do we euill things to this end to obey him? But he doth not command vs to do them, but rather we run on headlong, not minding what hee will eth, but so raging with the incompeterne of our owne lust, that of feter purpose we bende our trauail against him. And by these meanes in euill doing wee scrut his iust ordinance, because according to the infinite greatnes of his wisdome he hath good skil to vse euill instrumentes to do good. And see howe foolish is their maner of arguing. They would haue the doers unpunished for mischeuous acts, because they are not commited but by f disposition of God. I grant more: that theeues and murtherers & other euill doers are the instrumentes of Gods Providence, whom f Lord doth vse to execute thoses judgementes which he hath with himselfe determined. But I deny that their euill doings ought to haue any excuse thereby. For why? that they either entangle God in the same wickednes with them, or shal they cover their naughtiness with his righteousnes? They can do neither of both. Because they should not be able to excuse theselues, they are accused by their own conscience. And because they should not be able to blame God, they find all the euill in themselues, & in him nothing but a lawfull vse of their euillnes. But he worketh by them. And whence I pray you, commeth the stinke in a dead carriion, which hath bin both rotten & disclosed by heat of the sunne? All men do see that it is raised by the beames of the sunne. Yet no man doeth therefore... say, that the sunbeames do stinke. So when there resteth in an evil man, the matter and guiltinesse of evil, what cause is there why it should be thought that God is any thing defiled with it, if he vs their service at his pleasure? Away therefore with this dogish srowardnesse, which may in deed a farrre of barke at the justice of God, but can not touch it.

6 But these cauillations or rather doting errours of phreneticke men, shall easily be shaken away, by godly and holy meditation of the Providence, which the rule of godlinesse teacheth vs, to that thereof may growe vno vs a good and most pleasaunt fruite. Therefore a Christian heart when it is most assuredly persuaded, that all things come to passe by the disposition of God, & that nothing happeneth by chance, will alway bend his eyes to him as to the principall caufe of thinges, and yet will consider the inferiour caufes in their place. Then he will not doubt that the singular providence of God doth watch for his preservation, which Providence will suffer nothing to happen, but that which shall turne to his good and saluation. And because he hath to do first of all with men, and then with the other creatures, hee will assure himself that Gods Providence doth reigne in both. As touching men, whether they be good or euill, he will acknowledge that at their counselles, willes, enterprises and powers are under the hande of God, so that it is in Gods will to bowe them whether he list, and to restraine them so oft as pleafeth him. That the singular Providence of God doth keepe watch for the saucrie of the faithfull, there are many and most evidente promises to witnes. Caft thy burden vpon the Lord, and he shall nourish thee, and shall not laff the righteous to fall for euer, because he careth for vs. He that dwelleth in the helpe of the high, shall abide in the protection of the God of heaven. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. I wil be thy shield, a brauen wall: I wil be enemie to thy enemies. Although the mother forget her children, yet wil I not forget thee. And also this is the principall intent in the histories of the Bible, to teach that the Lord doth with such diligence keepe the waies of the Saintes, that they do not so much as stumble against a stone. Therefore as a little before we haue rightfully rejected their opinion which do imagine an universal Providence of God, that stoupeth not specially to the care of euery creature: yet principally it shalbe good to reknowlidge that same speciall care toward our felues. Wherupon Christ after he had affirmed that not the sparowe of least value, doth fall to the ground without the wil of the Father, doth by & by apply it to this end, we should consider that how much we be more worth than sparowes, with so much neere care God provideth for vs, and he extendeth that care so far that we may be bold to truft that the heares of our head are numbered. What can we with our selues more, if not so much, as a heare can fall from our head but by his will? I speake not onely of all mankind, but because God hath chosen his church for a dwelling house for himselfe, it is no doubt but that he doth by singular examples shew his care in governing of it.

7 The seruant of God being strengthened with these both promises and examples, will joyn with them the testimonies which teach that all men are vnder Gods power, whether it be to winne their minde to good will, or to restrayne their malice that it may doe no hurt. For it is the Lorde that that giueth vs fauour not only with them that will vs well, but also in the Egyptians, and as for the maliciousnesse of our enemies, he knoweth how by diuere wyes to subdue it. For sometyme he taketh away their wit from them, so that they can conceiue no founde or fonder adresse, like as hee fent forth Satan to fill the mouthes of all the Prophets with lying to deceive Achab. He made Rechabeam made by the young mens counsell, that hee might bee spoiled of his kindome by his owne follice. Many times when hee graunted them wit, yet hee maketh them so afraide and astonisshed, that they cannot will or goe about that which they haue conceyued. Sometyme also when he hath suffered them to goe about that which lust and rage did counfell them, hee doth in convenient time breake of their violences, and sufferrith them not to procee to the end that they purposed. So did hee before the time bring to nought the counsell of Achitophell that should haue ben to Davids destruction. So also he taketh care to gouerne al his creatures for the benefite and safetie of them that be his, yea and to gouerne the deuill himselfe, which as wee see durt enterprize nothing against Job without his suferance and commandement. Of this knowledge necessarilly ensueth both a thankfulnesse of mind in prosperous successe of things, and also patience in aduerfitie, and an incredible assurednesse against the time to come. Whatsoever therefore shall betide vnto him prosperously and according to his heartes desire, all that hee will acribe vnto God, whether hee feele the bountie of God by the ministerie of men, or be holpen by hye-leffe creatures. For thus hee will thinke in his minde: Surely it is the Lorde which hath enclinéd their minds to me, which hath ioyned the vnto me to bee instrumentes of his goodnesse towards me. In plentie of the fruities of the earth, thus hee will thinke, that it is the Lorde which heareth the heaven, that the heauen may heare the earth, that the earth also may heare her fruities. In other things hee will not doubt that it is the onely blessing of the Lorde, whereby all things prosper, and being put in mind by so many caufes he will not abide to be vnthankfull.

8 If anie aduerfitie happen, hee will by and by therein also liftet vp his minde to God, whose hande auayleth much to imprint in vs a patience and quiete moderation of heart. If Joseph had still continued in recording the falsechoode of his brethren, hee coulde never haue taken a brotherly minde towards them. But because he bowed his minde to the Lord, he forgave the inuiron, and inclined to meekenesse and clemencie, so farreforth that of his owne accorde he comforted his brethren and saide: It is not you that sould me into Egypt, but by the will of God I was sent before you to saue your lives. You in deede thought eft of me, but the Lord turned it to good. If Job had had respect to the Chaldees, by whom hee was troubled, hee woulde fortwith haue bene kindled to revengue. But because hee did therewithall acknowledge it to be the woorke of God, hee comforted himselfe with this most excellent saying: The Lorde hath giuen the Lord hath taken away, the Lordes name be bleffed. So David: when Semai had rayled and caft stones at him, if hee had looked vpon man, hee woulde haue in couraged his fouldiers to reacquire the inuiron. But because hee understooode that that Semei did it not without the moving of the Lorde, hee rather appeasated them. Let him alone (saide he) for the Lord hath commaunded him to curse. With the same bridle in an other place doth he restraine the intemperance of serowe. I helde my peace (faith hee) and became as dumme, because thou O Lorde, diddest it. If there bee more effectuall remedie against wrath and impatience: surely he hath not a little profisted which hath learned in this behalfe to thinke vpon the Prudence of God, that he may al-way call backe his minde to this point. It is the Lordes will, therefore it must bee suffered, not onely because it is not lawfull to strive against it, but also because hee willeth nothing but that which is both iust and expedient.
In summe this is the end, that being wrongfully hurt by men, wee leaving their malice (which woulde doe nothing but enforce our forrowe, and whet our minde to reuenge) shoulde remember to clime vp vnto God, & learn belecque assuredly, that whateuer our enimie hath mischeuously done against vs, was both suffered and sent by Gods disposition. Paul, to refraine vs from recompensing of injuries doth wisely put vs in minde, & we are not to wraffle with flethe and bloode, but with the spirittuall enimie the Deuill, that we may prepare our selues to strive with him. But this is the most profitable lesson for the appeasing of all rages of wrath,that God doth arme as well the deuill as all wicked men to strive with vs, and that hee fitteh as judge to exercize our patience. But if the misfortunes and miseries that opprese vs, doe chance without the worke of men, let vs remember the doctrine of the law: whatsoever is prosperus floweth from y fountain of Gods blessing, and that all aduersities are his cursings: and let that most terrible warning make vs afraid: If ye walke stubbornly against mee, I will also walke stubbornly against you. In which is rebuked our sluggisnness, when according to the common lense of the fleth accounting al to be but chance that happeneth of both forces we are neither encouraged by the benefits of God to worship him, nor pricked forwarde with his scourges to repentance.
This same is the reasone, why Hieremie, & Amos did so sharply rebuke the Lews, because they thought that things as well good as euill came to passe without the commandement of God. To the same purpose is the sermon of Efay, If the God that create light and fashion darkenes, that make peace and create euill: I God do make all these things.

9. And yet in the meaner time a godly man will not winke at the inferior causes. Neither will he, because hee thinketh them the ministers of Gods goodnesse by whom he hath receuied benefite, therefore let them passe unconsidered, as though they had deseuered no thanke by their gentlenes: but he will hartily thinke himselfe bounde vnto them, and will willingly confess his bonde, and travell as hee shall bee able and as occasion shall serue, to recompence it. Finally in beneficiues receuied hee will reverence and praise God as the pricipall author, but he will honour men as the ministers, and as the trueth is indeede hee will understande that hee is by the will of God bounde to them, by whose hande it was Gods will to bee beneficall vnto him. If hee suffer any losse by negligence or want of foresight, hee will de-determine in his mind that the same was done in deed with the will of GOD, but he will impute it also to himselfe, If any man be dead by sicknesses whome he hath negligently handled, whereas of detie he should haue taken good heed vnto him although he be not ignorant that the man was come to his appointed time beyond which he could not passe, yet will he not therby lessen his offence, but because he had not faithfully discharged his dutie toward him, he will so take it as if he had perished by fault of his negligence. Much lesse when there is vfe any fraude, and conceived malice of minde in committing either murder or theft, will he excuse it vnder prentce of Gods prouidence, but he will in one selfe euill act severally behoud both the righteousnes of God and the wickednes of man, as both doth manifestly shewe themselues. But principally in things to come he will haue consideration of such inferior causes. For he will reckon it among the blessings of God if he be not disappointed of the helps of men which he may use for his safetie. And so he neither will be negligent in taking of counsell, nor slouthfull in drawing their help whom he seeth to haue sufficient whereof he may be succoured: but thinking that whatsoever creatures can any thing proffite him, the same are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his use as the lawfull instruments of Gods prouidence. And because he doth not certainly knowe what success of the busines will haue that he goeth about, (being that in all things he knoweth that the Lord will prouide for his benefite) he will with studie travaile to that which he shall thinke expedient for himselfe, so far as he can conceiue in minde and understanding. And yet in taking of counsels he will not be caried on by his owne wit, but will commit & yeeld himselfe to the wisdome of God, that by the guiding thereof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence shall not so stay vpon outward helps, that if he haue them he wil carelesly rest vpon them, or if he wate them he wil be afraid as left destitute, for he wil haue his minde alway fastened vpon the Proutidence of God, neither will he suffer himselfe to be drawn away from the steadfast beholding thereof, by consideration of present things. So though loab acknowledged that the successfe of battail is in ye will & hand of God, yet he gaue not himselfe to slouthfulnesse but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaueth it vnto the Lord to gouerne the end. We wil stand valiant (faith he) for our nation, and for the cities of our God: But the Lord do what is good in his cies. This knowledge shall defpoyle vs of rashnes & wrongful confidence, & shall drue vs to continuell calling vpon God: & also shall vphold our minds with good hope, so as we may not doe aspiredly & boldly to despise those dagers, y cupalle vs about.

10 In this point dooth the inftable felicite of a godly minde shewe foorth itselfe. Innumerable are the euils that doe besiege mans life, and do threaten him so many deaths. As not to go further than our felites: forasmuch as our bodie is a receptacle of a thousand diseases, yea hath enclosed & doth nourish within it the causes of diseases, man can not carie himselfe but he must needs also carie about with him many formes of his owne destruction, & draw forth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may itself be called, where he neither is cold, nor sweateth without peril? Nowe whithersoever ye turne thee, all things are about thee are not only vntruly friends to thee, but do in manner openly threaten & seeme to shew thee prefer death. Go into a ship, there is but a foot thickenes between thee & death.
Sit on horseback, in the slipping of one foote thy life is in danger. Go through the citty, to so many tyles are vpon the houses, to so many perils art thou subject. If there be an iron toole in thy hand or thy friends, thy harme is readie prepared. Howe many wilde beasts thou feest, they are all armed to thy destruction. If thou meane to shute vp thy selfe, euin in a garden well fenled, where may appeare nothing but pleauantnesse of ayre and grounde, there sometime lurketh a Serpent. The house which is continually subiect to fire doeth in the day time threaten thee with pouertrie, and in the night with falling vpon thy head. Thy feele forsooth as it lyeth open to halfe, frost, drought and other tempestes, it warmeth thee of barrennesse, and thereby famine. I speake not of pyroptiones, treasons, robberies, open violence, of which parte doe behoove vs at home, and part doe followe vs abroad. In these rightes must not man needs bee moost miserable, which euin in life halfe deade doeth plainly drawe foorth a carefull and fainting breath as if hee had a sward continually hanging ouer his necke? But thou wilt say that these things chauce seldom, or at the leaft not alwayes, nor to all men, and neuer all at once. I grant, but seeing we are put in minde by the examples of other, that the same things may happen to our felues, and that our life ought of dueties no more to bee free then theirs, it can not bee but that we must deade and feare them as thynge that may light vpon us. Now what can a man imagine more miserable than such a fearfullnesse? besides that, it is not without dishonourable reproch of God to say, that hee hath set open man the nobleaf of all his creatures to their blind and unadvised storks offortune. But here my purpose is to speake onely of the miserie of man, which hee shoule feele if he shoule be brought subjecte vnder Fortunes dominion.

But when that light of Gods Prudience hath once shined vpon a godly man: hee is nowe releued and delivered not onely from ye extreme anguish and feare wherewith he was before oppresed, but also from al care. For as iustly he feareth fortune, so he dare boldly commit himselfe to God. This is (I say) his comforte to vnderstande that the heauenly father doeth so holde in all thinges with his power, so ruleth them with his authoritie and countenaunce, so ordreneth them with his wisdome, that nothing befalleth but by his appointment: and that hee is receiued into Gods tuition, & committed to the charge of Angels, and cannot be touched with any hurt of water, nor fire, nor weapon, but so farre as it shall please God the gouernour to give them place. For so is it song in the Psalme. For hee shall deliver thee from the hunters faire, and from the noysome pestilence. He wil couer thee vnder his wings, and thou shalt bee sure vnder his fethers. His true shalbe thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not bee afraid of the feare of the night, nor of the arrowe that flyeth by day, nor of the pestilence that walketh in the darkenesse, nor of the plague that destroyeth at noone day. And from thence procedeth that boldnesse of the Saintes to glorie: The Lorde is my helper, I will not feare what feth may doe to mee. The Lorde is my protector, why shal I be afraid? If whole campes stand vp against mee, if I walke in the middeft of the shadow of death, I wil not eafe to

to hope well. Whence, I pray you, haue they this that their assurednesse is never shaken away from them: but hereby, that where the world seems to be without order whirlèd about, they knowe that God worketh euerie where, whose worke they rust shall bee for their prefervation. Nowe if their safetie be assayed either by the deuill or by wicked men, in that case if they were not strengthened with remembrance and meditation of Providence, they mu{t needes by and by be discouraged. But when they call to minde, that the deuill and all the rout of the wicked, are so every way hol{den in by the hand of God as with a bridle, that they can neither conceive any mischiefe against vs, nor goe about it when they have conceived it, nor if they goe neuer so much about it, can stirre one finger to bring it to passe but so farre as hee shall suffer, yea so farre as hee shall commaund, and that they are not onely holden fast bounde with fetters, but also compelled with bridle to doe service: here haue they abundantly wherewith to comforte themselues. For as it is the Lordes worke to armes their curie and to turne and directe it whither it please{th him, so is it his worke also to appoint a measure and ende, that they doe not after their owne will licentiously triumph. With which perfwation Paul being stablished, did by the sufterance of God appoint his journey in another place where hee faide was in one place hindered by Satan. If he had onely fayde that hee had bene stopped by Satan, hee should haue seemed to give him too much power, as if it had bene in Satans hande to ouerthrow the verrie purposes of God: but when hee maketh God the judge, vpon whose sufterance all iourneys do hang: he doeth therewithall shewe, that Satan whatsoeuer hee goe about, can attain nothing but by Gods will. For the same reason doeth Dauid, because for the sundrie chaunges wherewith mans life is tossed and as it were, whirled about, hee doeth fli to this sanctuary, faith that his times are in hand of God. Hee might haue saide either of course of his life, or time in the singular number. But by the worde Times, hee meant to expresse that howsoever the state of man bee vnstedfast, whatsoeuer alterations doe nowe and then happen, they are governed by God. For which cause Raph and the king of Israel, when ioyning their powers to the destruction of Iuda, they seemed as firebrandes kindeled to waie and consume the lande, are called by the Prophet smoking brandes, which can doe nothing but breath out a little smoke. So when Pharao was terrible to all men by reason of his riches, streng{h and number of men, hee himselfe is compared to a beast of the Sea, and his armie to fishes. Therefore God faith that hee will take the Captaine and the armie with his hooke and drawe them whither hee list. Finally because I will not tarie long vpon this point, if a man marketh hee shall easily see that the extremitie of all miseries is the ignorance of Gods Providence, and the chiefest blessednesse standeth in the knowledge thereof.

Concerning the Providence of God, this that saide were enough for so much as is profitable both for the perfecte learning and comforte of the faithfull, (for to fill the vaine curiositie of men, nothing can be sufficient, neither is it to be wished that they bee satisfied) were it not for certaine places, which seeme to meane otherwise than is above declared, that God hath hath not stedfast and stable purpose but changeable according to the disposition of inferior things. First, in some places is spoken of the repentance of God, as that he repented of the creating of man, of the advancing of Saul to the kingdom. And that he will repent him of the euloth that he had determined to lay upon his people, so soon as he percei-ved any conversion of them. Again there are rehearsed divers repertes of his decrees. He had declared by Jonah to the Ninities that after 40. dayes once past Nineities should be destroyed, but by & by he was turned with their repentance to a more gentle sentence. He had by the mouth of Esay pronounced death to Ezechias, which he was moved by his tears and praiers to deferre. Hereupon many doe make argument, that God hath not appointed mens matters by eternall decree, but yerely, daily and houerly appointeth this or that, as every mans defertings are, or as he thinketh it equitie & justice. Concerning his repentance this we ought to hold, that the same can no more be in God, than ignorance errour and weakenesse. For if no man doe wittingly and willingly throw himselfe into the caue that he needeth to repent, we can not say that God doth repent, but that we must also say, that God is ignorant what will come to passe, or that he cannot auoide it, or that he headlong & vnaduitedly runneth into a purpose wherof he by & by foremostheth him. But it is so far from the meaning of the holy Ghost, that in very mention making of repentance he denieth that God had any repenting at all, because he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be noted that in any name chapter they are both so inclyned together, that the comparison doeth very well bring the shew of repugnancie to agreement. His changing is figuratively spoken, that God repented that he had made Saul king, by & by after it is added: The strength of Israel shal not ly, nor shall be moved with repenting. Because he is not a man that he may repent. In which words his unchangeablenes is affirmed plainly without any figure. Therefore it is certaine that the ordinance of God in disposing the matters of men, is perpetuall and aboue all repentance. And his constance shal not be doubtfull, his very adversaries haue bin compelled to bear him witnesses. For Balash whether he would or no, could not chuse but burst out into this saying: that he is not like a man to say nor as a son of man to be changed, & that it is not possible that hee should not do that he hath said, & not fulfill whatsoeuer he hath spoken.

13 What meaneth then this name of Repentance? even in the same sort that all the other phrases of speache which do describe God vnto vs after the manner of men. For, because our weakenesse doth not reach to his highnes, that description of him which is taught vs, was meete to be framed low to our capacitie that we might understand it. And this is the manner how to frame it lower for vs, to paint out himselfe not such a one as hee is in himselfe, but such a one as he is perceived of vs. Where as he himselfe is without all mouing of a troubled minde, he yet testifieth he is angry with sinners. Like as therefore when we heare that God is angry, we ought not to imagine that there is any moving at all in him, but rather to consider that this speach is borowed of our common sense, because God beareth a resemblance of one chamed and angry so oft as hee exeriseth judgmemt: so ought we to understand nothing els by this worde of Repentance but a chan-chaunging of deedes, because men by changing of their deedes are wont to declare that they dislike them. Because then every change among men is an amendement of that which misliketh them, and amendement commeth of repentance; therefore by the name of repentance is meant that, that God chaungeth in his works. In the meanie time ye neither is his purpose nor his will turned, nor his affection chaunged, but hee followeth on with one continual course that which he had from eternitie foreseen, allowed and decreed, howsoever the alteration seeme fodeyne in the eyes of men.

14 Neither doeth the holy historic shewe that Gods decrees were repelled when it theweth that the destruction was pardoned to the Ninuites which had been before pronounced, and that the life of Ezechias was prolonged after warning given him of death. They that so construe it are deceived in understanding of threatyninges: which although they doe simply affirm, yet by the successe it shall be perceived that they conteyned a secrete condition in them. For why did God sende Ionas to the Ninuites to tell them aforesaid of the ruine of their citie: Why did he by Ilay giue Ezechias warning of death? For hee might have brought to nought both him and them without sending them any worde of their destruction. Hee meant therefore an other thing, than to make them by foreknowing of their death to see it comming a farre of. Even this hee meant: not to haue them destroyed, but to haue them amended that they shoue not be destroyed. Therefore this that Ionas prophesied that Ninui should fall after 40.dayes, was done to this ende that it shoulde not fall. That hope of longer life was cut off from Ezechias, was done for this purpose that hee might obtaine longer life. Nowe who doeth not fee that God meant by such threatyninges to awake them to repentance, whom hee made afrayde to the ende that they might escape the judgement which they had deserued by their sins: if that be so agreed, the nature of the thinges themselfes doeth lead vs to this, to understande in the simple threatyning a secrete emplied condition, which is also confirmed by like examples. The Lorde rebuking the king Abimelech for that he had taken away Abrahams wife from him, vseth these wordes: Beholde thou shalt die for the woman that thou haist taken, for thee hath a husbande. But after hee had excused himselfe, God saide thus: Restore the wife to her husbande, for he is a Prophete and shall pray for thee that thou maist liue. If not: know that thou shalt die the death and all that thou haist. You see howe in his first sentence he vehemently stryketh his minde to bring him to be more heedefully bent to make amends, & in the other doth plainly declare to him his will. Seeing the meaning of other places is like: do not gather of these that there was any thing withdrawn from the firste purpose of God, by this that hee made voide the thing which hee had before pronounced. For God doth prepare the way for his eternall ordinance, when in giuing warning of the punishment he moueth tho to repentance, whom his will is to spare, rather than varieth any thing in his will, no not in his worde, sauing that he doth not expresse the same thing in fillables which it is yet easie to understand. For that sayeing of Ilay must needs remaine true: The Lord of Hostes hath determined, and who shall be able to vndoe it: His hand is stretched out, and who shall turne it away:
The xvii. Chapter.

That God doeth for the service of wicked men, and for bewraying their minds to put his judgments in execution, that yet still himself remaineth pure from all spots.

There ariseth a hard question out of other places, where it is saide that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himselfe and all the reprobrate. For the sense of the phrase scarcely conceyeth how hee working by them, should not gather some spot of their faulte, yea in his common working bee free from all fault, and lustly condemne his ministers. Vpon this was devised the distinction betweene Doing and Suffering: because many haue thought this doubt impossible to bee dissolued: that both Satan & all the wicked are so vnder the hande and power of God, that hee directeth their malice vnto what end it pleaseth him, and vseth their wicked doings to the executing of his judgements. And that modestie were peraduenture excusable, thome the thewe of absurdistie putten in feare, if it were not so that they do wrongefully with a lying defence goe about to deliuer the justice of God from all vnrightfull blame. It seemeth to them unreasonable, that man shoulde by the will and commandement of God be made blinde, and so by and by bee punyfed for his blindnesse. Therefore they seek to escape by this shifte, that this is done by the sufferance, but not by the will of God. But hee himselfe plainly pronouncing that hee doeth it, doeth reiect that shifte. As for this that men doe nothing but by the secrete commande-ment of God, and doe trouble themselves in vaine with deliberating, vnlesse hee doe by his secrete direction stablishe that which hee hath before determined, it is proued by innumerable and plaine testimonies. It is certayne that this which wee before alleaged out of the Psalme, that God doeth all things that hee will, belongeth to all the doings of men. If God bee the certaine appointer of warre and peace, as it is there saide, and that without exception: who dare say that men are carried causelessly with blinde motion while God knoweth not of it, and fisteth still? But in specialles examples will bee more lightsome plaines. By the first Chapter of Job we know, that Satan doeth no lesse appeare before God to receiue his commande-mentes than doe the Angels which doe willingly obey. In deedie it is after a diverse manner and for a diverse ende: but yet so thathee can not goe about any thing but with the will of God. Although there seeme afterwardes to bee added a bare sufuerance of him to affliet the holy man: yet because that sayinge is true: The Lorde hath giuen, the Lorde hath taken awaye, as it pleased God so is it come to passe: We gather that God was the author of that triall of Job, whereof Satan and the wicked theaneus were ministers. Satan goeth about to drive the holy man by desparation to madnesse. The Sabees cruelly and wickedly doe inuade and rob his goods that were none of theirs. Job knowledge that he was by God stripped of all his goods and made poore, because it fo pleased God. Therefore whatsoever men or Sa- tan himselfe attempt, yet God holdeth the spere to turne all their trauelles to the executing of his judgements. It was Gods will to haue the false king King Achab decreed: the diuell offered his service thereunto: he was sent with a certeine commandement, to be a lying spirit in the mouth of all the Prophets. If the blinding and madness of Achab be the judgement of God, then the deuise of bare Sufferance is vaine. For it were a fond thing to say, that the judge doth onely suffer and not also decree what he will haue done, and command the minifters to put it in execution. It was the Iewes purpose to destroy Christ, Pilate and the fouldiers do follow their raging luft, & yet in a solemne prayer the discipiles do confesse, that all the wicked men did nothing else but that which the hande and counsel of God had determined: even as Peter had before preached, that Christ was by the decreed purpose & foreknowledge of God deliuered to be slaine. As if he should say: that God from whom nothing is hidden, from the beginning did wittingly & willingly appoint that which the Iewes did execute, as in another place he rehearseth, that God which shewed before by all his Prophets y Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it. Absolon defiling his fathers bed with incontinent adulterie, committed detestable wickednesse. Yet God pronounceth that this was his owne worke. For the wordes are these: Thou haft done it secretly, but I will do it openly, and before the sunne. Hieremie pronounceth that all the crueltie that the Chaldees vsed in Iury, was the worke of God. For which cause Nabucadnezzer is called the servant of God, God every where crieth out that with his hissing, with the found of his trumpete, with his power & commandement y wicked are stirr'd vp to warre. He calleth the Affirian the rod of his wrath, & the axe that he moueth with his hand. The destruccion of the holy citie & ruine of the Temple he calleth his worke. Dauid not murmuring against God, but acknowledging him for a righteous judge, yet confesseth that the curtysings of Semei proceeded of the commandement of God. The Lord (faith he) commanded him to curse. We often finde in the holy historie, that whatsoever happeneth it commeth of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, the death of the fonnes of Hely, & very many things of like fort. They that be meanly exercised in Scrip- tures do see, that for shortnesse sake, I bring forth of many testimonies but a few, by which yet it appeareth plainly enough, that they doe trifle & talk fondly, that thrust in a bare Sufferance in place of the Pruidence of God, as though God sate in a watch tower wayting for the chaunces of Fortune, & so his judgements should hang vpon the will of men.

2 Now as concerning secret motions, that which Salomon speaketh of the heart of a king, that it is bowed hither or thither as pleaseth God, extendeth surely to all mankind, & is as much in effect as if he had said, whatsoever we conceive in minde, is by the secret inspiration of God directed to this end. And truely if he did not worke in the minde of men, it were not rightly said, that he taketh away the lip from the true speakers, & wisse doome from aged men, that he taketh the heart from the Princes of the earth, that they may wander wher is no beaten way. And hereto belongeth that which we oft read, that men are fearfull so farre forth as their hearts be taken with his feare, So Dauid went out of the campe of Saul & none was ware of it, because the sleepe of God was come vpon them all. But nothing can be desired to be more plainly spoken, than where he so oft pronounceth, that he blindeth blindeth the eyes of men, & striketh them with giddinesse, that he maketh them drunke with the spirit of drowsinesse, caueth them into madness, and hardneth their hearts. These things also many do referre to Sufferance, as if in forsaking the reprobate, he suffeth them to be blinded by Satan, but that solution is too round, forasmuch as the Holy Ghost in plaine wordes expresseth, that they are striken with blindness & madness by the iuft judgement of God. It is said, that he hardneth the heart of Pharao, also that he did make dull and strengthen it. Some do with an unsavoury cauillation mock out these phrases of speech, because wherein another place it is said, Pharao did harden his owne heart, there is his own wil for the cause of his hardening. As though these things did not very well agree together, although in divers maners, that man while he is moved in working by God, doeth also work himselue. And I do turne backe their objection against themselues. For, if to harden do signifie but a bare Sufferance, then 'tis very motion of obstinacie shall not be properly in Pharao. Now how weake & foolish were it so to expound, as if Pharao did only suffer himself to be hardened? Moreover the Scripture cutteth of all occasions from such cauillations. For God faith, I will hold his heart. So of the inhabitants of the land of Canaan Moses faith, that they went forth to battle, because the Lorde had hardened their hearts. Which same thing is repeated by another Prophet, saying: He turned their hearts that they should hate his people. Again in Esay he faith, that he will send the Affirions against the deceitful nation, & will command them to carry away the spoyes, & violently take the pray, not meaning that he will teache wicked & obstinate men to obey willingly, but that he will bow them to execute his judgements as if they did bear his commandements grauen in their mindes. Whereby appeareth that they were moved by the certaine appointment of God. I grant that God doth often times worke in the reprobate by Satans service as a meane, but yet so that Satan doeth his office by Gods motting, and proceedeth so farre as is given him. The euill Spirit troubled Saul, but it is said that it was of God, that wee may knowe that the madness of Saul, came of the iuft vengeance of God. It is also said, that the same Satan doth blind the mindes of the unfaithful: but how so, but only because the effectual working of error commeth from God himselfe, to make them beleue lyes that refuse to obey the truth? After the first maner of speaking it is said, If any Prophet shall speake lyingly, I God haue deceived him. According to the other maner of speech it is sayd, that he gueth men into a reprobate mind: & to cast them into filthie desires, because he is the chief author of his owne iust vengeance. & Satan is but onely a minister thereof. But because we must entreat of this matter againe in the second booke, where we shall discourse of free or bond will of man, I think I haue already shortlie spoken so much as this place required. Let this be the summe of all, that forasmuch as the wil of God is said to be the cause of all things, his Prudence is thought the gouerneffe in all purposes: & workes of men, so as it sheweth forth her force not only in the elect, which are governed by the holy Spirit, but also compelleth the reprobate to obedience.

1 Forasmuch as hithereto I haue recited only such things as are written in the Scriptures, plainly & not doubtfully, let them that feare not wrongfully

to slander the heavenly oracles, take heed what manner of judgment they take upon them. For if by fained pretending of ignorance they take a praise of modestie, what can be imagined more proudly done, than that to set one small worde against the authoritie of God? as I thinke otherwise, I like not to have this touched. But if they openly speake euill, what preuaile they with spitting against the heauen? But this is no new example of waywardnes, because there haue bin in all ages wicked and vngodly men, that with raging mouth barked against this point of doctrine. But they shall seeke that thing in deede to be true, which long agoe the holy Ghost spake by the mouth of Dauid, that God may overcome when he is judged. Dauid doth by the way rebuke the madness of men in this so vnbridled licentiousnesse, that of their owne filthinesse they do not onely argue against God, but also take upon them power to condemne him. In the meane time he shortly admonifieth, that the blasphemies which they vomit vp against the heauen do not reach vnto God, but that he driving away the cloudes of caullations, doth brightly shewe forth his righteousness, and also our faith (because being grounded upon the word of God, it is above all the world) doth from her hie place contemptuously looke downe upon these mystes. For first where they object, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in him two contrary willes, because he decreeth those things by secret purpofe, which he hath openly forbidden by his lawe, that is eaily wiped away. But before I anfwer these, I wil once againe giue the readers warning that this caullation is thrown ou not against me, but against the holy Ghost, which taught the holy man Job this confefion: As it pleased God, so it came to passe. When he was spoiled by theeues, he acknowledged in the iniurie and hurt that they did him, the juft scourge of God. What faith the Scripture in other places? The fanues of Hely obeyed not their Father, because it was Gods will to kill them. Also an other Prophet crieth out, that God which ftrike in heauen doth whatfoever he will. And now I haue shewed plainly enough that God is the author of all those things which these judges would have to happen onely by his idle fufferance. Hee teftifieth that he created light and darkenesse, that he formed good and euill, that no euill happeneth which he himselfe hath not made. Let them tell me, I beseech them, whether he do willingly or against his will execute his owne judgements? But as Moses teareth, he which is slaine by the falling of an axe by chance, is deliuered by God into the hand of the striker: so the whole church fayth in Luke, that Herode and Pilate confpired to doe those things, which the hand and purpose of God had decreed. And truely if Christ were not crucified with the will of God, whence came redemption to vs? And yet the will of God neither doth strue with it selfe, nor is changed, nor faineth that he willeth not the thing that he will: but where it is but one and simpole in him, it feemeth to vs manifolde, because according to the weakenesse of our witte we conceive not howe God in diuers maner willethe and wilether not one selte thing. Paul, after that he hath faid, that calling of the Gentiles is a hidden mysterie, within a little after faith further, that in it was manifestly shewed the manifolde wisedome of God: because for the dulenesse of our witte the wisedome of GOD feemeth to vs manifolde, or (as the olde interpretour hath translated it) of many fashions: that we therefore dreme that there is any variety in God himselfe, as though he either chaungeth his purpose, or differenceth from himselfe? Rather when we concewe not how God will haue the thing to be done, which he forbiddeeth to doe, let vs call to mind our owne weakeenesse, and therewithall consider that the light when he dwelleth, is not without caufe called inacessible, because it is couered with darknesse. Therefore all godly and sober men will easily agree to this sentence of Augustine, that sometime man with good will will willeth y which God willeth not. As if a good sonne willeth to haue his father to live, whom God will haue to die. Againe, it may come to passe, that man may will the same thing with an euill will, which God willeth with a good will. As if an euill sonne willeth to haue his father to die, and God alfo willeth the same. Now the first of these two sonnes willeth that which God willeth not, and the other sonne willeth that which God alfo willeth, and yet the naturnesse of the first sonne doth better agree with the will of God, although he willeth a contrary thing, than the vnnaturnalnesse of the other sonne that willeth y same thing. So great a difference is there what to wil doth belong to man, & what to God, and to what ende the will of euery one is to be applied, to haue it either allowed or disallowed. For those things which God willeth well he bringeth to passe by the euill willes of euill men. But a little before he had said, that the Angels apostataes in their falling away, and al the reprobate, in as much as concerneth themselves, did that which God would not, but in respect of the omnipotencie of God, they could by no means do, because while they did against the will of God, the will of God was done upon them. Whereupon he crieth out: Great are the works of God, & ought to be fought out of al them that loue them: that in marvellous maner y same thing is not done without his will which is alfo done against his will, because it could not be done if he did not suffer it: and yet he doth it not against his will, but willingly: and he being good, would not suffer a thing to be done euill, vnlesse for that he is omnipotent, he could of euill make good.

4. In the same maner is afoiled or rather vanifheth away the other objection: that if God do not onely vfe the seruice of wicked men, but also goureth their counsels and affections, he is the author of all wicked doings, & therefore men are vnworthily condemned, if they execute y which God hath decreed, because they obey his will: for it is done amisse to confound his wil & commandement together, which is appeareth by innumerable examples to differ farre a sunder. For though when Absalon abused his fathers wives, it was Gods will to punish Dauids adulterie with that dishonor: yet did he not therefore commande the wicked sonne to committe inceint, vnlesse perhaps you mean it in respect of Dauid, as he speakeoth of the railings of Semei. For when he confesseth that Semei raileth at him by the commandement of God, he doth not therein commende his obedience, as if that foward dogge did obey the commandement of God, but acknowledging his tongue to be y scourge of God, he patiently suffreth to be corrected. And this is to be holden in minde, that when God performeth y wicked that thing which he decreed by his secret judgement, they are not to be excused, as though they did obey his commandement, which in deede of their owne owne evil lust they do purposely brake. Now how that thing is of God, & is ruled by his secrete Providence, which men do wickedly, the election of king Iarobeam is a plain example, in which the rashnesse and madness of the people is severely condemned, for that they perverted the order appointed by God, and falsely fell from the house of David, and yet we know it was his will that he should be appointed. Whereasupon in the verie words of Osee there appeareth a certaine stwee of repugnancie, that where God complained that that kingdom was erected without his knowledge, and against his will, in another place he fayeth, that he gave the kingdom to Iarobeam in his rage. How shall these sayings agree? that Iarobeam reigned not by God, and that he was made king by the same God? Euen thus, because neither could the people fall from the house of David, but that they must shake off the yoke which God had laid upon them: neither yet had God his libertie taken away, but that he might so punish the unthankfulness of Salomon. We see therefore how God in not willing false breach of allegiance, yet to another end justly willeth a falling away from their prince, wherupon Iarobeam beside all hope was by holy anointing driven to be king. After this manner doeth the holy historie say, that there was an enemy raised vp to spoil Salomons sonne of part of his kingdom. Let the readers diligently wey both these things, because it had pleased God to have people governed vnder the hand of one king. Therefore when it was divided in two partes, it was done against his will. And yet the diviision tooke beginning of his will. For surely, where as the Prophet both by words & ceremonie of anointing did move Iarobeam wher he thought of no such thing, to hope of his kingdom, this was not done without the knowlege or against the will of God, which commanded it so to be done, and yet is the rebellion of the people justly condemned, for that as it were against the will of God, they fell from the posteritie of David. In this manner it is also afterward further said, that where Rehabeam proudly despised the request of the people, this was done by God to conforme the words which he had spoken by the hande of Ahiha, his servant. Lo howe against Gods will the sacred vitie is torn in sunder, & yet with the will of the same God tenne tribes do forsake Salomons sonne. Let vs add another like example. Where the people consenting, yea laying their hands vnto it, the fonne of Ahab were flaine, & all his offspring rooted out: Ichu said in deede truely, that nothing of the words of God were fallen to the ground, but that he had done all that he had spoken by the hand of his servant Elias. And yet not vnjustly he rebuketh the citizens of Samaria, for that they had put their hands vnto it. Are ye righteous, faith he? If I have conspired against my lord, who hath killed all these? I haue before (as I think) alreadie declared plainly, how in onelye worke both the fault of man doth bewray it selfe, and also the righteousnes of God gloriously appeareth. And for modest writtes this annuere of Augustine shall alway suffice: where as the father delivered the sonne, & Christ delivered his body, and Judas delivered the Lord: why in this delivering is God righteous, and man faultie? because in the same one thing which they did, the cause was not none, for which they did it. If any be more combered with this that we nowe saye, that there is no consent of God with man, where man by the righteous moving of God doeth that which is not lawful, let them remember that which Augustine faith another place: Who shall not tremble at these judgments, where God worketh even in the hearts of evil men whatsoever he will, and yet rendereth to them according to their deserving? And truly in the fallhood of Judas, it shalbe no more lawful to lay the blame of the wicked deed to God, because he himselfe willed him to be delivered, and did deliver him to death, than it shalbe to give away the praise of our redemption to Judas. Therefore the same writer doeth in another place truly telvs, that in this examination God doeth not enquire what men might have done, or what they have done, but what their will was to doe, that purpose and will may come into the account. They that think this hard, let them a little while consider, how tolerable their owne waywardness is, while they refuse a thing witnessed by plaine testimonies of Scripture, because it exceedeth their capacitie, and do finde fault that those things are uttered, which God, vnlesse he had known them profitable to be known, would never haue commanded to be taught by his Prophets & Apostles. For our being wise ought to be no more but to embrace with meke willingness to learne, and that without exception whatsoever is taught in the holy Scriptures. As for them that doe more sowardly outrage in prating against it, sith it is evident that they babble against God, they are not worthie of a longer contention.

That by Adams sinne and falling away, mankind became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate: whereina intreated of Original sinne.

OT without cause hath the knowledge of himselfe been in the olde prouerbe so much commended to man. For if it be thought a shame to be ignorant of all things that pertain to the course of mans life, then much more shamefull is the not knowing of our seules, whereby it commeth to passe, that in taking counsel of any thing necessary, we be miserably daseled, yea, altogether blinded. But how much more profitable this lesson is, so much more diligently must we take heed, that we do not disorderly vie it, as we see some of the Philosophers have done. For they in exhorting man to knowe himselfe, doe withall appoint this to be the ende, why he should knowe himselfe, that he should not be ignorant of his owne dignitie and excellencie; and nothing els doe they will him to behold in himselfe, but that whereby he may swell with vaine confidence, and be puffed vp with pride. But the knowledge of our selues, first standeth in this point, that considering what was gotten vs in creation, and how bountifully God continueth his gratious favoure towarde vs, we may knowe how great had bin the excellencie of our nature, if it had continued vncorrupted: and we may withall thinke vpon this, that there is nothing in vs of our owne, but that we haue as gotten by borrowing all that God hath bestowed vpon vs, that we may alwayes hang vpon him. Then, that we call to mind our miserable estate after the fall of Adam, the feeling whereof may throw downe all glorying & trust of our selues, outwhelme vs with shame and truely humble vs. For as God at the beginning fashioned vs like his owne image, to the end to raife vp our mindes both to the studie of vertue and to the meditation of eternall life, so leaft the so great noblenesse of our kind, which maketh vs different from brute beasts, should be drowned with our slothfulnes, it is good for vs to know, that we are therefore endued with reafon & understanding, that in keeping a holy & honest life, we should procede on forward to the appointed end of blest immortalitie. But the first dignitie can not come in our minde, but by and by on other side the heauy light of our filkines & shame doth thrust it selfe in presence, since we in the person of vs first man are fallen from our first estate, where vpon groweth the hatred and lothing of our selues, & true humilitie, and there is kindled a new desire to seeke for God, in whom euery of vs may recouer those good things, whereof we are found altogether voide and empitc.

2 This thing surely the truth of God appointeth to be sought in examinining of our selues, I mean, it requireth such a knowledge as may both call vs away from all confidence of our owne power, and making vs desitute of all matter to glory vpon, may bring vs to submision. Which rule it behouth vs to keepe, if we wil attaine to the true marke both of right knowledge and well doing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleasant is that other opinion that allureth vs rather to consider our good things, than to looke vpon our miserable needinesse and dishonour, which ought to overwhelme vs with shame. For there is nothing that mans nature more co-ureth, than to be stroked with flattery: and therefore when he heareth the gifts that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that side with ouermuch lighinesse of beleefe: whereby it is so much leffe to be maruesled, that herein the greatest part of men haue perniciously erred. For this there is naturally planted in al mortall men a more than blind loue of themselues, they doe moft willingly perswade themselues, that there is nothing in them that they ought worthy to hate. So without any maintenance of other, this moft vaine opinion doth ech where get credit, that man is abundantly sufcient of him selfe to make him feele liue well and bleffedly. But if there be any that are content to thinke more modestly, howe soeuer they graunt

somewhat to God, least they should seeme arrogantly to take all to themselves; yet they so part it, that the principall matter of glorie and confidence alway remaينeth with themselves. Now if there come talke, that with her allurementes tickleth the pride that already of it selle itccheth within the bones, there is nothing that may more delite them. Therefore as any hath with his extolling most fauourably advanced the excellency of mans nature, soth hath he bin excepted with the well liking reioycentement in maner of all ages. But whatsoeuer such commendation there be of mans excellencie that leacheth man to rest in himselfe; it doth nothing but delite with that her sweetenesse, and in deede so deceiueth, that it bringeth to most wretched destuction all them that affent vnto it. For to what purpose auailith it for vs, standing vpon al vaing confidence to deuise, appoint, attempt and goe about those things that we thinke to be for our behoofe, and in our first beginning of enterprize to be forsaken & destitute of sound understanding and ttrue strength, and yet to goe on boldly till we fall downe into destruction?
But it can not otherwife happen to them that haue affiance that they can do any thing by their owne power. Therefore if any man glie heede to such teachers that holde vs in considering onely our owne good things, he shal not profite in learning to knowe himselfe, but shall be caried violently away into the worse kinde of ignorance.

3 Therefore, whereas in this point the truth of God doth agree with the common natural meaning of all men, that the second parte of widsome consisteth in the knowledge of our selues, yet in the very maner of knowing there is much disagreement. For by the judgement of the selfe, a man thinketh that he hath then well searched himselfe; when trusting vpon his owne understanding and integrity, he taketh boldenesse, and encourageth himselfe to doing the dutie of vertue and bidding battell to vices, traua-lceth with all his studie to bende himselfe to that which is comely and ho-net. But he that looketh vpon and trieth himselfe by the rule of Gods judgement, findeth nothing that may raife vp his minde to good affiance: and the more inwardly that he hath examined himselfe, the more he is discouraged, till being altogether spoiled of all confidence, he leaueth to him-selv nothing toward the well ordering of his life. And yet would not God haue vs to forget the first noblenes that he gave to our father Adam, which ought of good right to awake vs to the studie of righteousnesse and goodnesse. For we can not consider either our owne first estate, or to what end we are created, but we halbe pricked forward to studie vpon immortalitie, and to defire the kingdome of God. But that consideration is so farre from putting vs in courage, that rather discouraging vs, it throweth vs downe to humblenesse. For what is that first estate of ours? euell that from whence we are fallen. What is that ende of our creation? euell the same from which we are altogether turned away: so that loathing our owne mis-terable estate, wee may grone for sorrowe, and in groning may also sigh for the losse of that dignitie. But nowe when wee say that man ought to behold nothing in himselfe that may make him of bolde courage: wee mean that there is nothing in him vpon affiance whereof he ought to be proude.
Wherfore, if any lile to heare what knowledge maught to saue of himself, et vs thus divide it, that first hee consider to what ende he is created, and endued with gifts that are not to be dispisèd, by which thought hee may be sturred vp to the meditation of the hearing of God & of the life to come. Then let him way his owne strength, or rather needie want of strength, by perceiving whereof he may lie in extreme confusion, as one utterly brought to naught. The first of these considerations tendeth to this ende, that hee may knowe what is his dutie: and the other, howe much hee is able to do towards the performing of it. Wee will entreat of them both, as the order of teaching shall require.

4 But because it must needs be that it was not a light negligence, but a deetatable wicked act which God so severely punished, wee muste consider the verie forme of the same in the fall of Adam, that kindeled the horrible vengeaunce of God vpon al mankinde. It is a childish opinion that hath commonly beene receyued, concerning the intemperance of gluttonie, as though the summe and heade of all vertues consisted in the forebearing of one only fruite, when there flowed on every side store of all sortes of deinties y were to be desired, & when in that blest fruitfulness of y earth, there was not onely plentie, but also varietie to make fare for pleasure. Therefore wee must looke further, because the forbidding him from the tree of y knowledge of good and euill, was the trial of obedience, that Adam in obeying might prove that hee was willingly subject to the government of God. And the name of the tree it selfe sheweth, that that commandement was given for none other ende, than for this that hee contented with his owne estate shoulde not with wicked lust aduaunce himselfe higher. But the promise whereby hee was bidden to hope for eternall life, so long as hee did not care of the tree of life, and againe, the horrible threatening of Death so soone as hee shoulde taile of the tree of knowledge of good and euill, serued to prooue and exercize his faith. Hereof it is not harde to gather, by what means Adam provoked the wrath of God against himselfe. Augustine in-deede faith not amisse, when hee faith, that pride was the beginning of all euils. For if ambition had not lifted vp man higher than was lawfull & than was permitted him, he might have continued in his estate: but wee muste fetch a more full definition from the maner of the tentation that Moses describeth. For fith the woman was with the deceit of the Serpent led away by infidelitie, nowe it appeareth that disobedience was the beginning of y fall. Which thing Paul confirmeth, teaching that all men were lost by one mans disobedience. But it is withall to be noted, that the first man fell from y subiection of God, for that hee not only was taken with the entisementes of Satan, but also despising the truth, did turne out of the way to lying. And surely Gods worde being once despisèd, all reverence of God is shaken off. Because his maieftie doeth no other wayes abide in honour among vs, nor the worship of him remaine intiuolate, but while we hang vppon his mouth. Therefore infidelitie was the root of that falling away. But thereupon arose ambition and pride, to which was adiomyed uthankfullnesse, for that Adam in courting more than was graunted, did vnreuerently despise the so great liberalitie of God wherewith he was enriched. And this was a mon-struous wickednesse, that the sonne of the earth thought it a small thing that that he was made after the likeness of God, whereas he might also be made equal with God. If Apostasie bee a filthie and detestable offence, whereby man draweth himselfe from the allegiance of his creauor, yea outrageously shaketh of his yoke: then it is but vaine to extenuate the sin of Adam. Albeit it was no simple Apostasie, but joyned with shamefull reproches against God, while they assented to the falsanders of Satan, wherein he accused God of lying enuiie, and niggardly grudging. Finally, insidetie opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obstinate rebellion, to make men cast away the fear of God, and throw themselves whither their lust carried them. Therefore Bernard doth rightly teach, that the gate of salvation is opened unto vs, when at this day wee receive the Gospel by our ears: even as by the same windowes, when they stood open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam woulde never have beene so bolde, as to do against the commandement of God, but for this that hee did not beleue his worde. Truely this was the best bridle for the right keeping of all affections in good order, to think that there is nothing better than to keepe righteousnesse in obeying the commandements of God, and then that the cheefe end of happy life is to be beloved of him. Hee therefore was being carried away with the blasphemies of the Deuill, did (as much as in him lay) extinguish whole glory of God.

5 As the spiritual life of Adam was, to abide joyned and bounde to his creauor, so his alienation from him was the death of his soule. Neither is it maruell if he by his falling away, destroyed all his owne posteritie, which perverted the whole order of nature in heauen and in earth. All the creatures doe groane, faith Paul, being made subject to corruption against their will. If one shoulde aske the caufe: no doubt it is for that they beare part of that punishment y man deserveth, for whose vs they were creatur. With then the curse that goeth throughout all the coasts of the world proceed from his fault both upward and downewarde, it is nothing against reason, if it spread abroad into all his issue. Therefore after that the heavenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone suffer this punishment, that in place of wisedome, strength, holinesse, truth, and justice (with which ornamentes he had beene clothed) there came in the most horrible pettiflences, blindnesse, weakenesse, filthinesse, falschode, and iniustice, but also he entangled & drowned his whole offspring in the same miseries. This is the corruption that commeth by inheritance, which the olde writers called originall sinne, meaning by this wordes sinne, the corruption of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they have had much contention, because there is nothing farther off from common reason, than all men to be made guiltie of one mans fault, and so the sinne to become common. Which seemeth to have beene the cause why the olde Doctors of the Church did but darkely touch this point, or at the least did not set it out so plainly as was convenient. And yet that fearfulnesse could not bring to passe, but that Pelagius arose, whose propiane invention was that Adam sinned onely to his owne losse, and hurted not his posteritie. So through this suttletie, Satan went about by hiding the diseafe, to make it incurable. But when it was proved by manifest testimonie of Scripture, that sinne passed from the first man into all his posterity, hee brought this caullation, that it passed by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefore good men travailed in this point, and above all other Augustine, to shewe that we are corrupted not by forien wickednesse, but that we bring with vs from the wombe of our mother a viciousnesse planted in our begetting, which to denie was too great shamelesness. But the rashnes of the Pelagians and Celestians wil not feeme marvellous to him, which by the writings of the holy man shal perceiue, howe shamelesse beastis they were in all other things. Surely it is not doutfully spoken that David confessed that he was begotten in iniquities, and by his mother conceiued in sinne, He doth not there accuse the sinnes of his father or mother, but the better to set forth the goodness of God toward him, hee beginneth the confession of his owne wickednesse at his very begetting. Forasmuch as it is evident that that was not peculiar to David alone, it followeth that the common estate of all mankinde is noted under his example. All we therefore that descend of vnclene seede, are borne infected which the contagion of sin, yea before that we see the light of this life, we be in the sight of God filthy and spotted. For who could give cleane of the vncleneesse not one, as it is in the booke of Job.

6 We heare that the vncleneesse of the parentes so paffeth into the children, that all without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defiling we shall not finde the beginning vnlesse we go vp to the first parent of all vs, to the well head. Thus it is therefore, that Adam was not onely the progenitor, but also the roote of mans nature, and therefore in his corruption was all mankinde worthyly corrupted: which the Apostle maketh plainely by comparing of him and Christ. As (saith he) by one man sin entred into the whole worlde, and death by sinne, and so death went ouer all men, forasmuch as all haue sinned: so by the grace of Christ, righteousnesse and life is restored vnto vs. What will the Pelagians here prate? that Adams sinne was spread abroad by imitation? Then haue wee no other profite by the righteousness of Christ, but that hee is an example set before vs to follow? Who can abide such robberie of Gods honour? If it be out of question that Christes righteousness is ours by communication, and thereby by life: it followeth also that they both were so lost in Adam, as they be recovered in Christ: and that sinne and death so crept in by Adam, as they are abolished by Christ. The words are plaine, that many are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, as by the disobedience of Adam they were made sinners: and that therefore betweene them two is this relation, that Adam wrapping vs in his destruction, destroied vs with him, and Christe with his grace restored vs to saluation. In so cleere light of truth, I think we neede not a longer or more laborious prove. So also in the 1 Epistle to the Corin. when he goeth about to stablish the godly in the trust of y resurrection, he sheweth y the life is couered in Christ, y was lost in Adam, he that pronounceth that we all are dead in Adam, doth also therewithal plainly teytiseth, that we were infected with the filth of sinne. For damnation could not reache vnto them y were touched w no guiltines of iniquitie. But it can be no way plainlier vnderstanded what he meaneth than by relation of y other neber of the sentence, where he teacheth that hope of life is restored in Christ. But it is well enough known, that the same is done no other way, than when by marvellous maner of communicating, Christ poureth into vs the force of his righteousness. As it is written in another place, that the spirit of life vnto vs, for righteousness sake. Therefore we may not otherwise expound that which is saide that we are dead in Adam, but thus, that he in sinning did not onely purchase mischief and ruine to himselfe, but also threwe downe our nature headlong into like destruction. And that not onely to the corruption of himselfe, which pertaineth nothing to vs, but because he infected al his seed with the same corruption whereinto he was fallen. For otherwise the saying of Paul could not stand true, that all are by nature the sons of wrath, if they were not already accursed in the wombe. And it is easilie gathered that nature is there meant not such as it were create by God, but such as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not convenient, that God should be made the author of death. Adam therefore so corrupted himselfe, that the infection past from him into all his offspring. And the heavenly judge himselfe Christ, doth also plainly inough pronounce, that all are borne euill and corrupted, where he teacheth, that whatsoever is borne of flesh, is flesh, and that therefore the gate of life is closed against all men, vntill they be begotten againe.

7 Neither for the vnderstanding thereof is any curious disputacion needfull, which not a little combred the old writers, whether the soule of the sonne doe proceede by derivation from the soule of the father, because in it the infection principally refeth. We must be content with this, that such gifts as it pleased the Lord to haue bestowed vpon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam left them after hee had receiued them, he left them not onely from himselfe, but also from vs all. Who shall be careful of a conueiance from soule to soule, when hee shall heare that Adam receiued these ornamentes which he lost, no lesse for vs than for himselfe, that they were not giuen to one man alone, but asigned to the whole nature of man? Therefore it is not aginfr reason, if he being spoield, nature be left naked and poore: if he being infected with sinne, the infection creepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten roote arose vp rotten branches, which sent their rottenness into the other twigs that sprong out of them. For so were the children corrupted in the father, they also were infected to their children: y is to say, so was y beginning of corruption in Adam, that by continual flowing from one to another, it is conveyed from the ancestors into the posteritie. For the infection hath not her cause in the substance of the flesh or of the soule, but because it was so ordaine of God, that such gifts as he had giuen to the first man, man should both haue them, and lose them as well for himselfe as for his. As for this that the Pelagians doe causill, that it is not likely that the children doe take corruption from godly parentes, Sith they ought rather to be sanctified by their cleanliness, that is easilie confuted, For they descend not of their spirituall regeneration, but of their carnall generation. Therefore as Augustine faith, whether the vnbelieuer be condemned as guiltie, and the believer quitte as innocent, they both do beget not innocents, but guiltie, because they beget of the corrupted rupted nature. Nowe where as they doe in manner partake of the parentes holinelle, that is the speciall blesing of the people of God, which poureth not but that the first and nuiterfall curse of mankinde went before. For of nature is guiltineffe, and sanctification is of supernaturall grace.

8 And to the end that these things be not spoken of a thing vn Certaine and unknowen, let vs define Original sinne. But yet I mean not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but I will bring forth one onely, which I thinke to bee most agreeable with truth. Original sin therefore feemeth to be the inheritably descending peruersfesse and corruption of our nature, powred abroad into all the partes of the soule, which first maketh vs guiltie of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth these worke in vs, which the Scripture calleth the worke of the fleffe: & that Gal.5.19. is it properly that Paul oftentimes calleth sinne. And these worke that arise out of it, as are adulteries, fornications, theftes, hatreds, murthers, banketinges, after the same manner hee calleth the fruities of sinne, albeit they are likewise calleth sinnes both commonly in the Scripture, & also by the same Paul himselfe. Therefore these two things are distinctely to bee noted: that is, that being fo in all partes of our nature corrupted and perverted, wee are nowe euen for such corruption onely holden worthily damned and conuicted before God, to whome is nothing acceptable but righteoufnesse, innocencie and purenesse. And yet is not that bonde in respecte of an others fault. For where it is faide, that by the sinne of Adam wee are made subject to the judgement of God, it is not so to bee taken, as if wee innocent and undefruing did bearre the blame of his faulte. But because by his offending wee are all clothed with the curse, therefore is it faide that hee hath bounde vs. Neuertheless, from him not the punishment onely came vpon vs, but also the infection diffilled from him, abideth in vs, to the which the punishment is iustly due. Wherefore howe so euer Augustine doeth oftentimes call it an others sinne, (to shew the more plainly, that it is conveyed into vs by propagation ) yet doeth hee also affirmeth withall that it is proper to euery one. And the Apostle himselfe expressely witnesseth, that therefore death came vpon all men, because all men haue sinned, and are wrapped in Original sinne, and desfiled with the spottes thereof. And therefore the verie infants them selues, while they bring with them their owne damnation from their mothers wombe, are bounde, not by an others, but by their owne faulte. For though they have not as yet brought forth the fruities of their owne iniquitie, yet they have the feed thereof enclosed within them: yea their whole nature is a certaine seede of sinne: therefore it cannot be but hateful and abominable to God. Wherevpon foloweth, that it is properly accompted sinne before God: for there could bee no guiltineffe without sinne. The other point is, that this peruersfesse neuer ceaseth in vs, but continually bringeth forth newe fruities, even the same worke of the fleffe that wee haue before described: like as a burning fornace bloweth out flame and sparcles, or as a spring doeth without ceasling cast our water. Therefore they which haue defined Original sinne, to bee a lacking of Original righteoufnesse which ought to haue bene in vs, although indeede they comprehend all that is in the the thing itself: yet they have not fully enough expressed the force and efficacite thereof. For our nature is not onely bare and emptie of goodnesse, but also is so plenteous and fruiteful of all evilles, that it cannot bee idle. They that haue faide, that it is a concupiscence, haue vse a worde not verie farre from the matter, if this were added, which is not granted by the most part, that whatsoever is in man, even from the understanding to the will, from the soule to the fleshe, is corrupted and stuffed ful with this concupiscence: or, to ende it shortlier, that whole man is of himselfe nothing else but concupiscence.

Wherefore, I haue faide that all the partes of the soule are possesed of sinne, Sith Adam fell away from the fountain of righteousness. For not onely the inferiour appetite allured him, but wicked impietie possesed the very cattel of his minde, and pride pearced to the innermost part of his hart. So that it is a fonde and foolish thing, to restraine the corruption that proceeded from thence, onely to the sensuall motions as they call them, or to call it a certaine nouriture, that allureth, stirreth and draweth to sinne onely that parte, which among them is called Sensuality. Wherein Peter Lombarde hath discloséd his grosse ignorance, which seeking and searching for the place of it, saith that it is in the fleshe, as Paul witnesseth not properly in deed, but because it more appeareth in the fleshe, as though Paul did meane onely a part of the soule, and not the whole nature which is in comparison set against supernaturall grace. And Paul there taketh away al dout: teaching that corruption resteth not in one parte alone, but that nothing is pure and cleane from the deadly infection thereof. For entreating of corrupted nature, hee doeth not onely condemne the inordinate motions of appetites that appeareth, but specially traueth to proue that the understanding minde is subject to blindness, and the heartes to peruersitie. And the same thirde chapter to the Romaines is nothing else but a description of original sinne. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the spirite which is compared with the old man and the fleshe, doth not only signifie the grace whereby the inferiour or sensuall parte of the soule is amended, but also containeth a full reformation of all the parts. And therefore Paul doth command, not onely that our grosse appetites be brought to naught, but also that we our selues be renewed in the spirite of our mind, as likewise in an other place he biddeth vs to be transformed in newenesse of minde. Whereupon followeth, that the same part, wherein most of all sinne the excellencie and noblenesse of the soule, is not onely wounded, but also so corrupted, that it needeth not onely to be healed, but in manner to put on a newe nature. Howe farre sinne posseseth both the understanding minde and the heartes, wee will see hereafter. Here I onely purposed shortly to touch that the whole man from the head to the foote is so ouerwhelmed as with an overflowing of water, that no parte of him is free from sinne, and that therefore whatsoever proceedeth from him is accompred for sinne, as Paul sayth, that all the affections of the fleshe or thoughts, are enmities against God, and therefore death.
Now let them go, that presume to make God author of their sins, because we say that men are naturally finnefull. They doe wrongfully seeke the worke of God in their owne filthyneffe, which they ought rather to have sought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet sounde and vn-corrupted. Therefore our destruction commeth of the fault of our owne flethe and not of God, forasmuch as we perished by no other meane but by this, that we degenerated from our first estate. But yet let not any man here murmur and say, that God might have better foresene for our salvation, if he had provided that Adam should not have fallen. For this obiection both is to be abhorred of all godly minde, for the too much presumptuous curiosity of it, and also pertaineth to the secret of predestination which shal after be entreated of in place convenient. Wherefore let vs remember that our fall is to be imputed to the corruption of nature, that wee accuse not God himselfe the author of nature. True in deede it is, that the same deadly wound fiketh fast in nature; but it is much materiall to knowe, whether it came into nature from else where, or from the beginning hath rested in it. But it is evident that the wounde was given by sinne. Therefore there is no cause why we should complain but of our faules; which thing the Scripture hath diligently noted. For Ecclesiasstes faith: This haue I founde, that God hath made man righteous, but they have sought many inventions. It appeareth that the destruction of man is to be imputed onely to himselfe, forasmuch as having gotten uprightneffe by the goodness of God, hee by his owne madneffe is fallen into vanitie.

We say therefore that man is corrupted with faultinesse naturall, but such as proceeded not from nature. Wee deny that it proceeded from nature, to make appeare that it is rather a qualitie come from some other thing, which is happened to a man, than a substantiall property that hath bin put into him from the beginning. Yet we call it Natural, that no man should think every man geteth it by evil custome, whereas it holdeth al men bound by inheritably descending right. And this we do not of our own heads without authority. For, for the same cause the Apostle teacheth, that we are all by nature the children of wrath. How could God, whom al his meanest workes do please, be wrathful against the noblest of all his creatures? But he is rather wrathful against his corruption of his work, than against his work it selfe. Therefore if for that mans nature is corrupted, man is not vnfitly faide to bee by nature abominable to God, it shalbe also not vnaptly called naturally per-terfe and corrupted. As Augustine faideth not in respect of nature corrupted, to call the sinnes naturall, which doe necessarily reign in our flethe where the grace of God is absent. So vaniseth away the foolish trifling de- wife of the Maniches, which when they imagined an evilneffe having substance in man, presumed to forge for him a newe Creator, lest they should seeme to assigne to the righteous God the cause and beginning of euill.

That man is now spoil'd of the Freedom of will, and made subject to miserable bondage.
Sith we have scene, that the dominion of sinne, since the time that it helde the first man bound vnnto it, doth not onely reigne in all mankinde, but also wholly poesfeth euerie soule: nowe must wee more neerely examine, since we are brought into that bondage, whether we be spoiled of all Freedome or no: and if yet there remaine any parcel, how farre the force there of proceeded. But to the end that the truth of this question may more easilly appeare vnto vs, I will by the way set vp a marke, whereunto the whole summe may be directed. And this shalbe the best way to avoid errour, if the daungers be considered that are like to fall on both sides. For when man is put from al vprightnesse, by and by he thereby taketh occasion of slothfulnesse: and because it is said, that by himselfe he can do nothing to the studie of righteousnes, forthwith he neglecteth it wholly, as if it pertained nothing vnnto him. Againe, he can presume to take nothing vpon himselfe, be it neuer so little, but that both Gods honour shalbe thereby taken from him, and man himselfe be overthrown with rash confidence. THEREFORE to the end we strike not vpon these rocks, this course is to be kept, that man being enformed that there remaineth in him no goodnes, & being on every side compassed about with most miserable necessitie, may yet be taught to aspire to the goodnes whereof he is void, and to the libertie whereof he is depruied, and may be more sharply stirred vp from slothfulnes, then if it were faine that he is furnished with greatest power. Howe necessarie this second point is, euerie man seeth. The first, I see is doubted of by moe than it ought to be. For this being set out of controuersie, it ought then plainly to stand for truth, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his owne, as farre as it behoeth that he be thrown downe from false boasting of himselfe. For if it were not granted to man to glory in himselfe even at that time, when by the bountifullnes of God he was garnished with most singular ornamentes, how much ought he now to be humbled, sith for his vnthankfulnesse hee is thrust downe from his glorie into extreme shame? At that time (I say) when he was aduounced to the hieft degree of honour, the Scripture attributeth nothing else vnnto him, but that hee was created after the image of God, wherby it secretly teacheth, that man was blessed, not by his owne good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remaineth nowe, but that he being naked and destitute of all glorie, doe acknowledge G O D, to whose liberalitie he could not be thankfull when hee flowed full of the riches of his grace: and that now at length with confession of his owne pouerie he glorifie him, whom in the acknowledging of his good gifts, he did not glorifie? Alfo it is as much for our profitte, that all praise of wisdome & strength be taken from vs as it pertaineth to the glorie of G O D that they joine our ruine with the robberie of God, that gire vnto vs any thing more than that which is true. For what is els done when wee are taught to fight of our owne force, but that we be lifted vp on his on staffe of a reede, that it may by and by breake, and we fall to the ground? ALBEIT, our forces are yet too much commended when they are compared to the staffe of a reede. For it is but smoke all that vaine men have imagined and do babble of them. WHEREFORE, not without cause is this excellent sentence oft repeated by Augustine, that free will is rather thrown downe headlong, than stablifhed by them that defend it. This I thought needesfull to speake before, as by way of preface for many mens sakes, which when they heare mans power overthrown from the ground, that the power of God may be buylded in man, do much hate this maner of disputing as dangerous, much more superfluous, which yet appeareth to be both in religion necessarie, & for vs most profitable.

2. Whereas we haue a little before saide, that in the vnderstanding mind, & in the heart are placed the powers of the soule, now let vs confider what they both are able to do. The Philosphers in deede with great content do imagine that in the vnderstanding minde fitteth reason, which like a lampe gueht light to all counsels, & like a Queene gouerneth the will, for they say that it is endued with divine light, that it can giue good counsels, & fo excelleth in lucely force that it is able well to gouerne. On the other side, that fene is dull & bleare eyed, that it alway creepeth on y ground, & walloweth in groffe objectts, and neuer fitteth vp it felle to true inlight. That the appettite, if it can abide to obey reason, and do not yeld it felle to fene to be sub-dued, is caried on to the studie of vertues, holdeth on the right way, & is transformed into will; but if it giue it felle subiect into the bondage of fene, it is by it corrupted and peruerced, so that it degendreth into luft. And whereas by their opinion there do sit in the soule those powers that I haue spoken of before, vnderstanding, fene, appettite or will, which worde will is nowe more commonly vfed, they say that vnderstanding is endued with reafon, the beft gouernesse toward good and blessed life, so that it do hold it felle within his owne excellencie, & shew forth the force that is naturally giuen it. But that inferiour motion of it, which is called fene, wherewith man is drawn to error & deceite, they say to be such, that it may be tamed with the rod of reafon, & by little & little be vanquished. They place will in the midst betweene reafon & fene, as a thing at her owne ordering, & hating libertie whether it liift to obey to reafon, or giue forth it felle to be rauished by fene.

3. Sometime in deede they do not deny, being overcome by verie experience, how hardly man stablisitheth reason to raigne as Queene within him felle, while sometime he is tickled with entuimentes of pleasures, sometime decuited with false semblance of good things, sometime importunately stiaken with immorderate affections, & violently haled out of the way as it were with ropes or stringes of finowes, as Plato saith. For which reason Ciceron faith, that these spakes giuen by nature, are with peruerse opinions & euill maners by and by quenched: But when such diseases have once gotten places in the mindes of men, they grant that they doe more outrageouslie ouerflow, than that they easliy may be restrained: and they stiuke not to compare them to wild horfes which throwing away reason as it were casting y Chariot druen, do range vnrulely & without measure. But this they make no question of, that vertues and vices are in our owne power. For if (say they) it be in our choiwe to do this or that, then is it also in our choiwe not to do. Now if it be in our choiwe not to do, then is it also to do, but of free choiwe we seeeme to do those things that we do, and to forbear those things that we forbeare. Therefore if we do any good thing when we liift, we may like-wisie leave it vndone: if we do any euil, we may also eschew the same. Yet

some of them have burst forth to great licentiousnesse, that they have boasted that it is in deed God's gift that we live, but our own that we live well & holly. And thence commeth that saying of Cicero in the person of Cotta: because every man himselfe getteth vertue to himselfe, therefore nouer any of the wise men did thank God for it. For (faith he) for vertue wee be praised, & in vertue we glorie, which should not be if it were the gift of God, and not of our felues. And a little after: This is the judgement of all men that fortune is to be asked of God, but wisedome to be taken of himselfe. This therefore is the summe of the opinion of all the Philosophers, that the reason of mans understanding is sufficient for right gouernance: that Will being subject to it, is in deed mov'd by Sense to euill things. But even as it hath free election, so can it not be stopped, but that it follow reason for her guide in all things.

4. Among the Ecclesiastical writers, albeit there haue bene none that did not acknowledge both that the soundnesse of reason in man hath beene fore wounded by sinne, and his will exceedingly entangled with perverse desires, yet many of them haue too much assent to the Philosophers, of which the ancient, as I thinke, did so much advaunce the strength of man, vpon this consideration, lest if they should haue expressly confessed his weakesnesse, first they should haue made the Philosophers, with whom they then contended, to laugh at them; and then least they should giue to thy fleshe, which of it fleshe was dull to goodnes, a new occasion of slothfulnesse. Therefore because they would not teach any thing that were an abfurditie in the common judgement of men, their studie was to make the doctrine of the Scripture haile to agree with the teachings of the Philosophers. But that they principally regarded that second point, not to make place for slothfulnesse, appeareth by their owne wordes. Chrysostom hath in one place: Because God hath put both good and euill things in our owne power, hee hath giuen vs Freedom of election, and he withholdeth not the vnwilling, but embraceth the willing. Again, Oftentimes he that is euill, if he will, is turned into good, and he that is good by slothfulnesse falleth and becommeth euill, because God made our nature to haue free will, and he layth not necessitie vpon vs, but giuing convenient remedies, suffreth all to lye in the mynde of the patient. Again, As vnlesse wee be holpen by the grace of God, wee can neuer doe any thing well: so vnlesse wee bring that which is our owne, wee cannot obainline the fauour of God. And hee had saide before, that it shoulde not be all of Gods helpe, but wee must also bring somewhat. And this is commonly a familiar worde with him, let vs bring that which is ours, God will supply the rest. Wherewith agreeth that which Hierom sayeth, that it is our parte to begin, but Gods to make an ende: our parte to offer what we can, his to fulfill what wee cannot. You see nowe that in these sayings they gaue to man towards the studie of vertue more than was meete, because they thought that they could not otherwise awake the dulnesse that was naturally in vs, but if they did prove that in it onely wee sinned. With what apt handeling they haue done the same, we shall after see. Surely that the sayings which we haue rehearsed are most false, shall by and by appeare, Now although y Grecians more than other and among them principally Chrysostome have passed measure in advancing the power of mans will, yet all the olde writers, except Augustine, do in this point fo either vary, or waier, or speake doubtfully, that in manner no certainty can be gathered of their writings. Therefore we wil not tary upon exact reckening of every one of their sayings, but here and thare wee will touch out of every one of them fo much as the plaine declaration of the matter shall seeme to require. As for them y followed after, while every one for him selfe sought praise of wit, in defending of mans nature, they fell continually by little and little one after another into worse and worse, till it came to faire, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted only in his sensual parte, and to haue reason altogether, and wil for the more part vn-corrupted. In the meane time this flew about in all mens mouths, that the natural gifts were corrupted in man, and the supernatural were taken away. But to what meaning that tended, scarcely the hundreth man did even sleightly vnderstand. As for my part, if I would plaineely shew of what sort is the corruption of nature, I could be easely contented with these wordes. But it is much materiall that it be hee defully weyed what a man, being in all partes of his nature corrupted and spoile of his supernatural gifts, is able to doe. They therefore which boasted themselves to be the Disciples of Chrifl, spake of this matter too much like Philosophers. For the name of Freewill still remained among the Latines, as if man had still abiden in vn-corrupted state. And the Grecians were not ashamed to vse the word much more arrogantly: For they called it Autexousion, that is to say, of her owne power, as if a man had the power of himselfe. Because therefore al, even to the common people, had receiued this principle, that man was endued with Free will, & many of them that would seeme excellent, can not tel how far it extendeth: first let vs search out the force of the word it selfe, & then let vs procede on by the simplicitie of the Scripture, to shewe what man is able to doe of his owne nature, toward good or euill. What Free will is, where as it is a word commonly found in all mens writings, yet few haue defined. Yet it feemeth that Origen rehearsed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he sayd, that it is a power of reason to discern good or euill, and a power of will to choose either of them. And Augustine varieth not from him, when he teacheth that it is a power of reason and will, whereby good is chosen while grace assisteth, and euill when grace ceaseth. Bernarde, while he meaneoth to speake more suttely, speaketh more darkely, which saith, that it is a consent by reason of the liberty of will that can not be loft, & the judgement of reason that can not be auoied. And the definition of Anfelmus is not familiar enough, which saith that it is a power to kepe vprightnesse for it selfe. Therefore Peter Lombard and the other Scholemen, haue rather embraced Augustines definition, because it was plainer and did not exclude the grace of God, without the which they saye that will was not sufficient for it selfe. But they bring alfo of their owne such things as they ought either to be better, or to serve for playner declaration. First, they agree that the name of Arbitrium, that is free choyse, is rather to be referred to reason, whose part is to discern between good and euill things: and the adiection Free, pertayneth properly to will, which may be turned
to either of both. Wherefore fith Freedome properly belongeth to will, Thomas faith that it would very well agree, if Free will be called a power of choosing, which being mixt of understanding & appetite, doth more encline to appetite. Nowe haue we in what thinges they teach that the power of Free will confineth, that is to say, in reason and will. Nowe remayneth that we shortly see how much they giue to either part.

5 They are commonly wonte to make fubiect to the free determination of man, thinges mean, by which belong not to the kingdome of God: but they doe refere true righteousness to the special grace of God and spirituall regeneration. Which thing while the author of thy booke Of the calling of the Gentiles meane he shewe, he reckeneth vp three fortes of Willes, the first Sensitue, the second Naturall, the third Spirituall, of which he fayth, that man hath the first two at his owne libertie, the last is the worke of the holy ghost in man. Which whether it be true or not, shalbe entretained in place for it, for now my purpose is but shortly to rehear the opinions of other, and not to confute them. Hereby it commeth to passe, that when writers speake of free will, they principally feke not what it is able to do to ciuil or outward doinges, but what it can doe to the obedience of the law of God. Which later point I thinke so to be the principall, that yet I thinke the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I trust, I shal shewe a good reason. There hath bin a distinction receiued in Schooles, that reckeneth vp three fortes of freedomes, the first from necessitie, the second from sinne, the third from miserie. Of which the first so naturally ticketh fast in man, that it can by no meane be taken away: the other two are lost by sinne. This distinction I willingly receive, sauing that there necessitie is wrongfullly confounded with compulsion: benewe which two how much difference there is, and how necessarie that difference is to be considered, shal appear in an other place.

6 If this be receiued, then shall it be out of controuersie that man hath not free will to do good workes, vnlesse he be holpen by grace, and that by speciall grace, which is giuen to the onely elect by regeneration. For I doe not passe vpone these phrenetike men, which babble that grace is offered generally and without difference. But this is not yet made plaine, whether he be altogether depruied of power to doe well, or whether he haue yet some power, although it be but little & weake, which by it selfe in deedes can doe nothing, but by helpe of grace doth also her part. While the Maitre of the Sentences goeth about to make that plaine, he saith there are two fortes of grace necessarie for vs, whereby we may be made mee te to doe a good worke: the one they call a Working grace, whereby wee effectuall will to doe good: the other a Together working grace, which followeth good will in helping it. In which diuision this I dislike, that whilst he giueth to the grace of God an effectuall desire of good, he secretly sheweth his meaning that man already of his owne nature, after a certaine maner, desirith good though vneffectuall. As Bernard affirming that good will is in deede the worke of God, yet this he granteth to man, that of his owne motion he desirith that good will. But this is farre from the meaning of Augustine, from whom yet Lombard would seems to have borrowed this diuision. In the second second part of the division, the doubtfulness of speech offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong exposition. For they thought that we do therefore work together with the Second grace of God, because it lieth in our power, either to make voyde the First grace by refusing it, or to confirme it by obediently following it. Whereas the author of the booke, of the calling of the Gentiles, doth thus express it, that it is free for them that see the judgement of reason, to depart from grace, that it may be worthy reward not to have departed, & that the thing which could not be done but by the working together of the holy Ghost, may be imputed to their merits, by whose will it was possible to have not bin done. These two things I had will to note by the way, that nowe, reader, thou mayest see how much I differ from the foundest force of the schoolemen. For I do much farther differ from the later Sophisters, even so much as they be farther gone from the ancient time. But yet somewhat, after such a force as it is, we perceiue by this division, after what maner they haue giuen Free will to man. For at length Lombard faith, that we haue not free will therefore, because we are alike able either to do or to thinke good and euill, but onely that we are free from compulsion: which freedome is not hindered, although wee be peruerse and the bondmen of sinne, and can doe nothing but sinne.

7 Therefore, man shalbe saied to haue free wil after this sort, not because he hath a free chiose as well of good as of euill, but because he doth euill by Will, and not by compulsion. That is very well said: but to what purpose was it to garnish so small a matter with so proude a title? A goodly libertic forsooth, if man be not compelled to serve sinne: so is he yet a willing servant that his will is holden fast bounde with the fetters of sinne. Truly I do abhorre hating about wordes wherewith the Church is vainely wearied: but I thinke that such wordes are with great religious carefullnes to bee taken heede of, which founde of any abfurdiety, especially where the error is hurrful. Howe fewe I pray you, are there, which when they heare that Free will is assignedit to man, do not by and by conceive, that he is lord both of his owne minde and will, and that he is able of himselfe to turne himselfe to whethet part he will? But some one will say: that peril shalbe taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather forasmuch as the wit of man is naturally bent to falsity, he will sooner conceive an error of one litle word, than a trueth out of a long tale. Of which thing we haue a more certaine experience in this very word, than is to be wished. For omitting that expostion of the old writers, all they in maner that came after, while they sticke upon the natural signification of the word, haue bin caried into a truft of themselves that bringeth them to destruction.

8 But if the authority of the fathers doe moove, they haue in deed continually word in their mouth: but they do withall declare, how much they esteeme y vse of it. First all Augustine, which sticke not to call it Bonde will. In one place he is angry with them that deny free wil: but he declareth his chiefe reason why, when he sayeth oneley, Let not any man be so bolde to deny the freedome of will, that he go about to excuse sinne. But surly in an other place he confeseth, that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghost; forasmuch as it is subiect to lustes that doe binde and conquere it.

Againe, that when will was overcome with sinne whereto it fell, nature began to want freedome. Againe, that man having ill used his free will, lost both himself & it. Againe, free will is become captive, that it can do nothing toward righteousness. Againe, that it cannot be free, which the grace of God hath not made free. Againe, that the justice of God is not fulfilled when the law commandeth, and man doth of his owne strength, but when the holy Ghost helpeth, and mans will not free, but made free by God, obeyeth. And of all these things he shortly rendereth a cause, when in another place he writeth, that man receiveth great force of free will when he was created, but he lost it by sinning. Therefore in another place, after that he had showed that free will is stablified by grace, he sharply inueth against them that take it upon them without grace. Why therefore (faith he) dare wretched men either be proud of free will before that they be made free, or of their owne strength if they be already made free? And they marke not that in the verie name of free will, is mention of freedome. But where the spirit of the Lord is, there is freedome. If then they be the bondmen of sinne, why do they boast them of free will? For of whom a man is overcome, to him he is made bond. But if they be made free, why do they boast them as of their owne worke? Are they so free, that they will not be his bond-servants, which faith: Without me ye can do nothing? Beside that also in another place he seemeth sportingly to mocke at the vse of that worde, when he sayde, that will was in deede free, but not made free, free to righteousnesse, but the bond-servant of sinne. Which saying in another place he repeated and expoundeth, that man is not free from righteousness, but by choyse of will, and from sinne he is not free but by grace of the Saviour. He that doeth testifie, that the freedome of man is nothing else but a freemaking or manumission from righteousness, seemeth trimly to mock at the vaine name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the vse of this worde with no euill signification, he shall not be troubled by mee for so doing. But because I thinke it cannot be kept without great perill, and that it shoulde turne to a great benefite to the church, if it were, abolished: neither will I my selfe vse it, and I would with other, if they aske me counsell, to forbeare it.

9 I may seeme to haue brought a great prejudice against my selfe, which haue confessed, that all the ecclesiasticall writers, except Augustine, haue spoken so doufully or diversely in this matter, that no certeintie can be had out of their writings. For some will so construe this, that I meant therefore to thrust them from giving any voyce herein, because they are all against me. As for me, I mean: it to no other end but this, that I simply and in good faith would haue godly wittes prouided for, which if they wittie vpon those mens opinions in this point, they shall alway water uncertaine. In such sort do they sometime reach, man being spoyled of all strength of free will, to flee to grace onely: sometime they furnish or seeme to furnish him with his owne armour. But it is not hard to make appeare, that in such doutfulness of speech, they nothing, or verie little esteeming mans strength, haue given the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost, if I here recite certain sentences of theirs, whereby that is plainly taught. For what meaneth that that saying of Cyprian, which Augustine so oft repealeth, that we ought to glory of nothing, because we have nothing of our own, but that man wholly deyouled in himselfe, may learne to hang al vpoun God. What meaneth that saying of Augustine and Eucherius, when they expound, that Christ is the tree of life, to whom he that reacheth his hand, shall live? and y the tree of knowledge of good & euel, is the free choice of will, wherof who so tasteth, forstaking the grace of God, he shall dye: What meaneth that of Chrysostom, that every man is naturally not onely a sinner, but also altogether finne? If we have no good thing of our owne: If man from top to toe be altogether sin: if be not lawfull to attempt how much the power of free will is able to doe, how then may it be lawfull to part the praise of a good worke betweene God & man? I could rehearse of this sort very many sayings out of other, but least any man should cauall, that I choose out those things only that make for my purpose, and do crassely leaue out such things as make against mee, therefore I doe forbeare such rehearfall. Yet this I dare affirme, howsoever they be sometime too busie in aduancing free will, y this yet was their pur-posed marke, to teach man being altogether turned away from truft of his owne power, to have his strength reposed in God alone. Nowe come I to the simple setting forth of the trueth, in considering the nature of man.

But I am here constrained to repeal that, which in the beginning of this chapter, I spake by way of preface. As any man is most discouraged and thrown downe with conscience of his owne miserie, neediness, nakednesse and flame, so hath hee best profited in knowledge of himselfe.
For there is no danger to be feared, least man will take too much from himselfe, so that hee learne, that what he wanteth is to be recovered in God, but to himselfe he can take nothing more than his own right, be it never so little, but that he shall destroy himselfe with vaine confidence, and conveying the honor of God to himselfe, become guilty of hainous sacriledge. And truely so oft as this lust invadeth our minde, y we desire to have somwhat of our own, which may rest in our selves rather then in God, let vs know y this thought is ministrd vs by no other counsellor, but by him that perswaded our first parentes, to have a will to be like vnto Gods, knowing both good and euill. If it be the word of the deuill that rafeth vp man in himselfe, let vs give no place vnto it, vnsesse we lift to take counsell of our enemy. It is pleasent in deede, for a man to haue so much strengthe of his own, y he may rest in himselfe. But that we be not allured to this vaine affiance, let so many fore sentences make vs afrayde, by which we be thrown downe: Cursed is he which trusteth in man, & letteth flesh to be his arm. Again, y God hath not pleasure in the strength of a horse, neither deliteth in the legs of man, but deliteth in them that feare him, & attend vpon his mercy. Again, that it is he which gieusth strengthe vnto him that faineth, & vnto him y hath no strengthe, he encreaseth power, even the young men shall faint and be weary, and the yong men shall stumble and fall, but they that wait vpon the Lord, shall renue their strengthe. All which sayings tend to this end, that we leane not vpon any opinion of our owne strengthe, be it never so little, if wee meane to haue God fauorable vnto vs, which resifteth the proud, & giueth Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of grace to the humble. And then againe, let these promises come into our remembrance. I will poure out water vpon the thristie, and Floudes vpon the drye ground. Againe, All ye that thrist, come vnto the waters. Which promises do testifie, that none are admitted to receive the blessings of God, but they that pine away with feeling of their owne pouertie. And such promises are not to be pasted ouer, as is that of Elay: Thou shalt haue no more sunne to shine by day, neither shal the brightnesse of the Moone shine vnto thee: for the Lord shall be thine everlastinge light, & the God thy glory. The Lord in deede doth not take away the shining of the Sunne or Moone from his seruantes, but because he will himselfe alone appeare glorious in them, hee calleth their confidence far away, euen from those things, that are counted in their opinion most excellent.

11 Truely, that saying of Chryfoftome hath alway exceedingly well pleased me, that the foundation of our Wisdome is humility: but yet more that saying of Augustine, As (fayth he) that same Rhetorician being asked, what was the first thing in the rules of eloquence, answered Pronunciation: and what was the second, he aunswered Pronunciation: and what was the thirde, he aunswered Pronunciation: so if one ask mee of the rules of Christian religion, the Firft, the Second, and Thirde time, and alwayes I would answere Humilitie. But he meaneth not humilitie, when a man knowing some little vertue to be in himselfe, abstaineth from pride and haughtinesse of minde, but when he truely feeleth himselfe to bee such a one, as hath no refuge but in humilitie: as in another place he declareth. Lette no man (fayth he) flatter himselfe: of his owne he is a deuill. That thing whereby he is blessed, he hath of God onely. For what haft thou of thine owne, but sinne? Take away from thee sinne which is thine owne, for righteousness is Gods. Againe, why is the possibility of nature so presumed on? it is wounded, maymed, troubled and loft, it needeth a true confession, and not a falle defence. Againe, when every man knoweth that in himselfe he is nothing, and of himselfe he hath no helpe, his weapons in himselfe are broken, the warres are ceas'd. But it is needesfull, that all the weapons of wickednesse be broken in sunder, shiuered in peeces and burnt, that thou remaine vnarmed and haue no helpe in thy selfe. Howe much more weake thou art in thy selfe, so much the more the Lorde receiueth thee. So vpon the three fcour and tenne Psalme hee forbiddeth vs to remember our owne righteousness, that wee may acknowledge the righteousness of God: and he sheweth that God doth so commend his grace vnto vs, that we may knowe our selues to be nothing, that we stande onely by the mercie of GOD, when of our selues we are nothing but euill. Let vs not therefore striue here with God for our right, as if that were withdrawn from our saluation which is gien to him. For as our humblenesse is his hienesse, so the confession of our humblenesse hath his mercy ready for remedy. Neither yet do I require that man not convinced should willingly yeeld himselfe: nor if he hath any power, that he should turne his minde from it, to bee subdued vnto true humilitie. But that laying away the diseafe of selfe loue and desire of victorie, wherewith being blinded, hee thinketh too highly of himselfe, he shoule well consider himselfe in the true
And the common saying which they have borrowed out of Augustine pleaseth me well, that the natural gifts were corrupted in man by sinne, and of the supernatural he was made empyre. For in this latter part of supernatural gifts, they understand as well the light of faith as of righteousness, which were sufficient to the attaining of heavenly life and eternal felicity. Therefore banishing himselfe from the kingdom of God, he was also deprifed of the spiritual gifts, wherewith he had been furnished to the hope of eternal salvation. Whereupon followeth, that he is so banished from the kingdom of God, that all things that belong to the blessed life of the soule are extinguished in him, untill by grace of regeneration he recover them. Of that sort are faith, the love of God, charity toward our neighbours, the studie of holinesse and righteousness. All these things, because Christ restorthe them unto us, are counted things comming from another to vs, and beside nature, and therefore we gather that they were once taken away. Again, soundnesse of the understanding minde and vprightnesse of heart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of natural gifts. For though there remaine somewhat left of understanding and judgement together with will, yet can we not say, that our understanding is found and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darkenes. And as for our will, the peruerse ones thereof is more than sufficiently known. Sith therefore reason, whereby a man discerneth betwene good and euill, whereby he understandeth and judgeth, is a natural gift, it could not be altogether destroyed, but it was partly weakened, partly corrupted, so that soule ruines thereof appeare. In this sense doth John say, that the light thineth yet in darknesse, but the darknesse comprehended it not. In which words both things are plainly expressed, that in the peruerse & degendred nature of man, there thineth yet some sparks that shew that he is a creature having reason, and that he differeth from brute beastes, because he is endued with understanding, and yet that this light is choaked with great thickenesse of ignorance, that it can not effectuallly gette abroade. So will, because it is inseparable from the nature of man, penthed not, but was bound to perturbe desires, that it can etuer no good thing. This in deede is a full definition, but yet such as needeth to be made plaine with more wordes. Therefore, that the order of our talk may proceede according to that first distinction, wherein we divided the soule of man into understanding and will, let vs first examine the force of understanding. So to condemn it of perpetuall blindenesse, that a man leasse vnto it no manner of skill in any kindes of thinges, is not onely against the worde of God, but also against the experience of common reason. For we see that there is planted in man a certaine desire to search out truth, to which he would not aspire at all, but hauing felt some favour thereof before. This therefore is some light of mans understanding, that he is naturally drawn with love of truth, the neglecting whereof, in brute beastes produceth a grosse sense without reason, albeit, this little desire, such as it is, fainteth before it entereth the beginning of her race, because it by and by fallenth into vanities. For the witte of man can not for dulnesse keepe the right way to search out truth.
truth, but strayeth in diverse errors, and as it were grooping in darkness, oftentimes stumbleth, till at length it wander and vanisheth away; so in seeking truth, it doeth betray howe untruth it is to seeke and finde truth. And then it is sore troubled with an other vanity, that oftentimes it discerneth not those things, to the true knowledge whereof it were expedient to bend to itselfe, and therefore it tormenteth itselfe with fonde curiosity, in searching out th' things superfluous and nothing worth; and to things most necessary to be known, it either taketh no heed, or negligently or feeldome turneth, but scarce at any time applieth her studie earnestly vnto them. Of which peruerfenesse, whereas the prophane writers doe commonly complain, it is found, that all men haue entangled themselves with it. Wherefore Salomon in all his Ecclesiastes, when hee had gone through all these studies, in which men thinke themselves to bee very wise, yet he pronounceth that they are all vaine and trifling.

Yet doe not all travailes of Witte so alway become void, but that it attaineth somewhat, specially when it bendeth it selfe to these inferior things. Yea and it is not so blockish, but that it tasteth also some little of the hier things, howefore it more negligently apply the searching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceiving. For when it is carried vppe aboue the compasse of this present life, then is it principally concluded of her owne weakenesse. Wherefore, that we may the better see howe farre according to the degrees of her ability, it proceedeth in euery thing, it is good that I putte forth a distinction. Let this therefore be the distinction, that there is one understanding of earthly things, another of heavenly things. Earthly things I call those that do not concerne God and his Kingdom, true righteousness, and the blessednesse of eternal life, but haue all their respect and relation to this present life, and are as it were contained within the bounds thereof. Heavenly things, I call the pure knowledge of God, the order of true righteousness, and the mysteries of the heavenly kingdom. Of the first fort are policie, gouernance of householde, all handy craftes, and liberaall Sciences. Of the second fort are the knowledge of GOD and Gods will, and the rule to frame our life according to it. Concerning the first, this we must confesse, because man is a creature by nature gien to live in companies together; he is also by natural instinct bent to chearifie and to preserve the fellowship of these companies, therefore wee see that there are in the mindes of all men innumerall impressions of a certaine cuill honestie and order. Hereby it commeth to passe, that there is found no man that understandeth not, that all companies of men ought to be kept in order with lawes, and that conceiue not in his minde the principles of these lawes. Hereof commeth that same perpetuall consent, as well of all nations as of all men vsnto lawes, because the seeds thereof are naturally planted in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I wyse not the diffensions and fightinges that afterward arise while some desyre to peruerse lawe and right, the loose absolute gouernement of Kinges, that lust straieh abroade in stead of right, as theewes and robbers, some some (which is a fault more than common) thinke that to be vniust, which other haue stablishvd for iust: and on the other side stifferly say, that to bee laudable, which other haue forbidden. For these men doe not therefore hate lawes, because they doe not knowe that lawes are good and holy, but for that they raging with headie iust, doe fight against manifest reason, and for their fault doe abhorre that, which in under standing of minde they allowe. The latter sorte of it striving in such, that taketh not awaye the first concerning of equitie. For when men do strive among themselves, concerning the pointes of lawes, they agree together in a certaine summe of equitie. Wherein is proved the weaknesses of mans wit, which even then when it seemeth to follow the right way, yet halteh and staggereth, but stil this remaineth true, that there is found in all men a certaine seede of politike order. And that is a large profe, that in the ordering of this life, no man is voide of the light of reason.

14 Now doe followe the artes, both the liberall, and the handie craftes, in learning whereof, because there is in vs all a certaine aptnesse, in them also doeth appeare the force of mans witte: but albeit, all men be not apt to learne them all, yet is this a token certayne enough of the common naturall power, that there is almost no man founde, whose conceite of witte doeth not in some arte or other shewe forth it selfe. Neither haue they onely a power or facultie to learne, but also to devisse in euerie arte some newe thing, either to amplifie or make perfecter that which hath beene learned of an other that went before, which thing, as it moued Plato erroneously to teach, that such conceyuing is nothing else, but a calling to remembrance, so by good reason it ought to compell vs to confess, that the beginning thereof is naturally planted in the witte of man. These poynthes therefore doe plainly testifie, that there is giuen to men naturally an vniuersall conceyuing of reason and of understanding. Yet is it so an vniuersall benefite, that therein euerie man ought for himselfe to acknowledge the peculiar grace of <GOD>. To which thankfulnessse the creator himselfe doeth sufficiency awake vs, when hee createth naturall fooles, in whom hee maketh vs to se with what giftes mans soule excelleth, if it bee not endued with his lighthe, which is so naturall in all men, that it is yet altogether a free gift of his liberalitie towards euerie man. But the inuention and orderly teaching of the same artes, or a more inwarde and excellent knowledge of them which is proper but to a fewe, is no perfecte argument of the common conceyuing of wit, yet because without difference it happeneth to the godlie and vn godlie, it is rightfully reckned among naturall giftes.

Ghost cannot be set light by, without contempt and reproach of himselfe: And what? Shall we deny that the truth shined to the old Lawyers, which haue set forth Civil order and Discipline with so great equitie? Shall we say that the Philosophers were blinde both in that exquisite contemplation, and cunning description of nature? Shall we say that they had no wit, which by setting in order the art of speach, haue taught vs to speake with reason? Shall we say that they were madde, which in setting foroth Phisicke, haue employed their diligence for vs. What of all the Mathematicall sciences? shall we thinke them doing errors of madde men? no, rather we can not reade the writing of the olde men, concerning these things, without great admiration of their wit. But shall wee thinke any thing praiie worthie or excellent, which we doe, not reknowledge to come of God? Let vs be ashamed of so great unthankfulnesse into which the heathen Poetes fell not, which confessed that both Philosophie and Lawes, and all good artes, were the inventions of Gods. Sith then it appeareth that these men whome the scripture calleth naturall men, were of so sharpe and deepe sight in searching out of inferior things, let vs learne by such examples, howe many good things the Lorde hath left to the nature of man, after that it hath beene spoile of the true God.

16 But in the meane time yet let vs not forget, that these are the most excellent good giftes of the spirite of God, which for the common benefite of mankinde hie dealthe abroad to whome it pleaseth him. For it behoveth, that the vnderstanding and skil that was required for the framing of the tabernacle, shoulde bee powred into Befeelel and Oliab by the spirite of God, it is no maruell if the knowledge of those things which are most excellent in mans life, be vayne to bee communieated vnto vs by the spirite of God. Neither is there cause why any man should ask, what haue vs wicked to doe with Gods spirite, which are altogether estranged from God. For where it is saide that the spirite of God dwelleth in the faithfull onely, that is to be vnderstanded of the spirite of sanctification, by the which we are confecrate to God himselfe, to bee his temples: yet doeth hee neverthelesse fill, move and quicken all things with the virtue of the same spirite, and that according to the propertie of cuerie kinde which he hath giuen to it by law of creation. If it haue beene the Lordes will that we shoulde bee helpen by the trauell and service of the wicked in naturall Philosophie, Dialecticke, the Mathematicall knowledges, and other: let vs see it, leafte if wee neglect the giftes of God, willingly offered in them, wee suffer justie punishment for our thoughtfullnesse. But leaft any shoulde thinke a man to bee blessed, when vnder the elementes of this worlde there is granted vnto him so great an abilitie to conceive truth, it is also to bee added that all this power to vnderstande, and the vnderstanding that followeth thereof, is a vanishing and transientie thing before God, where is not a steedfast foundation of truth. For Augustine reacheth most truerlie, whom (as we haue faide) the Mafter of the Sentences, and the other Scholmen are compelled to assent vnto, as the free giftes were taken from man after his fall, to these naturall giftes which remained, were corrupted. Not that they be defiled of themselues in as much as they come from God, but because they they cease to be pure to a defiled man, that he should have no praise of the.

17 Let this be the summe: that it is seen, that in all manke, is reason which is proper to our nature, which maketh vs to differ from brute beasts, as brute beasts doe differ in fente from thingses without life. For whereas there be borne certaine natural fools and idiots, that default of sense not the generall grace of God: But rather by such fite we are put in mind, that what is left unto our felues, ought fully to bee ascribed to the kindnesse of God, because if he had not spared vs, our rebellion had drewne with it the dettruction of our whole nature. But whereas some doe excell in sharpenesse of conceit, some other doe paffe in judgement, some have a quicker wit to learne this or that arte: in this varietie GOD setteth forth his grace vnto vs, that no man should claim to himselfe as his owne, that which floweth from Gods meere liberalitie. For how becommeth one more excellent than another but that in common nature might appeare: above other the special grace of God, which in omitting many, faith openly that it is bound to none. Beside that, God poureth in singular motions, according to the calling of every man, of which thing we meete with many examples in the books of the Judges, where it is said, that the spirit of the Lord clad them, whom he called to rule the people. Finally, in every noble act there is a special instruction. By which reason the strong men followed Saul, whose hearts the Lord had touched, and when his miniftring in the kingdom was prophesied of, Samuel faide thus: The spirit of the Lord shall come vpon thee, and thou shalt be an other man. And this was continued to the whole course of government: as after it is spoken of David, that the spirit of the Lord came vpon him from that day forward. But the same is spoken in another place as touching particular motions: yea in Homer men are faide to excell in witte, not only as Jupiter hath dealt to every man, but also as the time required. And truely experience teacheth, while many times such men stand amased as were most sharp and deepe witted, that the wittes of men are in the hande and will of God to rule them at every moment: for which reason it is said, that he taketh wit from the wife, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diversitie we see remaining some marks of the image of God, which doe make difference betwene al mankeinde and other creatures.

18 Now is to be declared what mans reason feeth, when it commeth to the kingdom of God, and to that spiritual insight, which consistseth chiefly in three things: to know God, and his fatherly fauour toward vs, where in our saluation standeth: and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his lawe. Both in the first two, and in the second, properly they that are most wittie, are blinder than molles. I denie not that there be here and there read in Philosophers, concerning God, many things well and aptly spoken, but yet such as doe alway fauour of a certaine giddie imagination. The Lord gave them in deed, as is above said, a little raft of his godhead, that they should not pretend ignorance to colour their vngodliness: and many times he moved them to speake many things, by confession whereof themselves might be convinced: But they so fawe the things that they saw, that by such seeing they were not directed to the truthe, much leffe did attaine.

unto it, like as a wayfaring man in the midst of the field, for a sodaine moment, feeth faire and wide the glistering of lightening in the night time, but with such a quickly vanishing light, that hee is sooner couered againe with the darkenesse of the night, than he can stirre his foot, so far is it of that he can be brought into his way by such a helpe. Beside that, those small droppes of truth, wherewith as it were by chance, they sprinkle their bookes, with how many and how monstruous lies are they defiled? Finally, they neuer so much as smelled that assurednesse of Gods good will toward vs, without which mans witse must needs be filled with infinite confusion. Therefore mans reason neither approcheth, nor goeth toward, nor once directeth sight vnto this truth, to understand who is the true God, or what a one he will be toward vs.

19 But because we being drunke with a false persuasion of our owne deepe insight, doe very hardly suffer our selues to be persaued, that in matters of God it is vterly blinde and dull: I think it shalbe better to confirme it by testimonies of Scripture, than by reasons. This doth John very well teach in that place which I even now allcaged, when he writeth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the same life which should bee the lightes of men, and that the light did shine in darkenesse, and the darkenesse comprehended it not. He sheweth in deccde, that mans foule is lightened with the brightness of Gods light, so that it is neuer altogether without some small flame, or at least some parcle of it, but yet, that with such a light he comprehended not God. And why so? because mans quicknesse of witte, as toward the knowledge of God, is but meere darkenesse. For when the holy Ghost calleth men darkenesse, he at once spoileth them of all abilitie of spiritual understanding. Therefore he affirmeth, that the faithfull which embrace Christ, are borne not of blood, or of the will of the fleshe, or of man, but of God. As if he should say: flesh is not capable of so his wisdom to conceite God and that which is Gods, vnlesse it be lightened with the spirit of God. As Christ testified, that this was a speciall ruelation of the father, that Peter did know him.

20 If we were persaued of this which ought to be out of all controversy, that our nature wanteth all that, which our heauenly father giueth to his elect by the spirit of regeneration, then here were no matter to doubt upon. For thus speaketh the faithfull people in the Prophet: For with thee is the fountaine of life, and in thy light we shall see light. The Apostle testifieth the same thing, when he faith y no man can call Iesus the Lord, but in y holy Ghost. And John Baptift seeing the dulnesse of his disciples, cryeth out, that no man can receive any thing, vnlesse it be given him from aboue. And that he meaneth by giue a speciell illumination, and not a common gift of nature, appeareth hereby, y he complaineth that in so many words as he had spoken to commend Christ to his Disciples, he prevaileth nothing. I see (faith he) that words are nothing to informe mens minde concerning divine things, vnlesse the Lord giue understanding by his spirit: Yea and Moses, when he reprocheth the people, with theirs forgetfulness, yet noteth this withall, that they can by no meanes grow wise in the mysteries of God, but by the benefite of GOD. Thine eies (faith he) have seen those those great tokens and wonders, and, The Lord hath not given thee a heart to understand, nor ears to hear, nor eyes to see. What should he express more, if hee called vs blockes in considering the worke of God? Whereupon the Lorde by the Prophete promiseth for a great grace, that hee will giue the Israelites a heart, that they may knowe him: signifying thereby, that mans wit is onely so much spiritually wise, as it is lightened by him.

Therefore he could not better shew what our power is to knowe GOD, than when hee faith, that wee haue no eyes to see his image, where it is so openly set present before vs. What? came he not into the earth for this purpose, to declare his Fathers will vnto men? And did hee not faithfully doe his office? Yes surely. But yet nothing is wrought by his preaching, vnlesse the inwarde scholemaster, the holy Ghost, set open the way to our minds. Therefore none come to him, but they that haue hearde and beene taught of the Father. What manner way of learning and hearing is this? Even, when the holy Ghost by marvellous and singular vertue formeth the cares to heare, and the mindes to vnderstande. And least that should feeme straunge, hee alleageth the Prophecie of Esay, where when he promiseth the repairing of the Church, that they which shall be gathered together to salvation, shall be taught of the Lorde. If God there foresheweth some peculiar thing concerning his electes, it is evident that hee speaketh not of any kind of learning that was also common to the wicked and vngodly. It remaineth therefore that wee must vnderstande it thus, that the way into the kingdom of God is open to no man, but to him to whom the holy ghost by his enlightning shal make a new minde. But Paul speaketh most plainly of all, which of purpose entring into discourse of this matter, after hee had condemned all mens wiSdom of follie and vanitie, & vterly brought it to naught, at the last concludeth thus: that § natural man can not perceive those things that are of the spirite of God: they are foolishnes vn to him, and he cannot vnderstande them, because they are spiritually judged. Whome doeth he call natural? Even him that stayeth vpon the light of nature. Hee I say comprehendeth nothing in the spirittual mysteries of God. Why so? is it because by slouthefullnesse he negleggeth it? Nay, rather although he woulde trauell never so much, hee can doe nothing, because forsooth they are spiritually judged. What meaneth that, because being vterly hidden from the sight of man, they are opened by the onely revelation of the spirite: so that they are reckened for follie where the spirite of God giueth not light. Before he had announced those things that God hath prepared for them that love him, above the capacitie of eyes, eares & mindes. Yea he testifieth that mans wisdome was as a certaine veil, whereby mans minde was kept from seeing God, What meaneth wee? The Apostle pronounceth, that the wisdome of this worlde is made follie by God: & shal we forsooth giue vnto it sharpenes of understanding, whereby it may pærce to the secret places of § heavencly kingdom? Fare be such beastlines fro vs.
And so that which here he taketh away from men, in another place in a prayer, he giueth it to God alone. God (faith he) and the father of glory giueth to you the spirit of wisedome and revelation. Nowe thou hearest that all wisedome and revelation is the gift of God. What followeth? and lighten the eyes of your minde. Surely if they need a newe revelation, then are they blinde of themselves. It followeth after: That ye may know what is the hope of your calling. &c. Therefore he confesseth, that the wittes of men are not capable of so great understanding, to knowe their owne calling. And let not some Pelagian babble here, for God doth reme ride that dulness or vnskillfullnese, when by the doctrine of his wordes hee directly mens understanding, whither without a guide hee coulde not have attreynd. For David had a lawe, wherein was comprehended all the wisedome that may bee desired, and yet not contented with that, hee requireth to haue his eyes opened, that hee may consider the mysteries of the same lawe. By which speech truely he secretly faith, that the sunne riseth uppon the earth where the wordes of God shineth to men: but they get not much thereby, vntil hee himselye, that is therefore called the father of lightes, doe giue them or open their eyes, because wherefo euerm hee shineth not with his spirit, all thinges are possetled with darkenesse. So the Apostles were well and largely taught by the best scholmastery: yet if they had not needed the spirit of truth to instruct their minde in that same doctrine which they had hearde before, hee would not haue bidden them looke for him. If the thing that we aske of God, we do thereby confesse that we want: and God in that that hee promiseth it vs, doeth argue our neede, let no man doubt to confesse that he is so much able to understande the mysteries of God as he is enlightened with his grace. He that giueth to himselye more understanding, is so much the more blinde, for that hee doeth not acknowledge his owne blindnesse.

Nowe remaineth the thirde pointe, of knowing the rule of well framing of life, which wee doe rightly call the knowledge of the worke of righteousnesse, wherein mans wit is meteth to bee of somewhat more sharpe sight, then in the other two before. For the Apostle testifiseth, that the gentiles which haue no lawe, while they doe the worke of the lawe, are to themselves instead of a lawe, and doe shewe the lawe written in their harts, their consciences bearing them wittnes, and their thoughtes accusinge them within themselves or excusinge them before the judgement of God. If the Gentiles haue righteousnes naturally graven in their minde, surely we cannot say that we are altogether blinde in the order of life. And nothing is more common, than that man by the lawe natural, of which ye Apostle speakes in that place, is sufficiently instructed to a righte rule of life. But let vs weye to what purpose this knowledge of the lawe is planted men: then it shall by and by appeare, howe farre it bringeth them toward the marke of reason and truth. The same is also evident by the wordes of Paul, if a man doe marke the placing of them. Hee had delayd a little before, that they which sinned in the lawe, are judged by the lawe, they that haue sinned without lawe doe perish without lawe. Because this might seeme vnrea sonable, that the Gentiles should perish without any judgement going before, he by and by addeth, that their conscience is to them in stead of a law, and therefore is sufficient for their just damnation. Therefore the end of the law natural is, that man may be made incapable. And it shall be defined not ill after this sort, that it is a knowledge of conscience, that sufficiently differenceth between just and unjust, to take away from men the pretence of ignorance, while they are probed guilty by their own testimony. Such is the tenderness of man toward him selfe, that in doing of evils, he always turneth away his mind so much as he may from the feeling of sinne. By which reason it seemeth that Plato was moved to thinke that there is no sin done but by ignorance. That in deed were fitly said of him, if mens hypocrisie went so farre in hiding of vices, that the minde might not know it selfe guilty before God. But when the sinner seeking to elude the judgement empiinted in him, is now & then drawn backe vnto it, and not suffereth so to winke, but that he be compelled whether he wil or no, sometime to open his eyes: it is falsely said that he finneth onely by ignorance.

23 Themistius faith more truly, which teachteth vnder standing is sel- dome deceived:that it is blindnesse when it goeth any further, that is, when he commeth down to the special case. Every man, if it be generally asked, will affirm, that manslaughter is evil: but he confirseth to kill his enimies, deliberateth vpon it, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemn adulterie, but in his owne, privately he will flatter himselfe. This is ignorance, when a man coming to the special case forgetteth the rule, that he had lately agreed vpon in the general question. Of which thing Augustine difcourseth very finely in his exposition of the first verse of the lvij. Psalm: albeit the same thing is not continual. For sometime the shamefulness of the evil deepe do pretseth the conscience, that not deceiving him selfe vnder false resemblance of a good thing, but wittingly & willingly he runneth into evil. Out of which affection came these sayings: I see the better & allow it, but I follow the worse. Wherefore, me thinketh, Aristotle hath very aptly made distinction betweene Incontinence and Temperance. Where incontinence reigneth, he faith, that there by reason of troubled affection or passion, knowledge is taken away from the minde, that it maketh not the evil in his owne act, which it generally feeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repentance immediately followeth. But temperance is not extinguished or broken by feeling of sinne, but on the other side obstinately standeth still in her conceived choice of euell.

24 Now when thou hearest judgment vniuercally named in the difference of good and euell, thinke it not euery sound and perfect judgement. For if mens hearts are furnished with choice of just and unjust, only to this end, that they should not pretend ignorance, it is not then needful to see the truth in euery thing. But it is enough, and more, that they understand so farre that they cannot escape away, but being consuited by witness of their conscience, they even now already begin to tremble at the judgement seat of God. And if we wil trie our reason by the law of God, which is the exampler of true righteousnesse, we shall find how many ways it is blind. Truely it attaineth not at all to those that are the chief thvgngs in the first table, as of confidence in God, of giving to him the praise of strength and riches righteounesse, What soule ever by natural sense did smell out, that the lawfull worshipping of God consisteth in these things? For when profane men will worship God, although they be called away an hundred times from their vaine trifles, yet they alwaies slide backe thither againe. They deny in deed that sacrifices do please God, yet there be adiomed a purenesse of minde whereby they declare, that they concieve somewhat of the spiritual worshipping of God, which yet they by and by corrupt with false inventions. For it can never be perfuaded them, that all is true that the law prescribeth of it. Shall I say, that that wit excelleth in any sharp understanding, which can neither of it selfe be wise, nor harken to teaching? In the commandments of the Second table it hath some more understanding, by so much as they came nearer to the preseruation of civil fellowship among men. Albeit euery herein also it is found many times to faile. To euery excellent nature it feemeth most vnreasonable, to suffer an vnjust, & too imperious a maner of governing over them, if by any meane he may put it away: and the judgement of mans reason is none other, but that it is the part of a ferteile & base courage, to suffer it patiently: and againe, the parte of an honest & free borne heart, to shake it off. And revenge of injuries is reckened for no fault among the Philosophers, But the Lord condemning that too much noblenesse of courage, commanded his to keepe the same patience that is so ill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the lawes, our understanding marketh not desire of minde at all. For a natural man suffereth not himselfe to be brought to this, to acknowledge the diseases of his desires. The light of nature is choked vp, before that it come to the first entrie of this bottomlesse depth. For when the Philosophers note immoderate motions of minde for faults, they meane those motions that appere and shew forth themselves by grofe tokens, but they make no accompt of those cuil desires that do gently tickle the minde.

25 Wherefore, as Plato was worthily found fault with all before, for that he imputed all sinnes to ignorance, so is their opinion to be resiected, which teach that purposed malice and frowardnesse is vised in all sinnes. For we finde it too much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reason is overwhelmed with so many sordes of being deceived, is subject to so many errors, stumbleth at so many stayes, is entangled with so manye straitnesse, that it is farre from sure directing. But how little it is esteemed before the Lord in all partes of our life, Paul sheweth when he layeth, that we are not sufficient to think any thing of our selues, as of our selues. Hee speaketh not of wil or affection, but he taketh also this away from vs, that we should not thinke that it can come in our minde how any thing is to be done well. Is our diligence, insight, understanding, and heede so corrupted, that it can Denise or thinke upon nothing that is right before the Lord? that feemeth too hard to vs, that do unwillingly suffer our selues to be spoyle of the sharpe beste of reason, which we accompt a most precious gift. But to the holy Ghoft it feemeth most full of equitie, which knoweth that all the thoughts of wise men are vaine, and which pronounce eth plainly, that all the invention of mans heart is onely vaine. If all that our witt conceiued, deu-

Nuniseth vpon, purposeth and goeth about, is alway euill, how can it come in our minde to purpose that which pleaseth God, to whom eoyly holines and righteousnesse is acceptable? So is it to be scene, that the reason of our mind, which way so ever it tume it selfe, is miserably subject to vanitie. David knew this weakenesse in him selfe, when he prayed to haue understanding giuen him, to learne the Lordes commandements aright. For he secretly fayth therein, that his owne wise sayeth him not, which desireth to have a new giuen him. And that he doth not eonely once, but almost tenne times, in one Psalm, he repebeth the same prayer. By which repebeth he principally declareth, with how great neede he is driven to pray it. And that which he prayeth for him selfe alone, Paul commonly vieth to pray for the Churches. We cease not (faith he) to pray for you, and to desyre that ye may be filled with the knowledge of God in all wisdome and spirittuall understanding, that ye may walke worthy of God. etc. But so oft as he maketh that thing the good gift of God, let vs remember, he doth withall telles, that it lieth not in mans power. And Augustine forsooth acknowledgeth this deuault of reason to understand those things that are of God, that he thinketh the grace of illumination to be no lesse necessarie for our mindes, than the light of the funne is for our eyes. And not conuenent with y, he addeth a correction of that, saying, that we lefte vp our eyes to see the light, but the eies of our mind lie shut, vntele the Lord open them. And the Scripture teacheth that our mindes are not enlightened one day alone, that they may afterward see by themselves: for that which I euen now alleged out of Paul, belongeth to continual procedinges and encreaseinges. And this doth David expressely set out in these wordes: With my whole heart I haue sought thee, make me not to stay from thy commandements. For when he had bene re-generated, and had not slenderly profited in true Godlienesse, yet he confesseth, that for every moment he needeth continual direction, lest he should swarue from the knowledge wherewith he is endued. Therefore, in another place he prayeth to haue the right spiritu reued, which he had lost by his owne faulte, because it belongeth to the same G O D to restore vnto vs the same thing being lost for a time, which himselfe gave at the beginning. 26 Nowe is will to be examined, whether standeth the cheshe libertie of free choise, for it hath bin already scene, that choise dooth rather belong to will, than to understanding. First, y this thing which the Philosophers haue taught, & is received with common consent, that is, y all things by natural instinct desire that which is good, may not seeme to belong to y vp rightnesse of mans will: Let vs marke that the force of free wil, is not to be considered in such appetite, as rather proceedeth of y inclination of the essence, than of the aduiment of the understanding minde. For euen the scholemen doe confess, that free will hath no action, but when reason uneth it selfe to objects, whereby they meaneth that the object of appetite must be such, as may be subject to choise, and goe before deliberation, which prepareth the way for choise. And truely, if a man consider what is the natural desire of good in man, he shall finde that it is common to him with beasts. For they also desire to be well, and when any shew of good appeareth that moveth their sense, they followe it. But man doth neither choise by reason, y he may folow with diligence that thing which is in deede good for him, according to the excellencie of his immortall nature, nor taketh reason to counsel, nor bendeth his minde, but without reason, without counsel, like a beast, followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedome of will, if a man by senfe of nature be caried to desire that which is good: but this is requisite, that he discerne good by right reason, and when he hath known it, that he chose it, and when he hath chosen it, that he follow it. But leaft any man should doubt, there is to be noted a double sophistical argument. For appetite is not here called the proper maner of will, but a naturall inclination: and good is called not as of vertue or justice, but of estate, as we say: This man is well, or in good case. Finally, although a man do neuer so much desire to attaine that is good, yet he followeth it not. As there is no man to whom eternal bleffe is not pleafant, yet is there none that aspireth vnto it, but by the moving of the holy Ghost. Wherefore, fith the naturall desire in men to be well, maketh nothing to proue the freedome of will, no more than in metals and stones, doth the affection inclining to the perfection of their substance: let vs consider in other thinges, whether Will be so infected and corrupted in all partes, that it engendreth nothing but euill: or whether it keepeth still any parcel vnhurt, from whence do growe good desires.

27 They that do attribute to the firft grace of God, that we will effectually, see me on the other side to say secretly, that there is in the soule a power of it selfe to aspire to good, but it is so weake, that it can not growe to a perfect affection, or raife vp any endured. And there is no doubt that the scholemen haue commonly embraced this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certaine of the olde writers; for somuch as they are wont to consider man in pure naturall thinges, (as they terme it) such a one as the Apostle describeth him in these wordes: I do not the good y I would, but the euill that I would not, that I doe. To will is present vnto me, but to performe it, I find not. But after this maner is the discourse y Paul there followeth, altogether wrongfully perverted. For he entreateth of the Christi-an wafeling (which he shortly toucheth to the Galatians) which the faithfull continually feele within themselves, in the battell of the flesh & the spirit. But the spirit is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the Apostle doth there speake of the regenerate, appeareth by this, y when he had sayd, that there dwelleth no goodnesse in him, he addeth an exposition, y he meaneth it of his flesh. And therefore he saith, that it is not he that doth the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in me, that is, in my flesh? Even as much as if he had faide thus: God dwelleth not in me of my selfe, for there is no good to be founde in my flesh. Hereupon foloweth that maner of excuse: I my selfe doe not the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in me. Which excuse belongeth onely to the regenerate, which doe with the chief part of their soule tende vnto good. Nowe, the conclusion that is adjoyned after, declareth all this matter evidently. I am de-lected (faith he) with the lawe, according to the inward man. But I see an other lawe in my members, fighting against the lawe of my minde. Who hath such a strauning in himself, but he that being regenerate by the spirit of God, carieth carieth the leauings of his flesh about with him? Therefore Augustine, whereas once he had thought, that that had beene spoken of the nature of man, reuoked his exposition as false, and all agreeing together. And truely, if we allow this, that men without grace haue some motions to good, though they be but small, what shall we answere to the Apostle which layeth, that wee are not sufficient so much as to thinke any good? What shall wee answere to the Lorde that pronounceth by Moses, that every intention of mans heart is onely euill? Wherefore, Sith they haue stumblid by false taking of one place, there is no cause why we should stay vppon their judgement. Let rather this sayyng of Christ preuaile. He that doeth sinne, is the seruant of sinne. We are all sinners by nature, therefore we be all Holden under the yoke of sinne. Nowe if whole man be subiect to the dominion of sinne, then must it needes be, that the will it selfe which is the chiefe seate thereof, be bound fast with most straignt bondes. For otherwise the sayyng of Paul would not stande together, that it is God which worketh will in vs, if any will did go before the grace of the Holy ghost. Away therefore with all that many haue triullingly spoken concerning preparation. For although sometime the faithfull do praye to haue their heart formed to the obedience of the lawe, as Dauuid doeth in many places: yet it is to be noted, that euens that desire of praying is from God. Which we may gather of his wordes, for when he wisseth to haue a cleane heart created within him, surely he taketh not on him selfe the beginning of creation. Therefore lerther this sayyng of Augustine haue place with vs: God will preuent thee in all things: And sometime preuent thou his wrath. Howe? Confesse that thou hauest all these thinges of God, that what so euer good thou haue, is of him: what soeuer euill, it is of thy selfe. And a little after: Nothing is ours but sinne.

That out of the corrupt nature of man prooedeth nothing but damnable.

But man cannot be any way better knowne in either part of his soule, than if he come fouerth with his titles wherewith the Scripture dooth set him out. If he be painted whole in these wordes of Christ, That which is borne of flesh, is flesh: as it is easie to prooue, then is he prooued to be a verie miserable creature. For the affections of the flesh, as the Apostle witnesseth, is death, for as much as it is enmity against God, and so is not subiect, nor can be subiect to the law of God. Is flesh so perturbe, that with all her affections shee continually vseth enmity against God: that she cannot agree with the rightousnesse of the law of God? Finally, that she can bring fouerth nothing but matter of death? Nowe, graunt that in the nature of man is nothing but flesh, and gather any good out of it if thou canst. But (they say) the name of flesh belongeth onely to the sensuall, and not the higher parte of the soule. But that is sufficiently confounded by the wordes of Christ, and of the Apostle. It is the Lordes argument, that man must bee borne againe, because he is flesh. He commandeth not to be borne againe, according to the body. But in minde he is not borne againe, if a parte of it be amended, but when it is all renewed. And that doeth the comparison, set in both places, conforme. For the spirite is so compared against the fleshe, that there is left no meane thing betweene them. Therefore whatsoever is not spirituall in man, is after the same reason called fleshy. But wee haue nothing of the Spirit but by regeneration. It is therefore fleshe whatsoever wee haue of nature. But of that matter, if of otherwise we could haue any doubt, that is taken away from vs by Paul, whereafter he had described the olde man, whom he had said to be corrupt with concupiscences of error, he biddeth vs to be renewed in the spirite of our minde: you see he doth not place vnlawfull and euill lustes onely in the seruiciue part, but also in the very minde, and therefore requireth a renewing of it. And truely a little before he had painted out such an image of mans nature, as did shewe that there was no part wherein we were not corrupted and peruered: for whereas he writeth that all nations doe walke in the vanitie of their minde, are darkened in understanding, estranged from the life of God, by reason of the ignorance that is in them, and the blindenesse of their heart: it is no doubt that this is spoken of all them whom the Lorde hath not reformed to the righteousness both of his wisedome and justitie: which is also made more plaine by the comparison by and by adioyned, where he putteth the faithfull in minde, that they haue not so learned Christ. For of these worde we gather, that the grace of Christ is the onely remedie whereby we are deliuered from that blindenesse, and the euils that ensueth thereof. For so had Efaie also prophesied of the kingdome of Christ, when he promiseth, \\nthat the Lorde should be an everlafting light to his Church, when yet darkenesse covered the earth, and a mift the peoples. Whereas he teftifieth, that the light of God shall arise onely in the Church, truely without the Church he leaueth nothing but darkenesse and blindenesse. I will not rehearse particularlie such things as are written euerie where, specially in the Pfalmes and in the Prophetes against the vanitie of man. It is a great thing that Davi did writeth, if he be weyed with vanitie, that he shall be vayne, more than vanitie it selfe. His wit is wounded with a greevous weapon, when all the thoughtes that come out of it, are scorned as foolish, trifling, madde and peruerse.

No easie is the condemnation of the heart, when it is called guilefull and peruerse above all thing: but because I studie to be short, I will be contente with one place alone, but such a one as shall be like a most bright looking glasse, wherein we may beholde the whole image of our nature. For the Aposttle, when he goeth about to throw downe your arrogancy of mankind, doth it by these testimonies: That there is not one righteous man, There is not one man that understandeth or that seeketh God, Alare gone out of the waye, they are made vnprofitable together, there is none that doeth good, no not one: their throte is an open sepulcher, with their tongues they worke deceitfully, the poiyon of Serpentes is vnder their lippes, whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: whose feete are swift to shedde bloude, in whose wayes is forrowe and vnhappiness, which haue not the feare of God before their eyes: With these thunderboltes hee inueth, not against certaine men, but against the whole nation of the sonnes of Adam. Neither declineth he against the corrupt manners of one or two ages.
ages, but accused the continual corruption of nature. For his purpose is in that place, not simply to chide men, to make them amende, but to reach rather that all men are opprest with calamities, impossible to be overcome, from which they can not get up againe, unless they be plucked out by the mercie of God. And because, that could not be proved unless it had beene by the overthrowe and destruction of nature, he brought rooth these testimonies whereby is proved that our nature is more than destroyed. Let this therefore remaine agreed, that men are such as they be here described, not onely by faultes of euill custome, but also by corruptnesse of nature. For otherwise the Apostles argument can not stand, that there is no saluation for man but by the mercie of God, because he is in him selfe utterly lost and past hope. I will not here buie my selfe in proving the applying of these testimonies, that no man shoulde thinke them vntruth vulsed. I will so take them as if they had bin first spoken by Paule, and not taken out of the Prophets. First he taketh away from man righteousnesse, that is integritie and purenesse, and then understanding. The want of understanding, he prooueth by Apostasie or departing from God, whome to seke is the first degree of willedome. But that want must needs happen to them that are fallen away from God. He sayth further, that all are gone out of the way and become as it were rotten, that there is none that doth good, and then he adiyneth the haynous faultes, wherewith they dele their members that are once let loose into wickednesse. Last of all he testifieth that they are voyde of the feare of God, after whose rule our steppes should haue bin directed. If these be the inheritable giftes of mankinde, it is in vaine to seke for any good thing in our nature. In deed I grant that not all these faultes doe appeare in every man: yet can not be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the heartes of all men. For as the body while it already oftentimes enclosed within it, the cause and matter of disease, although the paine be not yet vehement, can not be called healthye; no more can the soule be reckned sounde, while it swarmeth full of such diseases of vices, albeit the similitude doth not agree in all points. For in the body be it nouer so much diseased, there remaineth a quicknesse of life: but the soule being drowned in this gulfe of destruction, is not onely troubled with vices, but also altogether voiue of all goodnesse.

3. The same question in a manner which hath bin before assayed, nowe riseth vp againe of newe. For in all ages there haue bin some, which by guiding of nature haue bin bent to vertue in all their life. And I regarde it not, though many slippinges may be noted in their manners: yet by the very study of honestie they haue shewed a prove, that there was some purenesse in their nature. What reward such vertues haue before God, although we will more fully declare when we shall speake of the merites of workes, yet we must somewhat speake in this place: so farre as is necessarie for making plauns of this presente argument. These examples therefore seeme to put vs in minde, that we should not thinke mans nature altogether corrupte, for that by her instruction some men haue not onely excelled in some noble actes, but also in the whole course of their life haue behaued themselves most honestly. But here we must thinke, howe in this corruption of nature there there is some place for the grace of God, not to cleanse it, but inwardly to restraine it. For if the Lord would suffer the mindes of all men as it were with lose reines to rumne wildly into all fortes of lustes, without doubt there would be no man, but he would in plaine experience make vs beleeeue, that of those euils wherewith Paul condemneth all nature, are most truely sayde of him. For what? Canst thou exempt thy selfe out of the number of them, whose feete are swift to shed bloude, their handes defiled with robberies and manslaughters, their throtes like vnto open Sculpchres, their tongues deceitfull, the lippes venimous, their workes vnprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whose minde is without God, whose inwarde are peruerfenes, whose eyes are bent to entrappings, their hartes like vp diptoeously to triumph ouer other, and all the partes of them applied to infinite mischiefes. If every soule be subject to all such monsters, as the Apostle boldely pronounceth, truely we see what would come to passe, if the Lorde would suffer the luft of man to wander after his owne inclination. There is no made beast that is so hedlong carried away, there is no streame be it neuer so swift and strong, whereof the overfloving is so violent. The Lorde healeth these diseases in his elect by this meanes that we will by and by sette forth. In some he only restraine them with putting a bridle in their mouth, onely that they breake not out, so farre as he foreleeth to be expedient for preferuing of the vniversite of things. Hereby some are holden in by shame, some by feare of lawes, that they burst not souer into many fortes of filthinesse, howbeit they doe for a great part not hide their uncleanesse. Some becaues they thinke that an honest trade of life is good, doe after a certaine forte aspire toward it. Some rise vp aboue the common sorte, that by their maiestie they may keepe other in their dutie. So God by his prouidence bridleth the peruerfenes of nature, that it breake not souer into doinge: but he cleanseth it not within.

4. But yet the doubt is not dissoled. For either we must make Camillus like vnto Catilie, or els in Camillus we shall haue an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogether without goodnesse. I graunt in deede that those goodly gifts which were in Camillus both were the gifts of GOD and seeme worthy to be commended, if they be weyed by themselves, but howe shall they be proues of naturall goodnesse in him? must we not returne to the minde, and frame our argumente in this sorte? If a natural man excelled in such vproightnesse of manners, then nature is vndoubtedly not without power toward the studie of vertue. But what if the minde were peruerse and crooked, and following any thing rather than vproight streightnesse? And that it was such, there is no doubt, if you graunt that he was a natural man. Nowe what power of mans nature to goodnesse will you rehearse vnto mee in this behalfe, if in the greatest shewe of purenesse it be founde that he is alwaye carried to corrupcion? Therefore, leaft ye commend a man for vertue, whose vices deceiue you vnder vertues Image, do not so giue vnto the will of man power to desire goodnesse, so long as it remaineth faft in his owne peruerfenesse. Albeit this is a most sure and easie solution of this question, that these are not common gifts of nature, but special graces of God, which he diversely & to a certaine... certaine measure dealeth among men that are otherwise vn godlie. For which reason we feare not in common speach to call one man well natured, and another of euill nature; and yet we caufe not to include them both vnder the vniversall state of mans corruption, but we shewe what speciall grace God hath bestowed vpon the one, which hee hath not vouchfaued to give to the other, when his pleasure was to make Saul king, hee formed him as a newe man: and that is the reason why Plato alluding to the fable of Homer, sayth that Kingses fonnes are created notable by some singular marke, because God prouiding for mankinde, furniseth thefe with a princely nature whome hee appointeth to beare government: and out of this store house came all the great Captaines which are renowned in histories.
The fame is also to be thought of private men. But because as euere man hath most excelled, so his ambition hath most moued him forwarde (with which spottes all vertues are desiled, so that they lose all fauour before God) it is to bee accomplished nothing worth, whatsoever seemeth praife worthie in vngodly men, beside that the cheife part of vprighteoufnes faileth, where there is no studie to advance the glorie of God, which all they want whom he hath not regenerate with his spirit. Neither is it vainely spoken in Es-ray, that vpon Christ refeth the spirit of the feare of God, whereby we are taught, for many as are strange frō Christ are without it, fear of God, which is the beginning of wisdome. As for the vertues that deceiue vs with vaine fnew, I grant they shall have praife in the court of policie, & in the common fame of men, but before the heauenly judgement fenate, they shalbe of no value to deferue righteousnesse.

With fuch bondage of finne therefore as Will is deteyned, it cannot once moue it selfe to goodnesse, much leffe applie it felfe. For such mouing is the beginning of turning to God, which in Scriptures is wholly imputed to the grace of God. As Jeremie prayeth to the Lorde to turne him, if he will have him turned. Wherevpon the Prophet in the fame Chapter, describing the spiritual redemption of the faithfull people, faith that they were redeemed out of the hand of a stronger meaning with howe freight fetters a finner is bound fo long as being forsaken of the Lorde, hee liueth vnder the yoke of the Deuill. Yet Will still remaineth, which with moft bent affection is both inclined and hafteth to finne. For man was not depruied of Will when he did caft him selfe into this necessitie, but of the foundnesse of Will.
And Bernard faith not vnaply, which teacheth that to Will is in vs all: but to Will good is a profiting, to Will ill is a defect: and therefore simply to Will, is the worke of man: to Will euill, of corrupte nature: to will well, of grace. Nowe whereas I fay, that will put from libertie is by necessitie drawe or led into euill, it is mercell if that should seeme a hard speach vnto any ma, which neither hath any absurdity in it, nor varieht from the vie of holy men: But it offendeth them that can make no difference betweene necessitie and compulsion. But if a man asketh them, is not God of necessitie good? is not the diuell of necessitie euill? what can they answeare? For so is goodnesse knit with gods diuinitie, that it is no more necessarie that he bee God than that hee bee good. And the diuell is by his fal so estranged from partaking of goodnesse, ye he can do nothing but euill. But nowe if any robber of God

N 5  do
Of the knowledge of

do buke against this and say, that God deserveth small prayle for his goodness, which hee is compelled to keepe: shall not this be a readie answere to him, that it commeth to passe by his infinite goodness and not by vilent impulsion, that he can not do euill. Therefore if this, that it is of neces-sitie that God doe well, doe not hinder the free will of God in doing well, it the deuill which cannot doe but euill yet willingely sinneth, who shall then say that a man doeth therefore lette willingly sinne for this that hee is subject to necessitie of sinning: This necessitie, whereas Augustine ech where speaketh of it, even then also when he was enuiously pressef with the caulation of Celestius, hee sticke not to affirme in these worde, by libertie it came to passe that man was with sinne, but nowe the corruption which flowed for punishment, hath of libertie made necessitie. And so oft as hee falke into mention thereof, hee doueth not to speake in this manner of the necessarie bondage of sinne. Therefore let this summe of that distinti-on be kepe, that man since he is corrupted, sinneth in deede willingly and not against his will nor compelled, by a most bent affection of minde, and not by violent compulsion, by motion of his owne lust, and not by forren constraint: but yet of such peruersenesse of nature as he is, hee cannot but be moued and driven to euill. If this bee true, then surely it is plamely expressed that he is subject to necessitie of sinning. Bernarde agreeing to Augustine wrote thus, onely man among all living creatures is free: and yet by meane of sinne, hee also suffereth a certaine violence, but of will & not of nature, that een thereby also hee shoulde not be depruied of freedome, for that which is willing is free. And a little after, will beinge chaunged in it selfe into worse, by I wot not what corrupt & maruellous maner, so maketh necessitie y very necessitie for as much as it is willing, cannot excuse will, & wil forasmuch as it is drawn by allurement, cannot exclude necessitie, for this necessitie is after a certaine maner willing. Afterward he saith y we are pressef down with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certaine willing bondage, therefore by reason of our bondage we are miserable, by reason of our will wee are inexusable, because will when it was free, made it selfe the bondfervant of sinne. At length hee concludeth, that the soule is so after a certaine marvellous and euill manner holden both a bond fervant & free, under this certaine willing and ill free necessitie: a bondfervant by reason of necessitie, free by reason of Will, and that which is more marvellous and more miserable, therein guiltie wherein it is free, therein bond wherein it is guiltie, and so therein bond wherein it is free. Hereby truely the readers doe perceive that I bring no newe thing, which long agoe Augustine brought forth out of the consent of al godly men, & almost a thousand yeres after was kept still in monkes Cloyfeters. But Lombard when he could not distinguish necessitie from compulsion, gaue matter to a perritious er-roure.

6 On the other side it is good to consider what manner remedie is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended & healed. For whereas the Lord in helping vs, giueth vs that which wee want, when we shall know what his worke is in vs, it will streight way appeare on the other side what is our neediness. When the Apostile faith to the Phi-Philippians, that he trusteth that he which began a good worke in them, will performe it vnto the day of Iefus Chrift: it is no doubt, that by the beginning of a good worke, hee meaneth the very beginning of conversion, which is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good worke in vs by stirring vp in our heartes the loue, desire and endeuer of righteousness, or (to speake more properly) in bowing, framing and directing our heartes to righteousness: he endeth it in confirming vs to perseverance. And that no man should cauill that good is begunne by the Lorde, when will being of it selfe weake is holpen: the holy Ghost in an other place declareth what will is able to doe being left vnto it selfe. I will giue you (faith he) a newe heart. I will put a newe spirite in the middes of you. And I will take away the stonie heart from your fleste, and I will giue you a heart of fleste. And I will put my spirite in the middes of you, and I will make you to walke in my commandementes. Who shall say that the weaknesses of man's will is strengthened with helpe, whereby it may effectuallly aspire to the choise of that which is good, when it must be whole transformed and renewed? If there be any softenesse in a stone, which by some helpe being made tenderer will abide to be bowed every way, then will I grant that the heart of man is pliable to obey that which is right, so that that which in it is perfect, be supplied by the grace of God. But if he meant to shewe by this similitude, that no goodnesse could euer be wrung out of our heart vnlesse it bee made throughly newe: let vs not part betweene him and vs, that which he challengeth to himselfe alone. If therefore a stone be transformed into fleste, when God turneth vs to the desire of that which is right: then is all that which was of our owne will taken away, and that which commeth in place thereof is all of God. I say that will is taken away, not in that it is will, because in the conversion of man, that which was of the first nature abideth whole: also I say that it is created newe, not that will then beginneth to bee, but that it be turned from an euill wil into a good. And this I affirm to be wholly done by God, because we are not able fo much as to thinke, as the same Apostle witnesseth: therefore in an other place he faith, that God doth not onely helpe our weake will, or amend our peruersu will, but that he worketh in vs to will. Whereupon is safely gathered, that which I said before, that whatsoever good is in will, it is the worke of onely grace. In which sense in an other place he faith, that it is God that worketh all in all. Neither doth he there intreate of the vniversall gouvemement, but giueth vnto God alone the praise of all good things that the faithfull haue. And in saying all, truly he maketh God the author of Spirituall life, even from the beginning to the ende. Which felde same thing he had taught before in other worde, saying that the faithfull are of God in Chrift, where he plainly maketh mention of the new creation, wherein that which was of common natur, before, is destroyed. For there is to be understood a comparison betweene Adam and Chrift, which in an other place he more plainly expresseth, where he teacheth that we are the worke of God created in Chrift to good workes, which he hath prepared that wee should walke in them. For he goeth about by this reason to proue, that our salvation is of free gift, because the beginning of all goodnesse, is at the second creation, which which we obtain in Christ. But if there were any power of our soleues, were it never so small, we should have also some portion of merit. But hee to prooue vs altogether nothing worth, reasoneth that we have deferred nothing, because we are create in Christ to good works, which God hath prepared. In which wordes he signifieth againe, that all partes of good works, even from the first motion, are proper to God onely. For this reason, the Prophet after he had saide in the Psalm that we are the workmanship of God, that there should be no partition, addeth by and by, We made not our soleues. That he speaketh there of regeneration, which is the beginning of spiritual life, appeareth by the tenor of the text, where it by and by after followeth, that we are his people and the flocke of his pastures. We see now, how he not contented simply to have given to God the praise of our salvation, doth expressly exclude vs from all fellowship with him, as if hee would say, that there resteth no peece, be it never so little, for man to glory in, because it is all of God.

7 But there be some peraduenture that will grant, that Will being of her owne nature, turned away from good, is converted by the onely power of the Lord; but so that being prepared before, it hath also her owne part in doing, as Augustine teacheth, that grace goeth before every good workes, but so, that will doth accompanie it and not leade it, as a waying maide after it, and not a foregoer. Which thing being not euill spoken by the holy man, Peter Lombard doth disorderly wirthe to this purpose. But I affirm, that as well in the wordes of the Prophet which I have alledge, as in the other places, these two things be plainly signified, that the Lord doth both correct our corrupted will, or rather destroy it, and also of himselfe putth in place thereof a good will. In as much as it is prevented by grace, in that respect I gie you leave to call it a waying maide: but for that being reformed, it is the worke of the Lorde, this is wrongfullly given to man that hee doth with will comming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not well written of Chrysostome, that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can worke any thing: as if grace did not worke very well it seife, as euyn now we have seene by Paul. Neither was it Augustines purpose, when he called mans will the waying maide of grace, to assigne unto her a certaine second office in doing a good worke, but because this onely was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, which did set the principal cause of salvation in mans desyreing; therefore hee stooode onely upon this point, that grace was before all desyereing: which was sufficient for the matter. He then had in hand, not medling in the same time with his other question, concerning the perpetuall effect of grace, which yet in an other place he excellently well handeth. For sometime when hee saith, that the Lord doth prevent the willing that hee may will, and followeth the willing that hee will not in vaine, hee maketh him altogether the whole authour of the good worke. Albeit his sentences touching this matter, are too plaine to neede any longe arguing upon them. Men ( faith he) doe labour to finde in our will something that is owne and not of God, but howe it may bee found I knowe not. And in his first booke against Pelagius and Celestius, where hee doth expound that saying of Chrift, Every one that hath heard of my father commeth to mee, he faith: Freewill is so holpen not onely that it may knowe what is to be done, but also may doe it when it hath known it. And so when God teacheth, not by the letter of the lawe, but by grace of the spirite, hee so teacheth, that hee that hath learned, doeth not onely see it in knowing, but also desire it in willing, and performe it in doing.

8 And because wee are now in hande with the chiefe point whereupon the matter hangeth, let vs goe forward and prove the summe thereof to the readers, onely with a few and the most plaine testimonies of the Scripture. And then, lest any man should accuse vs of wrongfull wresting the Scripture, let vs shewe that the truth which wee affirmee beeing taken out of the Scripture, wanteth not the testimony of this holy man, I meane Augustine. For I thinke it not expedient, that all the things be rehearsed that may bee brought out of the Scriptures, for confirmation of our meaning; so that by the most chosen that shall bee brought forthe, the way may bee prepared to understande all the rest that are here and there commonly read. And again, I thinke it shall not be vnfitely done, if I openly shew that I agree well with that man whom worthy is the conscience of godly men both much elsew. Surely it is euident by plaine and certaine proofs, that the beginning of goodnesse is from no where else but onely from God, for there can not be found a will bent to good, but in the elect. But the cause of election is to be sought out of man. Whereupon followeth, that man hath not right Will of himselfe, but it proceedeth from the same good pleasure, whereby we are elect before the creation of the world. There is also another reason not unlike vnto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of faith, it is to bee scene whence faith it selfe commeth. For as much as the whole Scripture crieth out that it is a free gift of God, it followeth, that it is of the mere grace of God, when we, which are with al our minde naturally bent to euill, begin to will that which is good. Therefore the Lorde, when he nameth these two things in the conversion of his people, to take away from them a stonic heart, and to give them a heart of flesh, plainly testifieth that that which is of our selues must bee done away, that we may be conuersted to righteousnesse: and that whatsoeuer commeth in place thereof, is from himselfe. And he uttereth not this in one place only. For he faith in Jeremie: I will give them one heart and one way, that they may feare me all their dayes. And a little after, I will give the seare of my name into their heart, that they depart not from me. Againe in Ezechiel: I wil give them one heart, and I wil give a newe spirite in their bowels, I will take away the stonic heart out of their flesh, and I will give them a heart of flesh. Hee could not more euidently claime to himselfe, & take from vs whatsoever is good and right in our will, than when he declareth that our conversion is a creation of a new spirite, and of a new heart. For it followeth alway, that both out of our will proceedeth no goodnesse till it be reformed, and that after reformation, so much as it is good, is of God, and not of vs.

9 And so read wee the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as, The Lorde encline our heartes to him ( faith Salomon) that we may keepe his commandements. He sheweth the frowardnesse of our heart which naturally reioyceth to rebell against the Lawe of God if it bee not bowed. And
And the same thing is in the Psalm: Lord incline my heart to thy testimonies. For the comparison of contrarieties is always to be noted, which is between the perversity of the heart whereby it is carried to obstinacy, and this correction whereby it is led to obedience. When David feeling himself for a time without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a new heart within him, to renew a right spirit within his bowels: doth he not acknowledge that all the parts of his heart are full of uncleanness, and his spirit written with crooked perverse states? and in calling the cleanliness which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doeth he not attribute it wholly to God? But if any man take exception and say, that the verie prayer is a token of a godly & holy affection: our answer is readie, that though David were by that time somewhat come to amendment, yet doeth he still compare his first state with that sorrowful fall that hee had felt. Therefore taking upon him the person of a man estranged from God, he for good cause praieth to have given him all these things? God giveth to his elect in regeneration. And so being like a dead man, he will then himselfe be created of newes: that of the bond slue of Sathan, he may be made the instrument of the holy Ghost. Marvelous and monstrous surely is the lust of our pride. God requireth nothing more earnestly, than that we should most religiously keepe his Sabbath, that is in restfull from our owne works, but of vs nothing is more hardly obtained, than bidding our owne works farewell, to give due place to the works of God. If fuggishNettie hindered not, Christ hath givem testimonium evident enough of his graces to make them not to be enioytly suppressed. I am (faith he) the Vine, you be the branches: My father is a husbandman. As the branch cannot beare fruite out of it selfe, vnlesse it abide in the Vine, no more can you, vnlesse you abide in mee. For without mee you can doe nothing. If we beare fruite none other wise than a branch buddeth being plucked out of the grounde and without moisture: wee neede no more to secke what is the aptnesse of our nature to goodnes. And this is a plaine conclusion: Without mee you can do nothing. He doth not say that we are too weake to be sufficient for our selues: but in bringing vs to nothing, hee excludeth all opinion of power be it ever so little. If we being grafted in Christ, beare fruite like a Vine, which taketh her efficacie of fuculenesse both from the moisture of the earth, and from the dewe of heauen, and from the cherishing of the sunne: I see nothing remaine for vs in doing a good worke, if we keepe whole for GOD that which is his. The fonde siller deceit is alleaged inayne, that there is iyue already enclosed within the branch, and a certayne power to bring forth fruite, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the firste roote, because it bringeth somewhat of her owne. For Christ doeth meane nothing else, but that we are a drie sticke and nothing worth, when wee beecnuered from him, because our selues being separeate, wee haue no power to doe well: as also in another place hee faith: Euerie tree that my Father hath not planted shall bee rooted vp. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth all the whole unto him in the place already alleaged. It is God (faith he) that worketh in vs both to will and to performe.
The first part of a good worke is wil: the second is a strong endeauour in doing it: the author of both is God. Therefore we steale it from G O D, if we take to our selues any thing, either in will or in effectuall working. If it were saide that God doth helpe our weake will, then somewhat were left for vs. But when it is saide that he makest will, now all the good that is in it, is set out of vs. And because the good wil is yet still oppressed with weight of our fleth that it can not rise vp: He said further, that to overcome the hardnesse of that battell, there is ministred vnto vs steadfastnesse of endeauour, even to the effect. For otherwise it could not stand together which he teacheth in another place, that it is God alone that bringeth to effect all thinges in all, wherein we haue before taught that the whole course of spiritual life is comprehended. For which rea:son, David, after he had prayed to haue the wales of the Lord opened vnto him, that he might walke in his truth, by and by addeth: Vnite thou my heart to feare thy name. In which wordes he signifieth, that even they that are well minded, are subject to so many withdrawings of minde, that they easily vanish or fall away if they be not stablished to constancie. For which reason in another place, after he had prayed to haue his steppes directed to keep e the worde of God, hee requireth also to haue strength given him to fight. Let not any iniquitie (sith he) beare rule over me. After this sort therefore doth the Lord both beginne and ende a good work in vs: that it may all be his work, that wil conceive a loue of that which is right, that it is enclined to the desire thereof, that it is stirr'd vp & mov'd to endeauor of following it. And then that our choie, desire, and endeauor faint not, but do proceede even to the effect: or, of all, that man goeth forward constantly in them, and continueth to the end.

And hee moueth the wil, not in such foras as hath in many ages bin taught & beleued that it is afterward in our choie, either to obey or withstand the motion, but with mightily strengthening it. Therefore that must be receiued which Chrysostom so oft repeatest, whom he draweth, the draweth being willing. Whereby he secretly teacheth that God doth onely reach out his hand to see if we wil holpe by his aide. We grant that such was the state of man while he yet stooode, that he might bow to either part. But sith he hath taught by his example how miserable is free will, vnlesse God both will and can in vs: what shal become of vs, if he giues vs his grace according to that small proportion? But rather wee doe obscure and extenuate it with our unthankfulnes. For the Apostle doth not teach, that the grace of a good wil is offered vs, if we doe accept, but y he wil performe it in vs which is nothing else, but that the Lord by his spirit doth direct, bowe and govern our heart, & reigneth in it as in his owne possession. Neither doth he promise by Ezechiel, that he wil giue to the elect a new spiritone onely for this end, that they may be able to walke in his commandementes, but to make them walke in deedes. Neither can Christ saye, (Every one that hath heard of my Father commeth to me) be otherwise taken, than to teach that the grace of G O D is effectuall of it selfe: as Augustine also affirmeth. Which grace God vouchesfaeth not to giue to all men generally without regard, as that saieing (as I thinke) of Occam, is commonly spoken among the people, that it denieth nothing to him y doth what lieth in him. Men are in deede deed to be taught y Gods goodnes is laid open for al men, w/out exception that seeke for it. But forasmuch as they onely begin to seeke for it, whom the heavenly grace hath breathed vpon, not so much as this little peece ought to be plucked away from his praise. Truly this is the prerogatiue of the elect, that being regenerate by the spirite of God, they are moued and gouerned by his guiding. I therefore Augustine doth worthy as weel mock them, that claime any part of willing them to themselues, as he doth repre-hend other which thinke that, that is generally giuen to all men, which is the special testimonie of free election. Nature, (faith he) but not grace, is common to all men. Calling it a bricke subdettie of witte like glasse, that glistereth with meere vanitie, where it is generally extended to all which God giueth onely to whom it pleaseth him. And in an other place: Howe camest thou? by beleeting. Feare thou, lest while thou takest vpon thee that thou haft found the iust way, thou perish out of the iust way. I came (saiest thou) by Free will, I came by mine owne will, why swellest thou? wilt thou heare that this also is giuen thee? Hear euen him that calleth:No man commeth to me vnlesse my Father draw him. And it is without controversie gathered out of Johns wordes, that the heartes of the godly are so effectuallly gouerned by Gods working, that they follow with an vnchangeable affection. He that is begotten of God(faith he) can not sinne, because the seed of God abideth in him. For we see that the humane motion which the Sophisters imagine, which we at our libertie may either obey or refuse, is openly excluded, where an effectuall constancie to continue is affurmed.

Of continuance there should no more doubt haue bin made, but that it should haue bin taken for the free gift of God vnlesse the most wicked errour had grown in force, that it is distributed according to the defert of men, as every man hath shewed himselfe not vnthankful to the first grace.
But forasmuch as this errour hath grown vpon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuse or receive the grace of God offred, that opinion being dried away, this other doth also fall of it selfe. Albeit herein they erce two manner of wayes. For beside this that they reache that our vnthankfulnesse toward the first grace and our lawfull vse thereof, are rewarded with the latter gifts: they addde also, that nowe grace alone doth not worke in vs, but that it is onely a worke together with vs. Of the first this we ought to beleue, that the Lord while he daily enricheth & heapeth his seruants with newe gifts of his grace, because he liketh and fa-uoureth the worke which he hath begun in them, findeth in them somewhat whereupon to bestowe greater graces. And here to stete those say-inges, To him that hath, haue giuen. Againe: Oh, good seruant, because thou haft bin faithful in fewe thinges, I will set thee ouer many. But here two things are to be taken heede of, that neither the lawfull vse of the first grace be alwaies to be rewarded with the later graces, nor it bee so counted a rewarding, that it ceale to be reckoned the free grace of God. I grant therefore, that this blesting of God is to be looked for of the faithful, that howe much the better they haue vfed the first graces, they shall bee encrea-sed with so much the greater. But I say, that this vse also is of the Lorde, and that this rewarding is of his free good will. And they see no lesse wrongfully than unhappily that olde destruction of working and together working grace. Augustine vsed the same in deed, but delaying it with a fit definition, that God in together working with vs doth end, that which in working he begin neth, and that it is still the same grace but changeth name, according to the diverse manner of effect. Whereupon followeth, that he doth not part it betweene God & vs, as if there were a mutuall meeting together by the motion of both, but only noteth the multiplication of grace. To which purpose belongeth that which in another place he teacheth, that many gifts of God do goe before the good will of man, amonie the which the selfe same is one. Whereupon followeth, that he leaueth nothing that it may claime to it self. Which thing Paul also hath namely expressed: For when he had sayd y it is God, which worketh in vs both to will & to performe, he by & by addeth, ye he doth them both of his good will, declaring by this word, that it is his free goodnesse. Wheras they are wont to say, that after we haue once giuen place to the first grace, our owne endeauours do now worke together with the grace that followeth. To this I answer: If they mean that we, after we haue ben once by the power of the Lord brokene to y obedience of righteousnesse, do of our own accord go forward, and are inclined to follow the working of grace, I speake nothing against it. For it is most certain, that there is such a readiness of obeying, where the grace of God reigneth. But whence commeth that, but from this, that the spirts of God alway agreeing with it selfe, doth cherish and confirm to steadfastnesse of continuinge the same affection of obeying, which it selfe engendred at the beginning. But if they meane that man taketh of himselfe somewhat whereby to labour with the grace of God, they are most peltently deceived.

12 And to this purpose is that faying of the Apostle wrongfully wrested by ignorance. I haue laboured more than they all: not I, but the grace of God with me. For they take it so: that because it might seeme somewhat arrogantly spoken that he preferred himselfe before them all, therefore he corrected it with referring the praise to the grace of God, but yet so, that he calleth himselfe a worker together with grace. It is maruell that so many which otherwise were not euil men, haue stumbled at this straw. For the Apostle doth not write that the grace of the Lord labour eth with him, to the intent to make himselfe partener of the labour, but rather by this correction he giueth away al the praise of the labor to grace only. It is not I (faith he), that haue laboured, but the grace of God that was with me. But the doutefulness of the speach deceased them: but specially the ill translation wherein the force of the Greek article was left out. For if it be translated word for word, he doth not say, that grace was a worker together with him, but that grace, that was with him, was the worker of all. And the same thing doth Augustine teach, not darkly, though shortly, where he thus faith: The good will of man goeth before many gifts of God, but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it selfe is one, then followeth his reason: because it is written: Psa. 59. 11. His mercy hath preuented me: and his mercy shall folow me. It preuenteth man not willing, to make him willing, and foloweth him willing. Yf he wil not in Ser. 2. in vaine. With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the church speaking thus: Cant. O. Drawe.

Drawe me in a maner vnwilling, that thou maist make me willing; drawe me lying flightful, that thou maist make me runne.

13 Now let vs heare Augustines speaking in his owne worde, leaft the Pelagians of our age, that is to say, the Sophisters of Sorbon, shou'd as they are wont, lay to our charge that all antiquitie is against vs, wherein they follow their father Pelagius, by whom long ago Augustine was drawn forth into the same contention. In his booke of Correption & Grace written to Valentine he entreateth largely that which I will reheare shortly, but yet do it in his owne worde: that to Adam was giuen the grace of continuing in good if he would: and to vs is giuen to will, and by will to overcome concupiscence: that he therefore had to be able if he woulde, but not to will that he might be able: to vs is giuen both to will and to be able. That the first libertie was to be able not to finde, ours is much greater, not to bee able to finde. And leaft he should be thought to speake of the perfection to come after immortality (as Lombard wrongfully dreweth it to that meaning) within a little after he plucketh out this dout. For (faith he) the will of holy men is so much kindled by the holy Ghost, that they therefore are able, because they so will: they therefore wil, because God worketh that they so will. For if in so great weake, in which yet behoueth the power to be made perfect, for repressing of pride, their owne will were left vnito them, that by the help of God they may if they will, and God doeth not worke in them to wil: then among so many temptations will shou'd needs fall downe for weake, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is succour giuen to the weake weake of mans will, that it shou'd be mowed without swarming or seuering by the grace of God, and therefore shou'd not faint howe weake so euer it be. Then he entreateth more largely how our heartes do of necessitie follow the mouing of God that worketh affection in them. And he faith, that the Lord doth draw men in deedes with their owne will, but with such as he himselfe hath wrought. Now haue we that thing testifi'd by Augustines mouth, which we principally desire to obtaine, that grace is not onely offered by God to be receiued or refused at euery mans Free electio, but also that grace is the same, that formeth the election & wil in the heart: so that euery good worke that followeth after, is the fruite and effect thereof, and that it haue no other will obeying it, but the same which it hath made. For these are also his worde out of another place, that nothing but grace maketh euery good worke in vs.

Epi.100.5. 14 But whereas he faith in another place, that will is not taken away by grace, but from an euill will turned into a good, and holpen when it is good: he meaneth onely that man is not so drawen, that without any motion of heart he is caried as by an outward impulsion, but that he is inwardly so affected, that from his very heart he obeyeth. That grace is specially and freely giuen to the elect, he writeth thus vnto Boniface: We knowe that grace is not giuen to all men, and to them whome it is giuen, it is not giuen according to the merites of worke, nor according to the merits of wil, but of free fauour: and to them to whom it is not giuen, we knowe that it is by the iuft judgement of God that it is not giuen. And in the same Epistle he strongly fighteth against that opinion, that the grace following is giuen is given to the desertings of men, because in not refusing the first grace, they fliowed themselves worthy. For he will have Pelagius graunte, that grace is necessarie to vs for euery of our doings, and is not given in recom pense to worke, that it may be grace in deede. But the matter can not be comprehended in a shorter summe, than out of eight chapter of his booke to Valentine of Correption and Grace, where first he reacheth that mans will obtaineth not grace by liberty, but liberty by grace: and that by the fame grace, by affection of delite printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is strengthened with incincible force: that while grace governeth, it never falleth away: when grace forsaketh, it by and by tombleth downe. Epift. 46. That by the free mercy of God it both is converted to good, and being converted abideth in it, that the direction of mans wil to good, and stedsaftines after direction, hangeth vpon the onely will of God, and not vpon any me rite of his owne. And so to man is left such a free wil, if we lift so to call it, as he writeth of in another place, that can neither be turned to God, nor abide in God but by grace, and by grace is able all that it is able.

_How God woorke in the hearts of men._

_It is sufficiently proved, as I thinke, that man is so holden captive with the yoke of sinne, that of his owne nature he can neither aspire by desire, nor travaale by endeauour to goodnesse: beside that, wee haue re heard a distinction betweene compulasion and necessitie, whereby it might appeare, that when hee sinneth of neceffitie, yet neverthelesse he sinneth willingly. But forasmuch as while he is subie&; in bondage to the Deuill, he femeeth rather to be ledde by the devils wil than his owne, it resteth nowe to bee declared of what for are both kindes of working. And then is this queation to be affoiled, whether in euill worke there be any thing to be attributed to G O D: in which the Scripture sheweth that there is vsed some working of his. In one place Augustine compar eth mans will to a horfe, which is ready to be ruled by the will of his rider: and God and the Duill he compar eth to riders. If God (s fayth he) fit vp on it, he like a sober and cunning rider, gouerneth it temperately, spurreth it forward if it be too lowe, plucketh it bace if it be too quicke, refrayneth the wantonneffe and wildneffe of it, tameth the stubbornneffe of it, and guideth it into the right way. But if the Deuill haue posseffed it, he like a foolish and wanton rider, violently carieth it through places where no way is, driueth it into ditches, rolleth it downe steep places, spurreth it forward to stubbornneffe and fearcenesse: which similitude we will for this time be contended with, ther is commeth not a better in place. Where it is sayde that the will of naturall man is subie&; to the rule of the Deuill, so bee ftruk by him, it is not ment thereby that man as it were struing against it, and resifting is c6pelled to obey, as we compel bondflaus against their wil, by reason of being their lorde, to do our commandementes: but that being bewitched with the deceites of Satan, it of neceffitie yeldeth it selfe obedien to every leading of him. For whome the Lorde voucblaueth not to rule._
rule with his spirit, them by just judgement he sendeth away to be mouted of Satan. Wherefore the Apostle saith, that the God of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelievers ordained to destruction, that they should not see the light of the Gospel. And in another place: That he worketh in the disobedient children. The blinding of the wicked, & all the wicked deeds that follow thereupon, are called the works of Satan, of which yet the cause is not to be sought elsewhere, than in the will of man, out of which ariseth the root of evil, wherein reflect the foundation of the kingdom of Satan, which is Sinne.

2 But farther other is the order of Gods doing in such things. And that the same may appeare more certainly vnto vs, let the hurt done to the holy man Job by the Chaldees, be an example. The Chaldees killed his herdmen, and like enemies in warre, drove away his cattle for booties. Now is their wicked deed plainly scene, and in that worke Satan is not idle, from whom the Historic faith, that all this did proceeds. But Job himselfe did acknowledge the worke of the Lord: in it, whom he fayth to have taken away from him those things, that were taken away by the Chaldees. How can we referre the selfe same worke to God, as author, to Satan as author, and to man as author of it, but we must either excuse Satan by the company of God, or report God to be the author of evil? Very easily: if first we looke vpon the end, why it was done, and then the manner how. The purpose of the Lord is by calamity to exercise the patience of his servant: The devil goeth about to drive him to despair. The Chaldees against right & lawe, seek gaine of that which is an other mans. Such diversity in purposes, maketh great difference in the worke. And in the manner of doing there is no lesse diversity. The Lord leaueth his servant to Satan to be afflicted: and the Chaldees, whom he did chose for ministers to execute it, he did leave & deliver to him to be driven to it. Satan with his venemous stings, pricked forward the minds of the Chaldees which otherwise were peruerse of themselves to do such mischief: they furiously runne to do wrong, and do binde & desize all their members with wicked doing. Therefore it is properly said, that Satan doth worke in the reprobate, in whom he exerciseth his kingdom: that is to say, the kingdom of wickednesse. It is also said that God worketh in them after his manner, because Satan himselfe, forasmuch as he is the instrument of his wrath, according to his bidding and commandement, turneth himselfe hither and thither to execute his just judgements. I speake not here of Gods vniversal mowing, whereby as all creatures are sustaine, so from whence they take their effectuall power of doing any thing. I speake onely of that special doing, which appeareth in euery special act. We see therefore that it is no absurdity, that one selfe act be ascribed to God, to Satan, and to man: but the diversity in the end and manner of doing, causeth that therein appeareth the justice of God to be without fault, and also the wickednesse of Satan and man, bewrayeth it selfe to their reproch.

3 The old writers in this point also, are sometime precipitely afraid, simply to confesse the truth, because they feare lest they should ope open a window to wickednesse, to speake irreverently of the worke of God. Which sobriety as I embrace, so I thinke it nothing daungerous, if we simply hold what the
the Scripture teacheth. Augustine himself sometime was not free from superstition, as where he faith, that hardning & blinding, pertaineth not to the worke of God, but to his foreknowledge. But the phrares of Scripture allow not these sutletries, which phrares do plainly shewe that there is there-in somewhat else of God, besides his foreknowledge. And Augustine himself in his first booke againste Julianus, goeth earnestly about with a long prose to prove that sinnes are not only of the permission or sufferance of God, but also of his power, that so former sinnes might be punished. Likewise, that which they bring forth, concerning permission, is too weake to stand. It is oftentimes said, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that hee turneth, boweth, & moueth their heartes as he hate else where taught more at large. But of what manner that is, it is never expressed, if wee flee to free foreknowledge or sufferance. Therefore we answere that it is done after two manners. For first, where as when his light is taken away, there remaineth nothing but darknesse & blindnesse whereas when his spirit is take away, our hearts wax hard & become stones: where as when his direction cesseth, they are wrested into crookednesse, it is well said that he doth blind, harden & bow them from whom he taketh away the power to see, obey & do rightely. The second maner, which commeth neere to the propertie of the words, is that for the executing of his judgments by Sathan the minister of his wrath, he both appointeth their purposes to what end it pleaseth him, and stirreth vp their wills, & strengtheneth their endeavours. So when Moses reheareth that king Schod did not give passage to the people, because God had hardened his spirit, & made his heart obstinate, he by and and by adiyneth the end of his purpose; that he might (faith he) give him into our hands. Therefore because it was Gods will to haue him destroyed, the making of his heart obstinate, was Gods preparation to his destruction.

4. After the first manner this freemeth to be spoken. He taketh away the lip from the speakers of truth, and taketh away reason from the Elders. He taketh the heart away from them that are set ouer the people, hee maketh them to wander where no way is. Again, Lord why haft thou made vs mad, and hardened our heart, that we should not feare thee? Because they judge rather of what fort God maketh men by forsaking them, than howe he performeth his worke in them. But there are other testimonies that go further: as are these of the hardening of Pharao. I will harden the heart of Pharao, that he do not heare you, & let the people go. Afterward he faith, that he hath made heavy & hardened his heart. Did he harden it, in not susteyning it? That is true in deed: but he did somwhat more, that he committed his heart to Sathan to be confirmed with obstinacy. Wherupon he had before said: I wil hold his heart. The people went out of Aegypt, the inhabitants of that countrey came forth & met them like enemics. By whom were they stirred vp? Truely Moses affirmeth to the people, that it was the Lord that had hardened their heartes. And the Prophet reciting the same history, faith, that he turned their heartes, that they should hate his people. Now can you not say, that they stumbled being left without the counsell of God. For if they be hardened & turned, then they are of purpose bowed to that selfe thing. Moreover so oft as it pleased him to punish the transgressours of the people, how did he performe his worke in the reprobate? So as a man may see, that the effectuallnes of working was in him, and they onely did service as ministrers. Wherefore sometime he threatened that he would call them out with his whistle, sometime that they should be like a net for him to entangle them, & sometime like a mallet, to strike the Israelites. But specially he then declared how he is not idle in them, when he called Sennacherib an Axe, which was both directed & driven by his hand to cut. Augustine in one place doth not amisse appoint it after this fort: that inasmuch as they sinne, it is their owne: inasmuch as in sinning they do this or that, it is of the power of God, that caused the darknesse as pleaseth him.

5 Now the ministerie of Satan is vied to pricke forward the reprobate, so as the Lord by his providence appointeth them to this or to that, may sufficiently be proved, though it were but by one place only. For it is oftentimes said in Samuel, that the euill spirit of the Lord, and an euill spirit from the Lord, did either violently cry or leave Saul. To say that this spirit was the holy Ghost, is blasphemous. Therefore the unclean spirit is called the spirit of God, because it answereth at his commandement & power, being raather his instrument in doing, than an author of it selfe. This is also to be added withall, which Paul teacheth, that the efficacie of error & deceiving is sent by God, that they which have not obeyed the truth, may beleeue lies. But there is alway great difference in one selfe fame worke; betweene that which the Lord doth, and that which Satan & the wicked goe about. He maketh the euill instruments that he hath vnder his hand, & may turne whither he list, to serue his iustice. They, in as much as they are euill, do bring forth in effect the wickednesse that they have conceiued by corruptnesse of nature. The rest, of such things as serue for to deliuer the maiestie of God from flander, & to cut off all shifting from the wicked, are already set forth in the chapter concerning Providence. For in this place my purpose was only to shewe how Satan reigneth in the reprobate man, and how God worketh in them both.

6 Although we haue before touched, yet it is not plainly declared what libertie man hath in those doings, which are neither iust nor faultie of them selues, and belong rather to the bodiely than the spirituall life. Some in such things have granted him free election, rather, as I thinke, because they would not sttue about a matter of no great importance, than that they minded certainly to prowe the same thing that they granted. As for me, although I confess that they which do hold that they have no power to righteouenesse, do hold the thing that is principally necessarie to salvation: yet I doe thinke that this point also is not to be neglected, that we may know that it is of the speciall grace of the Lorde, so oft as it commeth in our minde to choose that which is for our profit, so oft as our will enclinheth thereunto: againe, so oft as our wit & mind echeueth that which else would haue hurt vs. And the force of Gods providence extendeth thus farre, not onely to make the successe of things to come to passe, as he shall foresee to be expedient, but also to make the willes of men to tend the same. Truly, if we consider in our wit the administration of outward things, wee shall thinke that they are so farre vnder the will of man: but if we shall give credit to so many testimo-testimonies, which cry out that the Lord doth in these things also rule the hearts of men, they shall compell us to yeilde our will subiect to the special mouing of God. Who did procure the good willes of the Egyptians to the Israelites, to lende them all their most precious jewels? They would never haue found in their hearts to haue so done of their owne accord. Therefore their heartes were more subiect to the Lord, than ruled by them selues: And truely if Iacob had not beene perswaded that God put into men divers affections as pleseth him, he would not have said of his sonne Ioseph, whom he thought to be some Heathen Egyptian: God graunt you to finde mercy before this man. As also the whole Church confesseth in the Psalme, that when it pleased God to haue mercy vpon it, he meekened the heartes of the cruel nations. Againe, when Saul so waxed on fire with anger, that he prepared him to warre, the cause is expressed, for that the spirit of God did enforce him. Who turned away Absolons minde, from embracing the counsel of Achitophel, which was wont to be holden as an oracle? Who inclined Rehabeam to be perswaded with the yong mens advice? Who made the nations that before were great, to be afraid at the comming of Israell? Truely the harlot Rahab confesseth, that it was done by God. Againe, who through downe the heartes of Israel with dread and fearfulness, but he that in the lawe threatened that he would give them a fearefull heart?

7 Some man will take exception and say, that these are singular examples, to the rule whereof all things universally ought not to be reduced. But I say, that by these is sufficiently proued that which I affirme, that God so oft as he meanceth to prepare the way for his providence, euen in outwarde things doth bow and turne the willes of men, and that their choice is not so free, but that God will beareth rule over the freedome thereof. That thy minde hangeth rather vpon the mouing of God, than vpon the freedome of thine owne choice, this dayly experience shall compell thee to thinke whether thou wilt or no; that is, for that in things of no perplexitie thy judgement and will faileth thee, in things not hard to be done thy courage fainteth: againe in things most obscure, by and by present advice is offered thee: in things great and perillous, thou haft a courage overcomming all difficultie. And so do I expound that which Salomon faith: That the care may heare, that the eye may see, the Lord worketh both. For I take it that hee speaketh not of the creation, but of the speciall grace of ving them. And when he writeth that the Lord holdeth in his hand and boweth whether he will the heart of the king as the streames of waters: truely under the example of one speciall sort, he comprehendeth the whole generallie. For if the will of any man be free from subjection, that preeminence principally belongeth to the will of a King, which vioeth as it were a kingdom vpon the willes of other: but if the will of the King be ruled with the hande of God, no more than our wil be exempted from his same estate. Vpon this point there is a notable sayling of Augustin: The Scripture if be diligently looked vpon doth shew, that not onely the good willes of men which hee for maketh good, and so being made by him selfe doth direct to good doinges and to eternall life, but also these willes that preferre the creature of the world, are so in the power of GOD, that hee maketh them to be inclined whether he will & when he will, either to do benefits, or to execute punishments, by a judgement most secret in deed, but the same most righteous.

8 Here let the Readers remember, that the power of man's will is not to be weyed by the success of things, which some vsrilful men are vnorderly wont to do. For they see me to them selves to proue trimly and wittily that mans will is in bondage, because eu'en the highest Monarch es haue not all thingse flowing after their owne desire. But this power whereof we speake, is to be considered within man and not be measured by outwarde success. For in the disputacion of freewill, this is not to the question, whether man may for outwarde impedimentes, performe and put in execution all those things that he hath purposed in mind: but whether he haue in euery thing both a free election of judgement, and a free affection of will, which both if man haue, then Attilius Regulus, enclosed in the narrowenesse of a tonne, set ful of sharpe prickes, shall no leffe haue free will than Augustus Cæsar, governning a great part of the world with the beck of his countenance.

A controversie of the objections that are vsed to be brought for defence of Free will.

It might seeme that we haue saide enough already, concerning the bondage of man's will, if they that with false opinion of libertie, labour to throw it down hedlong, did not on the contrarie part pretend certain reasons to affaille our meaning. First they heap vp together divers absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing abhorring from common reason: afterwarde they fet vp on it with testimomies of Scripture. Both these engines we shall beate backe in order. If (say they) Sinne be of necessitie, then ceaseth it to be sinne: if it be voluntarie, then may it be auoyded. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to affaille Augustine, with whose name we will not yet haue them oppress'd, till we haue satisfied them, concerning the matter it selfe. I deny therefore that sinne ought the leffe to be imputed, because it is necessarie. I deny againe that this doth follow which they conclude, that it may be auoyded, because it is voluntarie. For if any man wil dispute with God, and seek to escape from his judgement by this pretence, because he could none otherwise do: God hath that answer ready which we in an other place haue spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bondslaves to sinne, can will nothing but euil. For whence cometh this want of power which y wicked would gladly pretend, but vs this, y Adam of his owne accord made himselfe subject to y tyranny of the Deuill? Hereupon thence grew the corruption, with the bonds whereof we are holden fast tyed, for that the first man fell from his creator. If all men be justly holden guilty of his falling away, let them not thinke themselves excused by necessity, in which it selfe they haue a moost evident caufe of their damnatiō. And this I haue aboue plainly set forth, and I haue giuen an example in the Deuill himselfe, whereby it might appeare, y he which necessarily sinneth, doth neverthelesse willingly sinne: as againe in the elect Angels, where as their will can not decline from from good yet it ceaseth not to be a will. Which same thing Bernard also Ser. 81, in aplly teacheth that we are therefore the more miserable, because our necessity is voluntariable, which yet holdeth vs so subject unto it, that we see the bondslaves of sinne, as we haue before rehearsed. The second part of their argument is faultie, because from voluntariable it straightway leapeth to free: but we haue before prooved, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not subject to free election.

2. They further say that if both vertues and vices procede not of free choice of will, it is not reasonable that either punishment should be laide upon man or reward given to him. This argument, although it be Aristotle's, yet I grant is in some places vfed by Chryssostome and Hierome. But that it was a common argument with the Pelagians, Hierome himselfe hindereth not, & also rehearseth it in his owne words. If the grace of God work in vs: then it, not we that labour, shall be crowned. Of punishments I answer, that they are justly laid upon vs from whom the guiltines of sin procedeth. For what matter maketh it, whether sinne bee done by free or bond judgement, so it be done by voluntariable lust: specially if man is hereby prooued a sinner, for that he is under the bondage of sinne? As to the rewards of righteousness: a great absurdity forsooth it is, if we confesse that they hang rather upon God's bountifulnesse, than upon our owne deserverings. Howe oft finde we this thing repeated in Augustine: that God crowneth not our deseruerings, but his owne gifts: and that they are called rewardes, not as due to our deseruerings, but such as are rendered to the graces already bestowed upon vs: Wisely in deed they note this, that nowe there remaineth no place for deseruerings, if they come not out of the fountaine of free will: but where they reckone that which we say so far differing from truth, they are much deceived. For Augustine doubteth not, commonly to teach for necessarie, that which they thinke so vnlawful to confesse, as where he faith: What bee the merits of any men whatsoever they be: when hee commeth, not with due reward, but with free grace, then he alone being free, and that maketh free from sinne? Hee findeth all men sinners. Again, If that shall be render'd to thee that is due to thee, thou art to bee punished: what is done then? God hath not given thee punishment which is due, but giueth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt be estranged from grace, boast of thy deseruerings. Again: Thou art nothing of thy selfe. Sinnes are thine, but deseruerings are God's, punishment is due to thee: and when reward commeth, hee shall crowne his owne gifts, and not thy deseruerings. And in the same meaning in an other place, he teacheth that grace is not of deseruerings, but of grace. And a little after hee concludeth, that God with his gifts goeth before all deseruerings, that out of the same he may gather his owne deseruerings, and doth giue altogether freely, because he findeth nothing whereupon to faue. But what neede is it to make a longer register, when such sentences are often found in his writings? But the Apostle shall yet better deliuer them from this error, if they heare from what beginning hee conuicieth the glorye of the Saintes: Whome he hath chosen, them he hath called, whome he hath called, them he hath justified: whome he hath justified, them hee hath glorified. Why then, as witnesses the Apostle, are the faithfull crowned.
ned: because by the Lords mercie and not by their owne endeuer they are both chosen and called and justified. Away therefore with this vaine feare, that there shal no more be any defervings, if free will shall not stand. For it is most foolish to be fraied away and to flee from that to which the Scripture calleth vs. If (faith he) thou haft receiued all things, why glorifh thou, as if thou haddest not receiued them? Thou feest that for the fame caufe he taketh all things from free will, to leaue no place for defervings: but as the bountifulnesse and liberalitie of God is manifold, and imipoffible to be spent out, those graces which he beftoweth on vs, because he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our owne vertues.

3. Moreover they bring forth that which may feeme to be taken out of Chrysfotome: If this be not the power of our will, to choose good or eui, then they that are partakers of the same nature, must either all be eui or all be good. And not farre from that is he, whatfoever he was, that wrote the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles, which is carried about under the name of Ambrose, when he maketh this argument, that no man should ever depart from the faith, vnde the grace of God did leave who vs vs the state of immutabilitie: wherein it is maruell that so excellent men fell before themselves. For how chanceth it came not in Chrysfotoms minde, that it is Gods election that so maketh difference betweene men? As for vs, we feare not to grant that which Paul with great earnestnesse affirmeth, that all together are peruerse and giuen to wickednesse, but with him we adioyne this that by Gods mercie it commeth to passe that all abide not in peruerfenes. Therefore whereas naturally we are all sick of one disease, they one ly recover health vpon whom it hath pleased God to lay his healing hand. The rest whom by just judgement he paffeth ouer, pine away in their owne rottennesse till they are consumed. Neither is it of any other caufe, that some continue to the end, and some fall in their course begunne. For continuance it selfe is the gift of God, which he giueth not to all indifferently, but dealeth it to whom it pleaseth himselve. If a man aske for a caufe of the difference, why some continue constantly, and some faile by vnstedfastnes, we know none other caufe but that God sylveineth the one fort strengthened with his power that they perish not, and doth not giue the fame strength to the other fort, that they may be examples of inconstancie.

4. Further they preffe vs, saying, that exhorations are vainely taken in hande, that the vie of admonitions is superfluous, that it is a fond thing to rebuke, if it be not in the power of the finner to obey. When the like things in time past were objected against Augustine he was compelled to write the booke of Correction & Grace. Where although he largely wipe them away, yet he bringeth his aduersaries to this fumme: O man, in the commandement learne what thou oughtepest to doe: in correction leanlne that by thine owne fault thou haft it not: in praine learneth whence thou maist receiue that which thou wouldest haue. Of the same argument in a manner is the booke of the Spirite and Letter, where he teacheath that God measureth not the commandementes of his lawe by the strength of man, but when he hath commanded that which is right, hee freely gueueth to his elect power power to fulfill it. And this is no matter of long disputatiun: First wee are not onely in this cause, but also Christ and all the Apostles. Nowe let the other looke howe they will get the maisterie in straunding, that match themselves with such adueraries. Doeth Christ, which testifieth that we can do nothing without him, any thing the lesse rebuke and chastise them, y without our help in vall: Doeth he lesse exhort every man to appeale himselfe to good workes? Howse severely doeth Paul inuey against the Corinthians for neglecting of charitie; and yet hee prayeth for charitie to bee given to the same men from God. He testifieth in the Epistle to the Romanes, that it is neither of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God: hast mercie, and yet hee causeth not afterward to admonishe, to exhorte and to rebuke. Why doe they not therefore speake to the Lord, that he doe not so lose his labour in requiring of men those things which hee himselfe alone can give, & in punishing those things which are done for want of his grace? Why doe they not admonish Paul to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to runne, in the mercie of God, going before them which nowe hath forsaken them? As if the Lord had not a very good reason of his doctrine, which offereth it lesse readily to be founde of them that recently seeke it, but howe much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking doe worke of themselves, to the chaunging of the minde, Paul declareth, when hee wright that neither hee that planteth is any thing, nor hee that watereth, but the Lord that giueth the increase onely, effectually worketh. So wee see that Moses severally stablisheth the commandementes of the Law, and the Prophectes doe sharply call vpon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confesse, that men doe then onely waxe wise, when a hart is giuen them to understand, that it is the proper worke of God to circumcise his heartes, and in stead of stonge heartes to giue heartes of fleue, to write his lawe in the bowelles of men; finally, in renewing of soules to make that his doctrine may be effectuall.

5 Wherefore then serue exhortations? For this purpose: if they bee despised of the wicked with an obstinate heart, they shall be for a witnessse vnto them when they shall come to the judgement seate of the Lord, yea and even now already they beat and strike their conscience: for howsoeuer the most frowarde man laugheth them to scorn, yet can he not disprove them: but thou wilt say, what may fille miserable man do, if the softnesse of hart, which was necessarly required to obedience, be denied him? Nay rather, why doeth he excuse himselfe, when hee can impute the hardnesse of hearte to none but to himselfe? Therefore the wicked that are willingly ready to mocke them out if they might, are thrown downe with the force of them whether they will or no. But the cheefe profite towards the faithful is to be considered: in whom as the Lord worketh all things: by his spirit, he leaueth not the instrument of his word, and vtheth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stand, which is true, that all the strength of the godly resteth in the grace of God, according to that saying of the Prophet: I wil giue them a new hart, r they may walke in them. But thou wilt say, Why are they now admonished of their duetie, and not rather left to the direction of the holy Chrift? why are they moved with exhortation, sith they can make make no more haste than the stirring forward of the holy ghost worketh; why are they chastised if at any time they be gone out of the way, such they fell by the necessarie weakenesse of the flesh? O man, what arte thou to appoint a lawe for God? If it be his pleasure, that we be prepared by exhortation to receive the selfe same grace, whereby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what hast thou in this order to bite or carpe at? If exhortations and rebukings did nothing else profit with the godlie, but to rebuke them of sinne, they were euen for that thing onely to be compt not altogether vnprofitable. Nowe, forasmuch as by the holy Ghost working inwardly, they much auail to enflame the desire of goodnesse, to shake of sluggisshesse, to take away the pleasure and venymous sweetnesse of wickednesse, and on the other side to engender a hatred of irreformableness thereof: who dare cauall that they are superfluous? If any man require a plainer answer, let him take this: God worketh after two fortes in his elect, inwardly by his spirite, outwardly by his word: By his spirite, by enlightning their mindes, by framing their heartes to the loue and keeping of justice, he maketh them a new creature: By his word, he stirreth them to desirre, to seeke & attaine the same renewing: by them both he sheweth forth the effectuall working of his hand, according to the proportion of his distribution. When hee fendeth the same wordes to the reprobate, though not for their amendsment, yet he maketh it to serve for an other use: that both for the present time they may be presse with witnesse of conscience, and may against the day of judgement be made more inexcusable. So though Christ pronounce that no man commeth to him, but whome the Father draweth, and that the elect doe come when they have hearde and learned of the Father: yet doth not he neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calleth them, whome it necessarily behaueth to bee inwardly taught by the holy Ghost, that they may any thing profite. And Paul teacheth, that teaching is not in vaine with the reprobate, because it is to them the favour of death to death, but a sweete favour to God.

6 They be verie laborious in heapine together of testimonies of scripture: and that they doe of purpose, that when they can not oppresse vs with weight, they may yet with number. But as in battells, when it commeth to hande strokes, the weaker multitude howe much pompe and shewe foueuer it hath, is with a fewe stripes discomfited and put to flight: so shall it be verie caipe for vs to ouerthowe them with all their route. For, because the places that they abuse againste vs, when they are once dividde into their orders, doe meete upon a fewe speeclall points, wee shal with one aunfwere satisfie many of them therefore it shal not bee needfull to carrie ypon dissouling euerie one of them particullarly. Their chiefes force they fet in the comandementes, which they thinke to be so tempered to our stren-thes, that what foouer is proved to bee required by the one, it necessaril-ly followeth that it may be performed by the other. And therefore they runne through euerie of the comandementes, and by them doe measure the proportion of our strengthes. For (say they) either God mocketh vs when hee chargeth vs with holinesse, godlinesse, obedience, chaftitie, loue and meekenesse: and when hee forbiddeth vs uncleannesse, idolatrie, vncraft-nesse, neffe, wrath, robbery, pride, and such like: or he requireth only those things that are in our power. Nowe, we may deuide into three sorts in maner all the commandementes that they heape together. Some require our first connexion to God, some speake simply of the keeping of the law; some command vs to continue in the grace of God that we have received. First let vs speake of them all in generaltie, and then descend to the speciall fortes.

To extend the power of man to the commandementes of the lawe, hath in deed long ago began to be commone, & hath some shew: but it proceeded from most rude ignorance of the lawe. For they y thinke it a heinous offence, if it be said that the keeping of the lawe is impossible, doe rest forsooth upon this most strong argument, that else the lawe was giuen in vaine. For they speake in such sorte, as if Paul had no where spoken of the lawe. For I beseeche them, what meaneth these sayings, that the lawe was set because of transgressions: That by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne: That the lawe maketh sinne; that the lawe entred, that sinne might abound: was it meant that the lawe was to be limited to our strengthes, let it should bee giuen in vaine? or rather that it was set farre aboue vs to conscience our weakenesse? Truely by the fame mans definition, the end and fulfilling of the lawe is Charite. But when he wiseth the mindes of the Thefaulonians to be filled with charitie, he doth sufficiently confesse, that the lawe foundeth in our eares without profite, vnlesse God inspire the whole summe thereof in our heartes.

7 Truely, if the Scripture did teache nothing else, but that the lawe is a rule of life whereunto we ought to frame our endeouyr, I would also without delay agree to their opinion; but whereas it doth diligently and plainly declare vnto vs the manifold vse of the lawe: it is convenient rather to considerby that interpretation, what the lawe may doe in man. For so much as concerneth this present cause it teacheth that so soone as it hath appointed what we ought to doe, the power to obey commeth of the goodness of God, and therefore mouth vs to pray, whereby wee may require to have it giuen vs. If there were onely the commandement and no promise, then were our strength to be tried whether they were sufficient to assuere the commandement, but if there are promises joyned withall, which cries out, y not onely our aide, but also all our whole power consisteth in help of Gods grace, they doe testifie ynoough and more, that we are altogether vnfit, much more insufficient to keepe the lawe. Wherefore let this proportion of our strengthes with the commandementes of Gods lawe be no more enforced, as if the Lord had measured the rule of justice, which he purposed to giue in his lawe, according to the rate of our weakenesse. Rather by his promises we ought to consider, how vready we are of our felues which in every behalfe do so much neede his grace. But who (say they) shall be persuaded that it is like to be true, that the Lorde appointed his lawe to stones? Neither doth any man go about to perswade it. For the wicked are neither stones nor stones: when being taught by the lawe that their lustes doe strue against God, they are prooued guilty by their owne witnes. Nor yet the godly, when being put in minde of their weakenes they flee vnto grace. For which purpose serene these sayings of Augustine. The Lorde com-commandeth those things that we can not doe, that we may knowe what we ought to ask of him. Great is the profite of the commandements, if so much be giuen to free will, that the grace of God bee the more honoured. Faith obteineith that which the lawe commandeth, yea the lawe therefore commandeth, that faith may obteine that which was commanded by the lawe: yea God requireth faith itselfe of vs, and findeth not what to require, vnlesse he giue what to finde. Againe, Let God giue what he commandeth, and command what he will.

8 That shall more plainly be seene in rehearsing the three Forbes of commandements which we touched before. The Lord oftentimes commandeth both in the lawe and in the Prophetes, that we be converted vnto him. But on the other side, the Prophet answereth, Convert me, Lord, and I shall be converted: for after that thou didst convert me, I repented, &c. He commandeth vs to circumcise the vn-circumcised skanne of our heart: and by Moses he declareth that this circumcision is done by his owne hande. He each where requireth newnesse of heart, but in an other place he testifieth that it is giue by himselfe. That which God promiseth (faith Augustine) we do not by free will or nature, but he himselfe doth it by grace. And this is the same note that hee himselfe rehearseth in the fifth place among the rules of Ticonius, that we well make difference betweene the lawe and the promiseth, or betwene the commandements and grace. Now let them goe, that gather by the commandements whether man be able to do any thing toward obedience in such sort that they destroy the grace of God, by which the commandements themselves are fulfilled. The commandements of the second sort are simple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to serve and cleave vnto his will, to keepe his commandements, to followe his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that doe testifie that it is his gift we are righteously, holiness, godliness or purity may be had: Of the third sort was that exhortation of Paul and Barnabas to the faithful, which is rehearsed by Luke, that they should abide in the grace of God. But from whence that strenght of constancie is to be had, the same Paul teacheith in an other place. That remaineth, saith he, brethren, be ye strong throughout the Lorde. In an other place he forbiddeth vs, that wee doe not grieue the spiritu of God, wherewith we are sealed vp vnto the day of our redemption. But because the thing that he there requireth, could not be performed by men, therefore he wifheth it to the Thessalonians, from God, namely that he would reckon them worthy of his holy calling, & fulfil al the purpose of his goodnes, and the worke of faith in them. Likewise in the second Epistle to the Corinthians, entreating of almes, hee oftentimes commendeth their good and godly will, yet a little after, he thanketh God that put it in the heart of Titus, to take vpon him to giue exhortation. If Titus could not so much as ye the office of his mouth, to exhort other, but onely so far as God did put vnto him, how should other have bin willing to do, vnlesse God himselfe had directed their hearts?

9 The crasier sort of them do cauin at all these testimonies: because there is no impediment, but that wee may ioyne our owne strengthes, and God to helpe our weake endeavours. They bring also places out of the Pro-
Prophets, where the effect of our conversion seemeth to be parted in halfe betweene God and vs. Turne ye to me, and I will turne to you. What manner of helpe the Lorde bringeth vs, wee haue aboue shewed, and it is not needesfull here to repete it. This one thing I woulde haue granted mee, that it is vaine lyther gathered that there is required in vs a power to fulfill the law,because God doth commande the obedience of it: For as much as it is euident, that for the fulfilling of all the commandements of God, the grace of the law giveth is both necessarie for vs and promised vnto vs. Thereby the it appeareth, that at the leaft there is more required of vs than we are able to pay. And that saying of Hieremie can not bee wiped away with any cautiullions; that the couenaunt of God made with the auncient people was voide, because it was onely litterall, and that it coulde no otherwise be stablished, than when the spirite commeth vnto it, which frameth the harts to obedience. Neither dooth that saying, Turne ye to me, and I will turne vnto you, fauour their errour. For their is meant, not that turning of God, wherewith he renueth our hearts to repentance, but wherewith he by prospere of things doth declare himselfe favorable and mercifull: as by adueritie he sometime theweth his displeasure. Where as therefore the people being vexed with manie sorts of miseries, and calamities, did complain that God was turned away from them: he aunswereth, that they shall not be destitute of his fauour, if they returne to vprightnesse of life, and to him selfe that is the paterne of righteounesse: Therefore the place is wrongfully wrested, and it is drawn to this purpose, that the worke of our conversion shoulde seeme to bee parted betweene God and men. These things we haue comprehended so much the shortlier, because the proper place for this matter shall be where we entreat of the law.

10 The seconde sort of their argumentes is much like vnto the first, They alledge the promises whereby God doth couenaunt with our wil, of which sorte are: Seeke good and not euill, and yee shall liue. If ye will and doe heare, yee shall eate the good thinges of the earth: but if yee will not, the sworde shall deouer you, because the Lords mouth hath spoken it. Againe, If thou put away thine abominations out of my sight, then shall thou not bee druen out: If thou shalt obey diligently the voice of the Lorde thy God, and obserue and do all his commandements which I commaunde thee this day, then the Lorde thy God wil set thee on hie above all the nations of the earth. And other like. They doe inconueniently and as it were in mockerie thinke, that these beneiftes which the Lorde doth offer in his promises, are assigned to our owne wil: vnlesse it were in vs to stablish them or make them voide. And right easie it is to amplifie this matter with eloquent complaints, that the Lord doeth cruelly mocke vs, when hee pronounceth that his fauour hangeth vpon our will, if the same will bee not in our power: And that this liberalltie of GOD shoulde bee a goddly thing forthof, if hee so set his beneiftes before vs that wee haue no power to vse them: and a meruellous affrightnednesse of his promises, which hange vpon a thing impossible, so as they might never bee fulfilled. But of such promises as haue a condition adjoinned, wee will speake in an other place: So that it shall bee playne,
Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of

that there is no absurdity in the impossible fulfilling of them. And for so much as concerneth this place: I deny that God doth gently mock vs, when hee mouth vs to doseth his benesites, whome he knoweth to be vertely unable to do it. For whereas the promisses are offered both to the faith full and to the wicked, they have their vs with both sortes. As God with his commandementes priceth the confciences of the wicked, that they should not too sweetly take pleafure in their skinnes, without any remember-braunce of his judgementes: so in his promisses hee doth in a manner take them to witnesse, howe vnworthie they are of his goodnes. For who can denie that it is most rightfull and convenient, that the Lorde doe good to them of whom he is honoured, and punish the despriers of his Maiestie, according to his {seueritie? Therefore God doeth well and orderly when in his promisses he adjoineth this condition to the wicked that are bound with the fettres of sinne, that they shall then onely enjoy his benesites, if they depart from their wickednesse: or for this purpose onely, that they maye vnderstande that they are worthily excluded from these things, that are due to the true worshippers of God. Againe, because hee seeketh by all meanes to stirre vp the faithfull to call vpon his grace, it shall not bee inconuent, if hee attempt the same thing also by promisses, which we haue shewed that he hath done to great profite with commandements towardc them. Being enformed of the will of God, by his commandementes, wee are put in minde of our miferie, which doe withall our heart too farre difuent from the fame, and we be therewithall pricked forward to call vpon his Spirit, whereby we may be directed into the right way. But because our fluggiuehnesse is not sufficiently sharpened with commandementes, there are added promisses which with a certaine sweeteness may allure vs to the loue of them. And that the more desirous that wee haue of righteousnesse, wee may be the more furent to seek the favour of God. Loe howe in these requeftes, (If you will: If you shall heare,) the Lorde neither giueth vs power to will nor to heare, and yet mocketh vs not for our want of power.

11 The thirde sorte of their argumentes, hath also great affinitie with the two former. For they bring forth the places wherein God reprocheth the vthankefull people, and faith that they themselves onely were the cause that they receiued not of his tender loue all kinde of good things.
Of which sort are the places: Amaleck and the Chananee are before you, with whose swords you shall fall, because yee would not obey the Lorde, because I called and yee aunswered not. I will doe to this house as I did to Silo. Againe, this nation hath not hearde the voyce of the Lord their Gods, nor hath receiyed discipline, therefore it is cast away from the Lorde.
Againe, because ye haue hardened your heart and woulde not obey the Lorde, all these euilles are happened vnto you. Howe (say they) could such reproches be laide against them which might readily aunswer? As for vs, wee loued prosperitie, and feared adueritie. But where as for to obtaine the one and auoide the other wee obeyed not the Lord, nor heart-kened to his voyce: this was the cause thereof, for that it was not at our libertie so to do, because we were subiect to to the dominion of sinne. Vainely
Ly therefore are these evils laid to our charge, which it was not in our power to avenge. But leaving the pretence of necessity, wherein they have but a weak and sickly defence, I ask of them whether they can purge them selves of all fault. For if they be found guilty of any fault, then the Lord doth not without cause reproach them, that it came to pass by their peruersties, that they felt not the fruiture of his clemencie. Let them answer therefore, whether they can deny, that their froward will was the cause of their stubbornesse. If they finde the spring head of the cuil within themselves, why gape they to finde out foreign causes, that they might seeme not to have bene authors of their own destruction? But if it be true that by their owne fault, and none others, sinners are both deprived of the benefits of God, & chastised with punishments, then is there great reason why they should heare these reproches at the mouth of God: that if they goe obstinatly forward in their faults, they may learne in their miseries rather to accuse and abhorre their owne wickednesse, than to blame God of vnintent cruelty: that if they have not cast off all willingness to learne, they may be wery of their sinnes, by the deferuings whereof they see themselves miserable & vndone, and may retorne into the way, and acknowledge the same with earnest confession which the Lord rehearseth in chiding them. For which purpose it appeareth by the solemne prayer of Daniel, which is in the ninth Chapter, that those chidings of the Prophets which are alleged, did availe with the Godly. Of the first vs we see an example in the Jewes, to whom the Hieremie is commanded to declare the cause of their miseries, whereas yet it should not have fallen otherwise than the Lord had foresaid. Thou shalt speake vnto them all these words, and they shall not heare thee: thou shalt call them, and they shall not answer thee. To what ende then did they sing to deafe men? that being even loth and vnwilling, yet they should underftand? it was true that they heard, that it were wicked sacrilege if they should lay upon God the blame of their evils which rested in themselves. By these fewe solutions thou maist easily deluer thy selfe from the infinite heap of testimonies, which, for to create an image of free will, the enemies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as well out of the commandments as out of the protestations against profcssors of the law. It is reprochfully spoken in the Psalm concerning ye Jewes: A froward generation that have not made their heart strait. Also in another Psalm, the Prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their hearts, and that because all the fault of obstinacie remaineth in the peruerstie of men. But it is fondly gathered thereof, that the heart is pliable to either side, the preparing whereof is only of God. The Prophet faith: I have enclined my heart to kepe thine commandements: because he had willingly and with a chearfull earnest affection of minde added himselfe to God, and yet he doeth not boast himselfe to be the author of his owne inclination, which he confesseth in the same Psalm to be the gift of God. Therefore wee must holde in minde the admonition of Paul, where he biddeth the faithfull to worke their owne salvation with fear and trembling, because it is the Lord that worketh both the willing and the perfoming. In deede he affigneth them offices, to be doing, that they should not give themselves to sluggisht-fluggishnesse of the flesh: but in that he commandeth them to have feare & carefulnesse, he do humbleth them, that they may remember that the same thing which they are commanded to do, is the proper worke of God, wherein plainly he expresseth, that the faithfull worke, passively, as I may so call it, in so much as power is ministred them from heauen, that they should claim nothing at all to themselves. Wherefore when Peter exhorteth vs that we should add power in faith, he granteth not vnto vs a second office, as if we should do any thing feuerally by our selues, but onely he awaketh the slothfulnesse of the flesh, wherewith commonly faith it selfe is choked. To the same purpose seemeth that saying of Paul: Extinguith not the spirit, for slothfulnesse doth oftentimes creep upon the faithfull, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their own choice to cherish the light being offred them, his ignorance shall be easily confused: because the selfe same diligence that Paul requireth, commeth onely from God. For we are also oftentimes commanded to purge our selues from all filthinesse: whereas the holy Gost doeth claime to himselfe alone the office of making holy. Finally, that by way of granting, the same thing is conveyed to vs that properly belongeth to God, is plainly by the words of John: Whosoever is of God, saueth himselfe. The aduauncers of freewill take holde of this saying, as if we were faulted partly by the power of God, and partly by our owne: as though we had not from heauen the very same safe keeping, whereof the Apostle makest mention. For which cause, Christ also prayeth his Father to saue vs from euil, and we knowe that the godly, while they warre against Satan, doe get the victorie by no other armour and weapons, but by the armour and weapons of God. Wherefore when Peter commandeth vs, to purifie our soules in the obedience of truth, hee by & by addeth as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghost,) Finally, how mans strength are no force in the spirituall battell, John briefly comprehended, when he sayeth, that they which are begotten of God, cannot sinne, because the seed of God abideth in them. And in another place, he rendereth a reason why: that for our faith is the victorie that ouercommeth the world.

Yet there is alleged a testimonie out of the law of Moses, which seemeth to be much against our salvation. For after the publishing of the lawe, he protesteth vnto the people in this manner. The commandement that I commaund thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither farre of: It is not in heauen, but hard by thee, it is in thy mouth and in thy heart, thou shouldest do it. Truely if this be taken to be spoken of the bare commandements, I grant they be of no small weight to this present matter. For though it were ease to mocke it out with saying, that here is spoken not of the easinesse and readiness of &beration, but of knowledge: Yet euens so, peraduenture it would also leaue some doubt. But the Apostle which is no doubtfull expositor, taketh away all doubt from vs, which affirmeth that Moses here spake of the doctrine of the Gospell. But if any obstinate man will say, that Paul violently wrested those words, they might be drawn to the Gospell, although his boldnes so to say that not be without impietie, yet is there sufficient matter beside the authoritie of the Apostle to convince him withall. For if Moses spake speake of the commandementes onely, then he puffed vp the people with a most vaine confidence. For what should they els haue done, but thrown them selues downe hedlong, if they had taken vppon them the keeping of the law by their owne strength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that so ready eafinesse to keepe the law, where there is no accesse vnto it, but by a hedlong fall to destruction? Wherfore there is nothing more certain, than that Moses in these wordes did meane the covenant of mercy, which he had publisht together with the streight requiring of the lawe. For in a fewe yeres before he had taught, that our heartes must be circumcised by his hand of God, that we may loue him. Therefore he placed that eafinesse, whereof he freightway after speaketh, not in the strengt of man, but in the helpe & succor of his holy Ghost, which performeth his worke mightely in our weaknesses. Albeit his place is not simply to be vnderstanding of the commandements, but rather of the promises of the Gospel, which are so farre from establishing a power in vs to obtaine righteousnesse, that they utterly ouerthrowe it. Paul considering that same, proueth by this testimony, that salvation is offered vs in the Gospel, not vnder that hard and impossible condition, where with the lawe dealteth with vs, that is, that they onely shall attaine it which haue fulfilled all the commandements, but vnder a condition that is easie, ready, and plaine to come vnto. Therefore this testimony makest nothing to challenge freedom to the will of man.

Osee. 5.14.

Deue. 30. 8.

13 There are also certaine other places wont to be objected, whereby is shewed that God sometime, withdrawing the succor of his grace, trieth men, and waiteth to see to what ende they will apply their endeavours, as is that place in Osee: I will go to my place till they put it in their heart & seke my face. It were a fond thing (say they) if the Lord should consider whether Israel would secke his face, vs that their mindes were pliable that they might after their own wil incline themselves to one side or the other. As though this were not a thing commonly vsed with God in the Prophets, to make a shewe as if he did despise and cast away his people, till they haue amended their life. But what will the aduerfaries gather out of such threatninges? If they mean to gather, that the people being forfaken of God, may purpose their owne saluation: all the Scripture shall cry out against them in so doing. If they confesse that the grace of God is necessarie to conversion, why situeth they with vs? But they doe grant it necessarie, that still they will haue mans power preferred vnto him. Howe proue they that truely not by this place, nor any like to it. For it is one thing, to depart aside from man, and to looke what he will do being giuen ouer and left to himselfe, and an other thing to help his little strengt after the measure of his weaknesses. What then (will some man say) do these maners of speaking mean? I answere that they are as much in effect, as if God had sayde: Forasmuch as I preuaile nothing with this stubborne people by admonishing, exhorting and rebuking, I will withdrawe my selfe a while: and sitte still and suffer them to bee afflicted: I will see if at length, after long miseries, they will begin to remember me, to secke my face. The Lordes going farre away, signifieth the taking away of Prophecy: his looking what men will doe, signifieth that hee keeping silence, and as it were hiding himselfe, doeth for a time exercise them them with diverse afflictions. Both these things he doth to humble vs the more. For we should sooner be dulled than amended with the scourges of adversity, vnlesse he did frame vs to that tractableness by his Spiritu. Now whereas the Lord being offended, and in a manner wearied with our obstinate stubbornnesse, doth not for a time leave vs (that is by taking away his word in which he is wont to giue vs a certaine presence of himselfe) & doth make a proue what we would doe in his absence, it is falsely gathered hereof that there is any strength of free wil that he should beholde and trie, for-asmuch as he doth it to no other ende, but to drive vs to acknowledge our owne being nothing.

14. They bring also for their defence the continual manner of speaking, that is vsed both in the Scriptures and in the talke of men. For good works are called ours, and it is no lesse saide that wee doe the thing that is holy and pleasing to God, than that we committe finnes. But if finnes be justly imputed to vs, as proceeding from vs, truely in righteous doings also somewhat by the same reason ought to be asigned vnto vs. For it were against reason that it should be saide that we doe those things, to the doing whereof being vnable of our own motion, we are moved by God like stones. Therfore though we giue the chiefe part to the grace of God, yet these manners of speaking doe shewe that our endeavour hath also yet a second parte. If that thing onely were still enforced, that good workes are called ours, I would object againe, that the bread is called ours, which we pray to haue gi-uen vs of God. What will they get by the title of possession, but that by the bountifullnesse and free gift of God, the same thing becommeth ours, which otherwise is not due vnto vs? Therefore either let them laugh at the same absurdity in the Lordes prayer, or let them not recketh this to be laughed at, that good workes are called ours, in which we haue no property, but by the liberallie of God. But this is somewhat stronger, that the Scripture oftentimes affirmeth that we our selues do worship God, obey his lawe and apply good workes. Sith these are the dueties properly belonging to vs, and will: how could it agree that these things are both referred to the holy Ghost, and also attributed to vs, vnlesse there were a certaine communicating of our endeavour with the power of God? Out of these snares we shall easily vnwinde our selues, if we well consider the manner howe the spirite of the Lord worketh in the holy ones. The similitude wherewith they enuiously preffe vs is from the purpose, for who is so fond to thinke that the mouing of man differeth nothing from the casting of a stone? Neither doth any such thing followe of our doctrine. We reckne among the naturall powers of man, to allowe and refuse, to will and not wil, to endeavour and to resit,that is, to allowe vanity and to refuse perfect goodness, to wil euill and to be vn-willing to good, to endeaveour our selues to wickednes and to resit righteous-nesse. What doth the Lord hercin? If it be his wil to vse that peruerseuenesse as an instrument of his wrath, he directeth and appointeth it to what end he will, that he by an euill hand may execute his good workes. Shall we then compare a wicked man that so merueth the power of God, whose labour he onely to obey his owne lust, to a stone that is being thrown by the violence of an other, is caried neither with moving nor sense nor will of his owne?
We see how much difference there is. But what doth he in good things, of which is our principal question? when he executeth his kingdom in them, he by his spirit restraineth mans will, that it be not carried vp and downe with wandering lustes, according to the inclination of nature: and that it may be bent to holiness and righteousness, he boweth, frameth, fashioneth and directeth it to the rule of his righteousness: and if it should not stumble or fall, he doth establish and confirm it with the strength of his spirit. For which reason Augustine faith: Thou wilt say vnto me: then are we wrought & worke not. Yea, thou both workest & art wrought, and thou workeft well when thou art wrought of that which is good. The spirit of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that worke, and giueth himselfe the name of a helper, for that thou also workest somewhat. In the first parte he teacheth, that mans working is not taken away by the moouing of the Holy Ghost, because will is of nature, which is ruled to aspire to goodnesse. But where he by and by ad- deth, that by the name of helper, may be gathered that wee also doe work somewhat, we ought not so to take it, as if he did giue any thing severally to vs: but because he would not cherish slothfulnesse in vs, he so matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to will well of grace. Therefore he said a little before, Vnleffe God help vs, wee shall not be able to ouercome, no nor yet to fight at all.

15 Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the word is taken when we speake of regeneration) is the rule of the spirite, to direct & gouerne the will of man. And it cannot gouerne it, vnleffe it correct it, reforme it, and renewe it (from whence we say that the beginning of regeneration is, that that which is ours might be destroyed) and vnleffe it move it, stirre it, drive it forward, carry it and hold it. Whereupon we do truely say, that all the doings that proceede from it, are wholly the onely worke of the same grace. In the mean time we deny not that it is very true that Augustine teacheth, that will is not destroied by grace, but rather repaired. For both these things stand very well together: that mens will be said to be restored, when the faultinesse and peruerstinesse thereof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of justice; and also that a new will be said to be created in man, forasmuch as it is so defiled and corrupted, that it needeth vttterly to put on a new nature. Now is there no cause to the contrary, but that we may well be said to do the same thing that the spirit of God doeth in vs, although our own will do of it selfe giue vs toward it nothing at all, that may be seuered from his grace. And therefore we must keepe that in minde, which wee have elsewhere alleged out of Augustine, that some do in vaine trauaile to find in the will of man some good thing that is properly her owne. For whatsoeuer mixture men trauayle to bring from the strengthe of free will to the grace of God, it is nothing but a corrupting of it, as if a man would delay wine with dittie and bitter water. But although whatsoeuer good is in the wil of man, it procedeth from the meere instinct of the holy Ghost, yet because it is naturally planted in vs to will, it is not without cause said, that we doe those things whereof God chalengeth the praise to himselfe. First, because it is ours whatsoeuer by his goodnesse he worketh in vs, so that we understand it to be not of our selues: and then because the mind is ours, the will is ours, the the endeavours which are by him directed to good.

16 Those other testimonies believe these, that they scrape together here and there, shall not much trouble even meanie writeth that have well conceived only the solutions above said. They allege that saying out of Genesis, Thine appetite shall be under thee, and thou shalt bear rule over it. Which they expound of sinne, as if the Lord did promise to Cain, that the force of sinne should not get the upper hand in his minde, if he would labour in subduing of it. But we say that it better agreeeth with the order of the text, that this be taken to be spoken of Abel. For there Gods purpose was to reprove the wickednesse of envy that Cain had conceived against his brother. And that he doth two wayes. One, that in vaine he imagined mischief to excel his brother in Gods sight, before whom no honor is gien but into righteouesnesse: the other, that he was too much unthankfull for the benefit of God which he had already received, which could not abide his brother, although he did him subject under his authoritie. But least we should seem therefore to embrace this exposition, because the other is against vs: let vs admit that God spake of sinne. If it be so, then God either promiseth or commandeth that which he there declareth. If he commandeth, then we wee alreadie knewed that thereby followeth no proofe of the power of man. If he promiseth, where is the fulfilling of the promise? For Cain became subject to sinne, ouer which he shoule haue had dominion. They will say, that in the promise was included a secret condition, as if it had ben said, that he should have the victory if he would strive for it. But who will receive these crooked compasses? For if this dominion be meant of sinne, then no man can doubt that it is spoken by way of commandement, wherein is not determined what we are able to do, but what we ought to do, yea though it be above our power. Albeit both the matter is selfe and the order of Grammar do require, that there be a comparison made of Caine and Abel, because the elder brother should not haue ben set behind the younger, vnlesse he had become worse by his owne wicked doing.

17 They vse also the testimony of the Apostle, which faith, that it is not of him y willet, nor of him y runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Whereby they gather that there is somewhat by mans will and endeavour, which of itself though it be weak, being holpen by the mercy of God, is not without prosperous successe. But if they did soberly wey what matter Paul there intreate of, they would not so vnaduisedly abuse this sentence. I knowe that they may bring forth Origen and Hierome for mainteneers of their exposition: and I could on the other side set Augustine against them. But what they haue thought, it maketh no matter to vs, if we know what Paul meant. There he teacheth that satisfaction is prepared onely for them, to whom the Lord vouchsafe to graunt his mercy: and that ruine & destruction is prepared for all those that he hath not chosen. He had under the example of Pharao declared the state of the reprobate, and had also confirmed the afflic- rednesse of free election by the testimony of Moses, I will haue mercy vpon whom I will haue mercy. Now he concludeth, that it is not of him that will, or of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. If it be thus vnunder- standed, y will or endeavours are not sufficient, because they are too weake for
To great a weight, that which Paul sayth, had not bin aptly spoken: Therefore away with these suttleties, to say: It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, therefore there is some will, there is some running. For Pauls meaning is more simply, thus: It is not will, it is not running ye get vs the way to salvation, herein is onely the mercy of God. For he speaketh no otherwise in this place than he doth to Titus, where he wrieth, that ye goodnesse and kindnesse of God appeareth not by the works of righteousness, which we have done, but for his infinite mercy. They themselves that make this argument, that Paul meant that there is some will and some running, because he saith, ye it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, would not give me leave to reason after the same fashion, that we have done some good works, because Paul sayth, that we have not attained the goodnesse of God by ye good works we have done. If they see a fault in this argument, let them open their eyes, and they shall perceive that their own is not without the like deceit. For that is a sure reason that Augustine resteth upon, if it were therefore sayd, that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, because neither the will nor the running is sufficient: Then it may be turned on the contrary part that it is not of the mercy of God, because it alone worketh not. Sith this second is an absurdity, Augustine doth right fully conclude, that this is spoken to this meaning, that there is no good will of man, vnlesse it be prepared of the Lord, not but that we ought both to wil and to runne, but because God worketh both in vs. No lesse vnaply do some wrest that sayinge of Paul: Wee are the workers with God, which out of doute ought to be refrayned onely to the ministres: and that they are called workers with him, not that they bring any thing of themselves, but because God vlieth their servise, after that he hath made them meete and furnished with necessarie gifts.

18 They bring forth Eccelsiausticus, who, as it is not vknown, is a writer of whose authority is doubted. But although we refuse it not (which yet we may lawfully doe) what doth he resifie for free will? He sayth, that man so soone as he was created, was left in the hande of his owne counsell: that commandementes were given him, which if he observerd, he shoulde againe be preferued by them: that before man was set life and death, good & euill: that whatsoever he would, should be giuen him. Be it, ye man received from his creation power to obtaine either life or death. What if upon the other side we answere that he left it? Truely my minde is not, to speake against Salomon, which affirmeth that man at the beginning was create upright, and he forged vnto himselfe many inventions. But because man in swartning, lost as it were by shipwracke both himselfe and all his good things, it followeth not by and by, that all that is giuen to his first creation belongeth to his nature being corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I answere, not to them only, but also to Eccelsiausticus himselfe whatsoever he be. If thou meanest to instruct man, to seeke within himselfe power to attaine salvation, thy authority is not of so great force with vs, that it may be any prejudice, be it never so small, against ye vndouted word of God. But if thou only study to restraine the malice of the flesh, which in laying the blame of her owne euills vpon God, vseth to seeke a vaine defence for it selde, and therefore thou answrest that uprightness was given unto men, whereby it may appear that himselfe was cause of his owne destruction, I willingly agree unto it: so that againe thou agree in this with me, that now by his owne fault he is spoyled of those ornaments, wherewith God had clothed him at the beginning: & that so we confesse together, that now he more needeth a Phisitian than a defender.

19 Yet they have nothing of offence in their mouth than the parable of Christ of the wayfaring man, whom theues laid abroad halfe head in that way. I know it is common almost with all writers, that the calamity of mankind is represented vnder the figure of that wayfaring man. Thereupon doe our aduersaries gather an argument, that man is not so maymed with that robberie of sin and the Deuil, but that he keepeth still remaining the leauings of his former good things, forasmuch as it is said, that he was left halfe alife. For where is that halfe life, vnlesse some portion both of right reafon and will remained? First if I would not give place to their allegroy, I beseech you, what would they doe? For there is no doubt that it was devised by the fathers beside the natural sense of the Lords words. Allegories ought to go no further than they have the rule of Scripture going before them: so farre is it of, that they be by them seules sufficient to ground any doctrines. And there want not reasons, whereby I can, if I list, overthrow this devise, for the word of God leaueth not to man halfe a life, but teacheth that he is utterly dead, forasmuch as concerneth blessed life. And Paul when he speaketh of our redemption, doth not say that we were healed, when we were halfe dead & halfe alife, but that we were raised vp againe when we were dead. He calleth not upon them that are halfe alife to receive the light of Christ, but them that sleepe and are buried. And in like maner speakest the Lorde himselfe, when he sayth, that the houre is come when the dead shall arise againe at his voyce. With what face would they set this light allusion against so many plaine sentences? But let this allegory haue the force of a certaine testimony, yet what shall they wring out of vs thereby? Man is halfe alife, therfore he hath somwhat left safe. I grant: he hath a wit capable of vnderstanding, although it pearce not to the heauenly and spirituall wisdome: he hath true judgement of honesty: he hath some feeling of the godhead howbeit that he attaine not the true knowledge of God. But to what purpose come all these things? Truly they bring not to passe the same saying of Augustine be taken from vs, which is also approved by common consent of his Scholes: that after mens fall the freely given good things, whereupon salvation hangeth, are taken away from him, and that his natural gifts are corrupted & defiled. Lette therefore this truth remaine with vs vn doubted, which can be shaken by no engines, that the minde of man is so estranged from the righteounesse of GOD, that it conceieth, coveteth, and enterpriseth all wickednesse, filthinesse, uncleannesse, and mischiefe: that his heart is so throughly loaked in poisen of sinne, that it can breath out nothing but corrupt sinke: But if at any time they doe utter any goodnesse in shewe, yet still the minde remaineth alway wrapped in hypocriſfe and deceitfull crookednesse, and the heart entangled with inward peruerſenesse.

Sith all mankind hath perished in the Person of Adam, that excellence and nobilitie of beginning which wee have spoken of woulde so little profire vs, that it woule rather turne to our greater shame, till God appeare the redeemer in the person of his onely begotten Sonne, which acknowledgment not men defiled and corrupted with sinne to bee his worke. Therefore sith we are fallen from life into death, all that knowledge of God the creature whereof we have entreated, were unprofitable, vnlesse there followed also faith setting forth God a father vnfo vs in Christ. Truely this was the natural order that the frame of the world should be a Schoole vnto vs to learne godliness, from whence might be made a passage for vs to eternall life and perfect felicite: but since our falling away, whether foucer we turne our eyes, upwarde & downwarde, the curse of God still presenth itself vnto our sight, which while it possesth and enwrappeth innoccent creatures by our fault, must needes overthrow our owne foules with despiration. For although Gods will is that his fatherly favour tawarde vs doe still many ways appeare: yet by beholding of the worlde wee cannot gather that hee is our Father when our conscience inwardly prickt vs, & sheweth that there is in sin just cause of forsaking, why God should not accompte or reekon vs for his children. Beside that there is in vs both bloudfulness and vnhankfulnesse: becausse both our minds, as they bee blinded, doe not see the truth, and also as all our senses be peruerse, we mali-cioufly defraude God of his glorie. Therefore wee must come to that saying of Paul: becausse in the wisdome of God, the worlde knew not God by wisdome, it pleased God by the foolishnesse of preaching to saue them that believe. The wisdome of God hee calleth this honourable stage of heauen and earth, furnisshed with innumerable miracles, by beholding whereof wee ought wisely to haue known God. But because we so ill profited therein, he calleth vs backe to the faith of Christ, which for that it speedeth, is called the foolishnesse, the vnbelieuers do disdain. Wherefore although the preaching of the crosse do not agree with mans wit, yet ought we humblie to embrace it, if we desire to returne to God our creator and maker, that he may beginne againe to be our father. Truely since the fall of the first man, no knowledge of God auailed to saluation, without the Mediator. For Christ speakeith not of his owne age onely, but comprehende all ages, when he faith that this is the eternall life, to knowe the father the one true God, and him whome he hath sent Iesus Christ. And so much the fowler is their sluggishnesse, which take vpon them to set open heauen to all prophane & vnbelieuers, without his grace, whom the Scripture calleth to be the onely gate whereby wee enter into saluation. But if any will restraine that saying of Christ onely to the publishing of the Gospell, wee haue in readiness wherewith to confute him. For this hath beene a common sentence in all ages and among all nations, that without reconciliation they that are estranged from God, and pronounced accursed, & the children of wrath, can not please God. And here may be also alleged that which Christ answered to the woman of Samaria: Ye worship what ye know not, but we worship that which we know: because the salvation is from the Jews. In which words he both condemneth of falsehood all the religions of the Gentiles, and also assigneth a reason why, for that the Redeemer was promised under the law to the only chosen people. Whereupon it followeth, that no worship ever pleased God, but that which had respect unto Christ. For which cause also Paul affirmeth that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and void of the hope of life. Now where as John teacheth that life was from the beginning in Christ, and that all the world fel from it, we must returne to the same fountain Christ. And therefore Christ, in so much as he is the reconciler, affirmeth himselfe to be the life. And true the entrance of heaven belongeth to none, but to the children of God. But it is not meete that they be accompted in the place and degree of children, that are not grafted into the body of the only begotten sonne. And John plainly testifieth, that they which believe in his name, are made the children of God. But because it is not directly my purpose yet to discourse of faith in Christ, therefore it shall for this time be sufficient to have touched it by the way.

2 And therefore God never shewed himselfe mercifull to the olde people, nor ever did put them in any hope of grace without the Mediatour. I omit to speake of the sacrifices of the lawe, wherein faithfull were openly and plainly taught, that salvation is no where else to be sought, but in the cleansing which was performed by Christ alone. Only this I say, y the blessed and happy state of the church hath ben alway grounded upon the person of Christ. For though God comprehended all the issue of Abraham in his covenant, yet doeth Paul wisely reason, that Christ is properly that seed in whom all nations were to be blessed, forasmuch as we knowe that not all they were reckenned his seede that were begotten of him according to the flesh. For (to speake nothing of Ismael and other) howe came it to passe that of the two spawning of Isaac, that is Esau and Iacob, brethren borne at one birth, while they were yet together in their mothers wombe, the one was chosen, the other refuseth? Yea howe came it to passe that the elder was reiectted and the yonger only tooke place? And howe also came it to passe, that the greater part should be forfaken? It appeareth therefore, that the seede of Abraham was principally reckenned in one person, and that the promised salvation did never stande sure till it came to Christ, whose office is to gather together the things that were scattered abroad. Therefore the first adoption of the chosen people did hang upon the grace of the Mediatour. Which though it be not in so plaine wordes expressed by Moses, yet it sufficiently appeareth that it was commonly known to all the godly. For before that there was any king create among the people, Hanna the mother of Samuel entreating of the felicity of the godly, euen then saide thus in her song: God shall give strength to his king, and shall exalt y horne of his anointed. In which wordes the meaneth that God shall blesse his Church. Wherewith also agreeth y oracle that is within a little after adjoyned: The Priest whom I shall appoint shall walke before mine anointed.
Neither is it to be doubted, but that the will of the heavenly father was to have the lively image of Christ to be seen in David & his posterity. Therefore meaning to exhort the godly to the fear of God, he bid them to kiss the Sonne. Wherewith this saying of the Gospel also agreeth: He that honoureth not the Sonne, honoureth not the father. Therefore although by falling away of ten tribes the kingdom decayed: yet it behooved the covenant to stand which God had made in David and his successors: as also he said by the Prophets: I will not altogether cut of the kingdom, for David my servants sake, and for Hierusalem's sake, whom I have chosen: but there shall remaine one tribe to thy Sonne. Where the same thing is repeated the second and third time. It is also expressly added: I will afflict the seed of David, but not for ever. Within a little space of time after, it is said: For David his servants sake God hath given a light in Hierusalem, to raise vppe a Sonne and to keepe Hierusalem in safety. Now when the state grew toward destruction, it was said againe: God would not scatter Judah for David his servants sake, because he had spoken that he would give a light to him and his sons for ever. Finally this is the summe, that all other being past over, only David was chosen, vpon whom the good pleasure of God should rest. As in another place it is said: He hath refused the tabernacle of Silo, and the tabernacle of Tophet, and he hath not chosen the tribe of Ephraim, but he hath chosen the tribe of Judah the mount Sion which he hath loved. Hee hath chosen his Servant David to Sceed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. To conclude, it pleased God so to saue his church, that safety and preservacion thereof should hang vpon that one head, and therefore David crieth out, The Lord, the strength of his people, the strength of the salvation of his Christ. And by and by he addeth a prayer: Saue thy people & bless thine inheritance: meaning that the state of the Church is with unseparable knot JOINED to the government of Christ. And in the same meaning in another place: Lord saue vs; Let the king heare vs in the day that we shall call vpon him. In which words he plainly teacheth, the faithful did vpon none other confidence flee to the helpe of God, but because they were hidden under the succour of the king. Which is gathered by an other Psalm. Lord saue vs: Blessed is he that commeth in the name of the Lord. Where it is plainly inough, the faithful are called back into Christ, that they may hope they shall be saue by the hand of God. The same respect hath other prayer, where the Church calleth vpon the mercie of God. Let thy hand be vpon thy man of thy right hand, vpon the Sonne of man, whom thou hast preferred (or appointed) to thy selfe. For though the author of the psalme bewaileth the scattering abroad of his whole people, yet he praieth for their restitutio in the head alone. Where, when the people was led away into exile, the land wasted, and all things to mans reasoning destroied, Jeremy lamenteth the owrthrowe of the Church, he doth principally complaine that by destruction of the kingdom all hope was cut off from the faithful. Christes (faith hec) the spirite of our mouth is taken in our finnes, to whom we said: In thy shadowe we shall live among the nations. Hereby now it sufficiently appeareth that because God can not be mercifull to mankinde without the Mediatour, therefore Christes was alway set before the holy fathers in time of
of the law to whom they might direct their faith.

Nowe, where comfort is promised in affliction, specially where the deliverance of the Church is described, there the banner of affiance and hope is avanced in Christ alone. God went out to the sauing of his people with his Messiah, faith Habacuc. And so oft as the Prophets make mention of the restoring of the Church, they call backe the people to the promise made to David, concerning the euerlafting continuance of the kingdom. And no maruell. For otherwise there had bin no assurance of the covenant. For which purpose serveth that notable answere of Esay. For when he saue that y vnbelieving king Achaz refused that which he had declared to him of the raising of the siege of Hierusalem and of present fafetie, as it were soberly, he passt over to Messias. Behold a virgine shall conceiue and bring forth a son, meaning indirectly that though the king and his people by their frowardnesse refused the promise offered vnto them, as though they did of purpose bend themselves to discredite the truth of God, yet the covenant should not be void, but that the Redeemer should come at his appointed time. Finally it was the care of all the Prophets, to the ende they might shewe that God would be mercifull, alway to set out that kingdom of David, whereupon hanged the redemption and euerlafting saluation. So Esay saith: I will make a covenant with you the faithfull mercies of David. Behold I haue given him for a witneffe vnto nations, that is, because the faithfull when their state is at the worst, could not otherwise have any hope, but by the meanes of him being witneffe, that God would bee appeasable toward them. Likewise Hieremy, to raise them vp being in despaire, faith: Beholde the daies come, wherein I will raise vp vnto David a righteous branche, and then shall Juda be saued, and Israel shall dwell in fafetie. And Esay. Behold I will raise vp one sheepheard ouer my sheepe, even David my feruant. I the Lord will be a God to them, and my feruant David for a sheepeheard. And I will make a covenant of peace with them. Also in an other place, after he had entreated of the incredible rening, he faith: my feruant David shall be their king, and there shalbe one sheepeheard ouer all, and I will make an euerlafting covenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a fewe places out of many, because I onely mean to haue the readers put in minde, that the hope of all the godly hath alway beene repose no where else, but in Christ. And all the other Prophets also speake agreeably hereunto, as it is saide in Osee. The children of Juda and the children of Israel shalbe gathered together, and shall appoint to themselves one head. Which he afterward more plainly expoundeth, The children of Israel shall returne, and shall secke for the Lord their God and David their king. And Michele speaking of the returne of the people expressly faith, The king shall go before them, and the Lord in their head. So Amos meaning to praise the rening of the people, faith: I will in that day raise vp the tabernacle of David that is fallen downe, and I will hedge vp the gappes, and raise vp the places ouerthrown, euen because that was the onely standard of saluation, to haue the royall glorie to rife vp againe on his in the stocke of David, which is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore Zacharie, as his age was nereer to the appearing of Christ, so doth he more plainly crie out: be glad glad thou daughter of Zion, rejoice thou daughter of Hierusalem. Beholde thy king commeth, righteous and saue. Which agreeith with the place of the Psalm before allledged. The Lord exile the strength of the salutations of his anointed, Lorde saue vs. Where salutation is derived from the head to the whole bodie, 4 It was Gods will to have the Iewes instruxted with these prophécies, that to seeke for their deliverance, they should bend their eyes directly to Christ. And though they had shamefully swarued, yet could not the remembrance of the generall principle be abolished, that God by the hand of Christ, as he had promised to David, would be the deliuerer of his Church, and to the covenante should be of his owne free grant, whereby God had adopted his chosen. Hereby it came to passe, that this song founded in the mouth of the children when Christ a little before his death entred into Hierusalem, Hoftanna, to the sonne of David. For it appeareth that it was commonly knowne and spoken of, and according to common use that they sung that the onely pledge of Gods mercie remained vnto them, in the coming of the Redeemer. For this cause Christ himselfe, to make his disciples plainly and perfectly beleue in God, biddeth them to beleue on himselfe, Beleeue ye in God (faith he) then beleue also in mee. For though (to speake properly) faith climeth vp from Christ to the father, yet hee meaneth that the same faith, albeit it rest vp on God, doth by little & little vanish away vnlesse he become a meane to holde it in an assured fidelitie. Otherwise the maiestie of God is too hie for mortall men, which creep vp the grondes like wormes, to attaine vnto it. Wherefore I allowe that common sayling, that God is the object of faith, but in such force that it needeth correction. Because Christ is not in vaine called the invisible Image of God, but by this title we are put in minde, that if wee finde not God in Christ, saluation cannot be knowne vnto vs. For although among the Iewes, the Scribes and Pharisaees had darkened with false intentions, that which the Prophets had spoken concerning the Redeemer; yet Christ tooke it for a thing confessed as receiued by common consent, that there was none other remedie, in a dispered case, & none other meane of deliuering the Church, but by giving the Mediator. In deede that was not commonly known aamong the people as it ought to haue beene, which Paul teacheth, y Christ is the end of the lawe. But how true and assured it is, doth plainly appeare by the law & the Prophets. I speake not yet of faith, because there shall be elsewhere a more convenient place for it. One lie let the readers holde this as fast established, that the first degree of godlineffe be, to acknowledge God to be a Father vnto vs, to defende, gouerne and cherish vs, till he gather vs together into the everlastinge inheritance of his kigdom: & that hereby it plainly appeareth which we said euin now, y the knowledge of god which bringeth saluation, standeth not without Christ, and that therefore from the beginning he hath beene set forth vnto all the electe, that they should looke vpon him, and that in him should rest all their affiance. According to this meaning writeth Ireneus, that the Father which is vnmeasurabre, is in his Sonne measured, because he hath applied himselfe to y measure of our capacitie, least he should drowne our mindes with the vnmeasurablenes of his

Of the knowledge of his glory. Which thing the phrentike men not considering, doe write a profitable sentence to a wicked fantasie, as though there were in Christe but a portion of the godheade derived from the whole perfection; whereas it meaneth nothing else, but that God is comprehended in Christ alone.

That saying of John hath alwayes bene true: He that hath not the son, neither hath he the Father. For though in old time many did boast they worshipped the soueraigne God, his maker of heaué & earth; yet because they had no Mediator, it was impossible they should truely taste of his mericie of God, & so be persuaded they he was their father. Therefore because they knew not the heade that is Christ, the knowledge of God was but vaine among them: whereby also it came to passe, that at length falling into groffe & filthie superstitions, they bewrayed their owne ignorance. As at this day Turkish although they report with full mouth, that the creator of heauen & earth is their God, yet do they thrust an idle in place of the true God while they swear from Christ.

The vii. Chapter.

That the lawe was given, not to holde still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of salvation in Christ, until his comming.

By this continuall processse that we haue rehearsed, may bee gathered, that the Law was added about foure hundred yeres after the death of Abraham, not for this intent to lead away the chosen people from Christe: but rather to keepe their mindes in expectation vntill his comming, to kindle a desire of him, and to confirme them in looking for him, they should not waxe faint with long taryance. I meane by this worde Law, not only the ten commandementes, which prescribe a rule howe to live godliy and righteously, but also the forme of religion deliuered by the hand of Moses.
For Moses was not made a lawgiver to abolish the blessing promisde to the kinred of Abraham: but rather we see howe every where he putteth the Iewes in remembrance of that free covenante made with their fathers whose heires they were, as if he had beene sent to renewe the same. That was most plainely set forth by the ceremonies. For what were more vaine & fonde, than for men to offer vp lothsome flinke of the fat of cattell, to reconcilie themselves to God thereby? to flee to the sprinkling of water or bloude to wash away their filthinesse; Finally, all the service of God appointed in the lawe (if it bee considered by itselfe, and doe not containe shadowes and figures, which the trueh should anfwere vnto) shalbe but a verie mockerie.
Wherefore not without a cause both in Stephens sermon, & in the Epistle to the Hebrewes is that place so diligently weyed. Where God commanddeth Moses to make all things pertaining to the tabernacle, according to the paterne that had bene shewed him in the mount. For if there had not bene some spiritual thing appointed they should tend vnto, the Iewes should no lesse haue fondly spent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Prophane men yeuer earneftly applied the study of godlines, canot without lothsome tediousnes abide to heare so many fuddrie fashions of vsages: & they not only marvel why God wearied his people with such a heape of
heape of ceremonies, but also they despise & scorn them as childrens plays. And the cause is, for that they consider not the end, from which if the figures of the law be severed, they must needs be condemned of vanity. But that same figure sheweth, that GOD did not therefore command sacrifices because he would heap them that worshipped him with earthly exercises, but rather to raise vp their minds hier. Which may also plainly appeare by his nature; for as he is spiritual, so he is delighted with no other worshipping but spiritual. This doth the sayinges of the Prophete testifye, wherein they rebuke the Jews of sluggishness, for that they thought that any sacrifices were of any value with God. Is that because their purpose is to derogate any thing from the law? No, but according as they were true expostitours of the law, so they would by this meanse have mens eies directed to the mark from which the common people strayed. Now by the grace offered to the Jews it is certainly gathered, that the law was not void of Christ. For Moses did set forth vnto them this end of the adoption, that they should become a priestly kingdome to God. Which they could not obtaine unless there were had for the means thereof a great and more excellent reconciliation, than by the blood of beasts. For what is leesse likely than Adams children, which by inheritably descending infection are al borne the bondflaues of sinne, to be advanced to royal dignitie, and to become partakers of the glory of God, unless that so excellent a benefit should come vnto them else where than from themselves? Also how could thy right of priesthood remaine in force among them, who by filthines of sins were abominable to God, vntil they had bin consecrate in a holy head? Wherefore Peter doth very aptly turn thy saying of Moses, where he teacheth, that the fulnes of grace, the taunt whereof the Jews had taken vnder the lawe, was giuen in Christ: Yea are (faith hee) a chosen kindred, a kingly priesthood. For to this end tendeth that turning of thy words, to shew that they, to whom Christ appeared by the Gospel, have obtained more than their fathers, because they are all endued both with priestly and kingly honour, that trusting upon their mediator, they may freely be bold to come forth into the sight of God.

promisseth that all their sinnes shalbe cleansed with one onely sacrifice. Wherewith Daniel agreeably faith: The Priestes appointed of the tribe of Levi, did enter into the Sanctuarie, but of the onely priest it was once faide, that by an oath he was chosen of God to be a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedec. At that time the anointing with oile was visible: but Daniel by his vision pronounceth that there shalbe an other manner of anointing. And because I will not tarie vpon many examples, the author of the Epistle to the Hebreus even from the 4. chapter to the 11. doth largely and plainly ynoweth, that the ceremonies are nothing worth and vaine till we come to Christ. As concerning the ten commandements: that lesion of Paul is likewife to be kept in minde, that Christ is the ende of the lawe vnto saluation, to euery one that beleueth: And an other lesion, that Christ is the Spiriteth that quickeneth the letter which of it selfe slaieth. For in the first of these two, he meaneth that righteousnes is vainly taught by commandements, vntill Christ doe giue it both by free imputation and by the spirit of regeneration. Wherefore he worthily calleth Christ the fulfilling or ende of the lawe. Because it should nothing profite vs to knowe what God requireth of vs, vnlesse he did succour vs fainting and oppressed vnder the yoke and vntolerable burden. In an other place he teacheth that the lawe was made for transgressions, that is to bring men to humilitie being prooued guiltie of their owne damnation. And, because this is the true and onely preparation to feeke Christ, whatsoeuer hee teacheth in diuersse wordes doe all very wel agree together. But because he then was in contention with peruerse teachers, which fained that we doe deserue righteousnesse by the worikes of the lawe, to confute their error, he was compellid sometyme to speake precisely of the bare lawe, which yet otherwise is cloathed with the covenant of free adoption.

But now it is good to know, how being taught by the moral lawe, we are made more excusable, that our owne guiltinesse may mooue vs to crave pardon. If it be true that we be taught perfection of righteousnes in the lawe: then this also followeth, that the absolute keeping thereof is perfect righteousnes before God, that is, whereby a man may be deemed and accounted righteous before the heauenly throne of judgement. Wherefore Moses when he had published the law, doubted not to protest before heauen and earth, that he had set before Israel life and death, good and euill. And we may not dene, but that the reward of eternall salvation belongeth to the vpright obedience of the lawe, as the Lord hath promisid it. Againe yet it is good to examine, whether wee performe that obedience, vpon defect whereof we may conceive a truitt of that reward. For to what small purpose is it, to see the reward of eternall life set in keeping of the lawe, vnlesse wee further knowe whether we may by that way attaine to eternall life? But herein the weakenesse of the lawe doth shewe it selfe. For because that keepeing of the lawe is found in none of vs all, we are excluded from the promises of life, and doe fall into curse onely. I doe not nowe tell what doth come to passe, but what needes must so come to passe. For whereas the doctrine of the lawe is farre above the power of man, he may in decrea a far of, looke at the promises, but yet not gather any fruite of them. Therefore this one thing
...thing remaineth, that by the goodness of them he may the better waye his owne miserie, while he considereth, that all hope of salvation being cut off, death doth certainly hang over him. On the other side doe press vs vs ridiculous penall lawes, which doe hold entangled and fast bound not only a fewe of vs, but every one without exception: they press vs, I say, and doe pursue vs, with an vnapparent rigour, so that we may see most present death in the lawe.

4 Therefore if we looke only vpon the lawe, wee can doe nothing but be discouraged, be confounded, and dispeire, forasmuch as by it we are all damned & cursed, & kept farre off from the blessednesse that he offreteth to them that worship him. Wilt thou say then, Doth the Lord so mocke vs? For how finally doeth it differ from mocking, to shew forth a hope of felicitie, to allure and exhorte men vnto it, to protest that it is laid open for vs, when in the meanse season the entic vnto it is forloosed and impossible to be come to? I anfwered: although the promises of the lawe, in so much as they are conditionall, do hang vpon the perfect obedience of the lawe, which can no where be found, yet are they not giuen in vaine. For when we have learned that they shall be voyd and of no effect vnto vs, vnlesse God embrase vs with his free goodness without regard of our works, & vnlesse we doe imbrace by faith the fame goodness giue vs by the gospel, then want they not their efectualnes, yea with their condition annexed. For the he doth so freely giue all things vnto vs, that he addeth this also to the heape of his bountifulnesse, y not refusing our halfe full obedience, & remitting so much as it wanteth offull performance, he so maketh vs to enjoy the fruite of the promises of y law, as if we our selves had fulfilled the condition. But we wil at this present procede no further in this matter, because it shalbe more largely to be entreated of, when we shall speake of the Justification of faith.

5 Wheras we faide that it is impossible to kepe the lawe, that is in fewe wordes to bee both expounded and proued. For it is wont among the people commonly to be accompted an opinion of great absurditie, so farre that Hierome doubted not to pronounce it accursed: what Hierome thought, I do nothing stay vpon: as for vs, let vs search what is trueith. I will not here make longe circumstancies of diversee fortues of possibillities. I call that imposible,which both neuer hath beeene, and also is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it neuer hereafter may be. If wee record from the farthest time of memorie, I say that there hath none of the holy men, that beeing clothed with the bodie of death, hath euer attained to that ful perfection of love, to love God with all his heart, with all his minde, with all his soule, with all his power: Againe, that there hath by in none that hath not ben troubled with concipiscence. Who can say Nay? I see in deed what maner holy men foolish superstition doth imagine vnto vs, even such whole purenesse the heavenly Angels do fearfully contreuaile: but against both the Scripture and proofs of experience. I say also, that there shall none hereafter be, that shall come to the marke of true perfection, vnlesse he be loosed from the burden of his bodie. For this point there are open testimonies of Scripture. Salomon said, there is not a righteous man vpon the earth that sinneth not. And David saide: euery living man shall not bee...

justified in thy sight. Job in many places affirmeth the same. But Paul most plainly of all: that the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. And by no other reason he proueeth that, all that are vnder the law, are subiect to the curse. But because it is written, that cursed are all they that do not abide in all the commandements thereof: meaning, or rather taking it as a thing confessed, that no man can abide in them. And whatsoever is forespoken by the Scriptures, that must be holden for perpetuall, yea and necessarie. With such sutticcie did the Pelagians trouble Augustine, saying that there is wrong done to God, to say that he doeth command more than the faithfull are able by his grace to performe. Augustine, to aoid their caualiation confessed, that the Lorde might in deede, if he would, aduance a mortall man to the purenesse of Angels: but that he neither hath done so at any time, nor will do, because he hath otherwise affirmed in the Scriptures. And that I do not deny. But I add further, that it is inconuenient to dispute of his power against his trueth, and that therefore this sentence is not subiect to caualiations if a man should say, that that thing is impossible to be, whereof the Scriptures do pronounce that it shal not be. But if they dispute of the worde: when the Disciples asked the Lord, who may be saue, he answered: with men in deede it is impossible, but with God all things are possible. Alfo Augustine with a most strong reason stiftly defendeth, that in this flesh we never yeilde to God the due love that wee owe him. Love (faith he) so followeth knowledge, that no man can perfectly love God, but he that hath first fully known his goodnesse. We, while we wander in this world, see by a glaffe and in a darke speach: it followeth therefore, that our love is vnperfect. Let this therefore remaine out of controversie, that in this flesh it is impossible to fulfill the lawe, if we behold the weakenesse of our owne nature, as it shal yet also in another place be proued by Paul.

6 But that the whole matter may be more plainly set foorth: let vs in a compendious order gather vp together the office and vice of the lawe which they call Moral. Now, as farre as I understand, it is contained in these three partes. The first is, that while it sheweth to every man the righteousness of God, that is, the righteousness which only is acceptable to God, it admo- nish, censure, proue gilte, yea & condemne ev ery man of his owne vnrigh- teousnesse. For so is it needfull that man blinded & drunke with love of himselfe, be druen both to the knowledge & the confession of his owne weaknesse & vncleanenesse: for as much as if his vanity be not euidently convinced, he swellethe with mad affiance of his owne strength, and can never bee brought to thinke of the slendernesse thereof, so long as he measureth it by the proportion of his owne will. But so soone as he beginneth to compare his strength to the hardnesse of the lawe, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For howsoever he before conceived a great opinion of it, yet by & by he feeleth it to pant vnder so great a burden, & then to thakle & folter, at last even to fall down & faint. So being taught by the schoolding of the lawe, he putteth off that arrogancie wherwith before he was blinded. Likewise he is to be healed of another disease of pride, whereof wee haue faide that he is sicke, so long as he is subject to stande to his owne judgements, and then he is therewith helped to approve his owne vnderstanding, as well in solemne matter of religion as in common and ordinary things.

Hypocrite in stead of righteousness, wherewith being contented, he is readie vp in courage, by I wote not, what forged righteousnesses, against the grace of God. But so soone as he is compelled to trie his life by the balance of the lawe, then leaving the presumption of the counteraffe righteousness, he seeketh himself to be an infinite space distant from holinesse: Again, that he floweth full of infinite vices, whereof before he seemed cleane. For the euils of lust are hidden in so deep and crooked priuie corners, that they easily deceive the sight of man. And notwithstanding, if this Apostle faith, that he knewe not lust, except the lawe had sayd: Thou shalt not lufe: because except it be by the lawe disclosed out of her lurking holes, it destroyeth miserable man so secretly, that he feeleth not the deadly darte thereof.

So the lawe is like a certaine looking glasse wherein we behold, first our weakenesse, and by that our wickednesse, and last of all by them both our accursednesse, even as a glasse representeth vnto vs the spots of our face. For when power saileth man to follow righteousness, then must he needs strike fast in the mire of sinnes. And after sinne by and by followeth curse. And of how much the greater transgression the lawe holdeth vs guilty and curst, with so much the more greevous judgment it condemneth vs. For this purpose maketh the sayings of the Apostle, that by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne. For there he speaketh only of the first office of the lawe, the proofo whereof is in sinners not yet regenerate. And like to this are these two sayings, that the lawe entraile that sinne might abound, & therefore that it is the minimization of death that worketh wrath and flaireth. For without doubt so much more groweth iniquity, with how much more understanding of sinne the conscience is striken, because vs to breach of lawe is added obstinacie against the maker of the lawe. It followeth therefore that the lawe armeth the wrath of God to the destruction of the sinner, because of it selfe it can doe nothing but accuse, condemn and destroy. And as Augustine writeth, if the spirit of grace be absent, the lawe is present with vs, onely to this end, to accuse vs and kill vs. And yet when this is sayd, neither is it lawe dishonored thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellency thereof. Truly if our will were wholly framed and disposed to the obedience of the lawe, then plainly the onely knowledge of it were sufficient to saluation. But forasmuch as our fleshly and corrupt nature sighteth, as an enemie with the spiritual lawe of God, and is nothing amended with the discipline thereof, this followeth that the lawe which was giuen for saluation, (if it had found fit bearers) turneth to the occasion of sinne and death. For if so we are all proued transgressers of it, the more plainly that it openeth the righteousness of God, so much the more on the other side it discloseth our iniqutie: the more surely that it confirmeth the rewarde of life and saluation laid vp for righteousnes, so much the more assured it makest the destruction of the wicked. So farther is it of therefore that these sayings should be to the dishonour of the lawe, that they much availe to the more glorious commendations of Gods bountie. For truly it hereby appeareth that we are hindered by our owne wickednesse, and peruerfenes, that wee enjoy not the bleffednesse of life set openly abroad for vs by the lawe. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth vs without the succour of the lawe, is made so much the sweeter, sweeter, & the mercy more louely that giueth it vnto vs, whereby we learne that he is never wearied with often doing vs good and heaping newegiftes vpon vs.

8 And whereas the iniquity and condemnation of vs all is sealed by the testimony of the lawe, it is not done for this purpose (if at leaft we well profit in it) to make vs fall downe with desperation, or with discouraged minde to tumble downe headlong. In deede the reprobate are amased after that maner, but that is by reason of their obstinacie, but with the children of God there behoueth to be an other ende of instruction. I grant the Apostle re-fisteth that wee are all condemned by judgement of the lawe, that every mouth may be stopped, and that all the world may become bounde vnto

Rom. 3.19.

God: but yet the same Apostle in another place teacheth, that God hath concluded all vnder vnbelievence, not to destroy all, or to suffer all to perish, but that he might haue mercy of all, that leaving the foolshe opinion of their owne strength, they might understand, that they stand and are upheld by the only hande of God: that they being naked and empty, may flie to his mercy, that they may rest themselves wholly vpon him, hide themselves wholly in it, take holde of it alone in stead of righteousness and merites, which is laide open in Chri$t for al men who fouer they be that with true faith do defire and looke for it. For God in the commandements of the lawe ap-peareth but a rewarder of perfect righteousness, whereof we all are defi-turate, and on the other side a rigorous judge of cuil doings. But in Chri$t, his face shineth full of grace and lenity, cuen towards the wretched and vnworthy sinners.

9 Of profiting, to craue the grace of his helpe, Augustine speaketh oft, as when he writeth to Hilarie, The lawe commandeth that endeavouring to do the things commanded, and being wearied with our weakness under the lawe, we should aucke the helpe of grace. Againe to Aselius:

Epist. 200. The profit of the lawe is to conuince man of his owne weakness, and com-pell him to craue the Physike of grace that is in Chri$t. Againe to Innocent of Rome: The lawe commandeth grace ministreth strength to do. Againe to Valentine: God commandeth those things that we can not doe, that we may aucke what to aucke of him. Againe: The lawe was given to accuse you, that being accused you should feare, that fearing you should craue pardon, and not presume of your owne strengthes. Againe:

The lawe was giuen for this purpose, of great to make little, to shewe that thou haue not strength of thine owne to righteousnesse, that thou art poore, vnworthy and needy, shouldst flee vnto grace. After, he turneth his speech to God and sayeth: Doe so Lord, do so mercifull Lord, commande that which can not be fulfilled: yea, commande that which can not but by thy grace be fulfilled, that when men can not fulfill it by their owne strength, every mouth may be stopped, and no man may thinke him selfe great. Let al be little ones, and let all the worlde be guilty before thee. But I am not wise to heap vp so many testimonies, I shal se holy man hath written a booke properly of that matter, which he hath intituled, Of the Spirit & Letter. The seconde profiting he doth not so litley describe, either because he knewe that it did hang vpon the former, or because he did not so wel understand it, or because he wanted words wherewith distinctly & plainly to express his meaning of it, which yet he rightly conceived: but this first office of the law is not idle even in the reprobate also. For though they go not thus farre forward with the children of God, that after the throwing downe of their flesh they be renewed & flourish againe in the inward man, but amased with the first terrorre do lie still in desparation: yet it serueth to shewe forth the equitie of Gods judgement, that their consciences be tossed with such wayes. For they ever willingly desire to make shift against the judgement of God. Nowe while the same is not yet opened, they yet so astonisshed with the testimonie of the lawe and their conscience do bewray in themselues what they haue descured.

10 The seconde office of the lawe, is that they which are touched with no care of that which is just & right, vnlesse they be compelled, when they heare the terrible penal ordinances therein, may be restrained at least with feare of punishment. But they are restrained, not because their inward mind is moved or affected with all, but because being as it were bridled, they withhold their hand from outward worke, and doe keepe in their peruersite within them, which otherwise they would have outragiously poured out. Thereby they become truely neither the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being letted either by feare or by shame, they dare not put that in practice which they have conceived in their minde, nor openly blow abroad the rages of their lust: yet haue they not a heart framed to the feare & obedience of God, yea the more that they holde backe them selves, so much the strongerl with in they are kindled, they burn, they boile, readie to do any thing, & to break forth any whither, if this terror of the law did not stay them. And not that only, but also they most spirituall hate the lawe, and do detest God the lawmaker, so that if they could, they would very faine take him away, whome they cannot abide, neither when he commandeth rightfull things, nor when he reungeth him upon the despisers of his maiestie. In some in deed more darkly, & in some more plainly, but in all generally that are not regenerate, is this feeling, that they are drawn to the following of the law not by willing submision, but resisting and against their willes, only by violence of feare. But this constrained and enforced righteousnes is necessarie for the publike common state of men, the quiet whereof is herein provided for, while order is taken that all things be not confounded with vprore, which would come to passe, if all things were lawful for all men. Yea, it is not vnprofitable for the children of God to be exercised with this Scholing, so long as they before their calling beeing yet destitute of the spirite of sanctification, are still wanton with the folly of the flesh. For when they are drawn backe, though it be but from outward licentiousnes, by the terrorre of Gods vengeance, although for that they are not yet tamed in minde, they go for the present time but a little forward, yet they partly grow in vre to beare the yole of Christ, so that when they are called, they be not altogether rude and rawe to discipline, as to a thing uknownen. This office the Apostle feemeth properly to haue touched, when he faith that the lawe was not set for the righteous man, but for the vnrighteous & disobedient, wicked and sinners, euill doers and prophane men, slayers flayers of their parents, & murthers, fornicators, Sodomites, robbers of children, liers & perjured men, & whatsoever else is against sound doctrine. For he faith, that it is a stay to the wilde outraging lustes of the flesh, that else would stray abroad without measure.

11 But to both may that be applied which he faith in another place, that the law was to the Jewes a Scholemaster to Christ, for there are two sortes of men, whome with her schooling the leaddeth by the hand to Christ. The one sort of whome we first spake, because they are too full of affiance of their owne strength or righteounes, are not meete to receive the grace of Christ, vnlesse they be first emptied, therefore the lawe bringeth them downe to humility by knowledge of themselves, that so they may be prepared to desire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other sort needeth a bridle to be holden backe, lest they fo gue loose y reines to the wantonnesse of their flesh, that they fall of altogether from all studie of righteounes. For where the s spirite of God doth not yet gouerne, there sometime lustes do so boile, that it is in great perill least they throwe downe the foule that is subiect to them into the forgetfulness & despising of God: and so would it come to passe if God did not with this remedie provide for it. Therefore those whom he hath appointed to the inheritance of his kingdom, if he do not by and by regenerate them, he keepe them by the works of the lawe vnnder feare, vntill the time of his visitation, not that chaffe & pure feare such as ought to be in children, but yet a profitable feare for this that they may according to their capacitie be taught by introduction to true godlinesse. Of this we haue so many prooves, that it needeth no example. For whosoeuer haue any time continued in not knowing of God, will confesse that this happened vnto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the law in some feare & obedience of God, vntill the time that being regenerate by his spirite, they began heartily to loue him.

12 The third vs, which is also the principal vs, & more nearly locketh vnto the proper end of the law, concerneth the faithful, in whose hearts alreadie liueth & reigneth the spirite of God. For although they have the lawe written & grauen in their hearts by the finger of God, that is to say, be so affectioned & minded by the direction of the spirite that they desire to obey God, yet do they still two wayes profit in the lawe. For it is to them a very good meane, whereby they may daily better & more assuredly learne what is the will of the Lord which they aspire vnto, & may be confirmed in vnderstanding thereof. As if a seruaunt be alreadie bent with all the affection of his heart, to please his Lord: yet hath he neede diligently to search out & marke the fashions of his Lord, that he may frame & apply himselfe vnto them. And let none of vs esteem himself from this neede. For no man hath hitherto attained to so great wildefome, but that he may by daily instruction of the law get newe profit in proceeding to the purer knowledge of Gods will. Then because wee neede not only doctrine but also exhortation: this other profiteth shall the seruaunt of God take by the lawe, to be by the often meditation thereof stirred vp to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden backe from the slippery way of offending. For after this manner, must these holy ones drive forwarde them selues, which with howe great cheere...
cheerfulness to ever they traualie to Godward according to the spirit, yet they are alway loden with the sluggishnesse of the flesh, that they procede not with such full readines as they ought. To this flesh is the lawe given as a whippe, that like a towne and dul Asle it may be pricked forward to worke. Yea to the spirituall man, because he is not yet dispatched of the burden of the flesh, it shall be a continuall pricke that suffereth him not to stand still. Even to this vse Dauid had respect, when he did fet forth the law with those notable praises: The lawe of the Lorde is vndefiled, conuerenting foules: the justes of the Lorde are vpright, and chearing heartes: the commandement of the Lorde is bright, that giueth light to the eyes &c. Again: A lanterne to my feele is thy worde, and a light vnto my pathes, and innumerable other that he rehearseth in all that Psalme. Neither are these things against the sayings of Paul, wherein is shewed, not what vse the lawe ministrith to the regenerate, but what it is able to giue to man of it selfe. But here the Prophete reporteth with howe great profite the Lord doth instruct them by reading of his lawe, to whom hee inwardely inspirith a readinesse to obey. And he taketh holde not of the commandements onely, but also the promise of grace annexed to the things, which onely maketh the bitternesse to waxe sweete. For what were lcss amiable than the lawe, if it should onely with requiring & threatening trouble soules carefully with fear, and vexe them with terror? But specially Dauid sheweth, that he in the lawe conceiued the Mediator, without whom there is no delight or sweetenesse.

13 Which while some vnskillfull men can not discerne, they boldly shake away all Moses, and bide the two tables of the lawe farewell, because they thinke it is not agreeable for Christians to cleaue to that doctrine that conteneth the ministiration of death. Let this prophane opinion depart farre out of our mindes. For Moses taught excellently well, that the same Lawe which with sinners can engender nothing but death, ought in the holy to have a better and more excellent vse. For thus, when he was ready to die, he openly saide to the people: Lay your heartes vpon all the wordes that I doe testifie to you this day, that ye may committe them to your children, that ye may reach them to keepe, to doe, and to fulfill all the things that are written in the volume of this lawe, because they are not vainely commandued you, but that every one shoulde liue in them: but if no man can denye that there appeareth in it an absolute paterne of righteousness, then either wee must have no rule at all to liue justely and vprightely, or else it is not lawefull for vs to departe from it. For there are not many but one rule of life which is perpetuall and can not bee bowed. Therefore, whereas Dauid maketh the life of a righteous man continually busied in the meditation of the lawe, lette vs not referre that to one age onely, because it is most meeete for all ages to the ende of the world: and let vs not therefore be frayd awaye, or flee from being instructed by it, because it appointeth a much more exacte holynesse than wee shall performe, while we shall carry about the person of our body. For now it executeth not against vs the office of a rigorous exacte \(\frac{\text{Q}}{\text{vs}}\) wil not be satisfied, but with his full taske performed; but in this perfection wherevnto it exhorteth

vs, it sheweth vs a marke, toward which which, if we faile not, it is well. For all this life is a race, the space whereof being runne out, the Lord will graunt vs to attaine to that mark, toward which our endeuours do trauelle a farre of.

14. Nowe therefore, whereas the lawe hath towad the faithfulle a power to exhort, not such a power as may bine their conscience with curfe, but such as with oftem calling on, may shake of sluggishnesse and pinch imperfection to awake it: many when they meane to expresse this deliuerance from the curse thereof, do say, that the lawe is abrogate to the faithful. (I speake yet of the lawe moral) not that it doth no more command them that which is right, but onely that it be no more vnto them that which it was before, that is, that it doe no more, by making afraide and confounding their conscience, damne and destroy them. And truly such an abrogation of the lawe, Paul doeth plainly teach, and also that the Lorde himselfe spake of it, appeareth by this that he would not have confuted that opinion that he should dissolue the lawe, vnlesse it had beene commonly received among the Iewes. But forasmuch as it could not rise causelessly and without any colour, it is likeley that it grew from fallie understanding of his doctrine, as in a manner all erreours are wont to take occasion of truth, but leaft wee should also stumble at the same stone, let vs diligently make distinction, what is abrogate in the lawe, and what remaineth yet in force. Where the Lord protesteth that he came not to destroy the lawe, but to fulfill it: and that till heauen and earth passe away, no one iote of the lawe should passe away, but that all should be fulfilled: he sufficiently confirmeth that by his coming nothing should be taken away from the due keeping of the lawe. And for good cause: since he came rather for this ende, to heale offences. Wherefore the doctrine of the lawe remaineth for all Christians, intuible, which by teaching, admonishing, rebukiing and correcting may frame and prepare vs to every good worke.

15. As for those things that Paul speakeoth of the curfe, it is evident that they belong not to the very instruction, but onely to the force of binding the conscience. For the law not only teacheth, but also with authority requireth that which it commandeth. If it be not performed, yea if dutie be slacked in any part, it benteth her thunderboule of curfe. For this cause the Apostle sayth, that all they that are of the works of the lawe, are subject to the curfe, because it is written: Curfed is euery one, that fulfilleth not all. And he saith, that they be vnder the works of the law, that do not set righteousness in the forgiveness of sinnes, by which we are loosed from the rigor of the lawe. He teacheth therefore that we must be loosed from the bondes of the lawe, vnlesse we will miserably perish vnder them. But from what bondes: the bondes of that rigorous and sharp exacting, that releaeth nothing of the extremity of the lawe, suffrith not any offence unpunished. From this curfe (I say) that Christ might redeem vs, he was made a curfe for vs. For it is written: Curfed is euery one that hangeth vpon the tree. In the chapter following in deede he saith, that Christ was made subject to the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe: but all in one meaning meaning, for he by and by addeth, that by adoption we might receive the right of children. What is that: that we should not be oppresed with perpetual bondage, that should holde our conscience fast strained with anguish of death. In the meane time this alway remaineth vnshakē, that there is nothing withdrawn of the authoritie of the law, but that it ought stil to be receiued of vs with the same reuence and obedience.

16 Of ceremonies it is otherwise, which we abrogate not in effect, but in vs onely. And this, that Christ by his comming hath made an end of them, doth so nothing diminish their holiness, that it rather setteth them forth, and maketh them glorious. For as they should have gien but a vaine shewe to the olde people, vnlesse the power of his death and resurrection of Christ had bin shewed therein, so if they had not ceased, we could not at this day discourse to what purpose they were ordained. Therefore Paul, to prove Col. 2,17. that the keeping of them nowe is not onely superfluous, but also hurtfull, teacheth that they were shadowes whereof we have the body in Christ. We see therefore howe in the abolishing of them, the truth shineth better than if they did still a farre of, and as it were with a veil spred before, shewe a figure of Christ that hath already plainly appeared. And therefore the veil of the Temple at the death of Christ was tore in two pieces and fell downe: because nowe the true & express image of the heavenly good things was come to light, which before had bin but vnpertectly begun with darke rude draughtes, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues faith, *Hereunto serueth that saing of Christ, that the lawe and the Prophetes were vnto the time of John, and that from that time forward, the kingdom of God began to be joyfully preached: not meaning that the holy fathers were without the preaching that containeth the hope of salvation, and of eternall life, but because a farre of, and under shadowes only they did behold that which we at this day see in the full light. But why it behoved that the Church of God should clime vp hier from those first instructiouns, John the Baptist declareth, for that the lawe is gien by Moses, but grace and truth beganne by Iesus Christ. For although the purging of finnes were truely promis'd in the olde sacrificies, and the Arke of the covenant was a sure pledge of the fatherly fauour of God, yet all this had bene but a shadowe, if it had not bin grounded upon the grace of Christ, wherein is found perfect, and eternall fiedfaiinelle. Let this then remaine sure, that although the ceremonial viles of the lawe have ceased to be obserued, yet by the ende of them it is the better knowne how great was the profite of them before Christs comming, which in taking away the vs of them hath sealed the force and effect of them with his death.

17 Somewhat more hard is the point that Paul noteoth. And he hath renued you together with him, when ye were dead by finnes, and the vnircumcision of your flesh, forgiving you all your offences, blotting out your handwriting that remained in the decrees against vs, which was contrary vnto vs, and he hath taken it away, fastening it to the cross. &c. For he seemeth to stretch the abolishing of the law somewhat further that now we have nothing to do with the decrees thereof. For they erre that expand it of the lawe morall, whose vnappeasable rigor rather then doctrine thereof they thinke

thinks to be taken away. Some more deeply waying the wordes of Paule, doe espie that it is properly spoken of the lawe ceremonially, and doe shewe that this wordes Decree, doth more than once so signific in Paul. For to the Ephesians he faith thus: He is our peace, that maketh both to be one, that maketh voide the law of commandements consisting in the decrees, that he might make two in himselfe into one newe man. It is no doubt that he speake of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition wherewith the Jews were seuered from the Gentiles; wherefore I grant that those first expostors are rightfulliy reproved by these: but yet me thinks that these do not sufficiently well set forth the minde of the Apostle. For I like not at all, to have these two places compared together in all points, when his purpose was to aduertise the Ephesians of their adoptio into the fellowship of Israel, he teacheth that the stop is taken away, whereby they were before time kept asunder, that was in ceremonies. For the visages of washings and sacrifices, whereith the Jews were made holy vnto the Lord, do sever them from the Gentiles. But in the Epistle to the Colossians, who feet not that he toucheth a hyer mysterie? In deede the point of the disputation there, is of Moasicall observations whereunto the false Apostles did labour to drive the Christian people. But as in the Epistle to the Galatians he fetcheth that controwersie further of, and as it were brought it backe to the first head thereof, so dou they also in this place. For if in the ceremonies you consider nothing els but a necessitie of yse of the, to what purpose was it, to call it a hand writing against vs? moreouer to set the whole summe in a manner of our redemption in this, y it should be cancelled? Wherefore y matter it selfe trieth out, that there is some more secret thing to be considere. And I must y have attained the natural undersatding of it: if at least this be granted me to be true, which in one place is most truly written by Augustine, yea that he hath taken out of the plaine words of the Apostle, that in the Jewish ceremonies was rather a confession than a cleansing of sins. For what did they els by sacrifices, but confesseth themselves in their conscience guiltie of death, that did put cleansings in their place? What did they with their cleanings, but teyfifie themselves to be vnclean?: And so was the handwriting of their sin & vncleanenes oft renewed by them, but there was no discharge in that testifying thereof. For which cause the Apostle writeth that at length by meane of the death of Christ, was perfourmed the redemption of the offences that remained under the old Testament. Therefore the Apostle doeth worthily cal the ceremonies handwritings against those y observe them, forasmuch as by them they did openly scale to their owne damnation and vncleanenes. And it hindereth not, that they were also partakers of the same grace with us. For this they obtained in Christ, not in the ceremonies, which there the Apostle doeth feuer from Christ, because being at that time vfed, they did obscure the glorie of Christ. Thus learn we, that the ceremonies, if they be considered by themselves, are well and hidly called handwritings against the salvation of men, because they were as solemn instruments y teyfified theirs being bound. When the false Apostles went about to binde the Christian Church to them againe: Paul did not without cause admonish the Colossians, by fetching the signification of them further off, to what pointe they should fell backe againe, if they suffered themselves in such sorte to bee yoked by them. For therewithall was the benefit of Christ wrested away from them, inasmuch as he having once performed the eternal cleansing, hath utterly abolished those daily observations which were onely of force to scale sinnes, but could do nothing to the putting away of them.

An expostion of the Morall lawne.

Here I thinke it shall not bee from the purpose, to enterrace the tenne comamundementes of the lawe with a shorte exposition of them, because thereby both that shall better appeare which I have touched, that the same keeping of them which God hath once appointed, remaineth yet in force: and also we shall haue besides that a profe of the second point, that the fewes did not onely learne by it what was the true force of godlienesse, but also by the terror of the judgement, with they sawe themselves vnable to keepe it, they were compelled whether they woulde or no, to bee drawn to the Mediator. Nowe in setting forth the simme of those things that are required in y true knowledge of God, we haue alreadie taught, that wee cannot conceiue him according to his greatnesse, but that by and by his maiestie presenteth it selfe vnto vs, to binde vs to the worshippe of him. In the knowledge of our selues we haue set this for the chiefes point, that being voide of the opinion of our owne strengthe, and cleane stripped of the trust of our owne righteousnesse, and on the other side discouraged and beaten downe with conscience of our owne needinesse, we shoulde learne perfect humilitie and abasement of our selues. The Lord setteth forth both these pointes in his lawe, where first challenging to himselfe due power to governe, he calleth vs to the reverence of his divine maiestie, and appoineth out vnto vs wherein it standeth and consisteth: and then publishing a rule of his righteousnesse, (against the righteousnesse whereof of our nature as it is peruerse and crooked, doeth alway striue, and beneath the perfection whereof our power as of it selfe it is weake & feeble to do good, lieth a great way below) he reprooueth vs both of weakeneses & vnrighteousnes. Moreover the inward law which we haue before saide to be grauen and as it were imprinted in the hearts of all men, doth after a certaine maner enforme vs of the same things that are to bee learned of the two tables. For our conscience doeth not suffer vs to sleepe a perpetuall sleepe without feeling, but that it inwardly is a winruest and admonisher of those things that we owe to God, and layeth before vs the difference of good and euill, and so accuceth vs when wee swaue from our dutie. But man being wrappd in such darkenesse of errors as he is, seeketh even slenderly to attisth by that law of nature, what worship pleaseth God; but truely he is verie farre distant from y right knowledge thereof. Beside that, he is so swollen with arrogancy and ambition, and so blinded with selfe love, that he cannot yet looke vpon, and as it were, descende into himselfe to learne to submit and humble himselfe, and confesse his owne miserie. Therefore (as it was necessary both for our dulness and stubborness) the Lord hath set vs a lawe written, which should both more certainly testify that which in the lawe naturally was too obscure, and also shoulde shake away our drowsiness, and more lively touch our minde and remembrance.

2 Nowe it is easie to vnderstande what is to be learned of the lawe, that is, that as God is our creator, so of right he hath the place of our father & Lorde, and that by this reason we owe to him glorie, reverence, love & feare. Yea and also that we are not at our owne libertie, to follow whither soever that lust of our minde doeth moue vs, but that wee ought to hang vpon his becke, and to rest onely vpon that which pleaseth him. Then we learne, that hee delighteth in righteousnesse, that hee abhorreth wickednesse, and therefore that vnlesse wee will with wicked vnhappines fall away from our creator, wee must necessarily obserue righteousnesse all our life long. For if then onely we yelde vnto him the reverence that wee owe, when wee prefer his will before our owne, it foloweth, that there is no other due worshippe of him, but the observation of righteousnesse, holyneffe and cleanenesse. Neither may wee pretendte this excuse that we want power, and like wafted doters bee not able to pay. For it is not conuenient that wee shoule measure the glorie of God by our owne power: for whatsoever wee bee, he alway abideth like to himselfe, a lover of righteousnesse, a hater of wickednesse. Whatsoever he requireth of vs (because hee can require nothing but that which is right) by bonde of nature we must of necessestie obey; but that we are not able, is our owne fault. For if wee bee holden bounde of our owne lust wherein sinne reigneth, so that we are not lose at libertie to obey our father, there is no cause why we shoule alledge necessestie for our defence, the cuill whereof is both within vs, and to be imputed vnto our selues.

3 When we have thus farre profited by the teaching of the lawe, then must wee by the teaching of the fame lawe also descende vnto our selues: whereby at length wee may carrie away two things. The first is, by comparing the rightousnesse of the lawe with our life, to learne, that wee are farre off from being able to satisfie the will of God, and that therefore we are not worthie to have place among his creatures, much lesse to be reckened among his children. The second is, in considering our strengthe, to learne that it is not onely insufficient to fulfill the law, but also vitally none at all. Hereupon followeth both a distrust of our owne strengthe, and a care and fearefulnesse of minde: For conscience cannot beare the burden of iniqutie, but that by and by the judgement of God is present before it: and the judgement of God cannot be felt, but that it striketh into vs a dreadfull horrour of death. And likewise being constrained with proouces of her owne weakenesse, it cannot choose but by and by fall into dispaire of her owne strengthe. Both these affections doe engender humilitie and abatement of courage. So at length it commeth to passe, that man made afraid of with feeling of eternall death, which hee seeth to hang over him by the defearing of his owne righteousnesse, turneth himselfe to the onely mercie of God, as to the onely hauen of saluation: that feeling that it is not in his power to pay that he oweth vnto the law, despairing in himselfe, hee may take take breath againe and beginne to craue and looke for helpe from else where.

4 But the Lord not contented to have procured a reverencce of his righteousnes hath also added promises and threatnings to fill our hearts with loue of him, and with hatred of wickednesse. For, because our minde is too blinde, to be moued with the onely beautie of goodnesse, it pleased the most mercifull Father of his tender kindenesse, to allure vs with sweetenesse of rewards to loue and long for him. He pronounceth therefore, that with him are rewards laid vp for vertue, and that he shall not spend his labour in vaine, whosoever he be, that shall obey his commandements. He proclameth on the other side, that he not onely abhorreth vnrighteousnesse, but also that it shall not escape vnpunished, for that he will be a revenger of the contempt of his Maiestie. And to exhort vs by all meanes, hee promiseth as well the blessings of this present life as also eternall blessednesse, to their obedience that keepe his commandements; and to the transgresours thereof, he threatneth both present miseries and the punishment of eternall death. For the same promise, (hee that doth these things, shall lue in them:) and also the threatening that answereth it, (the soule that sinneth, that same shall die) do without doubt belong to the immortalitie or death that is to come, & shall never be ended. Albeit, wherefoever is mentioned the good will or wrath of God, under the one is contained the eternitie of life, under the other eternal destruction. Of present blessings and curses there is a longer register rehearsed in the law. And in the penal ordinances appeareth the soueraigne cleannesse of God, that can suffer no iniquitie: but in his promises, beside his great loue of righteousnesse, (which he cannot finde in his heart to defraud of her reward) there is also proued by his maruellous bountifullnes. For whereas we and all ours are indetted vnto his Maiestie, by good right whatsoever he requireth of vs, he demandeth it as due debt, but the payment of debt is not worthy of reward. Therefore he departeth with his owne right, when he offereth reward to our obediences, which we do not yeeld of our felues as things that were not due: but what those promises do bring vnsto vs, is partly faide already, and partly shall appeare more plainly in place fit for it. It sufficeth for this present, if we remember and consider, that there is in the promises of the law, no small commendation of righteousnesse, that it may the more certainly appeare how much the keeping thereof pleaseth God: that the penal ordinances are set for the more detestation of vnrighteousnes, lest the sinner delite with the sweete flatternings of vices, should forget that the judgement of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

5 Now whereas the Lord giveth a rule of perfect righteousnesse, hath applied all the parts thereof to his owne will, therein is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obedience, which is so much more diligently to be marked, as the wantonnes of mans minde is more ready to delite now and then diverse forces of worshipping to winne his favour withall. For in all ages that irreligious affectation of religion, because it is naturally planted in the witte of man, hath shewed & yet doth shew forth itselfe, that men do alway delite to invent a way to obtaine righteousnesse beside the word of God, wherby it commeth to passe that the commandements of the lawe

law have but small place among the works that are commonly called good works, while that innumerable route of men's works occupieth almost all the room. But what other thing meant Moses than to restraine such licentiousnesse, when after the publishing of the law he spake thus to the people: Give heede, and heare all the things that I command thee, that it may bee well to thee and to thy children after thee for ever, when thou shalt do that which is good and pleasant before thy God. What I command thee, that onely doe: add not unto it, nor diminish it. And before, when he had protested, that this was his wifedome and understanding before other nations, that he had receiued judgments, righteousness and ceremonies of his Lord, he said further, Kepe therefore thy self and thy soule carefully, that thou forget not the words which thine eyes haue seene, and that at no time they fall out of thy heart. For, because God did foresee, that the Israelites would not rest, but that after they had receiued the law, they would beeifie it traualie in bringing forth new righteousness, if they were not feuerely held back: therefore he pronounced that herein is contained the perfection of righteousness, which should haue bin the strongest stay to hold them backe, and yet they did caifie from that boldnesse so much forbidden them. But what of vs? we are surely comprehended within the same charge; for it is no doubt that that continueth still whereby the Lord hath challenged to his law the absolute doctrine of righteousness, yet we not contented therewith, do monstrously traualie with forg'ing & coyning of new good works one upon another. For the healing of this fault, the best remedie shalbe, if this thoughtshalbe steadfastly settled in vs, that the law is given vs from God to teach vs a perfect righteousness: that therein is taught no righteousness, but the same that is examined, by the appointed rule of Gods will: that therefore new forms of works are vainly attempted to winne the favour of God, whose true worship standeth in onely obedience: but rather that such study of good works as wandereth out of his law of God, is an intolerable defiling of Gods righteousness & of the true righteousness. Augustine also faith most truly, which calleth the obedience that is done to God, sometime the mother and keeper, sometime the original of all vertues.

6 But when we have expounded the Lawe of the Lord, then more fittingly and with more profite shall all bee confirmed which I haue before spoken of the office & vs of the law. But before that I beginne to discusse every severall commandement by it selfe, it shall be good now to giue such leasons as serue to the vniversal knowledge thereof. First let vs hold for determined, that the life of man is instructed in the law not only to outward honesty, but also to inward and spirituall righteousness. Which thing whereas no man can denye, yet there be few that rightly marke it. That commeth to passe, because they looke not upon the lawmaker, by whose nature the nature of the law also ought to be weeke. If any king do by proclamation forbid tocommit fornication, to kill, or to steele: in this case I grant that if a man doe onely conceive in his minde a lust to commit fornication, to sinne, or to steele, and doeth not commit any of these things in deede, he is out of his compass of this prohibition. And the reason is, for that because the foresight of a mortal lawmaker, could not extend but to outward civilitie: his comandements are not not broken, but when the outward offences are committed. But God (whose eye nothing escapeth, and which regardeth not so much the outward shew as the cleanliness of the heart), under the forbidding of fornication, manslaughter and theft, forbidden lust, wrath, hatred, couetousness of another man's goods, and whatsoever is like these. For in so much as he is a spiritual lawmaker, he speaketh no less to the soul than to the body. But the manslaughter of the soul, are wrath and hatred: the theft of the soul, is cruel desire and couetousness: the fornication of the soul, is lust. But many laws also (will some man say) have regard to intencidences and wiles, and not to successses of fortune. I grant, but yet they are such intencidences and wiles, as have outwardly broken out. They weye with what intent every outwards act hath beene done, but they search not the secretes thoughts. Therefore they are satisfied when a man onely withholdeth his handes from offending. On the other side, because the heavenly law is made for our minds, therefore the restraint of minds is principally needful to the keeping thereof. But the common sort of men, even when they mightily dissemble there contempt of the lawe, doe frame their eyes, their feete, their handes, and all the partes of their bodies to some observation of the lawe, in the mean time they holde their heart most farre off from all obedience, and thinke themselves well discharged, if they keepe close from men that which they doe in the fight of God. They heare it saide: thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adultery: Thou shalt not steal: they draw not out their sword to kill: they ioynce not their bodies with harlotes: they lay not their handes upon other mens goods. All this is well heretofore. But in their whole hearts they breath out murders: they boile in lust, they cast their eyes aside at all mens goods, and deuoure them with couetous. Nowe wanteth that which was the cheefe point of the lawe. Whence, I pray you, commeth so grosse dulnesse, but that leaving the lawemakers, they rather measure righteousness by their owne will? Against these doeth Paul mightily erie out; affirming that the lawe is spiritual: whereby hee meaneth, that it not onely demandeth an obedience of the soul, munde, and will, but also requireth an Angelike pureness, which having all the filthinesse of the flesh cleane wiped away, may favour nothing but of the spirit.

7 When we say that this is the meaning of the lawe, we thrust not in a newe exposition of our owne, but we follow Christ the best expositor of the law. For when the Pharisees had infected ye people with a false opinion, that he performeth the lawe that hath with outward worke committed nothing against the lawe, he reproocheth this most perilous errour, and pronounced that vnaught looking al a woman is fornication: he protested that they are manflayers that hate their brother, for he maketh them guilty of judgemenet that haue but conceited wrath in their mind, and them guilty of the counsell that in murmuring or grudging haue uttered any token of a displeased minde: & them guilty of Hell fire, that with tauntes and railing breake foorth into open anger. They that haue not espied these things, haue sayned Christ to be an other Moses, the giver of the lawe of the Gospell which supplied the imperfection of the lawe of Moses. Whereupon commeth that common principle of perfection of the lawe of the Gospell, which farre pateith
passeth the olde lawe, which is a most pernicious opinion. For hereafter, where wee shall gather a summe of the commandementes, it shall appeare by Moses himselfe, howe reproachfully they dishonour the Lawe of God. Truely it sheweth that all the holinesse of the fathers did not much differ from hypocrite, and it leadeth vs away from that onely and perfect rule of righteounesse. But it is verie ease to confute that error: for that they thought that Christ did addde vnto the lawe, whereas hee did but restore the lawe to her integritie, while he made it free, and cleft it being obscured with lies, and defiled with leauens of the Pharises.

8 Let this bee our seconde note, that there is alway more conteined in the commandementes and prohibitions, than is by wordes expressed, which yet is so to bee tempered, that it be not like a Lesbian rule, whereby licentioufully wresting the Scriptures, wee may make of euery thing what wee list. For many bring to pass by this vnmeasured libertie of running at large, that with some the authority of Scripture growtheth in contempt, and other some despiete of understanding it. Therefore if it be possible, wee must take some such way, that may by right and perfect path lead vs to the will of God, wee must I say search howe farre our exposition may exceede the boundes of the wordes, that it may appeare that it is not an addition of mens gloues knit to the wordes of God, but rather that the pure and natural meaning of the lawgiver is faithfully rendred. Truely in a manner in all the commandementes it is fo manifest, that there are figurative speachses, meaning more in expressing part that hee may worthily be laughed at that will restraine the meaning of the lawe to the narrownesse of the wordes. It is evident therefore, that sober exposition doeth passe beyonde the wordes: but howe farre, that remaineth harder to judge, unless there bee some measure appointed: wherefore I thinke this to bee the best mea sure, that if it be directed to the intent of the commandement, that is, that in euery commandement bee weyed, why it was giuen vs. As for example: Every commandement is either by way of bidding, or of forbidding: the trueth of both fortes shall forthwith bee founde, if wee consider the intent or the ende thereof. As the end of the fifth commandement is, that honour is to bee giuen to them to whome God appoinnte it. This therefore is the summe of the commandement, that it is right and pleaseth God, that we honour them to whom he hath giuen any excellencie, and that hee abhorreth contempt and stubbornesse against them. The intent of the first commandement is, that God alone be honoured. The summe therefore of the commandement shall bee, that true godlinesse, that is to say, true worshippe of his maestie pleaseth God, and that hee abhorreth vngodlinesse. So in euery commandement wee must looke upon what matter it treateth: then must wee search out the ende, till wee finde what the lawmaker doeth restifie therein properly to please or displease him: & last of all must we drawe an argument from the same to the contrarie, after this manner: If this pleaseth God, then the contrarie displeaseth him: if this please him, then the contrarie pleaseth him: if he commaunde this, then hee forbiddeth the contrarie, if he forbid this, then he commanded the contrarie.

That which is now some what darkly touched, shal in expounding of the commandments become very plain by practice, wherefore it sufficeth to have touched it, sauing that this last point, is to be shortly confirmed with some proofe thereof, because otherwise either it should not be understood, or being understood it might perhaps at the beginning seeme to sound like an absurdity. This needeth no proofe, that when a good thing is commanded, the euill is forbidden that is contrary to it: for there is no man but he will graunt it me. And common judgement will not much sticke to admit, that when euill things are forbidden, the contrarie duties are commanded. It is an universal opinion that vertues are commended, when the contrary vices are condemned. But we require somewhat more than those formes of speach do signifie commonly among the people. For they for the most part take the vertue contrary to any vice, to be the abstaining from the same vice: we say that it proceedeth farther, that is to contrary duties & doings. Therefore in this commandement, Thou shalt not kill, the common sense of men wil consider nothing else, but that wee must abstaine from all hurt doing, or lust to do hurt. I say that there is further contained, that wee should by all the helps that we may, succour the life of our neighbour. And, least I speake without a reason, I prove it thus: God forbiddeth that our brother be hurt or mistred, because he willeth that our neighbours life be deare & precious vnto vs: he doth therefore require with all those duties of love you may be done by vs for the preservation of it. And so may wee see how the end of the commandement doth alwaye disclose vnto vs that we are therein commanded or forbidden to do.

But why God, in such as it were halfe commandementes, hath by figures rather secretely signified, than expressed what his will was, whereas there are wont to be many reasons rendred thereof, this one reason pleaseth me aboue the rest. Because the flesh alwaye endeuoreth to extenuate the finness of sinne, & to colour it with faire pretences, sauing where it is euell palpable for grossenes, he hath fet forth for an example in euery kinde of offence that which was most wicked & abominable, at the hearing whereof our very senses might be moued with horror, thereby to imprent in our minde a more haynous detesting of euery sort of sinne. This many times deceiued vs in weying of vices, that if they be any thing secrete, wee make them seeme small. These deceits the Lord doth disclose, when he accuseth vs to referre all the whole multitude of vices to these principal heads, which do best of all shew, how much euery kind is abominable. As for example, wrath & hatred are not thought so haynous euils, when they are called by their own names, but when they are forbidden as under the name of man slaughter, we better understand how abominable they are before god, by whose word they are set in the degree of so horribile an offence: and wee moued by his judgement, do accustome our selues better to way the haynousnes of those faultes that before seemed but light vnto vs.

Thirdly is to be considered, what meaneth the dividing of the lawe of God into two tables, whereof all wise men will judge that there is sometime mention made not unfitly from the purpose, nor without cause. And wee have a cause readie, that doth not suffer vs to remaine in doubt of this this matter. For God so divided his law into two partes, in which is contained the whole righteousness, that he hath assigned the first to the duties of religion that do peculiarly pertain to the worshipping of his Godhead, the other to the duties of Charite which belong unto men. The first foundation of righteousness is the worship of God, which being once overthrown, all the other members of righteousness are torn in sunder and dissolved, like to the partes of an house vnjoynted and fallen downe. For what maner of righteousness wilt thou call it, that thou vexest not men with robbery & extortions, if in the meane time by wicked sacrilege thou spoilest Gods majestie of his glory: that thou defiest not thy body with fornication, if with thy blasphemies thou prophanely abuse the sacred name of God? that thou murtherest no man, if thou trauaile to destroy and extinguish the memoria of God. Wherefore righteousness is vainly boasted of without religion, and maketh no better shew, than if a mangled body with the head cut off, should be brought forth for a beautiful sight. And religion is not only the principal parte of righteousness, but also the very sole, wherewith it breatheth, and is quickened. For men keepe not equitie & loue among them selues without the seare of God. Therefore we say, that the worship of God is the beginning and foundation of righteousness, because when it is taken away, all the equitie, continence and temperance that men vs among them selues, is vaine and trifling before God. We say also, that it is the springhead and lively breath of righteousness, because hereby men do learne to live among themselves temperately & without hurt doing one to another, if they reverence God as the judge of right & wrong. Wherefore in the first table he instructeth vs to godliness & the proper duties of religion, wherein his majestie is to be worshipp'd: in the other he prescribeth howe for the seare sake of his name, we ought to behaue our selues in the fellowship of men. And for this reason our Lord (as the Evangelists rehearse it) did in a summe gather the whole lawe into two principal partes, the one that we should loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength: the other, that wee loue our neighbour as our selues. Thus thou feest howe of the two partes wherein he concludest the whole law, he directeth the one toward God, and appointeth the other toward men.

12 But although the whole lawe be contained in two principal partes, yet to the ende to take away all pretence of excuse, it pleased our God, to declare in the ten commandements more largely & plainly all things y belonging both to the honor, seare & loue of himsethe, and also to that charite which he commandeth vs to beare to men for his sake. And thy studie is not ill spent to know the diuision of the commandements, so that thou remember that it is such a matter wherin every man ought to have his judgement free, for which wee ought not contentiously to strive with him that thinketh otherwise. But we must needs touch this point, lest the readers should either seorne or marneil at the diuision that we shall vse, as newe & lately deuised. That the law is deuided in ten words, because it is oft approved by the authoritie of God himselfe, it is out of controversie, wherefore there is no dout of the number, but of the manner of deuiding. They that so deuide them, that they gue three commandements to the first table, & put other other 7. into the seconde, doe wipe out of the number the commandement concerning images, or at least they hide it under the first: whereas without dout it is severally set by the Lord for a commandement, & the tenth commandement of not coveting the things of his neighbour, they do fondly tare into two. Beside that it shall by and by be done to understand, that such manner of deuding was unknowen in the purer age. Other do reckon, as we doe, fewer severall commandementes in the first table, but in place of the first they set the promise without the commandement. As for mee, because vnlesse I be conuynced by euident rea|, I take the ten words in Moses for ten commandements, me thinks I see so many deuided in very fit order. Therefore, leauing to them their opinion, I will follow that which I best allowe, that is, that the same which these later fort make the first commandement, shalbe in stede of a preface to the whole lawe, and then shal followe the commandements, foure of the first table, and five of the second, in such order as they shalbe rehearsed. Augustine alfo to Boniface agreeith with vs, which in rehearsing them keepeth this order: that God only be seued with obedience of religion, that no idole be worshipped, that the name of the Lord be not taken in vaine, when he had before severally spoken of the shadow of the commandement of the Sabbat. In an other place in deede that first division pleaseth him, but for too sclender a caufe, that is, becaufe in the number of three, if the first table consist of three commandementes, the mysterie of the Trinity more plainly appeareth. Albeit in the fame place he stickeoth not to confesse the otherwise he rather liketh our division. Befides these, the author of the Vnperfect worke vpon Mathew is of our side, Iosephus, undoubtedely according to the common contenf of his time, affigneth to either table foue commandements. Which is both against reason, becaufe it confoundeth the distinction of religion and charity, and also is confuted by the authority of the Lorde himselfe, which in Mathew reckoneth the commandement of honouring our parents, in the number of the second table. Nowe let vs heare God himselfe speaking in his owne wordes.

The first Commandement.

I am the Lord thy God, which hast brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no strange Gods before my face.

13 Whether you make the first sentence a parte of the first com- mandement, or reade it severally, it is indifferent unto me, so that you do not deny me that it standeth in stede of a preface to the whole lawe. First in making of lawes is heede to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogate by contempt. Therefore God first of all prouideth, that the majesty of his law that he shall make, may never at any time come in contempt. For stablishing whereof he vseth three maner of argumentes. First he chalengeth to himselfe power & right of dominion, whereby he may constraine his choen people, that they must of necessitie obey him: then he setteith forth a promise of grace with sweetnes therof to allure the to study of holines. Thirdly he reci- teth the benefit that he did for them, to reprove the Iewes of vnthankfullnes, if they
Rom. 11. 36.
If they do not with obedience answer his kindnes. Vnder the name of Jehoovah, the Lord, is meant his authoritie and lawfull dominion. And if all things be of him and doe abide in him, it is right that all things be referred to him, as Paul faith. Therefore we are with this word alone sufficiently brought vnder the yoke of Gods maitie, because it were monstruous for vs to fecke to withdrawe our feldes from vnder his government, out of whome we can not be.

14. After that he hath shewed that it is he that hath power to command, to whom obedience is due, leaft he should seeme to draw by onely necessitie, he also allureth with sweetenesse in prouncinge, that he is the God of the Church. For there is hidden in this speech a mutual relation, which is contained in the promise: I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. Whereupon Christ proueth that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob haue immortal life, by this that God testified that he is their God. Wherfore it is as much in effect, as if he shold say thus: I haue chosen you to be my people, only to do you good in this present life, but also to giue you the blessed-nes of the life to come. But to what ende this tendeth, it is noted in diverse places in the law. For when the Lord doth vouchsafe to deale thus mercifully with vs, to call vs into the company of his people, he chooseth vs (faith Moses) that we should be a peculiar people vnto himselfe, a holy people, and should keepe his commandementes. From whence also commeth this exhortation: Be ye holy, for I am holy. Now out of these two is derivd that protestation that is in the Prophet: The sone honoreth the father, and the sertant honoreth his Lord. If I be a Lord, where is my feare? If I be a father, where is my love?

15. Now followeth the hearfall of his benefite, which ought to be of so much more force to movwe vs, as the fault of unthankfulnes is more detestable eu'n among men. He then did put Israel in remembrance of a benefite lately done, but such a one as for the miraculous greatnesse thereof beeing worthy to be had in remembrance for euer, shoulde remaine in force with their posterity. Moreover it is most agreeable for this present matter. For the Lord seemeth to say that they were deliverued out of miserable bondage for this purpose, they should with obedience & readiness of service honour him, the author of their deliverance. He voucheth also, (tot the end to hold vs fast in the true worshippine of him alone) to set out himselfe with certain titles, wherby he maketh his sacred majesty to be differetly known from all idols & forged gods. For, as I said before, such is our ready inclination to vanity, joyned with rash boldnes, that so soon as God is named, our mind cannot take heed to it selfe but it by & by falleth away to some vain intention. Therefore, when the Lord meaneth to bring a remedy for this mischief, he setteth out his own godhead with certain titles & so doth compass vs in, as it were within certaine grates, leaft we shoulde wander hither and thither and rashly forge our falses some new God, if forsaking the living God, we hold erect an idole. For this cause, so oft as the Prophets meane properly to point out him, they cloth him, and as it were encloie him, within thole markes, whereby he had opened himselfe to the people of Israel. And yet when he is called the God of Abraham, or the God of Israel, when he is set in the temple of Hierusalem
Hierusalem among the Cherubins, these & like forms of speech doe not bind him to one place or to one people, but are set only for this purpose, to stay the thoughtes of the godly in that God, which by his covenant, that he hath made with Israel, hath so represented himself, that it is no way lawful to vary from such a paterne. But let this remaine steadsafely imprinted, that there is mention made of the deliueraunce to this ende, that the Jews might the more cheerfully give themselves to the God that doth by right claim them vnto him. And we (least wee should thinke that the same nothing belongeth to vs,) ought to consider, that the bondage of Aegypt is a figure of the spiritual captituation, wherein we are all holden bound, vntil our heavenly deliueraer do make vs free by the power of his armes, and convey vs into the kingdom of libertie. As therefore, when in the old time hee minded to gather together the Israelites that were scattered abroad, to the worshipping of his name, he deliuered them out of the intollerable dominion of Pharaon, wherewith they were oppressed: so all those to whom at this day he professeth himselfe a God, he doth now deliuere from the deadly power of the diuell, which was in a shadow signified by that corporall bondage. Wherefore there is no man, but his minde ought to be inflamed to harken to the law which he heareth to haue proceeded from the soueraigne king. From whom as all things take their beginning, so is it meete that they haue also their end appointed and directed to him. There is no man (I say,) but he ought to be rauished to embrace the lawmaker, to the keping of whose commandements, he is taught that he is peculiarly chosen: from whose bountie he looketh both for flowing store of all good things, and also the glorie of immortal life: by whose marueilous power & mercy, he knoweth himselfe to be deliuered out of the iawes of death.

16. After that he hath grounded & stablished the authoritie of his lawe, he setteth forth the first commandement, That we have no strange Gods before him. The ende of this commandement is, that God will onely haue preeminence, and wholly enjoy his owne authoritie among his people. And that it may so be, he commandeth that there be farr from vs all vngodlinesse & superstition, wherby the glory of his godhead is either diminished or obscured: and by the same reason he commandeth, that wee worship & honour him with true obedience of godliness. And the very simplicitie of the words themselves do in a manner expresse the same. For wee cannot haue God, but wee must also comprehend therein all things that properly belong to him. Whereas therefore he forbidde vs to haue other Gods, he meane thereby, that wee should not glue away elsewhere that which is proper to him. For although the things that we owe vnto God be innumerable, yet not vnfitly they may be brought vnto four principal points: Adoration, whereunto as a thing hanging upon it, is anjoyed spiritual obedience of conscience: Affiance, Invocation, & Thanksgiving. Adoration I call the reverence & worship which every one of vs yeeldeth vnto him, when hee submitteth himselfe vnto his greatnes: wherefore I doe not without cause make this a part thereof, that we yeeld our confessions in subjection to his law. Affiance is an assurednes of resting in him by reknowledging of his powers, when reposeing al wisdom, rightcousnes, power, truth & goodness in him, we thinke Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of our selves blessed with only partaking of him. Invocation, is a resorting of our minde to his faith and help as to our only succour, so oft as any necessity presseth vs. Thanksgiuings is a certaine thankfulness whereby the praise of all good things is given vnto him. Of these, as God suffereth nothinge to be conuayed away else where, so he commanded all to be who-ly giuen to himselfe. Neither shall it be enough to abstaine from hausing any strange God, vnlesse thou restraine thy selfe in this, that many wicked con tempters are wont, which thinke the readieste waye, to seorne all religions: but true religion must goe before, whereby our mindes may be directed to the liuing God, with knowledge whereof they being ended may aspire to reverence, feare and worship his majefty, to embrace the communicating of all his good things, every where to seeke for his help, to re-knowledge and aduaunce with confession of praise the magnificence of his worke, as to the only marke in all the doings of our life. Then, that we beware of peruerse superstition, whereby our mindes swaruing from the true God, are drawen hither and thither as it were vnto diverse gods. Wherefore, if we be contented with one God, let vs call to remembrance that which is before saide, that all forged gods are to be druen farre away, and that the worship is not be torne in funder, which he alone claimeth to himselue. For it is not lawfull to take away any thing from his glory, be it neuer so little, but that all things that belong to him may wholly remaine with him. The parcell of sentence that followeth (Before my face) encreaseth the hinousnes: for that God is prouoked to jealousie, so oft as we thrust our owne inuentions in his place, as if an vnhalt woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her husbands eyes should the more vexe his minde. Therefore when God testified that with his present power & grace he looked vpon the people that he had choosen, the more to fray them from the wicked act of falling from him, he giueth them warning that there can be no new gods brought in, but that he is witness & beholder of their sacrilege. For this boldnesse is encreaseth with much wickednes, that man thinketh that in his flyings away he can begile the eyes of God. On the other side, God crieth out that whatsoeuer we purpose, whatsoeuer we goe about, whatsoe-uer we practive, it commeth in his sight. Let therefore our conscience be cleane euin from the most secret thoughts of swaruing from him, if we will haue our religion to please the Lord. For he requireth to haue the glory of his godhead whole and vncorrupted not only in outward confession, but also in his eyes, which do behold the most secret corners of hearts.

The second Commandement.
Thou shalt not make to thee any graven image, nor any similitude of those things that are in heaven above, or in earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. Thou shalt not worship them, nor serve them.

As in the first commandement be pronounced that he is the one God beside whom there are no other gods to be devoted or had, so now he more openly declareth what manner of God he is, and with what kinde of worship he is to be honoured: that we may not presume to forge any carnall thing for him. The end therefore of this commandement is, that hee will not haue haue the lawfull worship of him, to be prophaned with superstitious vsages. Wherefore in summe, he calleth and draweth vs away from the carnall obseruations, which our foolish minde is wont to inuenct, when it conceiuet God according to her owne grossenesse. And therefore he frameth vs to the lawfull worship of him, that is the spirituall worchippe, and which is appointed by him. He speaketh of the grossft fault that is in this offence, namely outward idolatry. And there be two partes of this commandement. The first reitrayneth our liberty, that we do not presume to make subject to our senses, or by any forme to represent God, which is incomprehensible. The second part forbiddeth vs to honour any images for religions fake. Moreover he shortly reciuet all the formes wherewith he was wont to be expressed in shape, by the prophane and superstitious nations. By those things that are in heauen, he meaneth the Sunne, the Moone, and other Stars, and peraduenture also birdes, as expressing his meaning in 4th of Deuteronomy he meaneth as well birdes as Stars. Which note I would not haue spoken of but that I sawe some vnskilfully to apply it to Angels. Therefore I omit the other partes, because they are sufficiently known of themselues, And we haue already in the first booke taught plainly enough, that whatsoever visible formes of God man doth inuenct, they are directly contrary to his nature, and that therefore so soone as images come souer, true religion is corrupted and defiled.

18 The penal ordinance that foloweth ought not a little to auail to shake of our slouthfulnesse. For he threatneth: That he is the Lorde our God, a jeolous God, that visiteth the iniquity of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third & fourth generation, in them that hate his name, & sheweth mercy vnto thousandes to them that love him and keepe his commandements. This is as much in effect, as if he should haue sayde, that it is as onely vpon whom we ought to sticke. And to bring vs thereunto, he speakeh of his power, that doth not without punishment suffer it selfe to be censured or diminished. Here is in deede the name El, which signifieth God. But because it is derived of strength, to express the sense the better, I did not sticke so to translate it, or to put it into the text. Then he calleth himselfe jeolous that can abide no fellow. Thirdly he affirneth that he wil be a reuenger of his majesty & glory if any do transferre it to creatures or to grauen images, and that not with a short or scelerous reuenge, but such as shal extend to the children and childrens children, and childrens children children, that is such as shalbe followers of their fathers vngodlinesse: as also he sheweth a perpetuall mercy and bountifulnesse vnto long continuance of posterity, to those that love him and keepe his lawe. It is a common manner with God to take vpon him the person of a husband toward vs. For the coniunction wherewith he bindeth himselfe vnto vs, when he receiveueth vs into the boosome of his church, is like vnto a certaine holy wedlocke, that must stande by mutuall faithfulness. As he doth all the duties of a faithful and true husband, so againe he requireth of vs such loue and chastitie as ought to be in wedlocke, that we yeelde not our foules to Satan, to lust, & to filthy desires of the flesh, to be defiled by them. Whereupon he that rebuketh the Apostasie of the Iewes, complaineth that they did throwe away chastitie, and were defiled with adulteries. Therefore, as the husband, the more holy and that he himselfe is, the more is he kindled to anger if he see his wives mind encline to a strange lover; so the Lorde that hath wedded vs vnto himselfe in truth, testifieth that he hath a most fervently burning ialousie, sometimes neglecting the pureness of his holy marriage, we are defiled with wicked lustes, but specially then when we transferre to any other, or doe infect with any superstition the worshippe of his name, which ought to bee most vncorrupted: Forasmuch as by this meanes we do not only breake the faith giuen in wedlocke, but also do defile the very wedded bed with bringing into it adulterers.

19 In the threatening is to be scene what he meaneth by this, when he faith, that he will visite the iniquity of the fathers vpon vs children vnto the third and fourth generation. For, beside that it standeth not with the equity of Gods justice, to punish the innocent for an others offence, God him selfe also faith, that he will not make the sonne to bear the wickednesse of the father. But this sentence is more then once repeated, of prolonging the punishment of the sins of the ancesters vpon the generations to come. For so doth Moses oftentimes speake vnto him: Lord, Lord, that renderest the inquity of the fathers vpon vs children vnto the third & fourth generation. Likewise Jeremey: Thou vsflewst mercy in thousands, that renderest the iniquity of the fathers into the bofre of the children after them. Many, while they travaile much in losinge this knot, thinke that it is to be vnderstanden only of temporall punishmentes, which if the children suffer for the parents faults, it is no abusurde, forasmuch as they are oftentimes layed vpon them for their salvation, which is in deede true. For Esay declared to Ezekias, that his sonnes should be spoyle of the kingdome, and caried into exile for the sin that he had committed. The houses of Pharao and Abimelech were plagued for offending Abraham. But where that is alleged for afoiling of this question, it is rather a shifte then a true exposition. For here & in like places he threatneth a more greeuous reuenge than it may be limited within the boundes of this present life. It is therefore thus to be taken: that vs just curfe of the Lorde, lieth not only vpon the head of the wicked man himselfe, but also vpon his whole family: when the curfe once keth vpon them, what is else to be looked for, but that the father being destitute of the spirit of God, liue most wickedly, and the sonne likewise forsaken of the Lorde for the fathers fault, do follow the same way of destruction: and finally, the childes child, and the child of the childes child, the cursed seede of detestable men do fall headlong after them?

20 First let vs see, whether such reuenge be vs seemly for vs justice of God.
If all the nature of man be damnable, we know vs destruccion is prepared for them, to whom vs lord vouchsafe not to communicate his grace. Neuer-theles they do perish by their own vnrighteousnes, & not by vnrighteous hattred of God. Neither is there left any cause to Quarrell, why they be not hol-pe by vs grace of God to salvatiō as other are. Whereas therefore this punishment is laid vpon wicked men and euil doers for their offences, vs their houses be deprifed of vs grace of God during many generatiōs: who can accuse god for this most just reuenge? But the Lord on the other side pronounceth, the punishment
punishment of the fathers sinne shall not passe over vnto the sonne. Note what is there intreated off. When the Israelites had beene long and continually vexed with manie calamities, they began to see for a Proverbe, that their fathers had eaten a fower grape, wherewith the childrens teeth were set on edge: whereby they meant that their fathers had committed sinnes, whereof they, being otherwise righteous, and not deferving it, did suffer the punishment, rather by the vnappeatable wrathfulnesse of God, than by a moderate feuerite. The Prophete pronounces vnto them that it is not fo because they are punished for their owne offences, and that it standeth not with the justice of God, that the righteous sonne should suffer punishment for the naughtynesse of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if the Visiting, whereof mention is nowe made, be fulfilled when the Lorde taketh away from the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his truth and other helps of saluation: in this that the children being blinded and forsaken of him, doe go on in the steps of their fathers, they sufteyne curses for their fathers offences. But inasmuch as they are put to temporall miseries, and at last to eternall destruction, herein they are punished by the iust judgement of God, not for the sinnes of other, but for their owne iniquitie.

On the other side is offered a promife of enlarging the mercy of God into a thousand generations, which promiss is also often found in the scriptures, and is set in the solemn covenant of the Church: I will be thy God, and of thy seede after thee. Which thing Salomon having respect vnto, wright that the children of the righteous shall be blessed after their death, not onely by reason of holy bringing vp, which also a little auaileth thereunto, but also for that blessing promised in the covenant, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Herevpon groweth great comfort to the faithful, great terror to the wicked. For if even after death, the remembrance both of righteousnes and wickednes be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoundeth vnto posteritie, much more shall it light and rest vpon the heads of the doers themselves. But it maketh nothing against vs, that the issue of the wicked many times commeth to good proste, and the issue of the faithful swarveth out of kinde: because the lawmaker meant not here to establish such a perpetual rule as should derogate his free election. For it sufficeth for your comfort of the righteous and for the terror of the sinner, that the penalty is not vaine or of no effect, although it do not alway take place. For as the temporall punishments that are laide vpon a fewe wicked men, are testimonies of the wrath of God against sinnes, and of the judgement that shall one day be given vpon all sinners, although many escape unpunished even to the end of their life: so when God giueth one example of this blessing to shew mercie and bountifullnesse to the sonne for the fathers sake, he giueth a proofe of his constant and perpetuall favour to them that worship him: and when he once pursueth the wickednesse of the father in the sonne, hee sheweth what judgement is prepared for all the reprobate for their owne offences, Which allurendesse hee had in this place principally respect vnto. And by the way he commendeth vnto vs the largeneffe of his mercie, which hee Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of extendeth vnto a thousande generations, whereas hee assigned but onely lower generations to vengeance.

The third commandement.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vaine.

The ende of this commandement is, that his will is to haue the maieftie of his name to be holy among vs. Therefore the summe shall bee that wee doe not defile it with contemptuously and irreuerently vsing it. With which prohibition the commandement hangeth orderly together, that we take studie and care godlyly to reuerence it. Therefore wee ought so to order our foules both in our mindes and our tongues, that we neither think nor speake any thing of God himselfe or his mysteries, but irreuerently and with much sobrietic: that in weying his worke, wee conceive nothing but honorable toward him. These three things I say, it behoueth vs not negligently to marke, that what focuer our minde conceived of him, whatsoever our tongue uttereth, it may fauour of his excellencie, and may agree with the holy highnesse of his name: and finally may ferue to aduance his magnificence. That wee doe not rashly or disorderly abuse his holy worde and reuerende mysteries either to ambition, or to couteouesnesse, or to our owne trifflinges: but that as they beare the dignitie of his name imprinted in them, so they may keepe their honour and estimation among vs. Last of all, that wee doe not carpe against or speake euill of his workes, as thefe wretched men are wont to babbie reproachfull against them: but that whatsoever wee rehearse done by him, wee reporte it with words of praffe of his wisedome, righteousnesse and goodnesse. That is to sanctifie the name of God. Where otherwisse is done, it is defiled with vaine & peruerse abuse, because it is violently carried from the right vs whereunto onely it was appointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is spoyled of his dignitie, and by little and little brought to contempt. Now, if there bee so much euill in this rash readinesse to vs the name of God out of season, much more mischeefe is in this, if it bee employed to euill vses, as they doe that make it to ferue the superstitions of Necromancie, cruel exceterations, unlawfull coniurations, and other wicked enchauntmentes. But swearing is cheffie mentioned in the commandement, as the thing wherein the peruerse abuse of Gods name is most detestable, that thereby we may be the better altogether frayed away from all defiling thereof. But that here is commandement given of the worship of God, and of the reuerence of his name, and not of the trueth and equitie that is to be kepte among men, appeareth by that that he afterwaies in the second table condemmeth perjurie and false witness, whereby hurt is done to the fellowship of men: but it were in vaine to repeate it againe, if this commandement intreated of the dutie of charitie. And alsoe the diuision of the lawe itselfe requireth it, because as it is faide, God did not in vaine appoint two tables for his law, whereby is gathered that in this commandement he challengeth his owne right to himselfe, and defendeth the holines of his name, and teacheth not what men owe to men.
23 First is to be learned what is an oath. It is a taking of God to witnesse, to confirm the truth of that which we speake. For those cursed speakes that containe manifest reproches against God, are unworthy to be reckoned among othes. That such taking to witnesse, when it is rightly done, is a kind of worshipping of God, is shewed in divers places of the Scripture. As when Esay prophesieoth of the calling of the Assyrians and Egyptians into fellowship of the covenant with Israel, They shall speake (faith hee) in the tongue of Chanaan, and shall sweare in the name of the Lord. That is to say, in swearing by the name of the Lord, they shall yeeld a confession of his religion. Againe when he speakeoth of the enlargement of his kingdom, he faith: Whosoever shall bleffe himselfe, shall bleffe in the God of the faithfull; and he that shall sweare in the land shall sweare in the true God. Jeremy faith, If they shall teache the people to sweare in my name, as they haue taught them to sweare by Baal, they shall bee builded vp in the middes of my house. And for good cause it is saide, that when we call vpon the name of the Lord to witnesse, we doe witnesse our religion toward him. For so we confesseth that he is the eternall and unchangeable truth, whom wee call vpon, not onely as a most substantiall witnesse of truth above all other, but also as the onely defence thereof, which is able to bring forth hidden things into light, and then as the knower of heartes. For where testimonies of men do faile, there we flee to God for witnesse, specially where any thing is to be proved that lieth secrete in conscience. For which cause the Lord is bitterly angry with them that sweare by strange gods, and he judgeth that manner of swearing to be an argument of manifest falling from his allegiance: Thy sonnes haue forstaken me, and doe sweare by them that are no gods. And he declareth the hainousnesse of this offence by threatening of punishment: I will destroy them that sweare by the name of the Lord, & sweare by Melchian.

24 Now when we understand that it is the Lords will that there bee in our othes a worship of his name so much the more diligent heede is to bee taken, that in stead of worshipping they do not containe dishonour, contempt or abatement of it. For it is no small dishonour, when perjurie is committed in swearing by him, wherefore it is called in the law, Profanation. For what is left to the Lord when he is spoiled of his truth; he shall then cease to be God. But truly he is spoiled thereof, when he is made an affirmer & approver of falshood. Wherefore, when Josia minded to drive Achan to confess his truthe, he said: My Sonne, giue glory to the Lord of Israel, meaning thereby, that the Lord is grievously dishonored if a man sweare falsely by him. And no manuel. For we do as much as in vs lieth, in a manner, to staine his holy name with a lie. And that this manner of speach was vsed among the Jews so oft as any was called to take an oath, appeareth by the like protestation, that the Pharisees vse in the Gospel of John. To this heequenes the forms of othes that are vsed in the Scriptures do instruct vs: The Lord lieth, The Lord do these things vnto me, and adde these things, The Lord bee witnesse vpon my soule. Which do proue, that we can not call God for witnesse of our sayings, but that we also wish him to take vengeance of our perjurie, if we speake deceitfully.

25 The name of the Lord is made vile and common, when it is vsed

in superfluous othes, although they be true. For in such case it is also taken in vaine. Wherefore it shall not be sufficient to abstaine from swearing falsely, vnlesse we doe also remember, that swearing was suffered and ordeined not for lust or pleasure, but for necessitie sake: and therefore they goe beyond the lawfull vfe thereof, that apply it to things not necessarie. And there can no other necessitie be pretended, but where it is to serve either religion or charity, wherein at this day men doe too much licentiously offend, & so much the more intolerably, for that by very custom it hath ceaft to be reckoned for any offence at all, which yet before the judgement seate of God is not slenderly weyed. For every where without regard, the name of God is defiled in trifling tattles, and it is not thought that they doe euill, because by long suffered and unpunished boldenesse, they are come to rest as it were in possession of so great wickednesse. But the commandement of the Lord remaineth in force, the penaltie abideth in strength, and shall one day haue his effect, whereby there is a certaine speciall reuenge proclaimed against them that vse his name in vaine. This commandement is also tranfgressed in another point, that in our othes we put the holy servants of God in the place of God, with manifest vngodlinesse, for so we transferre the glorie of his godhead to them. Neither is it without cause, that the Lord hath giuen a speciall commandement to sweare by his name, and by speciall prohibition forbidden, that we should not bee heard sweare by any strange gods. And the Apostle evidently testifieth the fame, when he writeth, that men in swearing doe call upon a hier than themselues, and that God which had none greater than his owne glorie to sweare by, did sweare by himselfe.

26 The Anabaptists not contented with this moderation of swearing, doe detest all othes without exception, because the prohibition of Christ is generall: I say vnto ye, sweare not at all, but let your talke be yea yea, and nay nay, whatsoever is more than this, is of euill. But by this meane, they doe without consideration stumble against Christ: while they make him adversarie to his father, and as if he had come downe from heaven to repeale his fathers decrees. For the eternall God doth not onely in the law permit sweareing as a thing lawfull, which were ynone, but also in necessitie doeth command it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his father: that hee bringeth no other thing, but that which his father commanded him, that his doctrine is not of himselfe, &c. What then? will they make God contrarie to himselfe, which shall afterward forbide and condemne the same thing in mens behauiours, which he hath before allowed by commanding it? But because there is some difficultie in the words of Christ, let vs a little weyce them. But herein we shall never attaine the truth, vnlesse wee bende our eyes vnto the entent of Christ, and take heed vnto the purpose that hee there goeth about. His purpose is not either to release or restraine the law, but to reduce it to the true and natural understanding, which had beene very much depraued by the false glodes of the Scribes and Pharisees. This if we hold in minde, we shall not thinke that Christ did verriterly condemne othes, but onely those othes which do tranfgresse the rule of the law. Thereby it appeareth, that the people at that time did forebeare no maner of swea ring but periuries, whereas the law doth not only forbid periuries, but also idle and superfluous others. The Lord therefore the most wise expositor of the lawe, doeth admonish them, that it is not only euill to forswear, but also to sweare. But howe to sweare in vaine. But as for these others that are commended in the lawe, he leaueth them safe and at libertie. They seme to fight somewhat more strongly when they take earnest holde of this word Atal, which yet is not referred to the word Sweare, but to y formes of swearing that are after reheased. For this was also part of their errour, that when they did sweare by heauen and earth, they thought that they did not touch the name of G O D. Therefore after the principall kinde of offence against this commandement, the Lorde doeth also cut of from them all byestifites that they shoulde not thynke that they have escaped, if not speaking of the name of God they call heauen and earth to witnesse. For here by the way it is also to be noted, that although the name of God be not expressd, yet men by indirect formes doe sweare by him, as if they sweare by the likelye light, by the bread that they eate, by their Baptisme or other tokens of Gods liberalitie toward them. Neither doth Chrift in that place where hee forbiddeth them to sweare by heauen and earth and Hierusalem, speake it to correct superstition, as some men falsely thinke, but he rather confuteth their sophistical suctetly, which thought it no fault babblingly to throwe out indirect othes, as though they spared the holy name of God, which is ingrauen in all his benefites. But otherwise it is, that either a mortall man, or a dead man, or an Angell is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flatterie duised that stinking formes of swearing by the life or soule of the king: for then the false making of Gods doeth obscure and minishe the glorie of the one only G O D. But when wee meane onely, to procure credite to our saying by the holy name of God, although the same bee indirectly done, yet in all such trifting othes his majestie is offended. Chrift taketh from this licentiouſnesse, all pretense of excuse, in this that hee forbiddeth to sweare at all. And James tendeth to the same purpose, reciting the same wordes of Chrift which I haue before alleaged, because the same rafhe boldnesse hath alwayes bene in the world, which is a prophane misusing of the name of G O D. For if yee refere this worde, At all, to the substance, as if without any exception it were altogether vnlawfull to sweare, wherefore sferneth that exposition which is added afterward: Neither by heauen nor by earth, &c? Wherby it sufficiently appeareth that those cautions are met withall, by which the Iewes thought their fault to be excused.

27 Therefore it cannot nowe be doubtefull to founde judgementes, that the Lorde in that place did onely reprooue those othes that were forbidden by the lawe. For he himselfe which shewed in his life an examplar of the perfection that he taught, did not sticke to sweare when occasion required. And his discipes, who (we doubt not) did obey their maister in all things, followed the same example: who dare say that Paul woulde haue sweorne, if swearing had beene utterly forbidden? but when the matter so required, he sweare without any sticking at it, yea sometime adding an excreation. But this question is not yet ended, because some do thinke yonely pub-public like others are excepted out of this prohibition, as those others that we take when the Magistrate doth offer them to vs and require them of vs. And such as Princes vs to take in stablishing of leagues, or the people when they sweare allegiance to their Prince, or the Souldiar when he is put to an othe for his true service in the warre, and such like. And to this forte they adiowne, and that rightlyfull, such others, as are in Paul, to confirme the dignitie of the Gospell, for as much as the Apostles in their office are not private men but public like ministers of God. And truely I deny not that those are the safest others, because they are defended with soundest testimonies of Scripture. The Magistrate is commanded in a doubtfull case to drive the witnesse to an othe, and hee on the other side to aunswerd by othe: and the Apostile faith, that mens controversyes are by this meanes ended. In this commandement both these have a perfect allowance of their offices. Ye and we may note, that among the old heathen men, publike and solemn others was had in great reverence, but common others that were usuall spoken without consideration, were either nothing or very little regarded, because they thought that in these they had not to doe with the majestie of God at all. But yet it were too much daungerous to condemne private others, that are in necessarie cases soberly, holy, & reverently taken, which are maintaine both by reason and examples. For if it be lawfull for private men in a weightie and earnest matter to appeale to God as judge betwene them, much more is it lawfull to call him to witnesse. Put the case: thy brother will accuse thee of false breach of faith, thou endeourorest to purge thy selfe according to the dutie of charitie, and hee by no meanes will suffer himselfe to bee satisfied. If thy good name come in perill by his obstinate maliciousnesse, thou shalte without offence appeale to the judgement of God, that it will please him in time to make thine innocencie known. Now if the weight of the wordes be considered, it is a leffe matter to call him to witnesse. Therefore I see not why in this case wee shoue affirme, that the calling him to witnesse is vnlawfull. And we are not without many examples thereof. For though the othe of Abraham and Isaac with Abimelech bee saide not to serue for our purpose, because it was made in the name of a public like companie, yet Jacob and Laban were private men, which stablished a covenant with mutuall othe betwene theneselues. Booz was a private man, which by the same meanes confirmed his promise of marriage to Ruth. Abdius was a private man, a just man & fearing God, which affirmed vnto Elias by oth, the thing he meant to perfwade him. Therefore I haue no better rule, but that others be so tempered, they be not vnaduised, they be not common without regard, that they be not vfed of raging luste, nor tribling, but that they serve just necessitie, as where the Lords glory is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to which ende the commandement of the law tendeth.

The fourth Commandement.

Remember thou keepe holy the Sabbats day. Sixe dayes shalt thou workes & doe all thy works, But on the seventh day is the Sabbats of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt do no worke. &c.
The end of this commandment is, that we being dead to our owne affections and workes, should bee busied in meditation of the kingdome of God, and to the same meditation should be exercised, by such meanes as he hath ordained. But because this commandment hath a peculiar and seuerall consideration from the rest, therefore it must haue also a seuerall maner of exposition. The olde writers vfe to call it a shadow of commandment, for that it containeth the outward observation of the day, which by the coming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherein I grant they say truly, but they touch but halfe the matter. Wherefore we must fetch the exposition of it farther of. And (as I thinke) I haue marked that there are three causes to be considered, whereupon this commandment consisteth. For first the heavenly lawemaker meant vnder the rest of the seuenth day, to set out in figure to the people of Israel, the spiritual rest, whereby the faithful ought to cease from their owne works, that they might suffer God to work in them. Secondly, his wil was to haue one appointed day, wherein they should meete together to heare the lawe, and execute the ceremonies, or at least before it peculiarly to the meditation of his works; that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercised to godliness. Thirdly, he thought good to haue a day of rest granted to servants, and such as liued vnder the government of other, wherein they might have some ceasing from their labour.

But we are many wayes taught, that the same shadowing of the spiritual rest, was the principall point in the Sabbat. For the Lorde required the keping of no commandment in a maner more seuerely, than this: when his meaning is in the Prophets to declare that all religion is overthrown, the he complaineth that his Sabbates are polluted, defiled, not kept, not sanctified: as though that peace of seruice being omitted, there remained no more wherein he might be honored. He did set forth the observing thereof with his prayles. For which cause the faithful did among other oracles marvellously eftimate the reuniting of the Sabbat. For in Nehemiah thus speake ye. Leuites in a solemnne convocation, Thou haft shewed to our fathers thy holy Sabbat, and haft giuen them the commandements and the ceremonies, and the lawe by the hand of Moses. You see how it is had in singular estimation among all the commandments of the lawe. All which things doe serve to set forth the dignitie of the mystical, which is very well expressed by Moses and Ezechiel. Thus you haue in Exodus. See that ye keepe my Sabbat day, because it is a token betweene me and you in your generations: that you may knowe that I am the Lord that sanctifie you: keepe my Sabbat, for it is holy vnto you. Let the children of Israel keepe the Sabbat & celebrate it in their generations, it is an everlastinge covenent betwene me and the children of Israel, and a perpetuall token. Yet Ezechiel speaketh more at large. But the summe thereof commeth to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israel shoulde knowe that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our owne will, then appeareth a most apt relation of the outward signe with the inward thing it selue: we must altogether rest, that God may worke in vs: we must depart from our owne will, we must resigne vp our heart, we must banish all lustes of the flesh.

Finally,
Finally, we must cease from all the doings of our own will, that we may have God working in vs, y we may rest in him, as the Apostle also teacheth.

30 This perpetuall ceasing was represented to the Iewes, by the keeping of one day among many: which day, to make it be observed with greater deuotions, the Lord commannded with his owne example. For it was not a little to stirre vp mans endeuour, that he may know that hee tendereth to the following of his Creator. If any man search for a secret signification in the number of leuen: Forasmuch as that number is in the Scripture, the number of perfection, it was not without cause chosen to signific euerlastinge continuance. Wherewith this also agreeth that Moses in the day that he declared that the Lord did rest from his works, maketh an end of describing the succeeding of daies and nights. There may bee also brought an other probable note of the number, that the Lord therby meant to shewe that the Sabbath should never be perfectly ended, till it came to the last day. For in it we beginne our blessed rest, in it we doe daily proceed in profiting more and more. But because we haue still a continual warre with the flesh, it shall not be ended vntil that saying of Esaie be fulfilled, concerning continuing of new Moone with new Moone, of Sabbath with Sabbath, even then when God shalbe all in all. It may seeme therefore that the Lord hath by the seuenth day set forth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabbath at the last day, that our whole life might by continual meditation of the Sabbath, aspire to this perfection.

31 If any man mislike this observation of the number as a matter too curious, I am not against him, but that he may more simply take it: that the Lord ordained one certaine day, wherein his people might vnder the schooling of the law be exercised to the continuall meditation of the spiritual rest: And that he assigned the seuenth day, either because he thought it sufficient, or that by setting forth the likeneesse of his owne example, he might better move the people to kepe it or at least to put them in minde, that the Sabbath tended to no other end, but that they should become like unto their creator. For it maketh small matter, so that the mysticke remaine which is therin principally set forth, concerning perpetual rest of our works. To consideration whereof the Prophetes did now and then call backe the Iewes that they should not thinke them selues discharged by carnall taking of their rest. Befide the places already allledged, you haue thus in Esaie: If thou turne away thy foote from the Sabbath, that thou do not thine owne will in my holy day, and shal call the Sabbath delicate and holy of the glorious Lorde, and shalt glorifie him while thou dost not thine owne wayes, & seekest not thine owne wil to speake thy word, then shalt thou be delited in thy Lord, &c. But it is no dout, that by the comming of our Lord Christ, so much as was ceremoniall herein, was abrogate. For he is the true, by whose presence all figures doe vanish away: hee is the bodie at sight whereof the shadowes are left. He, I say, is the true fulfilling of the Sabbath, we being buried with him by Baptisme, are grafted into the fellowship of his death, that we being made partakers of the resurrection, we may walke in newenesse of life. Therefore in another place the Apostle writeth, that the Sabbath was a shadowe of a thing to come: and that the true bodie, that is to say, the perfect substance of truth is in Christ, which in the same place he hath well declared. That is not contained in one day, but in the whole course of our life, until that we being utterly dead to our lusts, be filled with the life of God. Therefore superstitious observing of days ought to be farre from Christians.

32. But forasmuch as the two later causes ought not to be reckoned among the old shadowes, but do belong alike to all ages: since the Sabbath is abrogated, yet this hath still place with vs, that we should meete at appointed days to the hearing of the word, to the breaking of the mystical bread, and to publick prayer: and then, that to seruants and labourers be granted their rest from their labour. It is out of doubt that in commanding the Sabbath, the Lord had care of both these things. The first of them hath sufficient testimonie by the onely life of the Jews to prove it. The second, Moses spake of in Deuteronomie in these wordes: that thy man seruant and thy maide seruant may rest as well as thou: remember that thou thy selfe didst serue in Egypt. Again in Exodus: that thy Oxe and thy Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy bondwoman may take breath. Who can deny that both these things doe serue for vs as well as for the Jews? Meetings at the Church, are commanded vs by the worde of God, and the necessity of them is sufficiently known in the very experience of life. Vnlesse they be certeinetly appointed and haue their ordinarie daies, how can they be kept? All things by the sentence of the Apostle are to be done comely and in order among vs. But to farre is it of that comeliness & order can be kept without this policie and moderation, that there is at hand present trouble and ruine of the Church, if it be dissolved. Now if the same necessity be among vs, for releafe whereof the Lord appointed the Sabbath to the Jews: let no man say that it belongeth nothing vnto vs. For our most prudent and tender Father, willed no lesse to provide for our necessity than for the Jews. But thou wilt saye, why doe wee not rather daily meeete together, that the difference of daies may be taken away? I would to God, that were granted, and truely spiritual worshipp was a thing worthy to haue daily a pice of the time cut out for it. But if it cannot be obtained of the weaknesse of many to haue daily meetings, and the rule of charitie doth not suffer vs to exact more of them, why should we not obey the order which we see layed vpon vs by the will of God?

33. I am compelled here to be somewhat long, because at this day many vnquiet spirits do raise trouble, concerning the Sunday. They erie out that the Christian people are nourished in Jewishtnesse, because they keep some observation of daies. But I answere, that wee keepe those daies without any Jewishnesse, because we do in this behalfe farre differ from the Jews. For we keepe it not with strecthe religion as a cerimonie, wherein we think a spiritual mysterie to be signified, but we retaine it as a necessary remedie to the keeping of order in the Church. But Paul teacheth that in keeping thereof they are not to be judged Christians, because it is a shadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vain among the Galathians, because they did feele obseruance daies. And to the Romans he affirmeth that it is superstition if any man doe make difference betwenee day reverence very nature ought in a manner to influence us. For they are monsters and not men, that break the authority of parents with dishonour or stubbornness. Therefore the Lord commanded all the disobedient to their parents, to be slain, as men unworthy to enjoy the benefit of light, that does not reknowledge by whose means they came into it. And by many additions of the lawe it appeareth to be true that we have noted, that there are three parts of honour that he here speaketh of, Reverence, Obedience, and Thankfulness. The first of these the Lord establisheth when he commandeth him to be killed that curseth his Father or his Mother, for there he punisheth the contempt and dishonour of them. The seconde he confirmeth when he appointeth the punishment of death for the disobedient and rebellious children. To the third belongeth that saying of Christ in the sixteenth of Matthew, that it is the commandement of God that we doe good to our parents. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of a commandement, he expoundeth that therein obedience is required.

37 There is annexed a promise for a commendation, which doth the rather put us in mind, how acceptable unto God is the submission that is here commanded. For Paul with the same pricke to stirre vp our dulness when he faith: that this is the first commandement with promise. For the promise that went before in the first Table, was not special & properly belonging to one commandement, but extended to the whole lawe. Now this is thus to be taken: The Lord spake to the Israelites peculiarly of the lande which he had promised them for their inheritance. If then the possession of land was a pledge of God's bountifulnes: let vs not merueile if it pleased God to declare his favours by giving length of life, by which a man might long enjoye his benefit. The meaning therefore is thus. Honor thy Father and thy Mother, that by a long space of life thou mayest enjoy thy possession of that land that shalbe vnto thee for a testimonie of thy favour. But sith all the earth is blessed to the faithful, we doe not worthily rekeen this present life among the blessings of God. Therefore this promise doth likewise belong vnto vs, for somewhat as the continuance of this life is a prooue of Gods good will. For it neither is promiseth to vs, nor was promiseth to the Iewes, as though it contained blesednes in it selue, but because it is wont to be to the Godly a token of Gods tender looke. Therefore if it chauce that an obedient child to his parentes be taken out of this life before his ripe age, which is oftentimes seen, yet doth God no lesse constantly continue in the performance of his promise, than if he should reward him with a hundreth Acres of land, to whom he promised but one Acre. All consisteth in this, that we should consider that long life is so farre promised vs, as it is the blessing of GOD, and that it is his blessing so farre as it is a prooue of his favour, which he by death doth much more plentifully and perfectly witnessse and shew in effect to his suuerantes.

38 Moreover, when the Lorde promiseth the blessing of this present life to the children that honor their parentes with such reverence as they ought, he doth withall secretly say, that most assured curse hangeth over the stubborn and disobedient children. And that the same should not want execution: he pronounceth them by his lawe subject to the judgment of death, and and commandeth them to be put to execution: and if they escape that judgement, he himself taketh vengeance on them by one mean or other. For we see howe great a number of that sort of men are slain in battles & in frayes, and some other tormented in strange vnacustomed fashions, and they all in a manner are a proofe that this threatening is not vain. But if any escape to olde age, fith in this life being deprued of the blessing of God, they do nothing but miserably languish, and are resorted for greater paines hereafter, they are farre from being partakers of the blessing promised to the godly children. But this is also by the way to be noted, that we are not commanded to obey them but in the Lorde. And that is evident by the foundation before layed: for they sit on hie in that place whereunto the Lorde hath aduaunced them, by communicating with them a portion of his honour. Therefore the submission that is vied toward them, ought to be a steppe towards the honouring of that soueraigne Father. Wherefore, if they move vs to transgresse the lawe, then are they worthily not to bee accombted parents, but Strangers that labor to withdrawe vs from obedience to the true Father. And so is to be thought of Princes, Lords, and all forces of superiors. For it is shamefull and against convenience of reason, that their preeminence shoule prejudice to press downe his highnesse, fith theirs as it hangeth wholly vpon it, so ought onely to guide vs vnto it.

The Sixt Commandement.

Thou shalt not kill.

39 The ende of this commandement is, that forasmuch as God hath bounde together all mankinde with a certeine vnitie, that euery man ought to regard the safttie of all men, as a thing giuen him in charge. In summe therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all harme doing, whereby our neighbours body may be hurt, is forbidden vs. And therefore we are commanded, if there be any power of succour in our travaile to defend the life of our neighbours, that we faithfully imploy the same, that wee procure those things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keepe them from hurt, and if they be in any danger, that we give them our helping hand. If thou consider that it is God the lawmaker that so faith, then think withall that his meaning is by this rule also to gouerne thy soule. For it were a base thing to thinke, that he which espieth the thoughtes of the heart, and principally resteth vpon them, should instuc nothing but the body to true righteoulinefse. Therefore the maneslaughter of the heart is also forbidden in this lawe, and an inward affection to preserue our brothers life is here giuen in commandement. The hand in deede bringeth forth the maneslaughter, but the minde conceiued it, when it is infected with wrath & hatred. Looke whether thou canst be angrie with thy brother without burning in desire to do him hurte. If thou canst not be angry with him, then canst thou not hate him, for asmuch as hatred is nothing but an olde rooted anger. Although thou dissemble and go about to winde out thy selfe by vaine circumstancs: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurte. If thou wilt most part of men are subject to the vice of incontinence: and then of those that be subject unto it, he excepteth none, but commandeth al to ye only remedy, wherewith vnchastity is resifted. Therefore if they that be incontinent do neglect to heple their infirmity by this meane, they sinne even in this that they obey not the commandement of the Apostle. Neither let him flatter himselfe that toucheth not a woman as though he could not be rebuked of vnchastity, while in the meane season his minde burneth inwardly with lust. For Paul defineth chastity to be a cleanness of the minde, joyned with chastity of body. A woman vnmaried (faith he) thinketh upon those things that are of the Lord, forasmuch as she is holy both in body & in spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reafon to confirme that former commandement, he doth not onely fay, that it is better for a man to take a wife, than to defile himf elfe, with company of a harlot, but he fayth, that it is better to marry than to burne.

44. Now if married folkes do confeffe that their fellowshippe together is blessed of the Lord, they are thereby admonifhed not to defile it with intemperate and diſolute lust: For though the honestye of mariage do cower the filthines of incontinencie, yet it ought not forthwith to be a prouocatio thereof. Wherefore let not married folkes thinke, that all things are lawful vnto them, but let euery husband haue his owne wife soberly, and likewise the wife her husband, and so doing, let them committe nothing vnbecoming the honestye and temperance of mariage. For fo ought mariage made in the Lord to be restrayned to measure and modesty, & not to ouerflow into euy kind of extreme lasciuoulines. This wantonnes Ambrofe reproofed with a faying very fere in deed, but not vnfit for it, when he calleth his husband, the adulterer of his owne wife, which in fce of wedlock hath no care of shamfastnes or honestye. Laft of all, let vs confider what lawmaker doth here commend fornication, euem he which fith of his owne right he ought to possesse vs wholly, requireth pureneffe of the soule, spirit and body. Therefore when he forbidden to commit fornication, he also forbidden with wanton attire of body, with vnneatly gestures, and with filthy tale to lay waite to trap an others chastity. For that faying is not without good reafon, which Archelaus fpake to a yong man aboue measure wantonly & diuemly clothed, that it made no matter in what part he were filthily vnchaft: if we haue a regard vnto God's abhorreth all filthines in whatsoever part either of our soule or body it appeareth. And to put thee out of dout, remember that the Lord here commendeth chastity. If the Lord require chastity of vs, then he commendeth all that euer is against it. Therefore if thou couet to fhowe obedience, neither let thy minde burne inwardly with euill lust, nor lette thine eyes runne wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body be trimmed vp for allurement, nor let thy tongue with filthy tale entice thy minde to like thoughtes, nor let thy gluttonous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all these vices are, as it were, certaine blottes, wherewith the pureneffe of chastity is bespotted.

The eight Commandement.

Thou shalt not Steale.

45. The end of this commandement is, because God abhorreth vnrighteuoulines outnefse, that every man may have his owne rendred vnto him. The summe therefore shallbe, that we are forbidden to gape for other mens goods, and that therefore we are commanded every man to employ his faithfull trauaile to preserue to each man his owne goods. For this we ought to thinke that what every man posseseth is not happended vnto him by chance of fortune, but by the distribution of the soueraigne Lord of all things, and therefore no mans goods can be gotten from him by euil meanes, but that wrong be done to the disposition of God. But of these there be many kindes: one standeth in Violence, when the goods of an other are by any manner of force and robbing licentioufnes bereaued. The other kinde consisteth in malicious deceite, where they are guilefully conueied away. An other sorte there is that standeth in a more hidden suttletie, when they are wrong from the owner by colour of lawe. An other sort in flatterie, where they are sucked away by pretence of gift. But least wee should tarie too long vppon renting of all the feuerall kindes of theft, lette vs knowe, that all craftie meanes whereby the possession and money of our neighbours are conued vnto vs, when they once go by crooked waies from lyncerenes of heart, to a desire to beguilie, or by any meane to do hurt, are to bee accounted for theftes. Although by pleading the law, they may preuailie, yet God doth not otherwise weth them. For bee seeth the long captious suttleeties, wherewith the guilefull man beginneth to entangle the simplier minde, till at length he drawe him into his nettes. He seeth the hard and vngente lawes, wherewith the mightier oppreffe and throweth downe the weaker. He seeth the allurements, wherewith as with baited hooks, the craftier taketh thee vnware. All which things are hidden from the judgement of man, and come not in his knowledge. And this manner of wrong is not onely in monie, in wares, or in landes, but in every mans right. For we defraud our neighbour of his goods, if we denie him those dutties which we are bound to do for him. If any idle factor or Baylie doe devoure his masters substance, and is not heedfull to the care of his thrift, if he either do wrongfully spoile, or do riotously wast the substance committed vnto him, if a seruant doe mocke his master, if he disclose his secretes by any meanes, if he betray his life and his goods: againe if the Lord doe cruelly oppresse his household, they are before God guiltie of theft. For he both withholdeth and conueieth an other mans goods, which performeth not that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other.

46 We shal therefore rightly obey this commandement, if being contented with our owne estate, we seake to get no gaine but honest & lawfull, if we couet notto waxe rich with wrong, nor go about to spoile our neighbour of his goodes that our owne substance may encreafe, if wee labour not to heape vp cruel riches and wrong out of other mens blood, if we do not immeasurably scrape together euery way, by right and by wrong, that either our couetousneffe may be filled, or our prodigalitie satisfied. But on the other side, let this bee our perpetuall marke, to aide all men faithfully by counsel and helpe to keepe their owne so faire as we may: but if we have to do with false and deceitfull men, lette vs rather bee ready to yeeld vp some of our owne, then to thrue with them. And not that only, but vs communicate

to their necessities, and with our store releive their neede, whom we see to be oppressed with hard & poore estate. Finally, let every man looke how much he is by duetie bound to another, and let him faithfully pay it. For this reason let the people have in honor all those that are set over them, let them patiently beare their gouernement, obey their lawes and commandements, refuse nothing that they may beare, still keeping God favoureable vnto the.

Againe, let them take care of their people, preserue common peace, defend the good, restringe the euill, and so order all things, as ready to give accoamt of their office to the soueraigne judge. Let the Ministers of Churches faithfully apprize their ministerie, and not corrupt the doctrine of salvation, but deliver it pure and sancet to the people of God, and let them instruct them not onely with learning, but also with example of life; finally, let them so be other them, as good shephe­chardes be other the sheepe. Let the people likewise receive them for the messengers and Apostles of God, give them that honor whereof the hiest maister hath vouchsafted them, and minister vnto them such things as are necessarie for their life. Let parentes take on them to feede, rule and teach their children, as committed to them of God, & grieve not, nor turne away their mindes from them with crueltie, but rather cherish & embrace them with such lenitie and tenderneffe, as becommeth their person. After which manner, we have already said, that children owe to their parentes their obedience. Let yong men reverence olde age, even as the Lord willed that age to be honorable. Let old men also gouerne the weaknesses of youth with their wisdome and experience, wherein they excell yong men, not rating with rough & loude brawling, but tempering fercrity with mild­neffe and gentlenesse. Let feruantes shewe themselfes diligent and serviable to obey: and that not to the eye, but from the heart, as serving God himselfe. Also let maisters shewe themselfes not teste and hard to please, nor oppresse them with too much sharpenesse, nor reprochfullly vse them, but rather acknowledge that they are their brethren and their fellowe feruantes under the heavenly Lorde, whom they ought mutually to loue and gently to intreate. After this manner, I say, let every man consider what in his degree and place he oweth to his neighbours, and let him pay that he oweth. Moreover our minde ought alwayes to haue respect to the law-maker, that we may knowe that this lawe is made as well for our mindes, as for our handes, that men should studie to defend and further the commodities and profite of other.

The ninth Commandement.

Thou shalt not be a lying witnesse against thy neighbour.

47 The end of this commandement is, that because God which is truth abhorreth lying, we ought to observe trueth without deceitfull colour. The summe therefore shalbe, that wee neither hurt any mans name either with flanders or false reportes, nor hinder him in his goodes by lying; finally that wee offende no man, by lust to speake euill, or to be busie: with which prohibition is ioyned a commandement, that so farre as wee may, wee employ our faithfull endeuour for every man in affirming the trueth, to defend the safety both of his name and goods. It seemeth that the Lord purposed to expound the meaning of his commandment in the three & twenty Chapter of Exodus, in these wordes: Thou shalt not use the voice of lying, nor shalt thou shew thy hande to speake false witness for the wicked. Again, Thou shalt flee lying. Also in an other place hee doeth not onely call vs away from lying in this point that we bee no accusers, or whisperers in the people, but alfo that no man deceiue his brother, for hee forbiddeth them both in severall commandements. Truely it is no doubt, but that as in the commandements before, he hath forbidden cruelty, vnacontinent and courtesiously, so in this hee refraiment falshood. Whereof there are two partes as we haue noted before. For either wee offend the good name of our neighbours by maliciousness and froward minde to backebite, or in lying and sometime in euill speaking we hinder their commodities. There is no difference whether in this place be understood solemne and judicial testimonie, or common testimonie that is vsed in private talks. For wee must always have recourse to this principle, that of all the generall kindes of vices one speciall sort is set for an example, wherewith the rest may bee referred, and that that is cheefeley chosen, wherein the filthineffe of the faulte is moeffe apparant. Albeit, it were convenient to extende it more generally to flaunders and sinister backbittinges wherewith our neighbours are wrongfully greeued, for that falsesholde of witnessing which is vsed in judiciall courtes, is neuer without perurie. But peruries infomuch as they doe prophane and defile the name of God, are alreadie sufficiently mette withall in the third commandement. Wherefore the right vs of this commandement is, that our tongue in affirming the truth doe fere both the good name and profite of our neighbours. The equitie thereof is more than manifest. For if a good name bee more precious than any treasures, whatsoever they bee: then it is no lesse hurt to a man to bee spoyled of the goodness of his name than of his goods. And in bereaving his substance sometime falses witnesse doeth as much as violence of handes.

48 And yet it is maruellous with how negligent carelesssnesse men do commonly offende in this point, so that there are founde vere few that are not notably sicke of this deseafe: wee are so much delighted with a certaine poisoned sweetnesse both in searching out and in disclofing the euilles of other. And let vs not thinke that it is a sufficient excuse, if oftentimes we lie not. For hee y forbiddeth thy brothers name to be defiled with lying, willeth also y it be preserved vntouched so far as the truth will suffer. For howsoever he taketh heed to himselfe only, so that he tell no lie, yet in the same he secretly confeffeth that he hath some charge of him. But this ought to suffice vs to keepe safe our neighbours good name, y God hath a care of it. Wherefore without doubt all euill speaking is vterly condemned. But wee meane not by euill speaking, that reuing which is vsed for chaitimente: nor accusation, or judiciall procelse, whereby remedie is sought for an euill, nor publike reprehension which tendeth to put other sinners in feare, nor bewraying of faults to them for whose safety it behooueth y they shoule be forwarned leaft they shoule be in danger by ignorance: but we meane only hateful accusing, which ariseth of maliciousnes & of a wante wil to backbite. Also Also this commandement is extended to this point, that wee ouer not to use a scoffing kinde of a plesauntesse, but mingled with bitter tauntes, thereby bittingly to touch other mens faultes under pretence of pastime, as many doe that feke praife of merie conceites with other mens shame yea and grieue: also when by such wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a little reprooched. Nowe if wee bende our eyes to the lawmaker, which must according to his rightfull authoritie beare rule no leffe over the cares and minde than ouer the tongue: truely wee shall finde that greedi-neffe to heare backe bitings, and a hastie readiness to euill judgementes are no leffe forbbiden. For it were verie fonde if a man shoulde thinke God hath the faulte of euill speaking in the tongue, and doeth not disallow the fault of euill maliciousnesse in the heart. Wherefore if there bee in vs a true feare and loue of God, let vs indevour so farre as wee may and as is expedient, and as charitie beareth, that wee giue neither our tongue, nor our cares to euill speakinges, and bitter iestings, least wee rashly without cause yelde our mindes to indirect suspicions. But being indifferent expostours of all mens sayinges and doinges, let vs both in judgement, cares, & tongue gently preferr their honour safe.

The tenth Commandement.

Thou shalt not commit thy neighbours house, &c.

49 The ende of this commandement is, that because the Lordes will is that our soule be wholly possessed with the affection of loue: all luft is to bee shaken out of our minde that is contrarie to charitie. The summe therefore shall bee, that no thought creepe into vs, which may move our mindes with a concupiscence hurtfull and turning towarde an others loose: wherewith on the other side agreeth the commandement, that whatso-uer wee conceive, purpose, will or study vpon, bee joyned with the benefitie and commoditie of our neighbours. But here, as it seemeth, ariseth a harde and combersome difficulty. For is it bee truely faide of vs before that under the names of fornication and theft are contained the luft of fornication, and the purpose to hurt and deceuie, it may seeme superfluously spoken, that the coueting of other mens goodes shoulde afterward be secretly forbidden vs. But the distincktion betweene purpose and coueting, will easily lose vs this knot. For purpose (as wee have meant in speaking of it in the other commandementes before) is deliberate consent of will, when luft hath subdued the minde: but coueting may bee without any such either aduisione or affent, when the minde is onely pricked and tickled with vaie and peruerse obiectes. As therefore the Lorde hath heretofore commanded, that the rule of charitie shoulde gowerne our willes, studies, and workes: so hee nowe commandeth the conceptions of our minde to be directed to the same rule, that there be none of them crooked and wri-then, that may prouoke our minde an other way. As he hath forbidden our minde to be bowed and led into wrath, hatred, fornication, robberie, and lying: so he doth nowe forbid vs to be moued therunto.

50 And not without cause doth he require so great vprightnesse. For who who can deny that it is righteous, that all the powers of the soul be posse-sed with charity? But if any of them do swerve from the mark of charitie, who can deny that it is diseased? Now, whence commeth it that so many defies hurtful to thy neighbour, doe enter into thy heart, but of this, that neglecting him thou carest only for thy selfe? For if thy mind were alto-ther throughly soaked with charitie, no parcel thereof should be open to such imaginations. Therefore it must needs be void of charitie, so far as it receiveth concupiscence. But some men will object, that yet it is not necestary that fantasies are without order tossed in mans wit, and at length do vanish e away, should be condemned for concupiscence, whose place is in the heart. I answer that here our question is of that kinde of fantasies, which while they are present before our minde, doe together bite and strike our heart with desire, forasmuch as it neuer commeth in our minde, to wish for any thing, but that our heart is stirred vp and leapeth withall. Therefore God commandeth a moste marvellous ferenitie of loue which he willeth not to be entangled with neuer so small shares of concupiscence. He requireth a marculously framed minde, which he suffreth not so much as v flight provocations to be any thing stirred against the law of loue. To this expostition Augustitine did first open me, why, because thou shouldst not think it is without consent of some graue authoritie. And though the Lords purpose was to forbid vs al wrongful coueting; yet in rehearsing it, he hath brought forth for example those things that most commonly do deceive vs with a false image of delight; because he would leave nothing to concupiscence when he draweth it from these things, vpon the which it most of all rageth and triumphant. Lo, here is the second Table of the law, wherein we are taught sufficiently what wee owe to men for Gods sake, vpon consideration whereof haughteth the rule of charitie. Wherefore, thou shall but vainely call vpon those duties that are contained in this Table, vnshe vnderstanding of the law, as vpon her foundation. As for them which secke for two commandements in the prohibition of coueting, wise reader, though I say nothing, will judge that by wrong division, they are in sunder that which was but one. And it maketh nothing against vs, that this worde, Thou shalt not couet, is the second time repeated, for after he had first set the house, then he renideth the partes thereof, beginning at the wife: whereby it plainly appeareth, that (as the Hebrews do very well) it ought to be read in one whole sentence, and that God in effect commandeth, that all that every man possesseth, should remaine safe and untouched, not onely from wrong and luft to defraude them, but also from the very least desire that may move our minde.

51 But now to what ende the whole law tendeth, it shall not be hard to judge: that is, to the fullfilling of rightousshelle, that it might frame the life of man after the example of the pureesse of God. For God hath therein so painted out his owne nature, as if a man do performe in deeds that which is there commanded, he shall in a manner express an image of God in his life. Therefore when Moses meant to bring the summe thereof into the minde of the Israelites, he said: And nowe Israel, what doth the Lorde thy God aske of thee, but that thou feare the Lord, and wakke in his wayes.
him and serve him in all thy heart, and in all thy soule, and keepe his commandements; And he cesseed not till he sing the same song againe into them, so oft as he purposed to shewe the end of the lawe. The doctrine of the lawe hath such respect hereunto, that it ioyneth man, or as Moses in an other place termeth it, maketh man to sticke fast to his God in holinesse of life. Nowe the perfection of that holinesse consisteth in the two principal points already rehearsed, That we love Lord God with all our heart, all our soule, all our strength, and our neighbour as our selves. And the first indeed is, that our soule be in all parts filled with the love of God. From that by and by of it selfe forth floweth the love of our neighbour. Which thing the Apostle sheweth when he writeth, that the end of the law is Loue out of a pure conscience, and a faith not faineled. You see howe, as it were, in the head is set conscience and faith unsaied, that is to say in one word true godlinessse, and that from thence is charitie deriued. Threfore he is deceiued, whofoever thinketh that in the lawe are taught onely certaine rudimentes and first Introductions of righteouseesse, wherewith men became to be taught their first schooling, but not yet directed to the true marke of good worke, whereas beyond that sentence of Moses, and this of Paul, you can desiere nothing as wanting of the highest perfection. For howe farre, I pray you, will hee procede that will not bee contented with this institution, whereby man is instructed to the feare of God, to spirituall worshipping, to obeying of the commandements, to follow the prerightenesse of the way of the Lord; finally to pureene of conscience, sincere faith and loue? Whereby is confirmed that exposition of the law, which searcheth for and findeth out in the commandements thereof all the duties of godlinessse and loue. For they that followe onely the drie and bare principles, as if it taught but the one halfe of Gods wil, knowe not the end thereof, as the Apostle witnesseth.

52. But whereas in rehearsing the summe of the lawe, Christ and the Apostle do somtime leave out the first Table: many are deceived therein while they would faine draw their words to both Tables. Christ in Matthew calleth the chief points of the law, mercy, judgement and faith: under the word Faith, it is not doubtfull to me, but that he meaneth truth or vnfaithfulnesse toward men. But some, that the sentence might be extended to the whole law, take it for religiouenes toward God. But they labour in vaine. For Christ speaketh of those works wherewith man ought to prove himselfe righteous. This reason if we note, we will also cause to maruell why, when a young man asked him what be the commandements by keeping whereof we enter into life: he answered those things onely: Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt bear no false witness. Honor thy Father and thy Mother. Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. For the obeying of the first Table consisted in manner all either in the affection of the heart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the heart appeared not, and as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did continually vfe. But the worke of charitie are such, as by them we may declare a perfect righteouseesse. But this commeth where so often in the prophets, that it must needs bee familiar to a reader, but meanely exerciséd in them. For in a manner alwaye, whe they they exhort to repentance, they leave out the first Table; and only call upon faith, Judgement, Mercy and Equity. And thus they do not overskip the fear of God; but they enquire the earnest prayer of it by the tokens of it. This is well known, that when they speak of the keeping of the law, they do for the most part refer to the second Table, because therein the study of righteousness & vprightness is most openly scene. It is needles to rehearse places, because every man will of himselfe easily mark which Ifay.

But thou wilt say, is it then more available to the perfection of righ-teounes, to live innocently among men, than with true godlines to honor God? No, because a man doth not easily keepe charity in all pointes, vnles he earnestly feare God; therefore it is thereby proued, that he hath god-linesse also. Befide that, forasmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefit can come from vs vnto him, which thing he doth also testifie by y Prophet: therefore he requireth not our dueties to himselfe, but doth exercise vs in good works toward our neighbour. Therefore not without cause the Apostle setteth the whole perfection of y holy ones in charity. And not in-conveniendt in another place he calleth y same the fulfilling of the law: adding that hee hath performed the law that loue his neighbour. Againe, That all the lawe is comprehended in one worde. Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. For he teacheth no other thing but the same which Christ doth when he faith: Whatsoeuer ye will that men doe to you, doe yee the same to them. For this is the lawe and the Prophets. It is certain that in the lawe and the Prophets Faith and all that belongeth to the true worship of God, holdeth the principall place, & that Loue is beneath it in the lower degree: But the Lordes meaning is, that in the lawe is onely prescribed vnto vs an observation of right and equitie, wherein we be exercis’d to testifie our godly feare of him, if there be any in vs.

54 Here therefore let vs sticke fast, that then our life shall be best framed to Gods will and the rule of his lawe, when it shall bee every way most profitable to our brethren. But in the whole lawe there is not one fillable that appointeth to man any rule of such things as hee shall doe: or leave yndone to the commoditie of his owne fleithe. And surely fift men are so borne of such disposition naturally that they bee too much carried all headlong to the loue of themselues, and howe much soever they fall from the trueth yet still they keepe that felse loue, there needed no lawe anye more to enflame that loue, that was naturally of itselfe, too much beyonde measure. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that not the loue of our felues, but the loue of God and of our neighbour is the keeping of the commandments, and that hee loueth beft & most holily, that (so nere as may be) loueth & travelleth leaft for himselfe, & that no man loueth worse & more wickedly than he’ loueth and travelleth for himselfe & only thinketh vpon & seeketh for thinges of his owne. And the Lord, the more to expresse with how great earnestnesse we ought to be led to the loue of our neighbours, appointed it to be measured by the loue of our felues as by a rule, because hee had no other vehement or stronger affection to measure it by. And the force of the manner of speaking is diligently to bee wedyed. For hee doeth not, as certaine Sophisters have foolishly dreamed, giue the first degree to the loue of
Of the knowledge of our selves, and the seconde to charitie; but rather that affection of love which we doe all naturally drawe to our selves, he giueth away vnto other, whereupon the Aposhte faith, that Charitie seeketh not her owne. And their reason is not to bee esteemed worth a haire that the thing ruled isuer inferiour to his Rule. For God doeth not make the love of our selves, a rule wherevnto charitie towards other should be subject, but whereas by perpetuittie of nature, the affection of love was wont to rest in our selves, he sheweth that nowe it ought to be elsewhere spread abroad, that we should with no leffe cheerefulnes, ferventnes, and carefulnes be readie to do good to our neighbour than to our selves.

55 Nowe fith Chrift hath shewed in the parable of the Samaritane that under the name of Neighbour euery man is contained bee he neuer so strange vnto vs: there is no causse why wee should restraine the commandement of love within the bounds of our owne friendships and acquaintances. I denie not that the nearer that any man is vnto vs, the more familiarie bee is to bee holden with our indeuours to doe him good. For so the order of humanitie requireth, that so many more dueties of friendship men shoulde communicate together, as they are bounde together with streighter bonds of kinred, familiaritie or neighbourhoode, and that without any offence of God, by whose prouidence wee are in a manner druen therevnto. But I say that all mankinde without exception is to bee embraced with one affection of charitie: and that in this behalfse is no difference of Barbarous or Grecian, of worthie or vnworthie, of friend or foe, because they are to bee considere in God and not in themelues: from which consideration when wee tune away, it is no maruell if wee bee entangled with manie errours. Wherefore if we will keepe the true trade of louing, we must not tune our eyes vnto man, the fight of whome would ofter enforce vs to hate than to loue, but vnto God which commandeth that the loue which wee offer him, be powred abroad among al men: that this bee a perpetuall foundation, that whatsoever the man bee, yet he ought to be loued because God is loued.

56 Wherefore it was a most pestilent ignorance or malice, that the Scholemen of these commandementes, touching not desiring of reuenge, and louing our enimies, which in the olde time both were giuen to the Lewes and at the same time were commonly giuen to all Christians, haue made Counsels which it is in our libertie to obey or not to obey. And the necessarie obeying of them, they haue posted ouer to Monkes which were thought but in this one point forsooth more righteous than simple Christians, that they willingly bound themselves to keepe the Counsels. And they render a reason why they receiue them not for lawes, for that they seeme too burdensome, and heauie, specially for Christians that are under the lawe of grace. So dare they presume to repel the eternal lawe of God touching the louing of our neighbours? Is there any such difference in any leafe of the lawes and are not therein rather eache where founde commandementes that doe most severely require of vs to loue our enemies? For what manner of saying is that, where wee are commanded to feede our enemie when he is hungry? to set into the right way his Oxen or Asses
And who pray you mean these things that they have presumed to mock withall in their vanity glose? Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, pray for them that persecute you, bless them that curse you, that ye may be the children of your father which is in heaven. Who cannot here reason with Chrysolome, that by so necessarie a cause it plainly appeareth that they are no exhortations but commandements? What remained more when we are blotted out of the number of the children of God: But by their opinion, only Monkes shall be the children of the heavenly father, they only shall be bold to call upon their father: what shall Church do in the meaneseason? shall by like right be sent away to Gentils & Publicans. For Christ faith: If ye be friendly to your friends, what shall your looke you for thereby? do not the Gentiles & Publicans the same? But we shall be in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be left vnto vs, and the inheritance of the kingdom of heauen taken away from vs. And no lesse strong is Augustiue's argument. When (faith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no lesse forbiddeth to ouche the wife of thine enimie than of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giveth leave to steals nothing at all, either from thy friend or from thine enimie. But these two, not to steals, & not to commit fornication, Paul bringeth within the compass of the rule of love, yea & teacheth that they are contain'd vnder this commandement. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe. Therefore, either Paul must have bin a false expostor of the lawe, or it necessarly followeth hereby, your enemies ought also to be loved, even by commandements like as our friends. Therefore they do truly bewray themselves to be the children of Satan, do so licentiously shake off the common yoke of children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they have published this doctrine, more grosse dulnes or shamelesnes. For there are none of old writers that do not pronounce as of a thing certaine, these are mere commandements. And that even in Gregories age, it was not doubted, appeareth by his own affirmation, for he without controversie taketh them for commandements. And how foolish do they reason? They say, they are too weightie a burden forChristians. As though there could be deuised, any thing more weightie than to love God, and our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength. In comparison of this law any thing may be compted easie, whether it be to love our enimie, or to lay away all desire of revenge out of our mind. In deed all things are hie & hard to our weakes even the least title of the lawe. It is the Lord in whom we vfe strengt. Let him giue what he commandeth, & command what he wil. Christian men to be vnder the lawe of grace, is not unbridledly to wander without lawe, but to be graffed in Christ, by whose grace they are free fro the curse of the lawe, & by whose spirete they have a law written in their hearts. This grace Paul unproperly called a lawe, alluding to the law of God against which he did set it in comparison. But these men do in the name of the law, dispute upon a matter of nothing.

58 Of like sort it is, that they called Venial sinne, both secrete venodlinelle that is against the first table, & also the direct transgressing of the last commandment. For they define it thus, that it is a desire without adulterous affent, which resteth not long in the heart. But I say, that it cannot come at all into the heart, but by want of those things that are required in the law. We forbid to have strange gods. When the minde is shaken with the engines of distrust, looketh about elsewhere: when it is touched with a foden desire to remove her blessedness some other way: whence come these motions, although they quickly vanish away, but of this, that there is some thing in the soule emptie, to receive such tentations? And to the ende not to draw out this argument to greater length, there is a commandement given to love God with all our heart, with all our minde, with all our soule: if then all the powers of our soule be not bent to the love of God, we have already departed from the obedience of the law, because the enemies that do therein arise against his kingdom, & interrupt his decrees, do prove that God hath not his throne well stablished in our conscience. As for the last commandment, we have already shewed that it properly belongeth hereunto. Hath any desire of minde pricked vs? we are already guiltie of coueting, and therewithall are made transgressors of the law, because the Lord doth forbid vs, not only to purpose & practise any thing that may be to another's losse, but also to be pricked & swell with coueting it. But the curse of God doth alway hang over the transgression of the law. We cannot therefore prove even the very least desires free from judgement of death. In weying of finnes (sayth Augustine) let vs not bring falle balances to wey what wee lift and how wee lift at our own pleasure, saying: this is heauie, & this is light: but let vs bring Gods balance out of the holy Scriptures, as out of the Lords treasure, and let vs therein wey what is heauie: rather let vs not wey, but reknowledge things already weyed by the Lord. But what faith the Scripture? Truly when Paul faith that the reward of sinne is death, he sheweth that he knew not this finking distinction. Sith we are too much inclined to hypocrifie, this cherishment thereof ought not to have been added to flatten our clothful consciences.

59 I would to God, they would consider what saying of Christ meaneth: He that transgresseth one of the least of these commandments, and teacheth men so, shall be counted none in the kingdom of heaven. Are not they of that sort, when they dare so extenuate the transgression of the lawe, as if it were not worthy of death? but they ought to have considered, not onely what is commanded, but what he is that commandeth, because his authoritie is diminished in every transgression, how little soever it be, of his lawe that he hath given in commandement. Is it a small matter with them, the Gods majesty to be offended in any thing? Moreover if God hath declared his will in the lawe, whatsoever is contrary to the lawe, displeaseth him. Will they imagin the wrath of God to be so disarmed, that punishment of death that not forthwith follow upon them? And he himselfe hath pronounced it plainly, if they would rather finde in their hearts to heare his voice, than to trouble the cleare truth with their vain souery suttleties of argument. The soul (saith he) that sinneth, the same shall die. Againe, which I even nowe alleged: the reward of sinne is death. But albeit they grant it to be a sinne, because they can not denie it: yet they stand fliefe in this, that it is no deadly sinne. But sith they haue hitherto too much borne with their owne madness, let them yet at length learne to waxe wiser. But if they continue in dotage, we will bid them farewell: and let the children of God learne this, that all sinne is deadly, because it is a rebellion against the will of G O D, which of necessity provoketh his wrath, because it is a breach of the lawe, upon which the judgement of God is pronounced without exception: & that the sinnes of the holy ones are veniall or pardonable, not of their owne nature, but because they obtaine pardon by the mercy of God.

The ix. Chapter.

That Christ although he was knowne to the Israel under the lawe, yet was delivered only by the Gospell.

Because it pleased God in the olde time not vainly by expiations and sacrifices to declare himselfe a Father, and not in vaine hee did conscrate a chosen people to himselfe: even then without dout he was know-en in the same Image, wherein hee nowe appeareth to vs with full bright-nesse. Therefore Malachie, after that he had bidden the Ieues to take heed to the lawe of Moses, and to continue in study thereof, (because after his death there should come a certaine interruption of the office of the Prophetes) did forthwith declare, that there should arise a sorne of righteous-nesse. In which wordes he teacheth, that the lawe auailleth to this purpose, to holde the godly in expectation of Christ to come: but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when he should be come in deede. For this reason doth Peter say, that the Prophetes did make search, & diligently enquire, of the salvation that is now opened by the Gospell: and that it was reveiled vnto them, that they should minister, not to themselves, not to their owne age, but vnto vs, these things that are declared by the Gospel. Not that their doctrine was vnprofitable to the people in olde time, or nothing auailed themselves: but because they enjoyed not the treasur which God sent vnto vs by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they testified, is familiarly fett before our eyes. And whereas they did but a little sippe of it, there is offred vnto vs a more plentiful enjoying thereof. Therefore Christ himselfe, which affirme that he had witnessed borne him by Moses, yet ex-toloth the measure of grace whereby we excell the Ieues. For speaking to the Disciples, he said: Blessed are the eyes that see that which ye see, and blessed are the ears that hear that which ye hear. For many kinges and Prophets have wished it, & have not obtained it. This is no final commendation of the reveiling of the Gospell, that God preferred vs before the holy fathers that excelled in rare godlines. With which sentence that other place disagreeeth not, where it is laye, that Abraham sawe the day of Christ, and rejoyced. For though the fight of a thing faire distant was somewhat darke, ye he wanted nothing to the assurance of good hope. And thence came

T 2 that
That joy which accompanied the holy Prophet, even to his death. And that saying of John Baptist: No man hath scene God at any time; the onely begotten that is in the bosom of the father, hath declared him unto vs, doth not exclude the godly which had ben dead before him, fro the felowship of the understanding and light that shineth in the person of Christ. But comparing their estate with ours, he teacheth that those mysteries, which they sawe but darkly vnder shadowes, are manifest to vs: as the author of the epistle to the Hebrewes doth well set out, saying, that God diversly & many ways spake in olde time by the Prophets, but now by his beloued Son, Although therefore that only begotten one, which is at this day to vs y brightnesse of the glory, and the point of the substance of God the father, was in old time known to the Iewes, as we haue in another place alleaged out of Paul, that he was the guide of the olde deliverance: yet is it true, which the same Paul els where teacheth, that God which commanded y light to shine out of darkenesse, hath now shined upon our heartes to set forth the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ: because when hee appeared in this his image, he did in a manner make himselfe visible, in comparison of the darke and shadowish forme that had bin of him before. And so much the more foule & detestable is their vnthankfulness and perversenes, that are here so blind at middle day. And therefore Paul faith, y their minds are darkened by Sathan, that they should not see the glory of Christ shining in the Gospell, though there be no veile set betweene them and it.

2 Nowe I take the Gospell for the cleere difcloping of the mysterie of Christ. I grant truely, that in that respect that Paul calleth the Gospell the doctrine of faith, all the promises that we here and there finde in the lawe, concerning the free forgiueneffe of sinnes, whereby God reconcileth men to himselfe, are accounted parts thereof. For he compar eth faith against these terrors, wherewith the conscience should be troubled and vexed, if saluation were to be sought by workes. Wherupon followeth, that in taking the name of the Gospell largely, there are contained vnder it all the testimonies that God in olde time gaued to his fathers, of the mercie and fatherly favoure. But in the more excellent signification of it, I say it is applied to the publishing of the grace giuen in Christ. And that meaning is not onely receiued by common vfe, but also hangeth vpon the authoritie of Christ and the Apostles. Whereupon this is properly ascribed vnto him, that he preached the Gospell of the kingdom. And Marke maketh his preface in this manner, The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. And there is no neede to gather places to prove a thing sufficiently known. Christ therefore by his coming hath made cleere the life and immortality by the Gospell. By which wordes Paul meaneth, not that the fathers were drowned in darkenesse of death, vntill the sonne of God did put on fleshe: but claying this prerogative of honour to the Gospell, he teacheth that it is a newe and vnwonted kind of messaGe, whereby God performed those things that he had promised, that the truth of his promises should be fulfilled in the person of the Sonne. For although the faithful have alwayes found by experience, that same saying of Paul to be true, that in Christ are all the promises, yea and Amen, because they were sealed in their heartes: yet because he hath accom-accomplished all partes of our saluation in his flesh, therefore that selfliely deliuering of the things rightfully obtained a newe and singular title of praise. Whereupon cometh that saying of Christ: Hereafter ye shall see the heauen open, and the Angels of God ascending and descending yppon the sonne of man. For though he seeme to haue relation vnto the ladder flewed in a vision to the Patriarch Iacob:yet he setteth out the excellencie of his comming by this marke, that he opened the gate of heauen to all men, that the enterie thereof may stand familiarly open to all men.

3 But yet we must take heed of the diuulish imagination of Serauetrus, which when he goeth about, or at least faineth that he goeth about, to extoll the greatnesse of the grace of Christ, utterly aboliseth the promises, as if they were ended together with the law. He layeth for him, that by the faith of the Gospell there is brought vnto vs the accomplishment of all the promises: as though there were no difference betwene vs and Christ. I did in deed euen now declare that Christ left nothing unperformed of the whole summe of our saluation, but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we doe already enjoy the benefits purchased by him, as though that saying of Paul were false, that our saluation is hidde in hope. I graunt, that wee by believing in Christ, do also passe from death to life: But in the mean time we must holde this saying of Iohn, that although we knowe wee be the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeared, til we shalbe like vnto him: that is, till we shall see him such as he is. Therefore although Christ offer vnto vs in his Gospell present fulnesse of spirituall good things, yet the enjoying thereof is still hidde vnnder the keeping of hope, till being vncovered of the corruptible flesh, we be tranfigured into the glorie of him that goeth before vs. In the mean time the holy Ghost biddeth vs to rest vpon the promises, whose authoritie ought with vs to put to silence all the barkings of that fylthie dogge. For as Paul witnesseth, godlinesse hath a promise as well of the life to come, as of the life present. For which reaon he boasteth that he is an Apostle of Christ, according to the promise of life that is in him. And in another place he putteth vs in minde, that wee haue the same promises, which in the olde time were givern to the holy men. Finally, he setteth this for the summe of felicitie, that wee are sealed vp with the holy spirit of promise, but yet we do no otherwise enjoy Christ, but so farre as we embrace him clothed with his promises. Whereby it commeth to passe, that he in deed dwelleth in our hearts, & yet we wander in journey abroad from him: because we walke by faith & not by sight. And these two things do not ill agree together: that wee possess in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heavenly life: and yet that faith is a beholding of good things that are not seen. Olye there is a difference to be noted in the nature or qualitie of the promises: because the Gospel sheweth with her finger that thing, which the law did shadow under figures.

4 And hereby also is their errore convinced, which do not otherwise compare the law with the Gospel, but as they compare the merites of worke with the free imputation of rightouenesse. Although in deed this comparison of contraries be not to be rejected: because Paul doth oftentimes vnderstand by the name of the law, a rule to live righteously, where God requireth of vs, that which is his, nor giving vs any hope of life, unlefe we in all points obey it: and on the other side adding a curse if we do neuer so little swaue from it: that is in such places as he doth præfume, that we do freely please God, and are by pardon reckned righteous, because the obfervation of the lawe, whereunto the rewarde is promised, is no where founde.

Therefore Paul doth fitly make the righteoufnes of the lawe and of the Gospel, contrary the one to the other. But the Gospel did not so succeed in place of the whole lawe, that it should bring any diuerfe meane of salvation, but rather to confirme and proue to be of force, what so euuer the lawe had promised, and to joyn the body to the shadowes. For when Chrift faith, that the lawe and the Prophetes were vntil John: he maketh not the fathers subject to the curse, which the bondservantes of the lawe can not ecape: but rather onely that they were inuoked with certayne rudiments, so as they stayed a great way beneath the heigh of the doctrine of the Gospel. Therefore Paul calling th: Gospel the power of God, to salvation to every beleuer, by and by addeth, that it hath witnesse of the lawe and the Prophetes. But in the ende of the fame Epiftle, although he showeth that the title of prafyle of Iefus Chrift is the reuelation of the myfterie kept secret in the everlafting times: yet he doth qualifie that faying, with adding an expofition, teaching that he is openly fhowed by the writings of the Prophetes. Whereupon we gather, that when we are to entreate of the whole lawe, the Gospel differeth from the lawe only in respect of the plaine difclosing thereof. But yet for the ineflimeable flowing flore of grace, which hath beene layed open for vs in Chrift, it is now without cause faid, that at his comming the heauenly kingdome of God was erected in earth.

Now betwene the lawe and the Gospel came John, which had an office that was meane and of affinitie to them both. For though when he called Chrift the lambe of God, and the Sacrifice for the cleansing of fynes, he showeth forth the fumme of the Gospel: yet because he did not exprefly name incomparable strength and glory, which at length appeared in his reafurrection, therefore Chrift faith, that he was not equal to the Apostles. For fo do thofe words of his meane, that though John excelle among the fonnes of women, yet he that is leaft in the kingdome of heauen, is greater than he. Because he doth not there commend the perfons of men, but after he had preferred John before all the Prophetes, he auanceth the preaching of the Gospel to the hieft degree: which preaching we fee in another place signified by the kingdome of heauen. But whereas John himselfe doth anfwer that he is but a voice, as though he were inferiour to the Prophetes, he doeth not that for fained humilities fake, but meaneth to teache that the proper office of the Embraflamour was not committed to him, but that he onely executeth the office of an apparitor: as it was forespoken by Malachie: Behold, I fende Elias the Prophet, before that the great and terrible day of the Lord doe come. And truely he did nothing else in the whole course of his minifterie, but endeavour to get disciples to Chrift: as also Efaie proofoeth, that this was enioyned him from God. And in this fentence Chrift is call'd a candel burning and shinning, because the broad day had not yet appeared. And yet this is no let, but he may be reckned among the publishers of of the Gospel, like as he vfed the fame Baptisme, which was afterward deli-
- ereed to the Apostles. But that which he beganne, was not fulfilled but by the Apostles, with free proceeding, after that Christ was taken vp from them into the heauenly glorie.

The x. Chapter.
Of the likeness of the olde and newe Testament.

By the thinges aforesayde it may noe nowe appeare evidently, that all the men whom from the beginning of the world God adopted into the estate of his people, were with the same lawe, and with the bonde of the same doctrine, which nowe remaineth in force among vs, bound in conuenent to him. But because it is of no small importance that this point be wel establishe, I wil adiynve vnto it for an addition, fith the fathers were parta-kers of all one inheritaunce with vs, and hoped for all one salvation by the grace of all one Mediatour, howe farre their estate differed from ours in this fellowship. But although the testimonies that we haue gathered out of the lawe and the Prophets for prooffe thereof, do make it plaine that there was nouer any other rule of religion and godlinesse in the people of G O D: yet because in writers there are oftentimes many thinges spoken of the diffERENCE of the olde and newe Testament, that may make the reader that is not of very sharpe judgement to be in dout; therefore we shal rightfully appoint one peculiar place for the better & more exact discursing of this matter: Yea and that thing also, which otherwise shoule haue beene very profitable for vs, is noe nowe made necessarie by that monstrous lofe of Seruettus, and by divers other mad men of the feft of Anabaptistes, which haue no other opinion of the people of Israel, than as of a heard of swine: which they fondely faine to haue beene fattede vp by the Lord here in this earth, without any hope of heauenly immortality. Therefore that we may kepe away this pestilent error from godly minde, and also to plucke out of them all doubtes which are wont by and by to arife vpon hearing mention of the diversity betwene the old and the newe Testament: let vs by the way looke, what they haue in them like, and what unlike one to the other: what couenant the Lord made with the Israelites in the old time before the comming of Christ, and what covenant he hath noe nowe made with vs since Christ hath beene openly shewed.

2 And both these pointes may be made plaine with one worde. The covenant of all the fathers fo differeth nothing from ours in substance and in the matter it felle, that it is altogether one and the felle fame: but the ministration is diuerse. But because of fo great shortness no man were able to attaine a certaine understanding, we must needs procee on with a longer declaration if we meane to profit any thing at all. But in shewing how they are like or rather all one, it shall be superfluous to discourse again of new vp-on all the special particulars that haue already beene declared: and it shalbe out of season to mingle those things together that remaine yet to be spoken in other places. Here we must chiefly rest vpon three principall pointes:
First, that wee holde, that carnall wealth and felicitie was not the make

appointed to the Jews to aspire unto, but that they were by adoption chosen into the hope of immortality: and that the truth of this adoption was certainly assured unto them both by oracles, and by the law, and by the prophecies. Secondly, that the covenant whereby they were joined to the Lord, was vpholden not by any merites of theirs, but by the only mercie of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knew Christ the mediator, by whom they should both be joined to God and enjoy his promises. Of which pointes, because the seconde peraduenture is not yet sufficiently known, it shall in place appointed for it be declared at large. For we shall confirme by many & cleere testimonies of the Prophets, that it was of his owne meere goodness and tender sauour, whatsoever good the Lord at any time did, and promised to the people of Israel. The third also hath already had here and there some plaine declarations of it, and we have not left the first altogether untouched.

3 Therefore in setting out of this point, because it most specially belongeth to this present matter, & for that they make vs most controversie about it, we wil employ the more earnest trauaille: but yet so that if there want yet any thing of the explication of the other, it may be by the way supplied, or in convenient place be added. Truely the Apostle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he faith, that God the Father long before by the Prophets in the holy Scriptures promiseth the Gospel, which he afterward published according to the time appointed. Againe, that the righteousnesse of faith which is taught by the Gospel it selfe, hath witnessse of the lawe and the Prophets. For the Gospel doth not holde the heartes of men in the joy of this present life, but lifteth them vp to the hope of immortalitie: doth not satten them to earthly delites, but preaching to them a hope layd vp in heaven, doth in a manner transport them thither. For thus he defineth in an other place. Since that ye beleueth the Gospel, ye are sealed vp with the holy Spiritie of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, for the redemption of the possession purchased. Againe, we haue heard of your faith in Christ Iesus, and of your charitie toward the holy ones, for the hopes fake that is layde vp for you in heaven, whereof ye haue heard by the true speech of the Gospel. Againe: He hath called vs by the Gospel to the partaking of the glory of our Lord Iesus Christ. Wherefore it is called, both the word of saluation, and the power of God to fauour the faithful, & the kingdom of heaven. Now if the doctrine of the Gospel be spirituall, and openeth the entry to the possession of an incorruptible life: let vs not think that they to whom it was promisef and declared, did passe over and neglect the care of their soule, and lie dully like beasts in seeking pleasures of the body. Neither let any man here caullly the promises which are sealed in the lawe & the Prophets, concerning the Gospel, were ordained for the new people. For within a little after that which he spake of the Gospel promiseth in the lawe, he addeth, that all the thinges that the law containeth, are without doubt properly directed to them: they are vnder the law. I grant in deece it is in another argument. But he was not so forgetful, that when he had once said at the things which the law containeth belong to the Jews, he did not remember what in a fewe verses before he had affirmed of the Gospel promiseth in the lawe. Where-Wherefore the Apostle sheweth most plainely, that the olde Testament chiefly tended to the life to come, when he faith, that under it are conteynd the promises of the Gospel.

4 By the same reason followeth, both that it stood upon the free mercie of God, and also was confirmed by the meane of Christ. For the verie preaching of the Gospell pronounceth no other thing, but that sinners are justified by the fatherly kindnesse of God, without their owne deservyng, and the whole summe thereof is fulfilled in Christ. Who then dare make the Iewes without Christ, with whome wee heare that the covenaut of the Gospell was made, whereof Christ is the onely foundation: Who dare make them frauders from the benefit of free salvation, to whom we heare that the doctrine of the righteousness of faith was ministred? But, that we dispute not long of an evident matter, we haue a notable sentence of the Lorde. Abraham rejoyst that he might see my day, hee sawe it and was glad. And the same thing which Christ there teftifieth of Abraham, the Apostle sheweth that it was viuiterfall in the faithfull people, when hee faith, that Christ abideth, yesterday, this day, and for ever. For hee speakes not there onely of the eternal godheade of Christ, but alfo of his power, which was continually opened to the faithfull. Wherefore both the blessed Virgin and Zacharie in their longes, doe say, that the salvation raeant in Christ, is the performance of the promises, which God in olde time had made to Abraham and the Patriarches. If the Lorde in giving his Christ, discharged his olde oath, it cannot be saide but that the ende thereof was alway in Christ an everlaffing life.

5 Yea and the Apostle doeth make the Israelites egall with vs, not onely in the grace of the covenaut, but also in signification of sacramentes. For meaning by examples of punishmentes, wherewith the Scripture reciteth that they were corrected in the olde time, to make the Corinthians afraid, 1 Cor. 10. 1, that they should not runne into the like offences, hee beginneth with this preface, that there is no cause why wee shoude chalenge any prerogatiue vnto our selues, to deliuer vs from the vengeance of God which they susteyned, for as much as the Lorde did not onely grant vnto them the same benefits, but hee hath gloriously set forth his grace among them with the same tokens: As if hee shoule haue saide: If ye trust that ye bee out of peril, because both Baptisme wherewith ye be marked, and the Supper which ye dayly receive, have excellent promises and in the meane time despising the godnes of God, ye are licentiously wanton: Know ye, that the Iewes alfo were not without such sacramentes, against whome yet the Lord did most seuerely put his judgements in execution. They were baptized in passing ouer the Sea, and in the clouds wherewith they were defended from the burning heat of the soune. They say, that that same passage was a carnall Baptisme, which after a certaine proportion answereth to our spiritual Baptisme. But if that were allowed true, the Apostles argument could not proceede, which meaneth here to haue this taken away from the Christians, they thinke that they excelle the Iewes by the prerogatiue of Baptisme. Neither is it which by and by after followeth, subject to this cauillation: they did eate the same spiritual meate that we eate, and dronke the same spir-

tuall drinke, which hee expoundeth to be Christ.

6 To overthrowe this sentence of Paul, they object that which Christ's faith: Your fathers did eate Manna in the wildernes, and are deade: hee that eateeth my flesh, shal not die for euuer. Which two places are verie eafily made to agree together. The Lord, because he then talked to hearethes, sought onely to be filled with foode of their bellie, but cared not for the meate of the foule, tempered his tale somewhat to their capacitie, but especially he frameth the comparifon of Manna and of his body according to their fene. They required that hee, to get himfelvse some credite, would approve his power with doing some such miracle, as Moses did in the wildernes, when he obteyned Manna from Heauen. But in Manna they conceived nothing but the remedie of carnall hunger, wherewith the people was then vexed: but they perceived not to that hier mysterie which Paul hath respect vnto: Christ therefore, to shewe howe much greater a benefite they ought to looke for at his hande, then that which they reported that Moses did bestowe vpon their fathers, frameth this comparifon: If it were a great miracle in your opinion, and worthie to be remembred, that Lord by Moses miniftered foode from Heauen to his people, to sustayne them for a small time, that they shoulde not perish for hunger in the wildernesse, gather hereby the much more excellent is the meat that giueth immortality. We see why the Lord passed out that thing which was principal in Manna, and spake onely of the baifeft proffite of it, euene because the Jewes as it were of purpose to reproch him, did cast Moses in his teeth, which succoured the neceffitie of the people with remedie of Manna: he answered that he is the miniffer of a much hier grace, in comparifon whereof, the carnall feeding of the people, which alone they so much esteemed, ought of right to be nothing regarded. But Paul, because he knew that the Lorde when hee rained Manna from heauen, did not onely poure it downe for the feeding of their bellie, but also did distribute it for a spirituall mysterie, to be a figure of the spirituall quickening that is had in Christ, did not neglect that parte that was most worthie of consideration. Wherefore it certainly and cleerely followeth, that the same promises of eternall and heavenly life, which nowe the Lorde vouchfaeth to grant vnto vs, were not onely communicated vnto the Jewes, but also sealed with verie spirituall Sacramentes. Of which matter Augustine disputeth largely against Faustus the Manichee.

7 But if the readers had rather to have testimonies allledged vnto them out of the lawe and the Prophetes, whereby they may perceive the spirituall covenant was common alfo to the fathers, as we heare by Christ and the Apostles: I will also followe that desire, & so much the more willingly, because by that meane the aduersaries shall be more surely convinced, so that they shall haue afterward no way to dallie. And I will begin at ye proofe, which although I know that the Anabaptiftes pride will think verie fonde and in a manner to bee laughed at, yet shal much auaille with such readers as are willing to learne and haue their founde wit. And I take it as a principle confessed, that there is such effectuall force of life in the word of God, that whome so euer God vouchfaeth to bee partakers thereof, it quicke-neth their foules. For this saying of Peter hath alwaye beene of force, that it is the incorruptible seed which abideth for ever, as also he gathereth out of the words of Esay. Now sith God in the old time bound the Jewes vnto him with this holy bond, it is no doubt that he did also seuer them into the hope of eternall life. For when I say they embraced the word, which should ioyne them nere to God, I take it for the manner of communicating it: not that generally maner, which is powerd abroad throughout the heaven and earth and all the creatures of the world, which although it doe quicken all things, every one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doth not deliver them from neceffitie of corruption: but I speake of this special manner, whereby the soules of the godly are both lightened vnto the knowledge of God, and in a maner coupled to him. By this enlightening of the worde, sith Adam, Abel, Noe, Abraham, and the other fathers cleaned vnto God, I say that it is not doubtfull that they had an entrie into the immortal kingdom of God. For it was a sound partaking of God, which can not bee without the beneft of eternall life.

8 but if this seeme somewhat entangled: goe to, let vs come to the very forme of the covenante, which shall not onely satisfye sober wits, but also shall sufficiently convince their ignorace that bend themselues to speake against it. For God did atall thus covenante with his servantes: I will be to you a God, & ye shalbe to me a people. In which wordes the Prophets themselues are wont to expounde, that both life and saluation, and the whole summe of blessednesse is comprehended. For David doth not without cause often pronounce, that blessed is the people, whose God is the Lorde: blessed is the nation, which he hath chosen to be his inheritance: and that not for earthly felicities sake, but because he deluereth them fro death, he preferueth them for euer, and continually sheweth them eternall mercie, whom he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other Prophets, Thou art our God, we shall not die: The Lorde is our king, our lawmakere, he shall saue vs. Blessed art thou, O Israel, because thou art faucd in the Lord God. But, not to labour ouermuch in a thing needeslesse, this admonition is founde eche where in the Prophets, that we shall want nothing toward all aboundance of good things, and assurance of saluation, so that the Lord be our God. And rightfully: For if his face so soone as it beginneth to shine, is a most present pledge of saluation, to what man shall he openly shewe himselfe for his God, but that he will also open to him his treaure of saluation? For hee is our God with this condition, to dwel in the midst of vs: as hee testified by Moyses. But such presence can not be obtained, but that life must bee also together had in possession with it. And although there were no more expressed, yet had they a promise of spiritual life plain enough in these words: I am your God. For he did not declare that he would be a God vnto their bodies alone, but principally to their soules. But soules vnlesse they be ioyned to God by righteounnes remaine estranged from him in death. But on the other side, let that ioyning be present, it shall bring everlastinge saluation with it.

9 Beside that, he did not onely testifye that he was to them their God, but he also promised that he would be so alway to the ende, that their hope not contented with present benefices, should bee extended to eternitie.

And many sayings doe shew, that the speaking in the future time meant so much, as where the faithful not onely in present evils, but also for the time to come, doe comfort themselues with this, that God wil never fail them. Now as concerning the second part of the promise, he yet more plainly assured them of the blessing of God to be prolonged vnto them beyond the bounds of this life, in saying: I will be the God of your seede after you. For if he minded to declare his good will toward them being dead, in doing good to their posteritie, much more would his favor not fail toward them elses. For God is not like vnto men, which doe therefore carie their love to their friends children, because their power is interrupted by death, so they can not employ their friendly doings upon them to whom they did beare good will. But God, whose bountifulnesse is not hindered by death, taketh not away from the very dead the fruit of the mercie, which for their sakes he poureth out into a thousand generations. Therefore the Lords will was by a notable prooue to set forth vnto them the greatnesse and flowing plenty of his goodnesse, which they should feel after death, when hee describ'd it to be such as shouldowe over into all their posteritie. And the truth of this promise the Lord did then scale, and as it were brought forth the fullfilling of it, when he named himselfe the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, long after their death. For, what? had it not beene a fond naming, if they had utterly perished: For then had it beene all one, as if hee had faile, I am the God of them that are not. Wherfore the Evangelists rehearse, that with this one argument the Sadduces were so driven to a straighth, that they could not deny that Moses did testify the resurrection of the dead, for that they had learned by Moses, that all the Saints were in his hand. Whereupon it was easie to gather, that they are not destroyed by death, whom hee that is the judge of life and death had receiv'd into his safeguard, custodie, and protection.

Nowe (which is the principal point whereupon this controversie hangeth) let vs looke, whether the faithful themselues haue not beene so instructed of the Lord, that they perceived that they should have a better life elsewhere, and so neglecting this life, had an eye to the other. First the state of life that was enioynd them by God, was a continuall exercise, whereby they might be put in mind, that they were the most miserable of all men, if their happinesse were onely in this life. Adam, most unhappie, even with onely remembrance of the happinesse that he had lost, did with painfull labours hardly sustaine his needes, and that he should not be press'd with the curse of God, in the onely labours of his hands, even there receyued he extreme sorrowe of that which remained for him to be his comfort. Of his two fowndes, the one was taken away by the wicked slaughter of his brother: the other hee had left aliue, whose fight he worthily detested & abhorred. Abel cruelly murthered in the very flower of his age, became an example of ye wretchednesse of men. Noe, while the whole world carelesly hued in pleasure, spent a good part of his age with great wearinesse in building the Arke. This that he escaped death, came to passe by his greater troubles, than if he should have died an hundred deathes. For beside that the Arke was to him as a grave for tenne moneths, there is nothing more unpleasante than Abraham and

What trouble of their life would after, his children, wife and withal! into where famine. Tither he fled for succour, where to save himselfe, he was compelled to deliver out his wife to bee abused, which wee know not whether it were not more bitter to him than many deaths. When he was returned into the lande of his owne dwelling, he was driven out againe from thence with famine. What a felicite is this, to dwell in that lande, wherein a man must so often be hungry, yet die for famine if he runne not awaye? And therewithall he was brought to that necessity with Abimelech, by he must needs redeeme his life with the losse of his wife, while many yeares long he wandred uncertainly lither and thither, he was compelled by the continuall brawlinges of his seruantes to put away his nephew, whose hee loved as his owne sonne. Which departing without doubt hee did no other wise take, than if he had suffered the cutting of one of his limmes. A little after, he hearde that hee was carried away captiue by his enimies. Whither so euer he went, he founde neighbours outrageously barbarous, which woulde not suffer him so much as to drinke water out of the wells that him selfe had digged with great labour. For hee woulde not haue redeemed the of them at the hande of King Gerar, if hee had not first beene forbidden. Nowe when he came to olde age, hee swe the thing which is the most unpleasant and bitter that that age hath, himselfe punished with haueing no children, till beside all hope he begate Ismael, whose birth yet hee payed deere for, when hee was wearied with the brawling of Sara, as if he in maintaining the stubborne life of his bondwoman were himselfe the cause of the trouble of his household. At length Isaac was borne, but with this condition that his first begotten Ismael must, as forsaken, be cruelly call out of doores. When onely Isaac was left, in whome the weried age of the sillie good man might rest, within a little after he was commanded to kill him. What can mans wit deuise more miserable, than the father to be made the butcher of his owne sonne? If Isaac had died of any fckenesse, who would not haue thought y old man most miserable, y had a son given him in mock-age, for whom his greefe of want of children shoulde be double? If he had beene slaine by some stranger, the unhappinesse of the thing would have much encreased his miserie. But this pasteth al examples of miserie, to have him slaine with his fathers owne hande. Finally, hee was in all the whole course of his life so tossed and vexed, as if a man woulde in a table paint out an example of a miserable life, he could finde none more fit, than this of Abraham. And let no man object that he was not altogether vnhappy, for that he at length prosperously escaped from so many and so great tempestes. For we cannot say that hee huelth a blessed life, which for a long space together painfullie weareth out of infinite troubles, but him that without feeling of evils, quietly enjoyeth present good things.

12. Isaac that was least troubled with evils, yet scarce ever toke any tafte of sweetenesse. He also felt the same vexations, that doet not suffer a man to be blessed in the earth. Famine chaced him out of the land of Chanaan: he had his wife violently plucked away from him before: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all meanes oppressed him, so that hee was faine to straine for his water: at home in his owne house, hee suffered much troublesomenes by his childrens wives, he was greeced with difagreements of his fones, and could not remedie that so great a mischeefe, but by the banishment of him whome he had blessed. But as for Iacob, hee is nothing else but a notable example of extreme infelicitie. He fled his childhood most vnquietly at home among the threatenings and terrors of his elder brother, to which at length he was compelled to give place. When he was fledde from his parentes and his natue country, beside that it was a greuous thing to liue in banishment, he was nothing more kindly or gently received of his uncle Laban. Then it sufficed not that hee had serued seven yeares a harde and cruel service, but that also must bee by guile defrauded of his wife. For an other wifes sake he was driven into new service, where he was all the day fried with heatte of the sunne, & all the night lay waking and pained with frost and colde, as himselfe complained. While hee by the space of twenty yeares suffered so hard a life, he was dayly vexed with new injuries of his father in lawe. Neither was hee quiet in his owne house, seeing it divided and in a manner scattered abroad with the hatred, brawling and enui of his wifes. When he was commanded to returne into his country, he was compelled to watch an aduitantage to take his journey, much like a shamefull running away: and yet could hee not escape the vnuit dealin of his Father in Lawe, but was faine to suffer his reproches and rebukes in the middes of his journey. Then fell hee into a much more cruell distresse. For when he came neere to his brother, hee had so many deathes before his eyes, as might bee prepared by a cruell man and a bent enemie. So was hee aboue measure tormented and as it were drawn in snder with terrible feares, so long as he looked for his brothers coming: when hee came once in his sight, hee fell downe as halfe dead at his feete, vntill he founde him more fauourable than hee had hoped. Beside, at his first entrie into the land, hee lost Rachel his dearely beloved wife. Afterward he heard word that y fon which he had by her, & who therefore hee loued above all the rest, was torn with wilde beastes; by whose death houerear greefe he conceyued, hee himself declared in this that after after long weeping hee obstinately stoped vp all wayes whereby comfort might come to him, leaving himselfe nothing, but to goe downe to his sonne waying into the grave. In the meane time howe great causes of griefe, wayring and weariesse were the ruinehement and desflouring of his daughter, and the boldenesse of his sonnes in reuenging it, which not only made him to be abhorred in sight of all the inhabitants of his countrey, but also procured him most present peril of utter destruccion? Then folfollowed that horrible outrageous offence of Ruben his first begotten sonne, which was such as there could not chaunce a more grievous. For whereas the desfling of a nians wife is reckoned among the hyeff ill fortunes: what is to be faide of it, when that wickedenesse is committed by a mans owne sonne? Within a little while after, his house is spotted with an other vnnaturall adulterie:so that so many flames might well breake a heart, that otherwise were most constant and vnable to be vanquished with calamities. Neere before the ende of this life, while he sought to provide succour for the famine of himselfe and other, he was stricken with tydings of a newe misfortune, vnderstanding that an other of his sonnes was kept in prifon for reco-wering of whom he was compelled to leave to the reft Benjamin his onely darling. Who can thinke, that in such a heape of mishiefes he had any one moment given him safely to take breath in? And therefore he himselfe the best witness of himselfe, affirmed to Pharao, that his days were short & evil upon the earth. Now truly he that declareth that he hath passed his life by continuall miseries, denieth that he felt the prosperitie which the Lord had promised him. Therefore either Jacob did vnkindely and vthankfully wey the grace of God, or he truly professed that he had bin miserable vpon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that he had not his hope fastened vpon earthly things.

13 If these holy fathers looked for (as undoubtedly they did) a blessed life at the hand of God, truely they both thought and sawe it to be an other maner of blessednesse, than the blessednesse of earthly life. Which thing the Apostle also dooth thewe excellently wel:Abraham (faith hee) direct by faith in the land of promisfe as in a strange lande, dwelling in tentes with 1-

Isaac and Jacob parteners with him of the same inheritance. For they looked for a citie set vpon a good foundation, the maker & builder whereof is God. Al these are dead in faith, not receiuing the things promisfe, but looking at them a far off, and beleueng & confessing that they were gesles and strangers vpon the land. Whereby they declare y they fought for a citie, and if they had bene mooved with desire of that lande from whence they came, they had power to returne. But they fought for a better, that is the heavely countrie. Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, forasmuch as he hath prepared them a citie. For they had bene duller than blockes, to followe promises so earnestly, whereof there appeared no hope in earth, v'nlesse they had looked for the fulfilling of them els where. But this he chieffely enforceth, and that not without good reason, y they called this life a journey from home, even as Moses reporteth. For if they were strangers & foreners in the land of Chanaan, where is the Lords promisfe whereby they were made heires of it? He sheweth plainly therefore, that the Lords

Of the knowledge of Lordes promise, concerning the possession thereof, had a further respect. Wherefore they purchased not one foote in the land of Chanaan, but for buriall, whereby they testified, that they did not hope that they should receive the fruite of the promise till after death. And that is the cause why Jacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that he compelled his sonne Joseph to promise it him, & to sweare to performe it: and why Joseph willed his bones, certaine ages after, when they were long before fallen into powder, to be removed thither.

14 Finally, it appeareth plainly, that in all the travailes of this life they had alway set before them the blessedness of the life to come. For to what purpose shoulde Jacob haue so much desired, and with so great danger sought the preeminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a maner to be cast off from being his childe: but no good at all, vnlesse he had respect to a hier blessing? And he declared, that he had this meaning by the wordes which he spake among his last breathings: Lord, I will looke for thy salvation. What salvation could he haue looked for, when he saw that he laie readie to giue vp the Ghost, vnlesse he had seen in death the beginning of a newe life? But what dispute we of the holy ones & children of God, when euen he was not without a taft of such understanding, which otherwise was enemie to the truth? For what meant Balaam when he said: Let my soule die the death of the righteous, and let my last times be like vnto theirs? but that he meant the same thing that David afterward vterred, that the death of the Saints is precious in the sighte of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, is very euil? If the furthest bound and end were in death, there could in it bee noted no difference betweene the righteous and unrighteous, they differ one from the other by the diversitie of the cistates that after death shall beefall to them both.

15 We are not yet come beyond Moses, Which (as these men say) had no other office, but to perswade the carnall people to worship God by the fruitefulness of the ground and plentie of all things. And yet (vnlesse a man will fie the light that willingly offereth it selfe) there is already a plaine declaration of the spirituall covenante. But if we come downe to the Prophers, there with most full brightnesse both the life euerlastinge and the kingdom of Christ doe wnder themselves. And first of al David, which as he was before the other in time, & according to the order of Gods distribution, hee shewed the heavenly mysteries in shadowes more darkely than the rest, yet with what plainnesse and certaintie directeth he all his sayings to that end? How he esteemed the earthly dwelling, this sentence teffificeth: I am here a forier and stranger, as all my fathers were. Evry liuing man is vanitie, euer one waketh about as a shadow. But now what is my expectation, Lord? euuen to thee is my hope. Truely he that confessinge that in the earth there is nothing sound or stedfast, keepeth still a stedfastnes of hope in God, considereth his felicitie laide vp in another place. To such consideratie is hee wont to call all the faithfull, so oft as he meaneth to comfort them truely. For in an other place after he had spoken of the shortnesse, and the transtoric and vanishing image of mans life, he addeth: but mercy of the Lord is for euer vpon them that feare him. Like whereunto is that which is in the hundred hundred and second Psalme. At the beginning Lord thou didnst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heauens are the worke of thy handes. They shall perishe, but thou abidest: they shall waxe olde like a garment, and thou shalt change them as apparell, but thou remain the selfe same, & thy years shall not faile: the sons of thy fervantes shall dwell, and thy posterity shall be established before thee. If the godly cease not for the decay of heauen and earth to be established before the Lorde, it followeth, that their salvatioun is joinned with the eternity of God. But that hope can not stande at all, vnderlefe it rest upon the promise that is set forth in Esay: The heauens (layeth the Lord) shall vanish away like smoke, the earth shall be wore out like a garment, and the inhabitantes of it shall perishe like those things: But our salvatioun shall be for euer, and my righteousnes is gien to righteounses and salvatioun, not in respect that they remaine with God, but in respect that they are felt of men.

16 Neither may wee otherwise take those things, that he commonly speaketh of the prosperous succeffe of the faithfulfull, but to apply them to the open shewing of the heauenly glory. As these sayings: The Lord keepeth the soules of the righteous, he shall deliuer them from thy hande of the sinner. Light is arisen to the righteous, and joy to the vpright in heart. The righteousnes of the godly man abideth for euer: his chere shalbe exalted in glory, the desires of the sinner shall perishe. Again: but the righteous shall confesse vnto thy name, the vpright shall dwell with thy countenance. Again: the righteous shall be in eternall remembrance. Again: the Lorde shall redeeme the soules of his fervantes. For the Lord oftentimes leaueth his fervantes to the luft of the wicked, not onely to be vxed, but also to be torne in peeces and destroyed: he suffereth good to lie languishing in darkenes and filth, while the wicked do in a maner shine among the stars. And he doth not souther the with the brightness of his countenance, that they enjoy long continuing gladnes. Wherfore euie he also hideth not, that if the faithful fatten their eyes vpon the present state of things, they shalbe striken with a fore temptation, as though there were no favor or rewarde of innocency with God. So much doth wickednes for most part prosper & flourish, while the company of the godly is oppreffed with shame, povertie, contempt & all kinds of crossees. It wanted but little (faith he) that my feote flippet not, and my steppes fell not abroade, while the fortune of soules grieueth mee, and while I see the prosperity of the wicked. At length after rehearse fall of it he concludes: I benth my thought, if I could understand these things. But it is a torment to my spirite, till I enter into the sanctuari of the Lord, and understand the last end of them.

17 Let vs therefore learne yet by this confession of Dauid, that the holy fathers vnder the old testament were not ignorant, how seldom or never God doth in this world performe to his fervantes those things that he promiseth the, and that therefore they did lift vp their minds to Gods sanctuari, wherein they had that laid vp in store, which appeareth not in the shadowe of this present life. That was the last judgement of God, which when they could not see with eyes, they were content to understand by faith. Trusting vpon which affiance, whatsoever happened in the world, yet they doubted not a time.
time would once come, when the promises of God should be fulfilled. As these sayings do witness, I will behold the face of God in righteousnes: I will be satisfied with thy countenance. Againe: I as a greene Olive tree in the house of the Lord. Againe, The righteous shall flourish as a Date tree, spred in branches like the Ceder of Libanus, being planted in the house of the Lord, they shall flourish in the Palaces of our God: They shall still beare frute, they shall be fat and greene in their old age. When he had sayd a little before: How deepe are thy thoughts? O Lord, while the wicked doe flourish, they bud out like an herbe, that they may perish for euer. Where is ye faire shewe and beauty of the faithful, but when the face of this world shalbe turned inwarde by disclosing of the kingdom of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternity, they despised the hardnes enduring but a moment of present miseries, and boldly burst forth into these words: Thou shalt not suffier for euer the righteous to die, but thou shalt throw down the wicked long into the pit of destruction. Where is in this world the pit of eternal destruction that may swallow vp the wicked? Among whose felicitieis, this is also reckned in an other place, that they close vp the end of their life in a moment, without long languishing. Where is ye so great stedfastnes of the holy ones, whom David himselfe calle where complaineth, not only to be flaken with trouble, but also to be oppressed, & ytterly broken in pieces: Forsooth, he did set before his eyes, not what the altering course of the world beareth, which is vnstable and more vnstedsfast than the ebbing & flowing of tides, but what the Lord will doe, when he shall one day set for the eternall setting of heauen and earth. As in an other place he excellently wel describeth it: The foolish do stay upon their welthines, & are proud because of their great riches. And yet no man, though he flouris in neter so great dignity, can re-deeme his brother from death, no man can pay to God the price of his ransome, but wheras they see that both the wise do die, and ye the wicked also & fooles do perish and leave their riches to strangers, yet they think ye their houses shall abide for euer, and their dwellings to the end of ages, and they adauncie their names upon the earth, but man shall not continue in honor: he shall be like to the beasts that die. This imagination of theirs is extremest folly, which yet their povertie do greedily follow. They shall be placed like a flocke in Hell, and death shall have tule over them. When the light a-riseth, the vpright shall have dominion over them, the beauty of them shal perish, Hel is their dwelling house. First this laughing to scorn of the foolish for that they rest on the slippery & rolling good thinges of the worlde, doth shewe that the wise must seeke a farre other felicity. But there he more evidtently discloteth the mystery of the resurrection, where after the destructio and extinguishment of them, he erecteth the kingdom of ye godly. For what rising of light (I pray you) shal we call that, but the reueling of the new life which followeth the end of this present life.

18 From thence did spring vp that consideration, which the faithful oftentimes vied for a comfort of their miseries and remedy of patience: It is but a moment in the Lordes displeasure, and life in his mercy. How did they determine afflictions to ende in a moment, that were in affliction in a manner their life long? Where did they espie so long an enduring of God's kindnes
kindnes, whereof they scarcely felt any little tast; if they had stucked fast upon the earth, they could have found no such thing, but because they looked vp on heauen, they acknowledged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exercise his holy ones by the crosse, but that his mercies, wherein they are gathered together, do last the worldes age. Againe, they did foresee the eternall and neuer ending destruction of the vngodly, which were as in a dreame happy for one day. Whereupon came these sayings: The remembrance of the righteous shalbe in blessing, but the name of the wicked shall rot. Precious is the death of the Saints in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, most euill. Againe in Samuel: The Lord shall keepe the feast of the holy, & the wicked shalbe put to silence in darkenes. Which do declare that they well knewe, that howsoever the holy were divineely carried about, yet their last end is life and saluation: and that the prosperity of the wicked is a pleasant way, whereby they by little and little slide forwarde into the gulfe of death. Thherefore they called the death of such, the destruction of the uncircumcised, as of them from whom the hope of the resurrection was cut away. Wherefore Dauid could not devise a more greuous curse than this: Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and not be written with the righteous.

19 But above all other, notable is that saying of Job: I know that my redeemer liueth, and in the last day I shall rite againe out of the earth, and in my flesh I shall see God my sauour: This hope is layd vp in my bofom. Some that haue a minde to make a shew of their sharpe wit, doe cauill that this is not to be vnderstanded of the last resurrection, but of the first day that Job looked to haue God more gentle to him, which although we grant them in part, yet shall we enforce them to confesse whether they will or no, that Job could not haue come to that largenesse of hope, if he had rested his thought upon the earth. Therefore we must needs confesse, that he lifted vp his eyes to the immortality to come, which sawe, that his redeemer would be present with him evene lying in his graue. For to them ye thinke only of this present life, death is their vittremost desperation: which very death could not cut of Jobes hope. Yea though he kill me (sayde he) nevertheless I wil still hope in him. And let no trifler here carpe against me and say, that these were the sayings but of a few, whereby is not proved ye such doctrine was among the Iewes. For I will by & by anfwer him, ye these fewe did not in these sayings vter any secret wifedome, whereunto onely certaine excellent wittes were seucrally and priuely suffered to attaine, but that as they were by the holy Ghost appointed teachers of ye people, so they openly publisht to those mysteries of God that were to be vnitersally learned, and ought to be the principles of the common religion among ye people. Ththerefore when we heare the publike oracles of the holy Ghost, wherein he speake of the spirittuall life so clearly & plainly in the Church of the Iewes, it were a point of un-tolerable stubbornes to send them away onely to the fleshly covenant, wherein is mention made of nothing, but earth and earthly wealthnesse.

20 If I come downe to the later Prophets, there we may freely walke as in our owne fielde. For if it were not hurde for vs to get the upper hande in Dauid, Job, and Samuel, here it shall be much more easie. For God kept Prou.10.7. P's.106.16. & 30.22. Eze. 28.10. and 31. P's.69.26.
this distribution and order in disposing the covenant of his mercy, that much the nearer it drew on in proceed to the full performance there of, with so much greater encreasements of revelation he did day by day more brightly shew it. Therefore at the beginning when the first promise of salvation was made unto Adam, there glittered out but as it were small sparkles of it. After, having more added unto it, a greater largeness of light began to be put forth: which from thence forth brake out more and more, and displayed her brightness farther abroad, till at length all the clouds were driven away, and Christ the Sonne of righteousness fully lightened the whole world. We neede not therefore to feare that we faile of testimonies of the Prophets, if we seeke them to prove our cause, but because I see there will arise a huge deal of matter, wherupon it should be constrained of necessity to tary longer than the proportion of my purpose may beare, for it would so growe to a worke of a great volume, and also because I haue already, by those things that I have sayde before, made plaine the way, even for a reader of meane capacity, so as he may goe forward without stumbling: therefore I will at this present abstaine from long tediousnesse: which to doe is no lesse necessary: but giving the readers warning before hande, that they remember to open their owne way with that key that we have first gien them in their hande. That is, that so oft as the Prophets speake of the blessednesse of the faithfull people, whereof scarcely the leaft steppes are seene in this present life, they may referre to this distinction: that the Prophets, the better to expresse the goodnesse of God, did as in a shadow expresse it to the people by temporall benefices, as by certaine rough drawing of the portraiture thereof: but that the perfect image, that they have painted thereof, was such as might rauish mens minds out of the earth, and out of the elementes of this worlde, and of the age that shall perish, and of necessity raise it up to the consideringe of the felicity of the life that is to come and spirituall.

21 We will be content with one example. When the Israelites being caried away to Babylon, sawe their scattering abroad to be like vnto death, they could hardly be removed from this opinion that they thought that all was but fables that Ezechiel prophesied of their restitution: because they reckoned it even all one as if he had tolde them that rotten carcasses should bee restored againe to life. The Lorde to shewe, that even that same difficulty could not stop him from bringing his benefit to effect, shewed to the Prophet in a vision a field full of dry bones, to the which in a moment with the onely power of his word he restored breath and liveliness. The vision in deedes served to correct the incredulity at that present time: but in the meane seasion he did put the Jewes in minde how far the power of the Lord extended beyond the account of the people, which so easily quickened with his onely becke, bones already rotten and scattered abroad: wherefore you shall compare that with an other saying of Elay. The dead shall rise, my carcasse, they shall rise againe. Awake ye and rejoyce that dwell in the dust, because the dewe of the green field is thy dew, and thou shalt plucke down the land of the Giants into ruine. Go my people, enter into thy tents: shut thy doors vpon that: hide thee a little while, till my displeasure passe over. For beholde behold, the Lord shall go out of his place, to visit the iniquity of the dweller upon the earth against him, and the earth shall saw forth her blood, & shall no longer hide her shame.

22. Albeit a man should doe fondly, that would goe about to drawe all to such a rule. For there be some places that without any couering doe shew the immortalitie to come, that is prepared for the faithfull in the kingdom of God, of which sort we have recited some, & of like sort are the most part of the rest, specially these two, the one in Esay. As a newe heaven, & a newe earth which I make to stand before me, so shall your feede stand, & there shall be moneth of moneth, and Sabbat of Sabbath. All flesh shall come to worship before my face, faith the Lorde. And they shall go out & see the dead carcasses of the men that have offended against mee, that their worme shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched. The other of Daniel. In that time shall rise vp Michael the great prince, that standeth for the sones of his people, and there shall come a time of distresse, such as was not since nations first began to be, and then shall all thy people be saved that shall be found written in thy booke. And of those \\u2018t slepe in the dust of the earth, there shall awake some to eternal life, & some to everlasting shame.

23. Now, as for prouing the other two points that the fathers had Christ for pledge of their covenant, & that they repofed in him all their affiance of blessing, I will not traualle therein at all, because they have both lessie controuerie & more plainnesse. Let vs therefore boldly determine this, which by no engines of the devil may be removed, that the old Testament, or covenant which the Lord made with his people Israel, was not limited within the compasse of earthly things, but also contained the promise of the spiritual & eternall life; the expectation whereof must needs have been imprinted in all their minds that truly contemned to the covenant. But let vs put faire away this mad & pernicious opinion, that either God did set foorth in his promise to the Iewes nothing else, or \\u2018t the Iewesought nothing else but filling of their belly, delightes of the flesh, flourishing wealth, outwade power, fruitfulnesse of children, & whatsoever a natural man esteemeth. For at this day Christ promiseth no other kingdom of heauen to his, but where they shall rest with Abraham, Isaac, & Iacob. And Peter affirmed, that the Iewes of his time were heires of the grace of the Gospel, for that they were the children of the Prophets, comprehended in the covenant, which the Lorde had in the old time made with his people. And, that the same should not be witnessed w words only, the Lord also approved it by deede. For in the very moment \\u2018t he rofe againe, he vouchsafed to have many of the holy men to rise againe in company with him, & made them to bee seene in the Citie: so giving an assured token, \\‘t whatsoever he did & suffered for the purchasing of eternal salvation, pertaineth no leffe to the faithful of the olde testament, than vnto vs. For as Peter testified, they were also endued \\‘t the same spirit of faith, whereby we are regenerate into life. Now, when we heare that the same spirit which is in vs a certaine sparkel of immortalitie, whereupon it is also in another place calld the earnest of our inheritance, did likewise dwell in them, how dare we take from them the inheritance of life? Whereby it is so much the more maruell, in the old time the Sadduces sel to such grossesse.
ness of error, that they denied both the resurrection & also the substance of soules, both which points they sawe sealed with so cleare testimonies of Scripture. And no leasse to be maruellled at, even at this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdom of Christ, if the Scriptures had not long before declared, that they should haue that punishment for refusing the Gospel. For so it behoved, by the just judgement of God, to strike those mindes with blindnes, which in refusing the light of heaven being offered them, did wilfully bring themselves into darknesse. Therefore they read and continually turne over Moses, but they are stoppe with a veil set betwene them and him, that they cannot see the light that shineth in his countenance. And so shall it remaine covered & hidden from them, till he be turned to Christ, from whome now they travaile to leade and drawe him away so much as in them lieth.

The xi. Chapter.
Of the difference of the one Testament from the other.

What then wilt thou say: shall there be no difference betwene the old Testament and the New? & to what purpose serve all those places of Scripture, where they are compared one against the other, as things most contrary? I do willingly allowe those differences that are rehearsed in the Scripture: but so that they nothing hinder the vnitie alreadie established, as it shalbe plaine to see, when wee shall haue entreated of them in order. Those differences are (as farre as ever I could marke or can remember) chieflye foure in number, to the which if you lift to adioyne the fifth, I am not against it. I say and trust to prooue that they are all such as rather belong to the manner of ministration, than to the substance of them. And by this meanse they shall nothing hinder, but that the promises of both the olde and newe testament may remaine all one, and all one foundation of the same promises, Christ. Now the first difference is, that although, even in the old time also, the Lords will was to direct the mindes of his people, and to haue them raised vp to the heavenly inheritance: yet, that they might be the better nourished in hope thereof, he gave it to be scene or rather to be tasted of, under earthly benefits: but nowe hauing revealed the grace of the life to come, by the Gospel, he more clearely and plainly directeth our mindes the straight way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferiour manner of exercising which he vsed with the Israelites. They that marke not this purpose of God, do not thinke that the olde people climbed any hieir than to the good things promised to the body. They so often heare the land of Chanaan named, as the excellent, or rather only reward for the keepers of Gods law. They heare that God threatneth nothing more severely to the transgressors of the same law, than that they shalbe druen out of the possession of the same land, & scattered abroade into strange regions. They see y in a maner to this effect come all the blessings & curses that are pronounced by Moses. Hereby they do undoubtedly determine, y the Jews not for their owne sake, but for others, were seuered from other nations, y is, that the Church of Christ might haue an image, in whose outward forme The might see examples of spiritual things. But with the Scripture doth sometimes shewe, that God himselfe directed at the earthly beneficiaries that he did for them to this ende, that so he might leade them by the hand to the hope of heavenly beneficiaries: it was too much vnskillfulness, I wil not say blockishnes, not to consider this order of disposition. The issue or point of our controversy with this sort of men is this, that they teach that the possession of lande of Chanaan was to the Israelites their cheife & last blessednes, and that to vs after the reueling of Christ, it doth but figuratively signifie the heauenly inheritance. On the other side we affirme, that they did in the earthly possession which they enjoyed, as in a looking glasse beholde the inheritance to come, which they beleewed to be prepared for them in heauen.

1. That shal better appeare by the similitude that Paul vsed to the Galatians. He comparseth the nation of the Jews to an heire, within age, which being not yet able to gouerne himselfe, followeth the guiding of the tutor or schoolemaister, to whose custody he is committed. And whereas he applieth that similitude to the ceremonies, that nothing hindereth but that it may also very fitly serve to this purpose. The same inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for vs: but such as yet for want of age, they were not of capacity to enter vpon and vs. The same Church was among them, but whereas the age was yet but childish. Therefore the Lordkepthem vnder this schoolinge, that he gaue them not the spiritual promises so naked and openly, as if were shadowed with earthly promises. Therefore, where he called Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their posterity vnto hope of immortality, he promised them the lande of Chanaan to be their inheritance: not to determine their hopes vpon it, but that in beholding of it, they should exercise and confirme themselves in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appeare. And that they might not be deceived, there was giuen them a hier promise to teftifie that lande was not the lieft benefite of God. So Abraham was not suffred to lie flouthfull in the promise receiued of the lande, but his minde was with a greater promise raised vp vnto the Lord. For Abraham heard this syde vnto him: I am thy protector, and thy warrede exceeding great. Here we see, that Abraham hath the end of his reward set forth in the Lord, that he should not account vpon a transitory and flippery warde in the elements of this world, but rather thinke it to be such as can not wither away. Afterward he adiomyd the promise of the lande to another intent, but that it should be a token of the good wil of God, and a figure of the heauenly inheritance. And that the holy men had this meaning, their owne sayings do declare. So Dauid rifeth wyward from temporal blesings, to that same lieft and last blesing. My heart (sayth he) and my flesh faint for desire of thee. God is my portion for euer. Againe, The Lord is the part of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art he that fauest mine heritage for me. Againe, I haue cried vnto thee, O Lord, I haue said, Thou art my hope, my portion in the land of the living. Truely they that dare so speake, doe without dout profess that with their hope they clime above the world, and all the good things here present. But the Prophets doe oft describe this blessednes of the world to come, vnder the figure that they had receiued of the Lord. And so are these sayings to be vnderstaded. That the godly shall possess the lande by inheritance, and the wicked shall be destroyed out of it. That Hierusalem shall abound with all kind of riches, and Sion overflow with plenty of all thinges. All which we see, cannot properly be spoken of the land of our way faring, or the earthly Hierusalem, but of the true country of the faithful, and that heavenly city wherein the Lord hath commanded blessing and life for ever.

3 This is the reason why it is read that the holy men in time of the old testament, did esteem the mortall life and the blessings thereof more than is now meete to do. For although they knew well that they should not rest in it, as in the end of their race, yet when they called to minde, what marks of his grace the lord had pointed therein, to exercise the according to the final rate of their tenderenes, they felt a greater sweetnes of it, than if they had considered it by it selfe. But as the Lord in testifying his good will toward his faithful, by present good thinges, did as in Shadow express the spiritual felicity, by such figures and signes: so on the other side he did in corporall paines shew examples of his judgement against the reprobate. Therefore, as the benefits of God were to be seen in earthly thinges, so were also his punishments. While the unskilful do not weye this comparison or agreement, as I may call it betweene the punishments and the rewards, they marvel at so much alteration in God, that in olde time was so suddenly ready to take vengeance on every offence of man with sterne and horrible punishments, and nowe as if he had laid away his affection of his old angirnes, he punisheth both much more gentli & seldom, yea & for the same cause they do almost imagine seuerall gods of the old & new testament: which Manichees did in dede. But wee shall easilie be deliuered from such doutes, if we lay our minde to consider this orderly disposition of God that I have spoken of, whose will was for the time to signifie and set forth in figure both the grace of the eternall felicite to come, by temporall benefites, and the greeuouisnes of the spiritual death, by corporall paines. Whereby he deliuered his Testament to the Israelites, as yet after a certaine manner folded vp.

4 An other difference of the olde and newe Testament is sayde to be in the figures: for that the old testament did shew only an image in absence of the truth, and a shadow in steede of the body. But the new testament giueth the truth present, and the sounde body it selfe. And this difference is mentioned commonly wherefoever the newe testament is in comparison set against the olde: but it is more largely entreated of in the epistle to the Hebrews than any where else. There the Apostle disputeth against them, which thought the obseruation of Moses law might not be taken away, but that they should also drawe with them the ruine of all religion. To confute this errour, he saith that which had bin forespoken by the Prophet concerning the Priesthoode of Christ. For whereas there is given him an eternall priesthoode, it is certaine, that that priesthood is taken away, whereas in newe successours were dayly put in, one after another. But he proueth why the institution of this new priesthood is to be preferred, because it is establisht with an oath. He after addeth further, that in the same change of the priesthoode, is also contained the change of the Testament. And that it was necessarie so to be, he proueth by this reason: for that the weakenes of the lawe was such that it could help nothing to perfection. Then he proceeded in declaring what was that weakenes, even this, that it had certaine outward righteousnes of the flesh, which could not make the obseruers of them perfect, according to conscience: that by sacrifices of beastes, it could nether wipe away sins, nor purchase true holinesse. He conclude therefore that there was in it a shadowe of good things to come, but notac the lively image of the things themselfes: and that therefore it had no other office, but to bee as an iroduction into a better hope, which is deliuered in the Gospel. Here is to bee seen, in what point the covenent of the law is compared with the covenent of the Gospel and the ministerie of Christ with the ministerie of Moses. For if the comparison concerned the substance of the promises, then were there great difference betweene the two testaments: but with the point of our case leadeth vs an other way, we must tend to this ende, to finde out the trueth. Let vs then set forth here the covenent which he hath stablished to be eternall, and neuer to perish. The accomplishment thereof, whereby it attaineth to be stablished and continuing in force, is Christ. While such establishment was in expectation, the Lorde did by Moses appoint ceremonies, to be as it were solemne signes of the confirmation. Nowe this came there in question, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in the law ought to guide place to Christ or no. Although these ceremonies were indeed only accidents, or verily additions & things adioyned, or (as the people call them) necessary things to the covenent, yet because they were instruments or meanes of the administration thereof, they bear the name of the covenent it selfe, as the like is wont to be attributed to other Sacraments. Therefore in sume the Old Testamento is in this place called the solemne forme of confirming the covenent, conteined in ceremonies and sacrifices. The Apostle faith, that because in it is nothing perfect, vnlesse we passe further, therefore it behoved that they should be discontinued and abrogate, that place might be gien to Christ the afferuter & mediator of a better testament, by whom eternall sanctification is once purchased to the elect, and the transgressions blotted out that remained vnder the law. Or, if you like it better, thus: That the old testament of the Lord was that, which was deliuered, wrapped vp in the shadowes & effectual observations of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, because it did but (as it were) hang in suspence, until it might stay upon a more steadfast & substantial confirmation: and that then only it was made new and eternal, after that it was consecrate & stablished by the blood of Christ. Whereupon Christ calleth the cup that he gaued at his supper to his Disciples, The cup of the new testament in his blood: to signifie that then the testament of God attaineth his truth: by which it becommeth new and eternal, when it is sealed with his blood.

5 Hereby appeareth in what sense the Apostle saide: that in the schooling of the law, the Jewes were brought into Christ, before that he was shewed in the flesh. And he confesseth, that they were the children and heires of God, but yet such, as for their young age were to be kept vnder the custodie of a schoolemaster. For it behoved, that ere the sonne of righteousnes was yet risen, there should neither be so great brightnesse of reuilation, nor so great deepes sight of understanding. Therefore God so gaued them in meafure the light of his wordes, that they saw it as yet far off and darkely. Therefore Paul expresseth this seilendernesse of understanding by the tearme of yong age, which the Lordes wil was to haue to be exercisid with the elements of this worlde and with outward observations, as rules of instruction for children vntill Chrift shoulde shine abroade, by whome it behoved that the knowledge of the faithfull people shoulde growe to full age. This distinction Chrift himselfe meant of, when he saide, that the lawe and the Prophetes were vntill John, and that from thence forth the kingdome of God is preached. What did the lawe and the Prophetes open to men of their time? even this, they gaue a taste of that wisdom which in time to come shoulde be plainly disclosed: and they shewed it before as it were twinkleingly shining a far off. But when it came to passe that Chrift might be pointed too with the finger, then was the kingdome of God set open. For in him are laide abroad the treasures of all wisdom and understanding, whereby we attaine, euin in a manner, into the secrect closets of heaven.

6 And it maketh not against vs, that there can scarcely any one be found in the Christian Church, that in excellencie of faith may be compared with Abraham, or that the Prophetes excelled in such force of spirite, that euen at this day they lighten the whole worlde withall. For our question is not here, what grace the Lorde hath bestowed vpon a fewe, but what ordinarie disposition he vsed in teaching his people: such as is declared in the Prophetes themselves, which were endued with peculiar knowledge aboue the rest. For euen their preaching is darke and enlosed in figures, as of things a farre off. Moreover howe maruellous knowledge soueraine appeared in them above other, yet forasmuch as they were driuen of necessitie to submite them to the common childifh instruction of the people, they themselves also were reckened in the number of children. Finally, there never chanced any such cleere sight to any at ye time, but that it did in some part souar of the darkenesse of the time. Whereupon Chrift saide, Many kings and Prophetes have desired to see the thinges that ye see, and haue not seene them: and to heare the things that yee heare, and haue not hearde them. Therefore blessed are your eyes, because they see, and your ears because they heare. And truly it was meete that the presence of Chrift shoulde haue this excellency of prerogative, that from it shoulde arise the cleare revealing of the heauenly mysteries. And for this purpose also maketh that, which euene we nowe alleaged out of the first Epistle of Peter, that it was opened to them, that their trauell was profitable, principally for our age.

7 Nowe I come to the thirde difference, which is taken out of Jeremie, whole wordes are these: Beholde the day shall come, saith the Lorde, and Now, let us expound the Apostle’s comparison, one piece after another. The old testament is literal, because it was published without effectual working of the spirit: The new is spiritual which the Lord hath spiritually graue in hearts of men: Therefore the second diuersitie is as it were a declaration of the first. The old is deadly, because it can do nothing but wrap all mankind within the curse: The newe is the instrument of life, because it delivereth from curse, and restores to favour with God. The olde is the ministerie of damnation, because it condemneth all Adam’s children of vnrighteousnesse: The newe is the ministerie of righteous, because it reueth the mercie of God, by which wee are made righteous. The last diuersitie is to be referred to the ceremonies. Because the olde testament had an image of things absent, it behoved that it should in time decay and vanish away: but the Gospeell, because it giueth true bodie in deedee, keepeth still a firm and perpetuall steadfastnesse: Jeremiah indeed calleth euyn the morall lawes, a weake and fraile couenant: but that is for an other reason, because by sodaine falling away of the vnthankfull people, it was by & by broken, but forasmuch as such breaking of it was the fault of people, it cannot properly be laid vpoun the testament. But the ceremonies, forasmuch as by their own weakenesse were dissolved by the comming of Christ, had the cause of their weakenes within them selves. Now, that difference of the letter & spirit is not so to be taken, as though the Lord had giuen his laws to the Jews, without any any fruit at all, having none of them concerted vnto him: But it is spoken by way of comparison, to aduance the abounding of grace, where-with the same lawmaker as it were putting on a newe personage, did honorabile set foorth the preaching of the Gospell. For if wee reken vp the multitude of these whom the Lorde out of all peoples hath by the preaching of the Gospell regenerate with his spirite, and gathered into the communion of his Church, wee shall say, that there were verie fewe, or in a manner none in the olde time in Israell, that with affection of minde and entirely from their heart embraced the covenant of the Lord, who yet were verie manie, if they bee reckoned in their owne number without comparison.

9 Out of the third difference riseth the fourth. For the Scripture calleth the olde testament, the testament of bondage, for that it ingendreth feare in mens mindes: but the newe testament, the testament of libertie, because it raiseth them vp to confidence and assurance. So faith Paul in the eight to the Romains. Yee have not received the spirite of bondage againe to feare, but the spirite of adoption, by which wee crie Abba, father. Herevnto setteth that in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, that the faithfull are not nowe come to the bodily mount, and to kindled fire, and whirle-winde, darkeness and tempest, where nothing can bee heard or scene but that striketh mens mindes with terrour, inso much that Mofes himselfe quaked for feare, when the terrible voice sounded, which they al besought, that they might not heare: But that wee are come to the Mount Sion, and the Citie of the liuing God, the heavenly Hierusalem. But that which Paul shortly toucheth in the sentence that wee have all leged out of the Epistle to the Romanes, hee setteth out more largely in the Epistle to the Galatians, when he maketh an allegorie of the two sones of Abraham, after this manner, that Agar the bondwoman is a figure of the mount Sinai, where the people of Israell received the lawe: Sara the freewoman is a figure of the heavenly Hierusalem, from whence procedeth the Gospell. That, as the seede of Agar is borne bonde, which may neuer come to the inheritance, and the seede of Sara is borne free, to whom the inheritance is due: so by the lawe wee are made subiect to bondage, by the Gospell onely wee are regenerate into freedome. But the summe commeth to this effect that the olde testament did strike into consciences feare and trembling: but by the benefite of the newe Testament it commeth to passe, that they are made joyfulfull. The olde did holde consciences bounde vnto the yoke of bondage, by the libertie of the newe they are discharged of bondage, and brought into freedome. But if out of the people of Israell they obiect against vs the holy fathers, who Sith it is euident, that they were endued with the same spirite that wee are, it followeth that they were also partakers both of the same freedome and joye. Wee aunswere, that neither of both came of the lawe. But that when they felt themselves by the law to bee both oppresst with estate of bondage, and wearied with vnquietness of conscience, they fledde to the succour of the Gospell, and therefore it was a peculiar fruit of the newe testament, that beside the common lawe of the old testament they were exempted from these euils. Moreouer, nuer, wee will denie that they were so endued with the spirit of freedom and assurance, that they did not in some part feele both feare and bondage by the law. For howfoever they enjoyed that prerogative which they had obteyned by grace of the Gospel, yet were they subiecte to the same bondes and burdens of observation, that the common people were. Sith therefore they were compelled to y carefull keeping of those ceremonies, which were the signes of a schooling much like vnto bondage, and the hand writings whereby they confessed themselves guilte of sinne, did not discharge them from being bonde: it may rightfully be said, that in comparison of vs they were vnder the testament of bondage and feare, while wee haue respect to that common order of distribution that the Lord then vnde with the people of Israel.

10 The three last comparisons that wee haue recited, are of the lawe and the Gospel. Wherefore in them by the name of the Olde Testament is meant the lawe, and by the name of the New Testament is meant the Gospel. The first stretched further, for it comprehended under it the promises also that were published before the lawe, but whereas Augustine denieth that they ought to be reckned under the name of old testament, therein he thought verie well, and meant even the same thing that we doe Boni. cap. 4. nowe teach, for he had regarde to those sayinges of Hieremie and Paul, where the olde testament is feuered from the worde of mercie and grace. And this also hee verie aptly adiouneth in the same place, that the children of promise regenerate of God, which by faith working through loue haue obeyed the commandementes, doe from the beginning of the world belong to the Newe testament, and that in hope not of fleshly, earthly and temporall, but spiritual, heavenly, and eternall good things, principally beleeuing in the Mediator, by whom they doubted not that the spirit was not minimised vnto them, both to doe good, and to haue pardon so oft as they sinned. For the same thing it is that I minded to affirme, that all the Saintes whome the Scripture rehearseth to haue beene from the beginning of the world chose by God, were partakers of the selfe same blessing with vs vnto eternall salvation. This difference therefore is betweene our division and Augustines: that ous (according to that saying of Christe: Mar. 11. 13. The lawe and the Prophets were vnto Iohn: from thence fowrth the kingdom of God is preached) doth make distinction betweene the cleerenesse of the Gospel, and the darker distribution of the worde that went before: and Augustine doth onely feuer the weakenesse of the law from the strength of the Gospel. And here also is to bee noted concerning the holy fathers, that they so lived vnder the olde testament, that they staid not there, but alway aspired to the newe, yea and embraced the assured partaking thereof. For the Apostle condemneth them of blindnesse and assurednesse, which being contented with present shadowes, did not stretch vp their minde vnto Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest) what greater blindnesse can be imagined, than to hope for the purging of sinne by the killing of a beaft? than to seeke for the cleansing of the soule in outwarte sprinkeling of water? than to seeke to appease God with colde ceremonies, as though hee were much delighted therewith? For to all these absurdities doe they fall, that flieke saith in the observations of the law without respect of Christ.

11 The fifth difference that we may add lieth in this, that until the coming of Christ the Lord had chosen out one nation, within which he would keepe several the couenant of his grace. When the highest did distribute the nations, when he divided the sones of Adam (faith Moses) his people fell to his possession: Iacob the corde of his inheritance. In another place he thus speaketh to the people: Behold the heaven and earth all that is in it, are the Lord thy God. He cleansed only to thy fathers, he loved them, to chose their seede after them even your felues out of all nations. Therefore he vouch saucd to grant the knowledge of his name to that people onely, as if they only of all men belonged unto him: he laide his couenant as it were in their bosoms: to them he openly shewed the presence of his Godhead: them he honored with all prerogatives. But (to omit the rest of his benefits, & speak that which onely here is to our purpose) he bound them to him by his communicating of his worde, that he might be called and counted their God. In the meanes season he suffered other nations to walke in vanity, as though they had not any entercourse or any thing to do with him: neither did he to helpe their destrucition, give them that which was only the remedy, namely the preaching of his worde. Therefore Israel was then the Lordes sone that was his deareling, other were strangers: Israel was known to him and receiued into his charge and protection, other were left to their owne darknesse: Israel was sanctified by God, other were prophane: Israel was honoured with the presence of God, other were excluded from comming nie vnfo to him. But when the fulnesse of time was come, appointed for the restoring of all men, and that same reconciler of God and men was delivered in deede, the particion was plucked downe, which had so long holden the mercy of God enclosed within the boundes of Israel, and peace was preached to them that were fare off, even as to them that were nere adjoyned, that being together reconciled to God, they might grow into one people. Wherefore now there is no respect of Greeke or Jewe, circumcision or uncircumcision, but Christ is in all, to whom the nations are giuen for his inheritance, and the enedes of the earth for his peculiar possession, that vniversally without difference he might haue dominion from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the uttermost enedes of the world.

12 Therfore the calling of the Gentiles is a notable token, whereby is clearly shewed the excellencie of the newe Testament aboute the olde. It had in deede been before testified by many, & most plaine oracles of prophs, but so as the performance thereof was still differed vnfo to the kingdome of Messias. And Christ himselfe did not proceed vnfo to it at the first beginning of his preaching, but differed it so long vnfo to all the parts of our redemption being perfourmed, & the time of his abasement ended, he receiued of his father a name that is aboue all names, before whom all knees should bowe. For which cause when this conueniece of time was not yet fulfilled, he said to his woman of Chanaan, he was not sent but to the loffe sheep of the house of Israel. And he suffred not his Apostles at the first sending, to passe these bounds. Go not ye, (faith he) into your way of the Gentiles, nor enter into the cities of the Samaritans, but rather go ye to the loffe sheepe of the house.
house of Israel. But howeuer it was before vterred by so many testimonies, yet when the Apostles were first to beginne it, it seemed so newe and strange a thing vnto them, that they were afraye of it, as of some monster. Truely verie carefullly and not without fticking at it, they first did let vpone it. And no marueull, for it seemed against reason, that the Lord which by fo many ages had choson out Israel from all other nations, shoulde nowe vndoe that choife, as it were, suddenly changing his purpose. It was in deede spoken of afore by prophecies: but they coulde not gue fo great heede to the prophecies, as to be nothing moued with the newnesse of the thing that they sawe. And these examples which the Lord had shewed of the calling of the Gentiles that shoulde one day come to passe, were not sufficient to moue them. For bedefte this that hee had called verie fewe, hee did after a certaine manner ingraffe them into the householde of Abraham, to adde them vnto his people as parcel of them: but by this general calling, the Gentiles were not onely made egall with the Jews, but also it appeared that they came into the place of the Jews, that were become deade. And yet all those strangers whom God hath before that time brought into the bodie of the Church, were neuer made egall with the Jews. And therefore not without a cause doth Paul so extoll his mysterie hidden from ages and generations, and which hee also faith to bee maruellous to the verie Angels.

13 In these foure or fiue pointes, I thinke I haue well and faithfully set forth the whole difference of the old and newe Testament, so much as sufficeth to the simple order of teaching. But because many report this variety in governing the Church, this diverse manner in teaching, so great alteration of ages and ceremonies, to be a great absurditie: they are also to be answered before that we passe forth to other things. And that may bee done shortly, because the objections are not so strong that they neede a curious confutacion. It hangeth not together (say they) that God which doeth alwayse steadfastly agree with himselfe, shoulde suffer so great an alteration, as afterwaies to disallowe the same thing, which he had before both commanded and commended. I answere, that God ought not therefore to be compt mutable, for that hee applied diverse formes to diverse ages, as he knew to be expedient for euery one. If the husbandman appoint to his householde one sorte of businesse in winter, and another in summer, shall we therefore accuse him of inconstancie, or thinke that he swaureth from the right rule of husbandrie which agreeth with the continual order of nature? Likewise if a father of a household doe instruct, rule and order his children of one sorte in chilhood, of another in youth, and of another in manes, wee cannot therefore say that he is sickle and forake his owne purpose. Why therefore doe we charge God with reproch of inconstancie, for that he hath swaureth the diuerfitie of times, with fit & agreeable markes. The last similitude ought fully to satisfie vs. Paul maketh the Jews like unto children and Christians to yong men, What disorder is there, in this government of God? he helde them in their childish lessons, which according to judgement of their age were fit for the, & instructed us with stronger & it were more manly discipline; Therefore herein appeareth the constance of God, that he taught one self-same doctrine in all ages, and continueth in requiring the same worship of his name, which he commanded from the beginning. But whereas he changed the outward forme and manner thereof, in that he sheed not himselfe subject to change: but so farre he tempered him selfe to the capacitie of man, which is divers and changeable.

14 But whence (say they) commeth this diversitie, but because God willed it to be such? Could he not as well from the beginning as since the coming of Christ, reveal the eternal life in plaine wordes without any figures, instruct those that are his with a few sacraments and easy to perceive, give his holy spirite, and powre abroad his grace throughout the whole world? This is even like as if they should quarrel with God for that he hath created the world so late, Sith he might haue created it from the beginning: or for that his will was to haue enterchanged course betwene winter and sommer, betwene day and night. But as for vs, euem as all godly men ought to thinke, let vs not doubt that whatsoever God hath done, is wisely and righteously done, although oftentimes we know not the cause why it ought so to have been done. For that were to take presumptuously too much upon vs, not to giue God leave to haue the caufes of his owne purpose secerret to himselfe from vs. But it is maruellous (say they) that he now refuseth and abhorreth the sacrificing of beasts, and all that furniture of the letitical priesthood, wherewith in the olde time he was delighted: As though these outward and transtorie things did delite God, or any way move affection in him. We have already said that he did none of these for his owne cause, but disposed them all for the salvation of men. If a Phisicon do heale a young man after very good meanes from his disease, & afterward do vs an other manner of healing with the same man being olde: shall we therefore say, that he hath refuseth the manner of healing which before pleased him, but rather continuing still in the same, he hath consideration of age? So behoved it, that Christ being absent, should be expressd in figure by one sort of signes, and by an other sort be before shewed that he was to come: and it is meete that now being already deliverez, he be represented by other signes. But as concerning Gods calling, now at the coming of Christ more largely spread abroad among all people than it was before, and the graces of the holy ghost more plentiously powred out: who, I pray you, can deny it to be right, that that God haue in his owne hande and will the disposing of his owne graces, to giue light to what nations it pleaseth him?: to raise vp the preaching of his word in what places it pleaseth him: to giue what doctrine & how great profiting & success of doctrine it pleaseth him: and in what ages he will, to take away the knowledge of his name out of the world for their vnthankfulnes? & again when he wil to restore it for his owne mercy? We see therefore, that the caullations are too much vnneece, wherwith wicked men doe in this point disquiet the minde of the simple, to make them call either the righteousnesse of God, or the faith of the Scripture into doubt.

That it behoved that Christ, so performes the office of the Mediator, should be made man.
N ow, it much behoved vs that he should be both God and man, which should be our Mediator. If a man ask of the necessitie, it was not in deed a simple or absolute necessitie, as they commonly call it, but it proceeded from the heavenly decree, whereupon hanged all the salvation of men. But the most mercifull father appointed that which should be best for vs. For whereas our owne iniquities had, as it were, cast a cloud betwene him and vs, & utterly excluded vs from the kingdome of heauen, no man could be the interpreter for restoring of our peace, but he that could attaine vnto God. But who could have attained vnto him? could any of the sones of Adam? But all they did with their fathers shunne the light of God for feare. Could any of the Angels? but they also had neede of a head, by whose knitting together they might perfectly & vnesterably cleave vnto God. What then? It was past all hope, vnlesse the very majestie of God would descende vnto vs, for we could not ascend vnto it. So it behoved that the sone of God should become for vs Immanuel, that is, God with vs: and that in this sort, that by mutuall ioyning, his godhead and the nature of man might growe into one together. Otherwise neither could the neerenes be neere enough, nor the alliance strong enough for vs to hope by, that God dwelleth with vs. So great was the disagreement betwene our filthines, and the most pure cleannesse of God. Although man had stand vndefiled without any spot, yet was his estate too base to attaine to God without a Mediator. What could he then do being plonged downe into death and hel with deadly fall, defiled with so many spottes, stinking with his owne corruption, and overwhelmed with all accursednesse? Therefore not without cause, Paul meaning to set forth Christ for the Mediator, doth expressly recite that he is Man. One Mediator (faith he) of God and man, the man Jesus Christ. He might haue sayde, God: or at the leauest he might haue left the name of Man as well as of God. But because the holy Ghost speaking by his mouth, knewe our weakenesse: therefore to prouide for it in time, he vsed a most fit remedy, setting among vs the sone of God familiarly as one of vs. Therefore least any man should trouble himselfe to knowe where the Mediator is to be sought, or which way to come vnto him, in naming Man, hee putteth vs in minde that he is neere vnto vs, yea so neere that he toucheth vs, for as much as he is our owne flesh. Truly he meaneth there euenc the same thing that in another place is set out with more wordes: that we haue not a bishop that can not haue compassion of our infirmities, forasmuch as he was in all things tempted as we are, onely sinne excepted.

2 That shal also appeare more plainely, if wee consider howe it was no meane thing that the Mediator had to do: that is, to restore vs into the favour of God, as to make vs of the children of men, the children of God: of the heires of hel, the heires of the kingdome of heauen. Who could do that, vnlesse the sone of God were made also the sone of man, and so take ours vpon him to conuoy his vnto vs, and to make that ours by grace, which was his by nature? Therefore by this earnest we truist, that we are the children of God, because the naturall sone of God hath shapen for himselfe a body of our body, flesh of our flesh, bones of our bones, that he might be all one with vs. He disdained not to take that vpon him which was proper vnto
Cap. 12.

vs, to make againe that to belong to vs which he had proper to himself, and that so in common together with vs, he might be both the sonne of GOD and the sonne of man. Hereupon commeth that holy brotherhooe which he commendeth with his owne mouth, when he sayth: I go vp to my father and your father, my God and your God. By this meanes is the inheritance of the kyndome of heauen assured vnto vs: for that the onely sonne of God, to whome it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted vs into his brethren: because if we be brethren, then are we partakers of the inheritance. Moreover it was for the same cause very profitable, that hee which should be our redeemer, should be both very GOD and very man. It was his office to swallowe vp death: who could doe that but life it selfe? It was his office to overcome sinne: who could doe that but righteousnesse it selfe? It was his office to vanquish the powers of the worlde and of the ayre: who could doe that but a power above both worlde and ayre? Nowe in whose possession is life, or righteousnesse, or the empire and power of heauen, but in Gods alone? Therefore the most mercifull God, in the person of his onely begotten sonne, made himselfe our redeemer, when his wil was to haue vs redeemed.

3. An other principal point of our reconciliation with God was this, by man which had lost himself by his disobedience, should for remedy fet obedience against it, should satisifie the judgement of God, and pay the penalty of sin.
Therefore there came forth the true man, our Lorde, he put on the person of Adam, and tooke vpon him his name to enter into his stead in obeying his father, to yelde our flesh the price of the satisfacon to the just judg-dement of God, & in the same flesh suffer the paine that we had deferved. For asmuch as therefore neither being onely God he could feel death, nor being only man he could overcome death, he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yelde the one subject to death to satisfi for sinnes, and by the power of the other he might wrangle with death, and gain victorie for vs. They therefore that spoyle Christ either of his godhead or of his manhood, do indeed either diminish his majestie and glory, or ob-sure his goodnes: but on the other side they doe no lesse wrong unto men whose faith they do therby weaken & ouerthrow, which can not stand but resting vpon this foundation. Beside that, it was to be hoped, that the Redeemer should be the sonne of Abraham and Dauvid, which God had promised in the lawe and the Prophetes. Whereby the godly minde doe gather this other fruite, that being by the very course of his pedigree brought to Dauid and Abraham, they do the more certainly know that this is the same Christ that was spoken of by so many oracles. But this which I even now declared, is principally to be holden in minde, that the common nature between him and vs is a pledge of our fellowship with the sonne of God: that he clothed with our flesh vanquished death & sinne together, that the victorie so might be ours and the triumph ours: that he offered vp for sacrifice the flesh that he received of vs, that hauing made satisfaction he might wipe away our guilti-ness, and appease the iuft wrath of his father.

4. He that shall be diligently heedfull in considering these things as hee ought, will easily neglect these wandring speculations that rush into them light.
light spirits and desirous of noveltie: of which sort is, that Christ should have been man, although there had beene no neede of remedie to redeem mankinde. I grant that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature vncorrupted, he was set as head over Angels and men. For which cause Paul calleth him the first begotten of all creatures. But fiue al Scripture crieth out, that he was clothed with flesh, that he might be the Redeemer: it is too much rash presumption to imagin any other cause or end. To what end Christ was promised from the beginning, it is well enough known: even to restore the world fallen in ruine, & to succour men being lost. Therefore under the law, the image of him was set forth in sacrifices, to make the faithful to hope that God would be mercifull to them, when after satisfaction made for sinne, he should be reconciled. But whereas in all ages, even when the lawe was not yet published, the Mediator was neuer promised without bloud: we gather that he was appointed by the eternall counsell of god to purge the filthinesse of men, for that the shedding of bloud is a token of expiation. The Prophets so preached of him, that they promised that he should be the reconciler of God and men. That one specially notable testimonie of Elias shall suffice vs for all, where he foretellleth, that he shalbe striken with the hand of God for the sinnes of the people, that the chastisement of peace should be vpon him: and that he should be a priest y shoulde offer vp himselfe for sacrifice: that of his wounds shoulde come health to other: and that, because all haue strayed and beeene scattered abroad like shepe, therefore it pleased God to punish him, that he might beare the iniquities of all. Sith we heare that Christ is properly appointed by God to helpe wretched sinners, who so euer passeth beyond these bounds, dooth too much follow foolish curiositie. Now when himselfe was once come, he affirmed this to be the cause of his comming, to appease God, & gather vs vp from death into life. The same thing did the Apostles teftifie of him. So John before that he teacheth y the Word was made flesch, declareth of the falling away of man. But he himselfe is to be heard before all, when he speaketh thus of his owne office: So God loued the world, that he gave his only begotten sonne, that who soever belieueth in him shoulde not perifh, but haue euerlafting life. Againe: The houre is cometh that the dead shall heare the voice of the sonne of God, & they that heare it, shal live. I am the resurrection & life: he that belieueth in me, though he be deade, shal live. Againe: The sonne of man commeth to saue y which was lost. Againe: The whole neede not a Physicion. I should never make an end, if I shoulde rehearse all, the Apostles do all with one consent call vs to this fountaine: And truely if he had not come to reconcile God, the honor of the priesthood shoulde haue come to nought. Forasmuch as the priest appointed meane betweene God & man to make intercession: & he shoulde not be our righteousnesse, because he was made a sacrifice for vs, that God should not impute sinnes vnto vs. Finally, he shoulde be spoiled of all the honourable titles, wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. And also that saying of Paul shoulde prove vain, that that which was impossible to the lawe, God hath sent his owne sonne, in likenesse of the flesh of sinne he shoulde satisfie for vs. Neither will this stand that he teacheth in another place, that in this glasse appeared the good. goodness of God and his infinite goodness toward men, when Christ was given to be the Redeemer. Finally, the Scripture every where assigneth no other ende, why the sonne of God would take uppon him our flesh, and also received this commandement of his father, but to be made a sacrifice to appease his father toward vs. So it is written, and so it behoved that Christ should suffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therefore my father loueth me, because I give my life for the sheepe, this commandement he gave me. As Moses lifted vp the Serpent in the desert, so must the sonne of man be lifted vp. In another place: Father, saue me from this hour. But I am therefore come euon to this house. Father, glorifie thy sonne. Where he plainly speaketh of the ende why he tooke flesh, that he might be a sacrifice and satisfaction to do away sinne. After the same sorte doth Zacharie pronounce, that he came according to the promise givem to the fathers, to giue light to them that sate in the shadow of death. Let vs remember that all these things are spoken of the sonne of God: in whom Paul in an other place testieth, that all the treaures of knowledge and wisdom are hidden, and byside whom he glorifieth that he knoweth nothing.

5 If any man take exception and say, that none of all these things prove the contrary, but that the same Christ that redeemed men being damned, might also in putting on their flesh testify his love toward them, being preferred and safe. The answer is short, that for as much as the holy ghost pronounceth, that by the eternall decree of God these two things were ioyned together, that Christ should be our redeemer, and also partaker of all one nature with vs, therefore it is not lawful for vs to search any further. For who so euer is tickled with desire to know any more, he being not contented with the unchangeable ordinance of God, doth shew also that he is not contented with the same Christ that was given vs to be the price of our redemption. But Paul not only rehearseth to what ende he was sent, but also climbing to the high mystery of predestination, he very fitly repreffeth all want onnesse and itching desire of mans wit. The father chose vs in Christ before the creation of the world, to make vs his sonnes by adoption, according to the purpose of his will: and he accepted vs in his beloved sonne, in whom we have redemption by his bloud. Truely here is not the fal of Adam set before as though it were foremost in time, but is shewed what God determined before all ages, when his will was to helpe the miserie of mankinde. If the aduersarie obiect againe, that this purpose of God did hange upon the fall of man which he did foresee: it is enough and more for me, to say, that they with wicked boldnesse brake forth to faine them a new Christ, who so euer suffer themselves to search for more, or hope to know more of Christ than God hath foreappointed them by his decreet deeree. And for good cause did Paul, after he had so discoured of the proper office of Christ, with to the Ephesians the spirit of understanding, to comprehende what is the length heighth, brevth, and depth, euon the love of Christ that surmounteth all knowledge: euon as if of purpose he would set barres about our minde, that when mention is made of Christ, they should not, be it never so little, swaue from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, this is a faithful saying (as Paul testifieth) that Christ is come to save sinners, I doe gladly reft in the in the same. And wheresin an other place the same Apostle teacheth, that the grace which is now disclosed by the Gospel, was gien vs in Christ before the times of the worlde: I determine that I ought constantly to abide therein to the ende. Against this modestie Osiander carpeth vnuitly which hath againe in this time vnhappily stirred this question before lightly mo-ded by a few. He accuseth them of presumption that say, that the fonne of God should not haue appeared in the flesh, if Adam had not fallen, because this intention is confuted by no testimony of scripture. As though Paul did not bridle frowarde curiositie, when after he had spoken of redemption purchased by Christ, he by and by commandeth to auoid foolish questions.
The madnede of some did burst out so farre, that while they disorderly co-tected to feeme witty, they mowed this question, whether the Sonne of God might haue taken vpon him the nature of an Asse. This monftrousnes which all the godly do worthy abhorre as detestable, let Osiander confute with this pretenc, that it is never expressly confuted in the Scripture. As though when Paule accomplereth nothing precious of worthy to be knowne, but Christ crucified, he doth therefore admit an Asse to be the author of faulti-on. Therefore he that in an other place reporteth, that Christ by the eternall counfell of his father was ordeined to be a head to gather all things together, will never the more acknowledge an other that hath no office of redeeming appointed him.

6 But as for the principle that he braggeth of, it is very trifling. He would have it, that man was created after the image of God, because he was fashioned after the paterne of Christ to come, that he might resemble him, whom the father had already decreed to clothe with our flesh. Whereupon he ga-thereth, that if Adam had never fallen from his first and incorrupt origi-nall state, yet Christ should haue been man. How trifling this is and wrested, all men that haue sound judgement, doe easily perceive of themselves.
In the mean time first he thinketh that he hath seen what was the image of God, that forsooth the glory of God did not onely shine in those excellent giftes wherewith he was garnished, but also that God himselfe essentially dwelt in him. But as for me although I grant that Adam did beare the image of God, in so much as he was ioyned to God, (which is the true and highest perfection of dignitie), yet I say, that the likeness of God is nowhere els to be sought, but in those markes of excellencie wherewith he had garnished Adam aboue other living creatures. And that Christ was then the image of God, all men do grant with one consent, and therefore that what so ever ex-cellencie was grauen in Adam, it proceeded from this, that by the onely begotten sonne he approached to the glory of his creator. Therefore man was created after the image of God, in whom the creators will was to haue his glory seene as in a looking glasse. To this degree of honor was he advanced by the benefit of the onely begotten sonne: But I say further, that the same sonne was a common head as well to Angels as to men, so that the same dignity that was bestowed vpon man, did also belong vnto angels. For when we haeret them called the children of God, it were inconuenient to deny, that there is somthing in them wherein they resemble their father. Nowe if his will was to haue his glorie to be represented as well in Angels as in men, and to be seen in both natures, Osiander doth fondly trifle in saying, that the Angels were then set behind men, because they did not bear the image of Christ. For they could not continually enjoy the present beholding of God, unlesse they were like him. And Paul teacheth, that men are otherwise renewed after the image of God, but if they be coupled with Angels, that they may cleave together under one head. Finally, if we beleue Christ, this shalbe our last felicite, to be made of like fourme to the Angels, when wee shalbe receiued vp into heaven. But if Osiander will conclude, that the original paterne of the image of God was in Christ as he is man, by the same reason a man may say, that Christ must needes have beene partaker of the nature of Angels, because the image of God pertaineth also to them.

7 Therefore, Osiander hath no cause to feare, that God should be found a lier, unlesse it had beene first set fastly and unchangeably decreed in his minde, to have his sonne incarnate: because if the integritie of Adam had not fallen, he shalwth with the Angels have beene like vnto God, and yet it should not therefore have bene necessarie, that the sonne of God should be made either man or Angel. And in vaine he seareth that absurditie, leaft unlesse the vnchangeable counsell of God had ben before the creation of man that Christ shalde be borne, not as the redeemer but as the first man, he shalwth have left his prerogatiue: for asmuch as now he shalbe borne man onely by an accident caale, that is to restore mankind being lost, and so it might be gathered thereupon, that Christ was created after the image of Adam. For why should he so much abhorre that which the Scripture so openly teacheth, that he was made like vnto vs in all things, except sinne? Wherevpon Luke doubteth not to recken him the sonne of Adam in his Genealogie. And I would faine knowe why Paul calleth Christ the seconde Adam, but because the estate of man was appointed for him, that he might raise vp the posteritie of Adam out of their ruine. For if he were in order before that creation, he shalbe ben called the first Adam. Osiander boldly affirmeth, that because Christ was alreadie before knownen man in the mind of God, men were formed after the same paterne. But Paul in naming him the second Adam, setteth meane betweene the first beginning of man and the restitution which we obtaine by Christ, the fall of man whereby grew the necessitie to have nature restored to her first degree. Whereupon it followeth, that this same was the cause why the sonne of God was borne to become man. In the mean time, Osiander reasoneth ill & vnfauourily, that Adam, so long as he had stande without falling, shalbe bene the image of himselfe and not of Christ. I answeere by the contrary, because though the sonne of God had never put on flesh, neuertheless both in the body and in the soule of man shalbe shined the image of God in the bright beams whereof it alwaye appeared, that Christ is verily the head, and hath the foueraigne supremacie in all. And fo is that foolish subteltie afoiled, which Osiander bloweth abroade, that the Angels shalde have lacked this head, unlesse it had bene purposed by God to clothe his sonne with flesh, yea, though there had bene no fault of Adam. For he doeth too rashly snatch holde of that which no man in his right wit will graunte, that Christ hath no, no supremacy ouer Angels, that they should have him for their Prince, but in so much as he is man. But it is easily gathered by the words of Paul, that in as much as he is the eternall word of God, he is the first begotten of all creatures: not that he is create, or ought to bee reckened among creatures: but because the state of the worlde in integritie, such as it was at the beginning garnished with excellent beauty, had no other original: and then, that in as much as he was made man, he was the first begotten of the dead. For the Apostle in one short clause setteth forth in both these points to be considered: that all things were create by the sonne, that he might bear rule ouer Angels: and that he was made man, that he might beginne to be the redeemer. Of like ignorance is it that he sayth, that men should not have had Christ to their king, if he had not beene man. As though the kingdome of God could not stande, if the eternall sonne of God, although not clothed with the flesh of man, gathering together both Angels and men into the fellowship of his heavenly glory and life, should himselfe beare the souerainty. But in this false principle he is alway deceived, or rather deceived himselfe, that the Church should have beene without a head, yea, Jesus Christ had appeared in the flesh. As though, euen as the Angels enjoyed him their head, he could not likewise by his divine power rule ouer men, and by the secret force of his spirit quicken and nourish them like his owne body, till being gathered vp into heauen, they might enjoy all one life with the Angels. These trifles that I have hitherto confuted, Ofiander accounteth for most strong oracles: euen so as being dronke with the sweetness of his owne speculations, he seekth to blowe out fond Bacchus cries of matters of nothing. But this one that he bringeth after, he sayth is much more strong, that is the prophecie of Adam, which seeing his wife said, this nowe is a bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh. But howe proueth hee that to be a prophecie? Because in Matthew Christ giueth the same sayinge to God. As though that what fouer God hath spokien by men, conteneth some prophecie. Let Ofiander seeke prophecies in every commandement of the lawe, which, it is certaine to have come from GOD the author of them. Beside that, Christ should have beene grosse and earthly, if he had rested vpon the literall sense. Because he speaketh not of the mysticall vi-on wherunto he hath vouchsafed to receive his Church, but only of faithf nesse betweene man and wife: for this cause he teacheth, that God pronounc ed that man and wife shalbe one fleshe, that no man should attempt to breake that inoffuble knot by diuorce. If Ofiander loft this simplicitie, let him blame Christ, for that he led not his discipels further to a mysterie, in more subtly expounding the sayinge of his father. Neither yet doth Paul maintaine his error, which after he had sayd that we are flesh of the fleshe of Christ, by and by addeh, that this is a great mystery, for his purpose was not to tell in what meaning Adam spake it, but vnder the figure & similitude of marriage to set forth the holy coupling together, that makeh vs one with Christ. And so doe the wordes sound. Because when he giueth warning he speaketh this of Christ & his church, he doth as it were by way of corretion, feuer the spirituall joyning of Christ and his Church from the lawe of marriage. Wherefore this fickle reason easilly vaniseth away. And I think

I neede no more to shake vp any more of that sort of chaffe, because the vanity of them all his soone found out by this shorte confutation. But this sobrietie shall abundantly suffice to feede foundly the children of GOD: that when the fulnesse of times was come, the sonne of God was sent, made of woman, made vnder the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe.

The xiiij. Chapter.
That Christ take upon him the true substance of the flesh of man.

NOW, vnaieft I be deceived, it were superfluous to entreate agayne of the Godhead of Christ, which hath already in an other place beene proued with plaine and strong testimonies. It remaineth therefore to be feene, howe he being clothed with our flesh, hath fulfilled the office of Mediatour. The trueh of his humane nature hath in the olde time beene impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whom, the Marcionites fained a ghost in stead of the body of Christe, and the Manichees dreamed that he had a heavenly flesh. But both many and strong testimonies of the Scripture doe stande against them both. For the blessing is promised neither in a heavenely seed, nor in the counterfaft shape of man, but in the seede of Abraham and Iacob. Neither is the eternall throne promised to a man made of aire, but to the soone of David and to the fruit of his wombe. Therefore being delivered in the flesh, he is called the sonne of David and Abraham: not because he is onely borne of the wombe of the Virgine, and create in the aire, but because (as Paul expoundeth it) he is according to the flesh made of the seede of David: as in an other place \\u201d Apostle teacheth, that he descended of the Iewes. For which cause the Lord himselfe not contended with the bare name of man, doth oftentimes call himselfe the sonne of man, meaning to expresse more plaineely that he was man truly issued of the seede of mankind. Sith the holy Ghost hath so oft, by so many meanes, with so great diligence and simplicitie declared a thing not obscure of it selfe, who would have thought any men to be so shamelesse as to presume yet to spread mistes to darken it? And yet we have other testimonies at hande, if we lifted to heape vp more of them. As is that saying of Paul: that God sent his sonne made of woman. And innumerable other places, whereby appeareth that he was subiect to hunger, thrist, colde, and other infirmities of our nature. But out of many there are chiefly to be chosen, that may most availe to edifie our mindes in true confidence. As, where it is said, that he gave not so great honour to the Angels, as to take their nature vpon him; but tooke our nature, that in flesh and bloud he might, by death, destory him that had the power of death. Againe, that by benefite of that communicating we are reckon his brethren. Again, that he ought to have bin made like vnto his brethren, that he might be made a merciful and faithfull intercessour: that we have not a Bishoppe that can not be comptaynt of our infirmities. And such like. And for the same purpose serueth that which wee touched a little before, that it behoued that the sinnes of the worlde should be cleansed in our flesh: Which Paul plainly affirmeth. And truely, what so ever the father hath given to Christ, it doeth therefore belong to vs, because he is the head, from which the whole bodie being knitted together, groweth into one. Yea and otherwise that will not agree together, which is said: that the Spirit was given him without measure, that all wee shoulde drawe of the fulnesse thereof. Forasmuch as there is no greater absurditie than to say, that God is enriched in his essence by any accidentall gift. And for this cause Christ faith in an other place: I doe sanctifie my selfe for them.

2 As for the places that they bring forth to confirme their error, they do too vnaply wrest them, and they nothing preuaile by their trifling suttleties, when they goe about to wipe away those things that I haue alledged for our part. Marcion imagineth that Christ did put on a fantastical bodie in stead of a true bodie: because in some places it is saide, that hee was made after the likenesse of a man, and that hee was founde in shape as a man. But so ho nothing weicth what is Paules purpose in that place. For his meaning is not to reach what manner of body Christ tooke vpon him, but that whereas he might haue shewed forth his godhead, hee made no other shew of himselfe, but as of an abiet and vnregarded man. For, to exhorte vs by his example to submission, hee sheweth that forasmuch as he was God, he might haue by and by set forth his glorie to be scene to the worlde: but yet that hee gaue ouer some of his owne right, and of his owne accorde abased himselfe, because he did put on the image of a seruant & contended with that humilitie, suffred his godhead to bee hidden with the veile of the flesh. Hee doeth not here teach what Christ was, but how he behaued himselfe. And also by the whole processe of the text it is easilie gathered, that Christ was abased in the true nature of man. For what meaneth this, that in shape hee was founde as man, but that for a time the glorie of his godhead did not shine foorth, but onely the shape of man appeared in base and abief estate? For otherwise that place of Peter could not stande together, that he was deade in the flesh, but quickened in the spirite, if the sonne of God had not bene weake in the nature of man: which Paul expresseth more plainly in saying, that hee suffred by reason of the weakenesse of the flesh. And herevnto serueth the exaltation: because it is expressiely saide, that Christ attained a newe glorie after that hee abased himselfe, which could not well agree to bee spoken of any, but of a man hauing flesh and soule. Manichees framed Christ a bodie of aire, because Christ is called the seconde Adam, heauenly of heauen. But neither in that place doeth the Apostle bring in a heauenly essence of the bodie, but a spirittuall force which being powred abroad by Christ, doeth quicken vs. Now, as wee haue alreadie scene, Peter and Paul doe seuer the fame from his flesh. But rather that doctrine which is received among the true teachers, concerning the flesh of Christ, is verie well proued by that place. For if Christe had not all one nature of bodie with vs, it were a verie vaine argument, that Paul with such vehementie followeth: that if Christ be risen againe, we shall also rise againe: and if wee do not rise, then that Christ also is not risen. By what caullations so euer either the old Manichees or their newe Disciples goe about to escape, they shall not winde themselves away. It is a foule shifte, that they fondly say, that Christ is called the sone of man, in so much as he is promised of men. For it is plaine, that after the Hebrew phrase, verie man in deed is called the sone of man. And Christ without doubt kept the phrase of his owne tongue. Also it ought to make no question, what ought to be understood by the children of Adam, and (not to goe farre off) the place of the eight Psalme, which the Apostles apply to Christ, shal bee sufficient enough: What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the sone of man, that thou visitst him? In this figure is expressed the true manhood of Christ. For though hee were not immediately begett of a mortal father, yet his race came from Adam. For else that place could bee not stande, which wee have alreadie alleged, that Christ is made partaker of fleshe and blood, that he might gather to him yong children to the service of God. In which wordes it is plainly determined, that Christ is made fellow and partaker of all one nature with vs. In which meaning also hee faith, that both the author of holinesse and they that are made holy, are all of one. For it is prooved by the proccede of the text, that the same is referred to the fellowhip of nature, because he by and by addeth, Therefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. For if hee had faide before, that the faithfull are of God in so great dignitie, what cause should there be to be ashamed? But because Christ of his infinite grace doth joine himselfe to the base and vnnoble, therefore it is said, that he is not ashamed. But in vaine they object, that by this meanes the wicked shall become the brethren of Christ: because wee knowe that the children of God are not borne of flesh and blood, but of the holy Ghost by faith. Therefore onely fleshe makenoth a brotherly joyning. But although the Apostle giue this honour to the faithfull onely, to be of one with Christ, yet it followeth not, but that the wicked may be borne of the fame orinall. As when we say that Christ was made man, to make vs the sones of God: this saying extendeth not to all men, because faith is the same which spiritually graffeth vs into the body of Christ. Also they foolishly moue a brawle about the name of First begotten. They say that Christ shoulde haue beene borne of Adam straight at the beginning, that he might be the first begotten among brethren. For the title of First begotten, is not referred to age, but to the degree of honour, & excellence of power. And more colour hath that which they bable, why Christ tooke to him man and not Angels, because he receiued mankinde into favour. For, to set out more largely the honor which God vouchsaue to giue vs, he compared the Angels with vs, which were in this behalf se behind vs. And if the testimonie of Moses be well weied, where hee faith that the seede of the woman shal breake the serpent heade, it shall utterly end the controversye. For onely Christ is not there spoken of, but all mankinde Because the victorie was to be gotten by Christ for vs, hee generallly pronounced that the posteritie of the woman should get the upper hande of the devil. Whereunto followeth, that Christ issued of mankinde, because it was Gods purpose there to rase vp Eue, whom he spake vnto with good hope, that she shoulde not faint with sorrow.

3. They doe no leffe wickedly than foolishly entangle with allegories these testimonies where Christ is called the seede of Abraham, and if fruite of of the wombe of Davuid. For if the name of Seed had ben spoken in an allegorie, truely Paul woulde not haue left it vn tolde, where hee plainly & without figure affirmeth, that there are not many sonnes of Abraham re deemers, but one Christ. Of like forte is it that they alledge: that hee is no otherwise called the sonne Davuid, but because he was promised and at length in his due time deliuered. For after that Paul had once named him the sonne of God: in that he by and by addeth, According to the fleshe, hee truely meaneth of nature. And so in the ninth Chapter calling him the blessed God, he faith feuerally befide, that according to the fleshe hee descended of the Iewes. Nowe if he were not truely begotten of the seede of Davuid, to what purpose shal be this saying, that he is the fruite of his wombe? What meaneth this promise? Out of thy loines shal hee descend. that shall abide in thy feate. Nowe in the Genealogie of Christ, as it is rehearsed of Matthewe, they doe Sophistically mocke. For though he do not rehearse the parents of Marie but of Ioseph, yet because he speaketh of a thing sufficiently knowne abroad among the people, hee reckeneth it enough to shewe that Ioseph came of the seede of Davuid, when it was well knowne that Marie was of the same stocke. But Luke more preffeth them in teaching that saluation brought by Christ, is common to all mankinde: because Christ the author of saluation proceeded from Adam the common parent of all. I graunt in deede, that by the Genealogie it can none otherwise be gathered that Christ was the sonne of Davuid, but in so much as hee was begotten of the Virgine. But the new Marcionites to colour their error do too proudly, in this to proue that Christ tooke his bodie of nothing, they affirme that women are seedeles, and so they overthrowe the principles of nature. But because that is no question of diuinitie, and the reasons that they bring are so fickle, that they may verie easilie be confuted: therefore I will not touch those things that belong to Philosophie and Phisike, and will hold me contented to wipe away those things that they alledge out of Scripture: that is, that Aaron and Ioiadah tooke wives of the tribe of Iehudah, and so the difference of tribes had then bee confounded, if woman had engendring feed in her. But it is well known knowen that as touching civil order, the kindreds are reckened by the seede of the man, and yet the excellency of the kinde of man aboue woman proueth not the contrarie, but that in generation the seede of woman must meete. And this solution extendeth to all the Genealogies. Oftentimes when the Scripture reckoneth vp a Genealogie, it nameth the men onely: shal we therefore say, that the women are nothing? But verie children do know, that women are comprehended vnder the name of men. And after this forte is said, that women bring foorth to their husbands, because the name of the householde alway remaineth with the males. Now as this is graunted to the excellencie of the male kinde, that the children are counted noble or vnoble, according to the estate of their fathers: so also in that state of bondage the issue foloweth the wombe, according to the judgement of the Civil lawyers. Whereby we may gather, that the issue is engendred of the seede of the woman. And it hath of long time ben receiued in common vse of all nations, the mothers are called Genetrices, is engendriers. Wherewith Gods lawe also agreeth, which else should wrongfully forbide marriage.
marriage of the uncle with his sister's daughter, because there were no consanguinitie betwene them: and also it were lawful for a man to marry his sister by the mothers side, so that shee were begotten of an other father. But as I graunt that there is a passiue power ascribed to women, so do I anfwere that the same thing is indifferently spoken of them that is of men. And Christ himselfe is not faide to bee made by the woman, but of the woman. But some of their companie shaking of all shame doe too leudly aske, whether wee will say that Christ was engendred of the mensurall seede of the Virgin, for I will likewise aske of them, whether hee did not congele in the bloude of his mother, which they shall bee constrained to confesse. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Matthewes words, that because Christ was begotten of Marie, he was engendred of her seed: as a like engendring is meant when it is faide, that Booz was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Matthew here describe the Virgin as a conduit pipe through which Christ passed, but hee feuereth this meruellous manner of generation from the common manner, for by her was Christ begotten of the seed of Dauid. For euen in the same ffort, that Isaac was begotten of Abraham, Salomon of Dauid, and Iofeph of Jacob, likewise it is said that Christ was begotten of his mother. For the Evangelift so frameth the order of his speach, and willing to prooue that Christ came of Dauid, is contented with this one reafon, that hee was begotten of Marie. Whereby it followeth, that hee tooke it for a matter confessed, that Marie was of kinne to Iofeph.

4. The aburdities wherewith they would charge vs, are stuffed full of childish caualsions. They thinke it a shame and dishonour to Christ, if he should have taken his originall of men: because hee could not bee exempt from the vniversall lawe that encloseth all the offpring of Adam with our exception, vnnder sinne. But the comparison that wee reade in Paul doth easilly afoil this doubt: that as by one man came sinne, and by sinne death, so by the righteousnesse of one man grace hath abounded. Wherewith also agreeeth an other comparison of his: the firt Adam of earth, earthly and naturall, the seconde of heauen, heauenly. Therefore in an other place, the fame Apostle, where hee teacheth that Christ was sent in the likenes of sinnesfull man, to satisfie the lawe, doeth so expressly seuer him from the common estate of men, that hee be verie man without fault and corruption. But verie childishly they triffe in reasoning thus: If Christ bee free from al spot, and was by the secrete working of the holy Ghost begotten of the seede of Marie, then is not the womans seede, but onely the mans seede vnclene. For wee doe not make Christ free from all spot, for this cause that he is onely engendred of his mother without copulation of man, but because hee is sanctified by the holy Ghost, that the generation might be pure and uncorrupted, such as should have beeene before the fall of Adam. And this alwaies remained fteadfastly determined with vs, that so often as the scripture putteth vs in minde of the cleanliness of Christ, it is meant of his true nature of manhoode; because it were superfluous to say that God is clene. Also the sanctification that hee speaketh of in the sequenteth of Iohn, could have no place in the nature of God. Neither are there fained two seedes of Adam, although there came no infection to Christ: because the geration of man is not unclean or vicious of itself, but accidental by his falling. Therefore it is no manuell, if Christ, by whom the estate of innocencie was to be restored, were exempted from common corruption. And whereas also they thrust this vpon vs for an absurditie, that if the Word of God did put on flesh, then was it inclosed in a narrow prisone of an earthly bodie: this is but meere waywardnesse: because although the infinite essence of the worde did growe together into one person which the nature of man: yet doe wee faine no inclosing of it. For the sonne of God descended marvellously from heauen, so as yet hee left not heauen, it was his will to bee marvellously borne in the Virgins wombe, to bee conuerfait in earth, and hangeth vpon the croffe, yet that hee alway filled the world even as at the beginning.

Howe the two natures of the mediator do make one person.

Now where it is faide, that the Worde was made flesh: that is not so to be understood, as though it were either turned into flesh, or confusionally mingled with flesh, but because hee chose him a temple of the Virgins wombe to dwell in: he that was the sonne of God, became also the sonne of man, not by confusion of substance, but by vnitie of person. For we so affirm the godhead joyned and vnitied to the manhood, that either of them haue their whole propertie remaining, and yet of them both is made one Christ. If any thing in all worldly things may be found like to so great a mysterie, the similitude of man is most fitte, whome wee see to consist of two substances, whereof yet neither is so mingled with other, but that either keepeth the propertie of his owne nature. For neither is the body the bodie, nor the bodie the soule. Wherefore both that thing may be severally spoken of the soule, which can no way agree with the bodie: and likewiue of the bodie that thing may be faide, which can by no meane agree with the soule: and that may bee faide of the whole man, which can be but vnfitly taken neither of the soule nor of the bodie severally. Finally, the properties of the soule are sometime attributed to the bodie, and the properties of the body somtime to the soule: and yet he that consisteth of them is but one man and not many. But such formes of speach doth signifie both that there is one person in man compounded of two natures knit together, and that there are two diuerse natures which doe make the same person. And so do the Scriptures speake of Christ: Sometime they give vnto him those things that ought singularly to bee referred to his manhood, & sometime those things that doe peculiarly belong to his godhead, and sometime those things that doe comprehend both natures, and doe agree with neither of them severally. And this conioyning of the two natures that are in Christ, they doe with such religiousnesse expresse, that sometime they doe put them in common together: which figure is among the old authors called Communicating of properties.

2 These things were but weake, vnlesse many phrasas of scripture, and such such as bee echwhere readie to finde, did proove that nothing hereof hath bene deuised by man. That same thing which Christ spake of himselfe, saying: Before that Abraham was, I am, was far disagreeing from his manhood. Neither am I ignoraunt with what caulation the erroneous spirits doe depraue this place: For they say that he was before all ages, because he was already foreknown the Redeemer, as well in the counfell of the father, as in the minde of the godly. But whereas he openly distinguisheth the day of his manifestation from his eternall essence, and of purpose pronounceth vs. himselue an authoritie by antiquitie wherein he excelleth above Abraham, he doth vndoubtedly chalenge to himselfe that which is proper to Godhead. Whereas Paul affirmeth that hee is the first begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, and by whom all things kepe their being: and whereas hee himselfe reporteth that he was in glory with the Father before the creation of the world, and that hee worketh together with the father these things, do nothing more agree with the nature of men.

It is therefore certeine, that these and such like are peculliarly ascribed to Godhead. But whereas he is called the ferment of the Father; and whereas it is saide, that he grew in age, wisdom, and favour with God and men: that he seeketh not his owne glory: that hee knoweth not the last day: that hee speaketh not of himselfe: that he doeth not his owne will: where it is saide, that he was seene and felt: this wholly belongeth to his owne manhood. For in respect he is God, neither can he encreafe in any thing, & he worketh all things for his owne sake, neither is any thing hidden from him, hee doth all things according to the free choice of his owne wil, and can neither be seene nor felt. And yet he doth not feuerally ascribe these things to his nature of man onely, but taketh them vpon himselfe, as if they did agree with the person of the mediator. But the communicating of properties is in this that Paul faith, that God did by his owne bloud purchase vnto him a Church: and the Lorde of glory crucified. Againe, where John faith, he, the Word of life was seene. Truely God neither hath bloud, nor suffereth, nor can be touched with handes. But because he which was both verie God & man, Christ being crucified, did shed his bloud for vs: those things y were done in his nature of man, are vnproperly, & yet not without reason given to his godhead. A like example is, where John teacheth, God gave his soule for vs: therefore there also y propertie of the manhood is communicte with the other nature. Againe, when Christ faileth being yet conuertant in earth, that no man have ascended into heauen: but the soule of man that was in heauen: truely according to his manhood, & in the flesh y he had put on, he was not then in heauen: but because himselfe was both God & man, by reason of the untie of both natures, he gaueth to the one that, which belonged to the other.

3 But most plainly of all do these places fet forth the true substance of Christ, which doe comprehend both natures together: of which sort there are very many in y Gospel of him. For y which is there red is singularly belonging neither to his godhead nor to his manhood, but both together, y he hath receiue of his father power to forgive sins, to raise vp whom he will, to give righteousness, holines and salvation, to be made judge over y quicke & the dead, to be honoured eu'n as the Father is: Finally, that hee is called the the light of the world, the good shepeheard, the onely dore; the true Vine. John 9:5.

For such prerogatures had the sonne of god, when he was shewed in y flesh, which although he enjoyed with his father before the world was made, yet he had them not in the same maner or the same respect, & which could not be gien to such a man as was nothing but man. In the same meaning ought we to take that which is in Paul: that Christ after the judgement ended, shal yeilde vp the kingdom to God & the father: Euen the kingdom of the sonne of God, which had no beginning, nor shall have any ending: but euen as hee lay hid ynder the basenesse of the fleth, & abased himselfe, taking vpvn him the forme of a servant, & laying aside the porte of maiestie, he shewed himselfe obedient to his father: & having performed all such fubiection, at length is crowned with honor & glory, & aunounced to the highest dominion, that all knees shall bow before him: so shal he then yeeld up to his father both that name & crowne of glory, & whatsoever he hath receiued of his father, that God may be all in all. For to what purpose is power & dominion gien him, but that the father should govern vs by his hand? In which fente it is also said, that he sitreeth at the right hand of the father. But this is but for a time, til we may enjoye the present beholding of the godhead. And here the error of the old fathers cannot be excused, which while they tooke no heed to the person of the Mediatour, have obfcurd the natural meaning of almost all the doctrine y is read in the gospel of John, & have entangled them felues in many snares. Let this therefor be vnto vs the key of right understanding, that such things as belong to the office of the Mediatour, are not spokene simply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore, Christ shal reigne til he come forth to judge y world, in so much as he ioyneth vs to his father, according to the small measure of our weakness. But when we being made partakers of the heauenly glory, shal see God such as he is, then he having performed the office of Mediatour, shal ceafe to be y embassadoure of his father, & shalbe contented with that glory which he enjoyed before the making of the world. And the name of Lord doeth in no other respect peculiarly agree with the person of Christ, but in this, that it signifies the meane degree betweene God & vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of Paul: One God, of whom are all things, and one Lorde, by whom are all things, euen he to whom the dominion for a time is committed by the father, vntil his divine maiestie be to be scene face to face. From whom so farre is it of that any thing shal decay, by yeelding vp the dominion to his father, that he shal become so much the more glorious. For then shal God also ceafe to be the head of Christ because Christes godhead shal then shine of it selfe, whereas yet it is couered with a certaine veile.

And this obseruation shal do no small servise to afoile many doutes, if the readers do fitly apply it. For it is maricious how much the vnskillfull, yet some not vterly vnlearned, are combrd with such formes of speach, which they see spokene by Christ, which do well agree neither with his godhead nor with his manhood: because they consider not that they do agree with his person wherein he is shewed both God and man, and with the office of Mediatour, and it is alway easie to see, how well all things hang together, if they haue a sober expostouur to examine so great mysteries with such devout.
deout reverence as they ought to be. But there is nothing that these furious and phrentike spirits trouble not. They catch holde of those things that are spoken of his manhood, to take away the Godhead: and likewise of those things that are spoken of his Godhead to take away his manhood: and of those things that are so joynedly spoken of both natures, that they seuerally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is that else but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that he is not God, because he is man: and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man and God? We therefore do determine that Christ, as he is both God and man, consisting of both natures, united, though not confounded, is our Lord and the true fonne of God, even according to this manhood, though not by reason of his manhood. For the error of Nestorius is to be driven far away from vs, which when he went about rather to draw in sunder, than to distinguish the nature, did by the meane imagine a double Christ. Whereas we see that the Scripture crieth out with loud voice against it, where both the name of the fonne of God is giuen to him that was borne of the Virgin, and the Virgin herself is called the mother of our Lord. We must also beware of the madness of Eutiches, leaft while we go about to shew the unity of the person, we destroy either nature. For we have already allaged so many testimonies, and there are every where so many other to be allaged, where his Godhead is distinguished from his manhood, as may stop the mouthes even of the most contentious. And a little hereafter I wil allioyne some testimonies, to confute that better that faied deuise, but at this present, one place shal content vs. Christ would not have called his body a Temple, vnlesse the Godhead did distinctly dwel therin. Wherefore as Nestorius was worthyly condemned in the synode at Ephesus, so also was Eutiches afterward condemned in the synode of Constantinople and Chalecedon: forasmuch as it is no more lawfull to confound the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunder.

5 But in our age also there hath risen vp no lesse pestilcnt a monfter, Michael Seruettus which did thrust in place of the fonne of God, a fainted thing made of the essence of God, of spirit, fleshe and three elements vncreate. And first he denieth that Christ is by any other way the fonne of God, but in this, that he was begotten of the holy ghost in the wombe of the Virgin. But to this ende tendeth his suttlety, that the distinction of the two natures being once overthrown, Christ might be thought to be a certain thing mingled of God and man, and yet neither God nor man. For in his whole proceffe he travaileth towards this point, that before Christ was openly shewed in the fleshe, there were only certain shadowish figures in God, whereof the truth or effect then at length was in being, when that word which was ordained to that honor, began truly to be the fonne of God. And we in deede do confesse that the Mediator which is borne of the Virgin, is properly the fonne of God. For Christ in that he is man, could not be the mirror of the inestimable favour of God, vnlesse this dignity were giuen him to be, and be called the onely begotten fonne of God. But in the meane season the definition of the Church standeth stedfaftly grounded, that he is compred the fonne of God, because he being the Word begotten of the father before all worldes, did by hyposstaticall union take vpun him the nature of man. Now the hyposstaticall postatical union is called with the olde fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures, which phrase of speach was desuised to ouerthrowe the doring error of Neftorus, because he faid that the sonne of God did so dwell in flesh,that yet he the same was not man. Seruettus flandereth vs, y we make two sonnes of God when we say that the eternal Word was alreadie the sonne of God before that it was clothed with flesh, as if we did say any thing else, but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doeth it follow, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new god. And no more aburdistie it is to say, that the sonne of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this alway from eternall begettling to be the Sonne, which the Angels wordes to Mary do secretly shewe, That holy thing that shall be borne of thee, shall be called the sonne of God: as if he should haue said, that the name of the Sonne which was obscure in time of the lawe, should now be become famous & every where knownen abroad. Wherewith agreeeth y saieing of Paul, that now by Christ we are the children of God, freely & with boldnesse to crie Abba, Father. But were not the holy fathers in the olde time also accompted among the children of God? Yea, & bearing them bold vpon that intereft, they called vpon God by name of their Father. But because since the only begotten sonne of God was brought forth into y world, the heauenly fatherhood is become more plainly knowne: therefore Paul assigneth this, as it were, a praiuledge to the kingdome of Christ. But yet this is stedfastly to be holden, y God neuer was father either to Angels or men, but in respect of the only begotten sonne: and that men specially, whom their own wickednesse maketh hatefull to God, are his children by free adoption because he is the sonne of God by nature. And there is no caufe why Seruettus should cauill, that this hangeth vpon filiation or becoming a sonne, which God had determined w himselue, because our purpose is not here to speake of the figures how the expiation was shewed in the bloud of beasts: but because they could not in deede be the children of God, vnlesse their adoption were grounded vpon the head, it is without reason to take y from the head which is common to all the members. I go yet further: Wher as the Scripture calleth the Angels the sonnes of God, whose so great dignitie did not hang vpon the redemption to come; yet mufte it needs be, that the sonne is in order before them, which maketh the father to be their father. I wil repeat it againe shortly, & adde the same of mankind. Sith from their first beginning both Angels & men were created with this condition, that God should be common father to them both, if that saying of Paul be true, that Christ was alway the head & the first begotten of all creatures, to haue the first degree in all: I think I doe rightly gather that he was also the sonne of God before the creation of the world.

6 But if his filiation (if I may so terme it) began since he was manifested in the flesh, it shal followe, that he was also sonne in respect of his nature of man. Seruettus & other such riantike men would haue it, that Christ which appeared in the flesh, is the sonne of God, because out of the flesh he could not be called by that name. Nowe let them answere mee whether he be the sonne according to both natures, & in respect of both. So in deed they prate, but Paul teacheth farre otherwise. Wee graunt in deede, that Christ is in the flesh of man called the Sonne, but not as the faithfull are, that is by adoption only and grace, but the true and natural, and therefore only Sonne, by this marke he may be discerned from all other. For God vouchfaeth to giue the name of his Sonnes to vs, that are regenerate into a newe life: but the name of the true and only begotten Sonne, he giueth to Christ onely.

How can he be the onely Sonne in so great a number of brethren, but because he pouffeth that by nature, which we haue receiued by gift? And the honor we extend to the whole person of the Mediator, that he be truly & properly the Sonne of God, which was also borne of the Virgine, & offered himselfe for sacrifice to his father upon the croffe: but yet in respect of his Godhead, as Paul teacheth, when he faith, he was feuenter out to preach the Gospel of God, which he had before promised of his Sonne, which was begotten of the seede of Dauid according to his flesh, and declared the Sonne of God in power. But why, when he nameth him distinctly the Sonne of Dauid according to the flesh, should he severally say, that he was declared the Sonne of God, vnlesse he meant to shewe that this did hang vpon some other thing, than vpon the very flesh? For in the same fense in another place he faith, that he suffered by the weakenesse of the flesh, & role againe by the power of the spirite, even so in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. Truely they must needs be graunt, that as he hath that of his mother for which he is called the Sonne of Dauid, so he hath that of his Father for which he is called the Sonne of God: and the same is another thing & severall from the nature of man. The Scripture giueth him two names, calling him here & there sometimes the Sonne of God, & sometimes the Sonne of Man. Of the second there can be no contention moued, but according to the common fse of the Hebrue tongue he is called the Sonne of man, because he is of the offspring of Adam. By the contrary I affirme, that he is called the Sonne of God in respect of the Godhead & eternal essence: because it is no lesse meete that it be referred to the nature of God, that hee is called the Sonne of God, than to the nature of man, that he is called the Sonne of man. Againe, in the same place I alleged, Paul doth meane that he which was according to the flesh begotten of the seede of Dauid, was no otherwise declared the Sonne of God in power, than he teacheth in another place. Christ which according to the flesh descended of Iewes, is God blessed for cuer. Now if in both places distinction of the double nature be touched, by what right wil they say, he which according to the flesh is the Sonne of man, is not also the Sonne of God, in respect of the nature of God.

They do in deed disorderly enforce for the maintenance of their errour, the place where it is said, God spared not his owne Sonne, & where it is declared, that the very same he that should be borne of the Virgine, should be called the Sonne of the highest. But, least they should glory in so fickle an objection, let them wey with vs a little, how strongly they reason. For if it be rightly concluded, from his conception he began to be the Sonne of God, because he is conceived is called the Sonne of God, then shall it follow, that he began to be the word at his manifestation in the flesh, because Joyn faith, that he bringeth them tidings of the Word of life, which his handes have handeled. Likewise that, which is read in the Prophet:

Thou
God the Redeemer.

Thou Bethlehem in the lande of Juda, art a little one in thousandes of Juda: Out of thee shall be borne to me a guide to rule my people Israel, and his comming forth from the beginning, from the days of eternity. How will they be compelled to expounde this, if they will be content to followe such manner of reasoning? For I haue protested, that we do not agree with Nestorius, which imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine, Christ hath made vs the sonnes of God with him, by right of brotherly citoyning, because he is the onely begotten sonne of God in the flesh which he tooke of vs. And Augustine doth wisely admonish vs, that this is a bright glasse, wherein to behold the marueldous and singular favour of God, that he attained honor in respect that he is man which he could not deferve. Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellencie euene according to the flesh from the wombe of his mother, to be the sonne of God. Yet is there not in the vnity of person to be fained such a mixture, as may take away which is proper to the godhead. For it is no more absurdity, that the eternal word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures unitied into one person, be divers wayes called the Sonne of God, than that hee be according to divers respects, called sometime the Sonne of God, and sometime the Sonne of Man. And no more doth that other cauillation of Seruettus accomber vs: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is no where called the Sonne of God, but under a figure, because although the describing of him, then was somewhat darke: yet where as it is already clerely proued that he was no otherwise eternall God, but because he was the worde begotten of the eternal father, and that this name doth no otherwise belong to the person of the Mediatour which he hath taken vpion him, but because he is God openly shewed in the flesh: and that God the Father had not beene called Father from the beginning, if there had not then bin a mutuall relation to the Sonne, by whome all larded or fatherhoode is reckned in heauen and in earth: hereby it is easie to gather, that euene in the time of the lawe and the Prophets, he was the Son of God, before that this name was commonly knowen in the Church. But if they strue only about the onely word, Salomon discoursing of the infinite highnesse of God, affirmeth as well his Sonne as himselfe to be incomprehensible. Tell his name if thou canst (sayth he) or the name of his sonne. Yet I am not ignorant, that with the contentious this testimony will not be of sufficient force: neither do I much ground vpon it, sauing that it sheweth that they doe maliciouly caull, that deny Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in this respect that he was made man. Beside that, all the oldest writers with one mouth and consent have openly testified the name: so that their shamelesnesse is no leffe worthy to be scorned than to be abhorred, which dare obiect Ireneus and Tertullian against vs, both which doe conforme that the Sonne of God was invisible, which afterward appeare visible.

8. But although Seruettus hath heaped vp horrible monftrueus deuises, which paraduenture the other would not allowe: yet if ye preffe them hard, ye shall perceiue that all they that doe not acknowledge Christ to be the Son of God but in the flesh, do grant it only in this respect, that he was conceived in the wombe of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as the Manichiees in olde time did foolishly affirm, that man hath his soule (as it were) by de-riuation from God; because they reade that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take so fast holde of the name of Sonne, that they leave no difference between the natures, but babble disorderly, that Christ being man, is the Sonne of God, because according to his nature of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternall begetting of Wisedom, that Salomon speaketh of, is destroyed, and there is no account made of the Godhead in the Mediator, or a fantasiaed Ghost is thrust in place of the Manhoeode. It were in deede profitable to confute the grosser deceites of Seruettus, wherewith he hath bewitched himselfe and some other, to the ende that the godly readers admonished by this example, may hold themselfes within the compasse of sobremesle and modesty: seeing that I thinke it should be superfluous, because I have already done it in a booke by it self. The summe of them commeth to this effect, that the Sonne of God was a forme in minde from the beginning, and even then hee was before appointed to bee man that should be the essentiaall image of God. And he doth acknowledge no other Word of God, but in outward shew. This he expoundeth to be the begetting of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a will to begette a Sonne, which also in act extended to the nature it selfe. In the meantime he confoundeth the Spirit with the Word, for that God distributed the invisible Word and the Spirit into fleth & soule. Finally the figuration of Christ, hath with them the place of begetting, but he faith, y he which then was but a shadowish Sonne in forme, was at length begotten by the worde, to which he assigneth the office of seed. Whereby it shall followe that hoggess & dogges are as well the children of God, because they were create of the original seede of the worde of God. For although he compound Christ of three vncrete elements to make him begotten of the essence of God, yet he faineth that he is fo the first begotten among creatures, that the same essentiaall godhead is in stones, according to their degree. And left he should seeme to stripple Christ out of his godhead, he affirmeth that his flesh is consubstantial with God, and that the Word was made man by turning the flesh into God. So while he can not conceive Christ to be the Son of God, vnlesse his flesh came from the essence of God, and were turned in to godhead, he bringeth the eternall person of the Worde to nothing, and taketh from vs the Sonne of Davuid, that was promised to be the Redeemer.
He oft repeateth this, that the Sonne was begotten of God by knowledge and predestination, & that at length he was made man of that matter which at the beginning shined with God in the three elementes, which afterward appeared in the first light of the world, in the cloude and in the pillar of fire. Nowe how shamefully he sometime disgreeeth with himselfe, it were too tedious to rehearse. By this short recitall the readers that haue their fourde witte may gather, that with the circumstances of this vnclene dog the hope of saluation is utterly extinguisht. For if the flesh were the godhead itselfe, it shoule cease to be the temple thereof. And none can be our redeemer, but he that begotten of the seede of Abraham and Da-uid, is according to the flesh, truly made man. And he wrongfully standeth upon the wordes of John, that the Worde was made flesh for as they refit
the error of Nestorius, so they nothing further this wicked invention, whereof Eutiches was author, forasmuch as the onely purpose of the Euangelist was to defend the unitie of persons in the two natures.

That we may know, what and Christ was sent of his Father, and what he brought us; three things are principally to be considered in him, his Propheticall office, his kingdoms, and his Priesthood.

A Vgutine faith rightly, that although the Heretikes do bragge of the name of Christ, yet they have not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth onely proper to the Church. For if these things be diligently considered, that belong to Christ, Christ shall be found among them onely in name, and not in very deed. So at this day the Papistes, although the name of the Sonne of God redeemere of the worlde, is founde in their mouth: yet because being contented with vaine pretence of the name, they spoile him of his power and dignitie: this saying of Paul may be well spoken of them, that they have not the head. Therefore, that faith may finde sound matter of saluation in Christ, and so rest in him, this principle is to be stablished, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, consisteth of three partes. For he is gien both a Prophet, a King, & a priest. Albeit, it were but small profite to know those names, without knowledge of the ende and vse of them. For they are also named among the Papistes, but coldly and to no great profite, where it is not known what eche of these titles containeth in it. We have said before, howe, though God sending Prophets by continual course one after another, did never leaue his people destituie of profitable doctrine, and such as was sufficient to saluation; that yet the mindes of the godly had alway this persuasion, that full light of understanding was to be hoped for onely at the comming of Messias: yea and the opinion thereof was come, euen to the Samaritans, who yet never knewe the true religion, as appeareth by the saying of the woman: When Messias commeth, he shall teach vs all things. And the Iewes had not rashly gathered this ypon pretumpions in their minde: But as they were taught by assured oracles, so they beleaued. Notable among the other is that saying of Esay: Beholde, I haue made him a witnesse to peoples, I haue gien him to be a guide and Schoolemaister to peoples: euen as in another place he had called him the Angel or interpreter of the great counsell. After this manner the Apostle commending the perfection of the doctrine of the Gospel, after that he had faide, that God in the old time spake to the Fathers by the Prophets diuerfly, and vnnder manifold figures, addeth that last of all he spake vnto vs by his beloved Sonne. But because it was the common office of the Prophets to kepe the Church in suspense, & to uphold it vntil the comming of the Mediator, therefore we read that in their scattering abroad, the faithful complained that they were depruied of that ordinarie benefite, sayinge: We see not our tokens: there is not a Prophet among vs: there is no more any that hath knowledge. But when Christ was now not farre off, there was a time appointed to Daniel to scale vp the vision and the Prophet, not only that the Prophesie, which is there spoken of should be stablished in assured credit, credit, but also that the faithful should learn with contented minds to want the Prophets for a time, because the fulness and closing up of all revelations was at hand.

2. Now it is to be noted, that the title of commendation of Christ belongeth to these three offices. For we know that in the time of the law, as well the Prophets as Priests and Kings were anointed with holy unction. For which cause the renowned name of Mæssias was given to the promised Mediator. But though in deed I confess, (as I have also declared in another place,) that he was called Messiah by peculiar consideration & respect of his kingdom; yet the annoyings in respect of the office of Prophet & of priest, have their place, and are not to be neglected of vs. Of the first of these two is express mention made in Efay, in these words: The Spirit of the Lorde Jehovah upon me. Therefore the Lord hath anointed me, that I should preach to the meek, should bring health to the contrite in heart, should declare deliverance to captives, should publish the yere of good will, &c. We see ye, he was anointed with the Spirit, to be the publisher and witness of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common manner: for he is secur'd from other teachers, that had the like office. And here again is to be noted, that he took not the anointing for himself alone, that he might execute the office of teaching, but for his whole body, that in his continual preaching of the Gospel, the virtue of the Spirit should ioyne with all. But in the mean time this remaineth certain, by this perfection of doctrine which he hath brought, an ende is made of all prophecies: so that they doe diminish his authoritie, that being not content with the Gospel, doe patch any foraine thing vnto it. For that voice which thundered from heaven, saying: This is my beloved Sonne, heare him: hath anauanced him by singular privilege above the degrees of all other. Then, this unction is poured abroad from the head vnto all the members: as it was forespoken by Joel.

Your children shall prophesie, & your daughters shall see visions, &c. But where Paul saith, that he was given vs vnto wisdom: and in another place, I in him are hidden all the treasures of knowledge & understanding: this hath somewhat another meaning: that is, that out of him there is nothing profitable to know, and that they which by faith perceive what he is, haue comprehended the whole infiniteness of heavenly good things. For which cause he writeth in another place: I haue counted it precious to knowe nothing, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified: which is most true, because it is not lawful to passe beyond the simplicity of the Gospel. And hereunto tendeth the dignitie of a Prophets office in Christ, that we might knowe y in the summe of the doctrine, which he hath taught, are contained at points of perfect wisdome.

3 Now come I to his kingdom, of which were vaine to speake, if ye readers were not first warned, that the nature thereof is spiritual. For thereby is gathered, both to what purpose it fersethe, and what it availeth vs, and y whole force and eretitie thereof, and also the eretitie which in Daniel the Angel doeth attribute to the person of Christ: and againe the Angel in Luke doeth worthily applye to the valuation of the people. But that is also double or of two fortes, for the one belongeth to the whole body of the Church, the other is proper to every member. To the first is to be referred that which is said in the Psalm: I have once sworn by my holiness to David, I will not lie, his seed shall abide for ever, his seed shall be as the Sunne in my right, it shall be established as the Moone for ever, and a faithful witness in heaven. Neither is it doubtful, but that God doth there promise, that he will be by the hande of his sonne an eternal governor and defender of his Church. For the true performance of this prophecy can be found, no where else but in Christ: forasmuch as immediately after the death of Salomon, the greater part of the dignity of the kingdome fell away, & was to the dishonour of the house of David conveyed over to a privie man, and afterwarde by little and little was diminished, till at length it came to utter decay, with heavy & shameful destruction. And the same meaning hath the exclamation of Elias: Who shall shew forth his generation? For he so pronounced that Christ shall remaine alive after death, that he joyneth him with his members. Therefore, so oft as wee heare that Christe is armed with eternal power, let vs remember that the everlastinge continuance of the Church is uphelden by this supporte, to remaine still safe among the troublesome tossings, where with it is continually vexed, and among the grecious and terrible motions that threaten innumerable destructions. So when David scorneth the boldnesse of his enemies, that go about to breake the yoke of God and of Christ, and saith, that the kinges and peoples raged in vaine, because hee that dwelleth in heauen is strong enough to breake their violent assaults: he affirmeth the Godly of the continual preservation of the Church, and encourageth them to hope so oft as it happeneth to be oppressed. So in another place, when he saith in the person of God: sit at my right hande, till I make thine enemies thy footstole: he warneth vs, that how many and strong enemies so euer doe conspire to besiege the Church, yet they haue not strength enough to preval against that unchangeable decree of God, whereby he hath appointed his sonne an eternall king: whereupon it followeth, that it is impossible that the Deuill with all the preparation of the world, may be able at any time to destroye the Church, which is grounded upon the eternall seat of Christ. Now for so much as concerneth the special use of every one, the very same eternal continuance ought to raise vs vp to hope of immortalitie. For we see, that whatsoever is earthly and of the world, endureth but for a time, yea and is very fraile. Therefore Christ, to lift vp our hope vnto heauen, pronounced that his kingdome is not of this world. Finally, when any of vs heareth, that the kingdome of Christ is spiritual, let him be raised vp with this saying, and let him peare to the hope of a better life, and whereas he is now defended by the hande of Christ, let him looke for the full frute of this grace in the world to come.

4 That, as we haue saide, the force and profit of the kingdome of Christ can not otherwise be perceived by vs, but when we knowe it to be spiritually appereareth sufficiently though it were but by this, that while we must liue in warfare under the cross, during the whole course of our life, our estate is harde and miferable: what then should it profit vs to be gathered together under the dominion of a heauenly king, vnlesse we were certaine to enjoy the
the fruite thereof out of the state of this earthly life: And therefore it is to be known, that whatsoever felicity is promised vs in Christ, it consisteth not in outwarde commodities, that we should leade a merry and quiet life; flourish in wealth, be assured from all harmes, and flowe full of those delitethful things that the flesh is wont to desyre: but that it wholly belongeth to the heavenly life. But as in the worlde the prosperous and deضرate state of the people is partly maintayned by plentie of good things and peace at home, and partly by strong forceable defences; whereby it may be safe against outwarde violence: so Christ also doth enrich his with all things necessarie to cernall salvation of soules, and fortieth them with strength; by which they may stande invincibile against all assaults of principal enemies. Whereby we gather, that he reigneth more for vs than for himselfe; and that both within and without: that being furnished, so farre as God knoweth to be expedient for vs, with the gifts of the spirit, whereof we are naturally emptie, we may by these first frutes perceiue, that we are truely joyned to God vnto perfect bleffednes. And then, that bearing vs bolde vpon the power of the same spirit, wee may not doubt, that we shall alway haue the victorie against the Deuill, the world, and euery kinde of hurtfull thing. To this purpose tendeth the answere of Christ to the Pharifes, that because the kingdom of God is within vs, it shall not come with observation. For it is likely that because he professed, that he was the same king, vnder whom the foureaigne blessing of God was to be hoped for, they in feorde required him to shewe forth his signes. But he, because they (who otherwife were too much bent to the earth) shoulde not foolishly rest vpon worldly pompes, biddeth them to enter into their owne conscienes, because the kingdom of God is righteousnes, peace & joy in the holy Ghoft. Hereby we are briefly taught, what the kingdom of Christ anuaileth vs. For, because it is not earthly or fleshly, subject to corruption, but spiritual: he lifteth vs vp euen to eternall life, that we may patientely passe over this life in miseries, hunger, colde, contempe, reproches, and other greces, conteinedd with this one thing, that our king will never leaue vs deftitute, but succour vs in our necessaries, til having ended our warre, we be called to triumph. For such is his maner of reigneing, to communicate with vs al that he hath receiued of his father. Now wheras he armeth and furniseth vs with power, and garniseth vs with beauty and magnificence, enricheth vs with wealth: hereby is ministred vnto vs most plentiful matter to glory vpon, & also bolde courage to fight without feare against the Deuill, saine and death. Finally, that clothed with his righteousnesse, we may valiantly overcome all the reproches of the world, and as he liberally filleth vs with his gifts, so we againe for our part, may bring forth fruite to his glorie.

Therefore his kingly anointing is set forth vnto vs, not done with oile or ointmentes made with spices, but he is called the anointed of God, because vpon him hath refted the spirit of wisedome, understanding, counsel, strength and feare of God. This is the oyle of gladnesse, wherewith the Psalmist reporteth that he was anointed above his fellowes, because if there were not such excellencie in him, we should be all needy & hungry. For, as it is already saide, he is not priviately enriched for him selfe, but to pourre his plentie plenty upon vs being hungry and dry. For as it is saide, that the father gave the spirit to his sonne, not by measure, so there is expressed a reason why, John. 1,16, that all we should receive of his fulnesse, and grace for grace. Out of which fountaine floweth that liberall giving, whereof Paul maketh mention, where-Eph. 4,7. by grace is duly distributed to the faithfull, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Hereby is that which I saide, sufficiently confirmed, that the kingdom of Christ consisteth in the spirit, not in earthly delights or pompes, and therefore we must forsake the worlde that we may be partakers of it.
A visible signe of this holy anointing was shewed in the baptism of Christ, when the holy Ghost rested upon him in the likeness of a dove. That the holy Ghost and his gifts are meant by the word Anointing, ought to seeme neither newelie nor absurditie. For we are none other waye, quickned, specially for so much as concerneth the heavenly life; there is no dropp of lively force in vs, but that which the holy Ghost poureth into vs, which hath chosen his seat in Christ, that from thence the heavenly riches might largely flowe out vnto vs, whereof wee are so needy. And whereas both the faithfull stande incensiblle by the strength of their king, and also his spiritual richesse plentifully flowe out vnto them, they are not unworthily called Christians. But this eternitie whereof we have spokne, is nothing derogate by that saying of Paul: Then he shall yelde vp the kingdom to God and the Father. Again: The sonne him selue shall be made subject, that God may be all in all things: for his meaning is nothing els, but that in that same perfect glorie, the administration of the kingdom shall not be such as it is nowe. For the father hath given al power to the sonne, that by the sonnes hande he may gouerne, cherish and sustaine vs, defend vs vnder his fauegarde, and helpe vs. So while for a little time we are waucring abroad from God, Christ is the meane betweene God and vs, by little and little to bring vs to perfect conioyning with God. And truly, whereas he sitteth on the right hande of the Father, that is as much in effect, as if he were called the fathers deputie, vnder whom is the whole power of his dominion, because it is Gods will to rule and defende his Church by a meane(as I may so call it) in the person of his Sonne. As also Paul doth expounde it in the first chapter to the Ephesians, that he was set at the right hande of the father, to be the head of the Church, which is his body. And to noe other meaning tendeth that which he teacheth in an other place, that there is gi-gen him a name above all names, that in the name of Jesus all knees should bow, and all tongues confesse that it is to the glorie of GOD the Father.
For euens in the same worde also he setteth out in the kingdom of Christ an order necessarie for our present weakehesse. So Paul gathereth rightly, that God shall then be by himselfe the only head of the Church, because Christes office in defending of the Church, shall be fulfilled. For the same reaion the Scripture commonly calleth him Lorde, because his Father did sett him ouer vs to this ende, to exercise his owne Lordely power by him. For though there be many lordehippes in the worlde, yet is there to vs but one God the Father, of whom are al things and we in him, and one Lorde Christ, by whom are al things and we by him saith Paul.
Whereupon is rightly gathered that he is the selue same GOD, which by

the mouth of Esay affirmed himselfe to be the king and the lawe maker of the Church. For though he do every where call all the power that he hath, the benefit and gift of the Father, yet he meaneth nothing else, but that he reigneth by power of God: because he hath therefore put on the personage of the Mediator, that descending from the bosome & incomprehensible glory of the father, he might approach nie vnto vs. And so much more rightfull it is, that we be with all consent prepared to obey, & that with great cheerefulness we direct our obedience to his commandement. For as he isoythen the offices of king and pastor toward them that willingly yeeld their obedient: so on the other side we heare that he beareth any ron scepter, to breake and brooue all the obstinate like potters vessels: wee heare also that he shalbe the judge of nations, to cover the earth with dead corpces, and to overthrowe the height that standeth against him. Of which thing there are some examples scene at this day: but the full proufe thereof shalbe at the laft judgement, which may also properly be accounted the last act of his kingdome.

Concerning his Priesthood, thus it is briefly to be holden, that the end and vfe of it is, that he should be a Mediator pure from all spotte, that should by his holinesse reconcile vs to God. But because the just curfe posseth the entry, and God according to his office of judge is bent against vs: it is necessarie that some expiation be vsed, that he being a priest may procure fauour for vs, to appease the wrath of God. Wherefore, that Christ might fulfill this office, it behoved that he should come forth with a sacrifice. For in the lawe it was not lawfull for the priest to enter into the sanctuarie without blood, that the faithfull might knowe, that though there were a priest become means for vs to make intercession, yet God could not be made fauourable to vs before that our sinnes were purged. Upon which point the Apostle discourse largely in the epistle to the Hebrues, from the seveneth chapter almost to the ende of the tenth. But the summe of all commeth to this effect, that the honour of priesthooe can be applied to none but to Christ, which by the sacrifice of his death hath wiped away our giltines, and satisfied for our sinnes. But how weightie a matter it is, we are enformed by that solemn oath of God, which was spoken without repentance: Thou art a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedech. For without doubt his will was to establish that principall point, which he knewe to be the chiefie ioynync whereupon our saluation hanged. For, as it is sayde, there is no way open for vs or for our prayers to God, vnlesse our filthinesse being purged, the priests doe sanctifie vs and obtain grace for vs, from which the uncleannesse of our wicked doinges and sinnes doth debarre vs. So doe we see, that we must beginne at the death of Christ, that the efficacie and profitte of his Priesthooe may come vnto vs. Of this it followeth that he is an eternal intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine fauour, whereupon againe ariseth not onely affiance to pray, but also quietnesse to godlye conferences, while they safely leane vpon the fatherly tendernes of God, and are certainly perswaded that it pleareth him, whatsoever is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the lawe, God commanded sacrifices of beasts to be offered to him: there was an other and an new order in

God the Redeemer.
Lib. 2. 161

Christ, that one should be both the sacrificed host, and the priest: because there neither could be found any other satisfaction for finnes, nor any was worthie so great honour to offer vp to God his openly begotten sonne. Nowe Christ beareth the person of a Priest, not onely by eternall meanes of reconciliation to make the Father favorable and mercci full vnto vs, but also to bring vs into the fellowship of so great an honour. For wee that are deare in our selves, yet being made Priests in him doe offer vp our selves, & all ours to God, and doe freely enter into the heavenely sanctuarie, that all the sacrific of prayer and praise that come from vs, may bee acceptable and sweete smelling in the sight of God. And thus farre doeth that laying of Christ extende: For their sakes I sanctifie my selfe: because, having his holinesse powerd vpon vs, in as much as hee hath offered vs with himselfe to his father, we that otherwise doe stinke before him, doe please him as pure & cleane, yea & holy. Hereunto serue the the anointing of the sanctuarie, whereof mention is made in Daniel. For the coparison of contrarietie is to be noted betwene this anointing, and that shadowis anointing that then was in vse: as if the Angell shouled haue saide, that the shadowes being driven away, there should bee a cleere priesthood in the person of Christ. And so much more detestable is their invention, which not contented with the sacrific of Christ, haue presumed to thirst in themselves to kill him: which is dayly interpried among the Papistes, where the Maffe is reckned a sacrificing of Christ.

The xvj. Chapter.
How Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase salvation for vs, Wherein is intreated of his death, and Resurrection, and his Ascending into Heauen.

All that we haue hether to saide of Christ, is to be directed to this marke, that being damned, dead, and lost in our selves, wee may seeke for righteousnes, deliverance, life and saluation in him; as we be taught by that notable sayeing of Peter, that there is none other name vnder heauen giuen to men wherein they must be saue. Neither was the name of Iesus giuen him vnaduisedly, or at chaunceful adventure, or by the will of men, but brought from heauen by the Angel the publisher of Gods decree, and with a reason also assigned: because he was sent to saue the people from their sins. In which words is to be noted, which we haue touched in another place, the office of redeemer was appointed him, he should be our Saviour: but in the mean time our redemption should be but vnperfect, ynes he shoulde by continual proceedings conteyn vs forward to vs termost marke of saluation. Therefore, soone as we swarre nner so little from him, our saluation by little & little vanishe away, which wholly resteth in him: so all they wilfully spoile the felicities of all grace, y rest not in him. And a admonition of Bernard is worthie to be rehearsed, that the name of Iesus is not only light, but also meate, yea & oile also, without which all the meate of soule is drye, and that it is also felt, without the seasoning whereof all that is set before vs is vnfauorite. Finally, that it is honye in the mouth, melodie in the ear and.
and joyfulnesse in the heart, and also medicine, and that whatsoever is spoken in disputations is vnfavorie, but where this name soundeth. But here it behoeth us to vs diligently, to let them understand, that wee may not onely bee perswaded, that he is the author of it, but also embraceth such things as are sufficient to the steadfast upholding of our faith, wee may refuse all such things as might drawe vs away hither or thither. For sith no man can descende into himselfe, and earnestly consider what he is, but feeling God angrie and bent against him, he hath neede carefully to seeke a meane and way to appease him, which dementiaueth satisfaction: there is no common assurednesse required, because the wrath and curse of God lyeth alwaye vpon sinners, till they bee loose from their guiltinesse: who, as hee is a righteous judge, suffereth not his lawe to be broken without punishment, but is ready armed to reuenge it.

2. But before we goe any further, it is to be seen by the way, how it agreeth together, that God which preventeth vs with his mercie, was our enemie vntill he was reconciled to vs by Christ. For howe coulde he haue giuen vs in his onely begotten Sonne a singular pledge of his loue, vnlesse hee had alreadie before that embraced vs with his free fauour? Because therefore here ariseth some seeming of contrarietie, I will first vsue this knotte. The holy Ghost commonly speaketh after this manner in the scriptures, that God was enimic to men, till they were restored into fauour by the death of Christ: that they were accused all their iniquitie was purged by his sacrifice: that they were freed from God, till they were received into a conyoyning by his bodie. Such manner of phrases are applied to our capacitie, that wee may the better understand howe miserable and wretched our estate is being out of Christ. For if it were not spoken in express wordes, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and everlastinge death did rest vpon vs, wee woulde lesse acknowledge howe miserable wee should bee without Gods mercie, and woulde lesse regard the benefite of deliverance. As for example, If a man heare this spoken to him: If God at suche time as thou waft yet a sinner, had hated thee, and cast thee away as thou hadst deserved, thou shouldst haue suffered horrible destruction: but because hee hath willingly and of his owne free kindnesse kept thee in fauour, and not suffred thee to bee estranged from him, hee hath so deliuered thee from that perill: truely he will bee moued with, and in some parte feel howe much hee oweth to the mercie of God. But if hee heare on the other side that which the Scripture teacheth, that hee was by sinne estranged from God, the heir of wrath, subject to the curse of eternall death, excluded from all hope of salutation, a stranger from all blessing of God, the bondlaue of Satan, captive vnder the yoke of sinne: Finally, ordeyned vnto and alreadie entangled with horrible destruction, that in this case Christ became an intercessor to entreate for him, that Christ tooke vpon him and suffred the punishment which by the just judgement of God did hang ouer all sinners, that hee hath purged with his bloode those evills that made them hatefull to God, that by this expiation is sufficient satisfaction and sacrifice made to God the father, that by this intercessor his wrath was appeased: that within this foundation refleth the peace betwenee God and men: men: that vpon this bonde is conteined his good will towarde them: shall not he be so much the more moved with thefe, as it is more liuely represented, out of howe great miserie hee hath beeene deliueter? In a summe: because our minde can neither defirously enough take hold of life in the mercie of God, nor receive it with such thankfulnesse as we ought, but when it is before striken and throwne downe with the feare of the wrath of God and dread of eternall death, we are fo taught by holy scripture, that without Christ wee may see God in manner wrathfully bent against vs, and his hand armed to our destruction: and that wee may inbrace his good will and fatherly kindnes no otherwhere, but in Christ.

3 And although this be spoken according to the weakenesse of our capacity, yet it is not falsely faide. For God which is the highest righteous-nesse, can not loue wickednesse which hee seeth in vs all. Therefore we all haue in vs that, which is worthie of the hatred of GOD. Therefore in respect of our corrupted nature, and then of euill life added vnto it, truly we are all in displeasure of God, guiltie in his sight, and borne to damnation of hell. But because the Lorde will not loose that which is his in vs, hee fin-deth yet somewhat that he of his goodnesse may loue: For howsoever we bee sinners by our owne fault, yet wee remayne his creatures. Howsoever wee have pur_chased death to our felues, yet hee made vs vnto life. So is hee moued by meere and free louing of vs, to receive vs into fauour. But fifh there is a perpetuall and vnappeasable difagreemenc betweene righteous-nesse and iniquitie, so long as wee remaine sinners, hee cannot receive vs wholeie. Therefore, that taking away all matter of difagreement, he might wholy reconcile vs vnto him, hee doeth by expiation set forth in the death of Christ, take away whatsoeuer cuill is in vs, that we, which before were uncleanse and vnpuire, may nowe appeare righteous and holy in his sight. Therefore God the Father doeth with his loue preuent and goe before our reconciliation in Christ, yea, because hee first loued vs, therefore he afterwarde doeth reconcile vs vnto himselfe. But because, vntill Christ with his death come to fuccour vs, there remaineth wickednes in vs,which deferueth Gods indignation, and is accursed and damned in his sight,therefore we are not fully and firmly ioyned to God, vntill Christ doe ioyn vs.
Therefore if we will affirme our foules to haue God made well pleased and favourable vnto vs, wee must faften our eyes and mindes vpon Christ one-ly: as in deed we obreine by him onely, that our sinnes bee not imputed to vs, the imputing whereof, draweth with it the wrath of God.

4 And for this reason Paul faith, that the same loue, wherewith GOD imbraced vs before the creation of the world, was stayed and grounded von Christ. These thinges are plaide and agreeable with the scripture, and doe make those places of Scripture to accorde verie well together, where it is faid: that God declared his loue towarde vs in this, that hee gaue his only begotten sonne to death: and yet that hee was our enemie till he was made favourabe againe to vs by the death of Christ. But that they may be more strongly proued to them that require the testament of the old Church I will alleadge one place of Augustine, where hee teacheth the verie same that wee doe. The loue of God (faith he) is incomprehenable and vnchan-is alleged by the Evangelist. He was accounted among the wicked. And why so? even to take upon him the stead of a sinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, because he suffered death not for cause of innocencie, but for sinne. On the other side when we hear that he was acquitted by the same mouth whereby he was condemned, for Pilate was compelled openly more than once to beare witness of his innocencie: let that come in our minde which is in the other Prophet: y he repayed that which he had not taken away. And so wee shall beholde the person of a sinner and euill doer represented in Christ: and by the open appearance of his innocencie it shall become plaine to see, that he was charged rather with other offence than his owne. Hee suffered therefore vnder Ponce Pilate, and so by the solemn sentence of the President, was reckned in y number of wicked doers: but yet not so, but y he was by the same judge at the same time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he founde no cause of condemnation in him. This is our acquittal, that the guiltinesse which made vs subject to punishment, is remoued vpon the heade of the sonne of God. For this setting of one against the other, wee ought principally to holde fast, least wee tremble and bee careful full all our life long, as though the iust vengeance of God did hang ouer vs, which the sonne of God hath taken vpon himselfe.

6 Beside that, the verie manner of his death is not without a singular mysterie. The Croffe was accursed, not onely by opinion of men, but also by decree of the lawe of God. Therefore when Christ was lifted vp to the Crosse, hee made himselfe subject to the curse. And so it behooved to bee done, that when the curse was remoued from vs to him, we might be delivered from all curse: for our sins was prepared for vs, or rather did already rest vpon vs. Which thing was also by shadowe expressed in the law. For the sacrifices and satisfactorie oblations that were offered for sinnes, were called Aschemoth. Which worde properly signifieth sinne itselfe, By which figuratine change of name, the holy Ghost meant to shew, that they were like vnto cleansing playters to draw out to themselues, and beare the curse due to sinne. But that same which was figuratively represented in the sacrifices of Mofes, is indeede deliuered in Christ the originall paterne of all the figures. Wherefore he, to perfome a perfect expiation, gaue his owene soule to be an afoam, that is a satisfactorie oblation as the Prophet calleth it, vpon the which our filth and punishment might be cast, and so ceafe to bee imputed to vs. The Apostle testifieth the same thing more plainly, where he teacheth, that he which knewe no sinne, was by his father made sinne for vs, that wee might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. For the son of God being most cleane from all fault, did yet put vpon him the reproch and shame of our iniquities, and on the other side covered vs with his cleanesse. It semeth that he meant the same when he speaketh of sinne, that sinne was condemned in his flesh. For the Father destroyed the force of sinne, when the curse thereof was remoued and laide vpon the flesh of Christ. It is therefore declared by this saying, that Christ was in his death offered vpon to his Father for a satisfactorie sacrifices; that the whole satisfaction for sinne being ended by this sacrifice, wee might cease to dread the the wrath of God. Now is it plain, what that saying of the Prophet meaneth, that the iniquities of all were laid upon him, that is, that he enten ding to wipe away the filthinesse of our iniquities, was himselfe as it were by way of enterechanged imputation, covered with them. Of this, the crosse whereunto he was fastened was a token, as the Apostle testifieth. Christ (faith he) redeemed vs from the curse of the law, when he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Accursed is every one that hangeth on the tree: that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had Peter respect unto, where he teacheth that Christ did beare our sinnes vpon the tree. Because by the very token of the crosse wee doe more plainly learne that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was laid vpon him. And yet it is not so to be vnderstond, that he tooke vpon him such a curse, wherewith himselfe was ouerloden, but rather that in taking it vpon him, he did treade downe, breake and destroy the whole force of it. And so faith conceiueth acquittal in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paul doeth not without a cause honourably report the triumph that Christ obtained to himselfe on the crosse, as if the crosse which was full of shame, had beene turned into a Chariot of triumph. For he sayth, that the hand writing which was against us, was fastened to the crosse, and the Princely powers were spoyled and led openly. And no maruell: because (as the other Apostle testifieth) Christ offered vp himselfe by the eternal spirite. And thereupon proceeded that turning of the nature of things. But that these things may take stedfast roote, and be throughly settled in our heartes, let vs alway thinke vpon his sacrifice and washing. For wee could not certainly beleue that Christ was the ranfome, redemption, and satisfaction, vnlesse he had beene a sacrificed hoste. And therfore there is so often mention made of bloud, where the Scripture sheweth the maner of our redeeming. Albeit the bloud of Christ that was shed, serued not onely for sacrifice, but also in steede of washing, to cleanse away our filthiness.

7 It followeth in the Creede, that he was dead and buried. Where again it is to be seene, howe he did euery where put himselfe in our steede, to paye the price of our redemption. Death hold vs bounde vnder his yoke, Christ in our steede did yeld himselfe into the power of death, to deliver vs from it. This the Apostle meaneth where he writeth that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to passe that we should not die, or (which is all one) by his death he did redeeme life for vs. But in this he differed fro vs, that he gave himselfe to death, as it were to be duouered, not that he should be swallowed vp with the gullifes of it, but rather that he should swallowe vp it, of which we should have been presently swallowed: that he gave himselfe to death to be subdued, not that he should be oppresed with y power thereof, but rather that he shoulde ouerthrowe death which approched neere vs, yea, and had alreadie beaten vs down and triumphed vpon vs. Finally, that by death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Diuel: and might deliver them that by feare of death were all their life long subject to bondage. This is the first fruite that his death did bring vs. An other is, that by enterpartening of himselfe with vs, he morttitheth our earthly members, that they should no more hereafter vs their owne worke: and killeth our olde man, that it should no more liue & beare fruit. And to the same purpose pertineth his burial, that wee being partakers thereof, should also be buried to sinne. For when the Apostle teache that newe are grafted into the likenesse of the death of Christ, and buried with him to the death of sinne, that by his cross the worlde was crucified to vs, and wee to the worlde, that wee are dead together with him, he doth not onely exhort vs to express the example of Christes death, but hee declareth that there is such effectuallnesse in it, as ought to appeare in all Christians, vnlesse they will make his death unprofitable and fruitlesse. Therefore in the death and burial of Christ, there is offered vs a double benefite to bee enjoyed, that is deliverance from death, whereunto wee were become bonde, and the mortifying of our flesh.

8 But it is not meete to overpashe his going down to the helles, wherein is no small importance to the effect of redemption. For although it appeared by the writings of the olde fathers, that that parte which is read in the Creed was not in olde time so much vset in the Churches: yet in treating of the summe of our doctrine, it is necessarie that it have a place allowed it, as a thing that conteneth a verie profitable and not to be despisie mysterie of a right weightie matter. And there are also some of the olde writers that do not leave it out. Whereby wee may gesse, that it was after a certaine time added, and did not presently but by little & little growe in vs in the Churches. But this certainly is out of question, that it proceeded of the common judgement of all the godly: For as much as there is none of the Fathers that doeth not in his writings make mention of Christes going downe to the helles, although after diuerse maner of exposition. But by whome, or at what time it was first added, maketh little to the purpose. But rather in the Creede this is to be taken heed vnto, that we there in certainly haue a full and in all pointes perfect summe of our faith, whereinto nothing may be thront, but that which is taken out of the more pure worde of God. Nowe, if any will not for precise curiosities admit it into the Creede, yet shall it streight way be made to appeare plainly, that it is of so great importance to the summe of our redemption, that if it be left out, there is lost a great parte of the fruit of the death of Christ. There are againe fome that thinke, that there is none newe thing spoken in this article, but that in other worde the same thing is repeated which was spoken before of his burial: for as much as the worde Infranum, hell, is in the Scripture oftimes vset for the graue. I grant that to be true which they allege of the signification of the worde, that Hell is oftentimes taken for the graue; but there are against their opinion two reasons, by which I am easily perswaded to dissent from them. For what an idlenesse were it, when a thing not harde to understand, hath once beene set out in plaine & easie worde, afterwarde with darker implication of worde, rather to point towarde it than to declare it. For when two maners of speaking that express one thing be joyned together, it behoveth that the later be an exposition of the former. But what an exposition were this, if a man should say say thus: Whereas it is sayd that Christ was buried, thereby is meant that he went downe to hell: Againe, it is not likely that such a superfluous vaine repetition could haue crept into this abridgement, wherein the chiefe points of our faith are summarily noted in as fewe wordes as was possible. And I doubt not that so many as shall haue somewhat diligently yewed the matter it selve, will easilie agree with me.

9 Some expound it otherwize, and say that Christes went downe to the soules of the fathers that died in the time of the lawe, to carry them tidings, that the redemption was performed, and to deliuer them out of the prison wherein they were kept enclosed: & to the proowe hereof they do wrongfully draw testimonies out of the Psalme, that he brake the brauen gates and yron barres. Againe out of Zacharie, that he redeemed them that were bounde, out of the pit wherein was no water. But whereas the Psalme speaketh of their deluriances that in far countries are cast captiue into boundes, and Zacharie compareth the Babylonicall ouerthrowe, wherein the people was oppressed, to a dry pit or bottomlesse death, and therwithal teacheth that the salvation of the whole Church is as it were a comming out of the deepe helles. I wot not how it is come to passe, that they which came after, thought that there was a certaine place under the earth wherunto they haue faine the name of Limbus. But this fable, although they were great authours, and at this day many doe earnestly defende it for a trueth: is yet nothing els but a fable. For, to enclose the soules of dead men as in a prison, is very childish. And what neede was it that Christes soule shoulde goe downe thither to set them at libertie? I doe in deede willingly confesse, that Christ shined to them by the power of his spirit, that they might know that the grace which they had onely tasted of by hope, was then deliuered to the worlde. And to this purpose may the place of Peter be probably applied, where he sayth, that Christ came and preached to the spirites that were in a dungeon or prison, as it is commonly translated. For the very proceffe of the text leadeth vs to this, that the faithfull which were dead before that time, were partakers of the same grace: we were: because he doth thereby amplifie the force of Christes death, for that it pærced euen to the dead, when the godly soules enjoyed present sight of that visitation which they had carefully looked for: on the other side it did more plainly appeare to the reprobate that they were excluded from all salvation. But whereas Peter in his sayinge maketh no distinction between them, that is not so to be taken, as though he mingled together the godly and vngodly without difference: but only he meant to teach that generally they both had one common feeling of the death of Christ.

10 But concerning Christes going downe to the helles, beside the consideration of the Crede, we must secke for a more certaine exposition, and we assuredly haue such a one out of the word of God, as it not onely holy and godly, but also full of singular comfort. Christes death had bin to no effect, if he had suffred onely a corporall death: but it behoved also that he should feel the rigor of Gods vengeance: that he might both appease his wrath, and satisfie his just judgement. For which cause also it behoved that he should as it were hande to hande wrastle with the armies of the helles and the horror of eternal death. We have even now alleged out of the Prophet that the chastisement of our peace was layde vpon him: that he was striken of his father for our sinnes, and broufed for our in infirmities. Whereby is meant, that he was put in the stead of wicked doers, as surety and pledge, yea & as the very guilty person himself, to abide and suffer all the punishments that should have beene layde vpon them: this one thing excepted, that he could not be helden still of the forrowes of death. Therefore it is no marueile if it be said that he wente downe to the hels, for he suffered that death wherewith God in his wrath striketh wicked doers. And their exception is very fond, yea & to be scorned, which say, that by this exposition the order is perverted, because it were an absurdity to set y after his burial which went before it. For after the setting forth of those things that Christ suffered in the sight of men, in very good order followeth that invisible and incomprehensible judgment which he suffered in the sight of God: that we should knowe that not only the body of Christ was giuen to be the price of our redemption, but that there was an other greater and more excellent price payed in this, that in his soule he suffered the terrible tormentes of a damned and forsaken man.

According to this meaning doth Peter say, that Christ rose againe hating loosed the forowes of death, of which it was impossible that he should be holpen, or overcome. He doth not name it simply death: but he expreseth that the sonne of God was wrapped in the forowes of death, which proceed from the curse and wrath of God, which is the originall of death. For howe small a matter had it bin, carelessly and as it were, in sorte to come forth to suffer death? But this was a true proufe of his infinite mercy, not to shun that death which he so fore trembled at. And it is no doubt that the same is the Apostles meaning to teach, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where he wryteth: that Christ was hearde of his owne Feare: some translate it Reuerence or piety, but how vnfitly, both the matter it selfe, and the very maner of speaking prooueth. Christ therefore praying with teares & mighty criе, is heard of his owne feare: not to be free from death, but not to be swallowed vp of death as a sinner: because in that place hee had but our person vpon him. And truely there can be imagined no more dreadfull bottomlesse depth, than for a man to feele himselfe forsaken and estranged from God, and not to be heard when he calleth vpon him, even as if God himselfe had conspired to his destruction. Even thither we see that Christ was throwne downe, so farre y by enforcement of distresse he was compelled to cry out: My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? For whereas some would have it taken, that he so spake rather according to the opinion of other, than as he felt in himselfe: that is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is evident, that this saying proceeded out of the very anguish of the bottom of his heart. Yet doe we not meane thereby, that God was at any time his enemy or angry with him. For howe could he be angry with his beloued Son, vpon who his mind refted? Or how could Christ by his intercession appeale his fathers wrath toward other, hauing him hatefully bent against himselfe? But this is our meaning: y he suffered the greuous hell of Gods rigour, for y he being striken & tormented with the hand of God, did feele all the tokens of God when he is angry & punisheath. Whereupon Aylary argueth thus, that by this going downe we have obtained this, that death is slaine. And in other places he agreeeth with our judgement, as where he saith: The croffe, death, & hells are our life. Againe, in another place: The sonne of god is in the hells, but man is caried vp to heauen. But why do I alledge the testimonie of a private man, when the Apostle affirmeth the same, rehearsing this for a fruit of his victorie, that they were delivered which were by feare of death all their life long subiect to bondage? It behoved therefore, that he shal overlook that feare, that naturally doeth continually torment & oppresse all mortall men: which could not be done but by fighting with it. Moreover, that his feare was no common feare or conceiued upon a slender cause, shal by and by more plainly appeare. So by fighting hand to hand with the power of the diuel, with the horror of death with the paines of the hells, it came to passe, that he both had the victorie of them, and triumphed over them, that we now in death should no more feare those thinges, which our Prince hath swallowed vp.

12. Here some lead men, although unlearned, yet rather moued by malice than by ignorance, erie out that I do a hainous wrong to Christ, because it was against commonconueniencie of reason, that he should be fearefull for the saluation of his soule. And then they more hardly enforce this cauallation, saying, that I ascribe to the sonne of God desperacion, which is contrary to faith. First they do but maliciously move controverseie of Christs feare and trembling, which the Evangelists do so plainly report. For a little before that the time of his death approached, he was troubled in spirit & passioneth with heavinesse, and at his very meeting with it, he began more vehemently to tremble for feare. If they say that he did but counterfeit, that is too soule a shift. We must therefore as Ambrofe truely teacheth, boldly confess the sorrowfulnesse of Christ, vnlesse wee be ashamed of his croffe. And truely, if his soule had not bene partaker of paine, he had bene only a redeemer for bodies. But it behooved that he should wraffe, to raise vp them that laye thrown down. And his heavenly glory is so nothing appaired therby, that eu'n herein gloriously shineth his goodnesse which is neuer sufficiently praised, that he refused not to take our weaknesse vp pon him. From whence is also that comfort of our anguishe and sorrowes, which the Apostle set-eth before vs: that this Mediatour did feel our infirmities, that he might be the more earnestly bent to succour vs in misery. They say: that that thing which is evil of it selfe, is vnworthily ascribed vnto Christ. As though they were wiser than the spirite of God, which ioyneth these two thinges together, that Christ was in all things temptes as we are, and yet that hee was without sinne. Therefore there is no cause that the weakenes of Christ should make vs afraide, or whereunto he was not by violence or necellitie compelled, but by meere loue of vs, and by mercy was led to submit himselfe. And whatsoever he of his owne will suffered for vs, diminisheth nothing of his power. But in this one point are these backebites deceived, that they do not perceiue in Christ an infirmite cleane and free from all fault and spot, because he kept himselfe within the bounds of obedience. For whereas there can be found no moderation in our corrupt nature, Heb.4.15. where where all our affections do with troublesome violence exceed all measure, they do wrong to measure the forme of God by that standard. But when man was in his uncorrupted state, then there was a moderation having force in all his affections, to restrain and moderate. Whereby it might well be that he was like unto vs in sorrow, dread, and fearfulness, and yet that by this mark he differed from us. Being so confounded, they leap to another caualation, that though Christ feared death, yet he feared not the curse & wrath of God fro which he knew himself to be safe. But let the godly readers yehe how honorable this is for Christ, that he was so tender and more fearfull than the most part of the very rascall sort of men. Theeues & other evil doers do obstinately hast to death, many do with hautie courage despise it: some other do mildly suffer it. But what constancie or stout courage were it, for the sonne of God to be astonished and in a manner stricken dead with fear of it? For even that which among the common sort might be accounted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehementie of griefe, very drops of blood did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a thewe to the eyes of others, but when in a secret corner whither he was gone out of company, he groaned vnto his father. And this putteth it out of all doubt, that it was needeful that he should have Angels to come downe from heauen to relieve him with an unvntioned maner of comforting. How shameful a tendervnes, as I said, should this haue bene, to be so farre tormented for fear of common death, as to melt in bloudie sweate, & not to be able to be comforted, but by sight of Angels? What? doth not that prayer thrice repeated, (Fa- ther, if it be possible, let this cup depart from me:) proceeding from an incredible bitterness of heart, shew that Christ had a more cruel & harder battle than with common death? Wherby appeareth that those triflers against whom I now dispute, do boldly babble upon things that they knowe not, because they never earnestly considered what it is, or of howe great importance it is that we be redeemed from the judgement of God. But this is our wisdom, well to understand how deere our saluation did cost the sonne of God. Now if a man shoule ask me, if Christ went then down to hel, when he prayed to escape that death? I answeare, that then was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered, how grievous & terrible tormentes hee suf- fered, when he knew himselfe to stand to be arraigned for our cause before the judgement seat of God. But although for a moment of time, the divine power of the spirit did hide it selfe, to give place to the weakness of the flesh: yet must we know, the temptation by feeling of sorrow & fear was such as was not against faith. And so was that fulfilled, which is in the Sermon of Peter, he could not be holden of the sorowes of death, because when he felt himselfe as it were forsaken of God, yet he did nothing at all swarue from the trust of his goodnesse. Which is proued by that notable calling vp to God, when for extremity of paine he cried out, My God, my God, why haft thou forsaken me? For though he was above measure grieved, yet he called not to call him his God, of whom he crieth out that he was forsaken. Moreover hereby is confused as well the error of Apollinaris, as thereis were called Monethelites. Apollinaris faine that Christ had an eternall spiritue in stead of a soule, so that he was only but halfe a man. As though he could cleasfe cleanse our sinnes any other way, but by obeying his father. But where is affection or will of obedience but in the soule? which soule of his we knowe was troubled for this purpose, to drive away feare, & bring peace & quietnes to our soule. Againe, for confusion of the Monothelites, we see how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhood, which he willed according to his nature of godhead. I omit to speake how he did subdue the aforesaid feare with a contrary affection. For herein is a plane shewe of contrarieties. Father deliuer me from this houre. But euentherefore I came euene into this houre. Father glorifie thy name. In which perplexitie yet was there no such outrage in him as is scene in vs, euene then when we moft of all endeauour to subdue our felues.

13 Nowe followeth his resurrection from the dead, without which all that wee haue hitheerto, were but vnpertect. For sith there appeareth in the croffe, death, and burial of Christ nothing but weakenesse: faith must passe beyond all those thinges, that it may be furnished with full strength. Therefore although wee haue in his death a full accomplishment of saluation, because by it both wee are reconciled to God, and his iust judgement is satisfied, and the curse taken away, and the penalty fully payde: yet wee are faide to be regenerate into a living hope, not by his death, but by his rising again. For as he in rising againe rofe vp the vanquisher of death, so the victorie of our faith consisteth in the very resurrection: but how this is, is better exprest in the wordes of Paul. For he sayeth, that Christ died for our sinnes, and was raised vp againe for our iustification: as if he should haue faide: that by his death sinne was taken away, and by his rising again, righteousnesse was renewed and restored. For how could he by dying deliuer vs from death, if he himselfe had lyen still overcome by death? How could he haue gotten victorie for vs, if himselfe had beene vanquished in fight? wherefore wee do so parte the matter of our saluation betweene the death and resurrection of Christ, that by his death wee lay sinne was taken away and death destroyed, and by his resurrection righteousness was repaired, and life raised vp againe: but so that by meanes of his resurrection, his death doeth shewe foorth her force and effect vnto vs. Therefore Paul affirmeth, that in his very resurrection he was declared the sonne of God, because then at last he vterred his heavently power, which is both a clear glasse of his godhead, and a steadfast stay of our faith. As also in another place he teacheth, that Christ suffered after the weakenesse of the flesh, and rofe againe by the power of the spirit. And in the same meaning in another, where he entreateth of perfection, he sayeth: that I may knowe him and the power of his resurrection. Yet by and by after he adioyneth the fellowship with death. Wherewith most aptly agreeth that saying of Peter: that God raised him vp from the dead and gaue him glorie, that our faith and hope might be in God: not that our faith being vpholden by his death shoulde watter, but that the power of God which kepeth vs vnder faith, doth principially shew it selfe in the resurrection. Therefore let vs remember, that so oft as mention is made of his death only, there is also comprehended that which properly belongeth to his resurrection: and like figure of comprehension is there in the word Resurrection, as oft as it is vfed. feuerally without speaking of his death, so that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertaineth to his death. But forasmuch as by rising againe he obtained the crowne of conquest, so that there should be both resurrection and life; therefore Paul doth for good cause affirm that faith is destroyed, and the Gospel is become vaine & deceitful, if the resurrection of Christ be not fastened in our hearts. Therefore in an other place, after he had gloried in the death of Christ against all the terrours of damnation, to amplifie the same, he faith further: Yea, the same He which dyed, is risen vp againe, and now standeth a Mediatour for vs in the presence of God. Furthermore, as we haue before, declared, that upon the partaking of his crosse hangeth the mortification of our flesh: so is it to be understood, that by his resurrection we obtaine another commoditie which answereth that mortification. For (faith the Apostle) we are therefore graffed into the likeness of his death, that being partakers of his resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place: as he gathereth an argument of this that we are dead together with Christ, to proove that wee ought to mortifie our members upon earth: likewise also, because we are risen vp with Christ, he gathereth thereupon that we ought to seeke for those things y are aboue, &not those that are upon the earth. By which wordes we are not only exhorted to be raised vp after the example of Christ, to follow a newnesse of life: But we are taught that it is wrought by his power that we are regenerate in to righteousnes. Wee obainte also a third fruit of his resurrection, that we are, as by an earnest deliverer vs, assured of our owne resurrection, of which we knowe that his resurrection is a most certaine argument. Whereof he-disputeth more at large in the fifteenth chapter of his first Epistle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be noted, that it is faide, that he rose againe from the dead: in which saying is expressed the trueth both of his death & of his resurrection: as it had bene saide, that he did both dye the same death that other men naturally do dye, and received immortalitie in the same flesh which he had put on mortal.

14. To his resurrection is not vnslidely adioyned his ascending into heauen. For although Christ began more fully to fet forth his glory & power by rising againe, for that he had now layd away that base & vn noble estate of mortal life, and the shame of the crosse; yet by his ascending vp into heauen only, he truely began his kingdom. Which the Apostle sheweth where he teacheth, that Christ ascended to fulfil all things. Where in seeming of repugnancie he sheweth that there is a goodly agreement because he so departed from vs, that yet his presence might be more profitable to vs, which had bene penned in a base lodging of the flesh, while he was conuerfing in earth. And threfore Iohn, after that he had rehearsed that notable calling, If any thirth, let him come to me, &c. By and by faith, that the holy Gho t was not yet gien to the faithful, because Iesus was not yet glorified. Which the Lord himselfe also did teftifie to the Disciples, saying: It is expedient for you that I go away. For if I do not goe away, the holy Ghoft shall not come. But he gueth them a comfort for his corporall absence, that he will not leave them as parentlesse, but will come againe to them after a certaine manner, in dece dead invisible, but yet more to be desired, because they were then then taught by more assured experience, that the authority which he enjoyed, and the power which he vieth, is sufficient for the faithfull, not only to make them live blessedly, but also to die happily. And truly we see how much greater abundance of his spirit he then poured out, how much more royally he then advanced his kingdom, how much greater power he then shewed, both in helping his, and in overthrowing his enemies. Being therefore taken vp into heauen, he toke away the presence of his body out of our sight: not to ceafe to be present with the faithfull that yet wandered in the earth, but with more present power to governe both heauen and earth. But rather the same that he had promised, that he would be with vs to the end of the worlde, he performed by this his ascending, by which as his bodie was lifted vp above all heauens, so his power and effectuall working was powred and spred abroade beyond all the boundes of heauen and earth. But this I had rather to declare in Augustines wordes than mine owne. Christe (saieth he) was to go by death to the right hand of the father, from whence he is to come to judge the quicke and the dead: and that like wise in bodily presence according to the sounde doctrin and rule of faith. For in spirtual presence with the, he was to come after his ascension. And in an other place more largely and plainly: According to an unspeakable & vnvisible grace is that fulfilled which he had spoketh: behold I am with you alwayes, &c. &c. Amen. But according to the flesh which the worde tooke upon him, according to that that he was borne of the virgin, according to that that he was taken of the Iewes, that he was fastened on the tree, that he was taken downe from the croffe, that he was wrapped in linen clothes, that he was layde in the graue, that he was openly fiewed in his rising againe: this was fulfilled: Ye shall not alwayes haue me with you. Why so? because he was conuertant according to the presence of his body fourty dayes with his discipels, and they being in his company, seeing him, not following him, he ascended into heauen and is not here, for he sitteth there, at the right hande of his Father: and is here, for he is not gone away in presence of maiestie. Therefore according to the presence of his maiestie, we alwayes haue Christ: according to the presence of his flesh, it was truely sate in to his discipels: but me ye shall not alwayes haue. For the Church had him a fewe dayes according to the presence of his flesh, but now she holdest him by faith, but seeth him not with eyes.

Wherefore, it by & by followeth, that he is sitteth downe at the right hande of his father: which is spoken by way of similitude, taken of princes that haue their sitters by, to whom they commit their office to rule and governe in their stead. So it is said, that Christ, in whom the father will be exalted & reigne by his hande: was receiued to sitt at his right hand: as if it had ben saide, that he was investted in the dominion of heauen & earth, solemnly entred upon the possession of the governement committed unto him, and that he not only entred upon it, but also continueth in it till he come downe to judgement. For so doth the Apostle expounde it, when he saith thus: The father haue set him at his right hand, above all principality and power, and strength and dominion, and euery name that is named not onely in this worlde, but in the worlde to come. &c. He hath put all thinges under his feet, &c.

A. 2. 30.

And hath given him to be head of the Church above all things. For he who see what purpose belongeth that sitting, that is, that all creatures both heavenly and earthly may with admiration look upon his Majesty, be governed with his hands, behold his countenance, and be subject to his power.

Heb. 7. 7.

And the Apostles meant nothing else, when they so oft rehearse it, but to teach, that all things are left to his will. Therefore they think no right, which think that blessedness is only meant by it. And it foretold not, that in the Acts, Stephen testified that he saw him standing, because we speake not here of the gesture of his body, but of the majesty of his dominion: so that to sit is nothing else, but to be chief judge in the heavenly judgement state.

16 Hereupon doth faith gather manifolde fruit: For it learneth, that the Lord by his ascending into heaven, hath opened the entrie of the heavenly kingdom, which before had bin stopped vp by Adam. For when he entered into it in our flesh as in our name, thereupon followeth that which the Apostle saith, that we doe already in him after a certaine maner sit in heaven. For that we do not with bare hope looke for heaven, but already in our head we possesse it. Moreover faith perceiued that he sitteth with his father to our great benefit. For he is entred into a sanctuarie not made with hands, and there appeareth before the face of the father a continuall advocate and intercessor for us: he so turneth the fathers eyes to his righteousness, that he turneth them away from our finnes: Hee fo reconcilith his minde vnlo vs, that by his intercession he prepareth vs a way and passage to his throne, filling it with grace & mercifullnes, which otherwise would have bin full of honour to wretched finnes. Thirdly, faith conceiued his power, wherein consisteth our strength, might, wealth, and glorying against the hells. For ascending into heaven he led captivity captiue, and spoiling his enemies enriched his people, & dayly filleth them with heapes of spiritual riches. He sitteth therefore on his throne, that from thence pouring out his power vnlo vs, he may quicken vs to a spiritual life, sanctifie with his spirit, & garnish his church with the divers gifts of his grace, preserve it safe against all hurtes by his protection, restraine with the strength of his hand the raging enemies of his crosse and of our saluation: finally, holde all power, both in heaven and in earth, till he haue overthrown all his enemies which are also our enemies, & made perfect building vp of his Church. And this is the true state of his kingdom: this is the power that his father hath given him, till he make an end of the last act, when he commeth to judge the quicke and the dead.

17 Christ doeth in deede here shewe to them that be his, plaine prooves of his power present among them: but because under the basenes of flesh his kingdom doth in a maner lie hidden in earth, therefore for good cause is faith called to think upon that visible presence, which he will openly shewe at the last day. For he shall in visible forme come down from heaven, even such as he was seene to go vp: and he shall appear to all men with visible and peaceable majesty of his kingdom, with bright glittering of immortality, with infinite power of godhead, with a gard of Angels. From thence therefore we are hidden to loke for him, to come our redeemer at that day, when he shall fetter the Lambes from the Goates, the chosen from the forsake: & there shall be none of all either the quicke or the deade, that shall escape his judgement. For from the furthest corners of the world shall be heard the sound of the trumpet, wherewith all shall be called to his judgement seat, both they that shall bee founde alieue at that day, and they whom death hath before taken out of the companie of the quicke. Some there bee that in this place expounde the words of the quicke and the dead otherwise: and we see that some of the olde writers did sticke in doubt upon the construction of this article. But as the aforesaid meaning is plaine and easye to perceiue: so doth it better agree with the Creede which is euident that it was written according to the capacitie of the common people. And herewith nothing disgreeth that which y Apostle affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they which shall remaine in mortall life at y last judgement shall not die after a natural manner and order: yet that change which they shall suffer, because it shalbe like a death, is not unproperly called death.
It is indeede certaine, that not all shall sleep, but all shall be changed. What meanceth y:In one moment their mortall life shall perish and be swallowed up and be utterly transformed into a new nature. This perishing of y flesh no man can denye to be a death: and yet in y meane time, it remaineth true, that the quicke and the dead shall be summoned to the judgement: because y death that are in Christ shall first rise, and then they y shall remaine and be liuing, shal with them bee sodenly taken vp into the aire to meete the Lord.
And truly it is likely that this article was taken out of the sermon of Peter, which Luke reciteth, and out of y Solemne protestation of Paul to Timothe.

18 Hereupon ariseth a singular comfort, when we heare that he is judge, which hath alreadie appointed vs parteners with him in judging: so far is it off, that he will goe vp into the judgement seate to condemne vs. For howe shoulde the most mercifull prince destroye his owne people? howe shoulde the head scatter abroad his owne members? how should the patronie condemne his owne clients? For if the Apostle dare cry out, that while Christ is intercessour for vs, there can none come forth that can condemne vs: it is much more true, that Christ himselfe being our intercessor, will not codemne them whom he hath reconciled to his charge and tuition. It is truly no small assurednesse, that we shall be brought before no other judgement seate, but of our owne redeemer, from whome our saluation is to bee looked for: moreover that he which nowe by the Gospell promiseth eternall blessednesse, shall then by sitting in judgement performe his promise.
Therefore to this ende the father hath honoured the sonne, in giving him all judgement, that so hee hath, provided for the consciences of them that be his, trembling for feare of the judgement. Hitherto have followed y order of the Apostles Creede, because whereas it shortly in fewe words containeth the cheefe articles of our redemption, it may serue vs for a table, wherein we doe distinctly and severally see those things that are in Christ worthie to be taken heed vnto. I call it the Apostles Creede, not carefully regarding who were the authour of it. It is truely by great consent of y olde writers ascribed to the Apostles, either because they thought that it was by common trauell written and set out by the Apostles, or for that they ju-gled that this abridgement being faithfully gathered out of the doctrine, delivered by the handes of the Apostles, was worthie to bee confirmed with such a title. And I take it for no doubt, that whence so euer it proceeded at the first, it hath euen from the first beginning of the Church, and from the verie time of the Apostles, ben vse as a publike confession, and received by confent of all men. And it is likely that it was not privately written by any one man, forasmuch as it is evident that euen from the farthest age it hath alwaye continued of sacred authoritie and credite among all the godly.
But that thing which is onely to bee cared for, wee have wholly out of controverse, that the whole Historie of our faith is shortly and well in difinite order rehearsed in it, and that there is nothing conteyned in it that is not sealed with founde testimonies of Scripture. Which being vnderstan-ded, it is to no purpose either curiously to doubt, or to strive with any man who were the authour of it: vnlesse perhappe it be not enougb for some ma to bee assured of the truth of the holy Ghost, but if hee doe also vnderstande eyther, by whose mouth it was spoken, or by whose hande it was written.

19 But forasmuch as wee doe see, that the whole summe of our saluation, and all the partes thereof, are comprehended in Christ, we must beware, that wee doe not drawe away from him any part thereof: bee it never to little. If wee seeke for salvation, wee are taught by the verie name of Is-bus, that is in it. If wee seeke for any other giftes of the spirit, they are to bee founde in his anointing. If wee seeke for strengthe, it is in his dominion: if wee seeke for cleannesse, it is in his conception. If wee seeke for tender kindnesse, it is theweth it fille in his birth, whereby hee was made in all thinges like unto vs, that he might learne to forrowe with vs: if wee seek for redemption, it is in his passion: if wee seeke for absolution, it is in his condemnation: if wee seeke for release of the curfe, it is in his croffe: if wee seeke for satisfaction, it is in his sacrifice: if wee seeke for cleansing, it is in his blode: if wee seeke for reconciliation, it is in his going downe to the hells: if wee seeke for mortification of the fleshe, it is in his buriall: if wee seeke for newnesse of life, it is in his resurrection: if wee seeke for immor-talitie, it is in the same, if wee seeke for the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven, it is in his entrance into heaven: if wee seeke for defenece, for au-surednesse, for plentie and store of all good thinges, it is in his kingdom: if wee seeke for a dreadleffe looking for the judgement, it is in the power giue to him to judge. Finally, fith the treasurers of all sortes of good thinges are in him, let vs draw thence and from no where else, even till we be full with-all. For they which being not content with him alone, are caried hither & thither into diverse hopes, although they haue principal regard to him, yet euen in this they are out of the right way, that they turne any part of their knowledge to any other place. Albeit such distrust can not creepe in, where the aboundance of his good giftes hath once beene well knowen.

The xvij. Chapter.
That is a truely and properly said, that Christ hath deserved Gods favour and salvation for vs.
This question is also to be assayed for an addition. For there are some sudden men after a wrong manner, which although they confesse that we obtain salvation by Christ, yet can not abide to here the name of deserving, by which they thinke the grace of God to be obscured: and so they will have Christ to be onely the instrument, or minister, not the author, guide, or Prince of life, as Peter calleth him. In deed I confesse, that if a man will set Christ simply and by himselfe against the judgement of GOD, then there shalbe no roome for deserving: because there can not be found in man any worthinesse that may deserve the favour of God: But, as Augustine most truly wrytheth, the most cleare light of predestination and grace is our Saviour himselfe, the man Christ Jesus, which hath obtained to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deservingnes of works or of tayth going before. I beseech you let me be answered, whereby that same Man deserved to be taken vp by the Worde that is coeternall with the father into one prifon, and so to be the onely begotten Sonne of God. Let therefore appeare in our head the very fountain of grace, from whom according to the measure of every one, it floweth abroad into all his memers. By that grace every one from the beginning of his faith is made a Christian, by which that same man from his beginning was made Christ.
gaine in another place: there is no plainer example of predestination than the Mediator himselfe. For he that made of the seede of Dauid a man righteous that never should be vnrighteous, without any deserving of his will going before, even the same hee doeth of vnrighteous make them righteous that are the members of that heade: and so brother as there followeth.
Therefore when we speake of Christes deserving, we doe not say that in him is the beginning of deserving, but we clime vp to the ordinance of GOD, which is the first cause thereof: because God of his owne meere good will appointed him Mediatour, to purchase salvation for vs. And so is thy deserving of Christ vnfitly set against the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that things orderly one vnder another doe not disagree. And therfore it may well stand together, that mans justification is free by thy meere mercy of God, and that there also the deserving of Christ come betweene which is contained vnder the mercy of God. But against our workes are aptly set, as directly contrary, both the free fauour of God, and the obedience of Christ, either of them in their degree. For Christ could not deserve any thing but by the good pleasure of God, and but because he was appointed to this purpose, with his sacrifice to appease the wrath of God, and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a summe: because thy deserving of Christ hangeth upon the onely grace of God, which appointed vs this meane of saluation, therefore as well the same deserving, as that grace, is fitly set against all the workes of men.

2 This distinction is gathered out of many places of the Scripture. God so loved the worlde, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whom soever belee-when in him, shall not perish. We see how thy love of God holdeth thy first place, as the soueraigne cause or original, and then followeth faith in Christ, as the second or nearer cause. If any man take exception and say, that Christ is but the formall cause, he doth more diminish his power than the wor-may beare. For if we obtaine righteousness by faith that resteth upon him, then is the matter of our salvation to be sought in him, which is in may places plainly proved. Not that we first loved him, but he first loved vs, and sent his sonne to be appeasing for our sinnes. In these words is clearly shewed, that God to the ende that nothing should withstand his love toward vs, appointed vs a meane to be reconciled in Christ. And this word Appeasing, is of great weight: because God, after a certaine unspeakeable manner, even the same time that he loued vs, was also angry with vs, until he was reconciled in Christ. And to this purpose saie all those sayinges: He is the satisfaction for our sinnes. Again: It pleased God by him to reconcile all things to himselfe, appeasing himselfe through the blood of the Croffe by him, &c. Again, God was in Christ, reconciling the word to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinnes. Again: He accepted vs in his beloved sonne. Again, That he might reconcile them both to God into one man by ye croffe. The reason of this mysterie is to be fetched out of the first chapter to the Ephefians, where Paul, after that he had taught that we were chosen in Christ, addeth therewithall, that we haue obtained fauour in him. How did God beginne to embrace with his fauour them whom he loued before the making of the worlde, but because he vnttered his loue when he was reconciled by the blood of Christ? For Sith God is the fountaine of all righteousness, it must needes be, that man so long as he is a sinner, haue God his enemy and his judge. Wherefore the beginning of his loue is righteousness, such as is described by Paul: He made him that had done no sinne, to be sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousness of God in him. For he meaneth, that we have obtained free righteousness by that sacrifice of Christ, that we should please God, which by nature are the children of wrath and by sinne estranged from him. But this distinction is also meant to oft as the grace of Christ is joyned to the loue of God, Whereupon foloweth, that he giueth vs of his owne y which he hath purchased: For otherwise it would not agree with him, that this praise is given him feuenterally from his father, that it is his grace and proceeded from him.

3 But it is truly and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Christ by his obedience hath purchased vs fauour with his father. For this I take for a thing confessed, that if Christ hath satisfied for our sinnes, if he hath suffered the punishment due unto vs, if by his obedience he hath appeased God, finally, if he being righteous, hath suffered for the unrighteous, then is salvation purchased for vs by his righteousness: which is as much in effect as to deferue it. But, as Paul witnesseth, we are reconciled and have received reconcilation by his death. But reconcilation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaning is: that God, to whom we were hateful by reason of sinne, is by the death of his sonne appeased, so that he might be fauourable vnto vs. And the comparison of contraries that followeth a little after, is diligently to be noted as by the transgression of one man, many were made sinners: so also by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus: As by the sinne of Adam we were estranged from God and ordained to destruction, so by the obedience of Christ we are received into fauour as righteous.

And
And the future time of the verfe doeth not exclude present righteousness, as appeareth by the procefs of the text: For hee had saide before, that the free gift was of manie finnes vnto iustification.

But when we say, that grace is purchas'd vs by the dereruing of Christ, we meane this, that we are cleanfed by his bloode, and that his death was a satisfaction for our finnes. His bloode cleanseth vs from sinne. This bloode is it that is shed for remission of sinne. If this bee the effect of his blood shed, that finnes bee not imputed vnto vs: it followeth, that with that price the judgement of God is satisfied. To which purpose serueth that saying of John the Baptist: Behold, the Lambe of God that taketh away the sinne of the worlde. For hee setteth in comparison Christ against all the sacrifices of the lawe, to teach that in him onely was fulfilled that which those figures shewed. And we know, what Moses ech where faith: Iniquitie shall be cleansed, sinne shall be put away and forgiven. Finally wee are vertic well taught in the old figures, what is the force: and effect of the death of Christ. And this point the Apostle setteth out in the Epifte to the Hebrewes, very fitly taking this principle, that remission is not wrought without shedding of blood. Whereupon he gathereth, that Christ for the abolishing of sinne, appeared once for all by his sacrifice. Againe: that he was offered vp to take away the finnes of many. And hee hadd saide before, that not by the blood of goats or of calues, but by his owne blood hee once entred into his holy place, finding eternal redemption. Nowe when hee thus reafoneth: if the bloode of a calfe doe sanctifie, according to the cleanness of the flethe, that much more confences are cleansed by the bloode of Christ from dead worlkes: it easily appeareth that the grace of Christ is too much diminished, vnles wee grant vnto his sacrifice the power of cleaning, appeasing & satisfying. As a little after he addeth: This is the mediator of the new testament, that they which are called, may receive the promise of eternal inheritance by meane of death for the redemption of finnes going before, which remained under the law. But specially it is convenient to wey the relation which Paul describeth, that he became curse for vs. &c. For it were superfluous, yea & an absurditie, that Christ should bee charged with curse, but for this intent, that he paying that which other did owe, shoulde purchase righteousnesse for them. Also the testimonie of Esay is plaine that the chastisement of our peace was laid vpon Christ, and that we obtened health by his stripes. For if Christ had not satisfied for our finnes, it could not have beene said, that he appealed God by taking vpon him the paine whereunto we were subject. Wherewith agreeth ye which foloweth in the fame place: For y sin of my people I haue stricken him. Let vs also recite the exposition of Peter, which shall leave nothing doubtful that he did beare our sin, vpon y tre. For he faith, y burden of damnation frō which we were deliuered, was laid vpon Christ.

And the Apostles doe plainly pronounce, that he paid the price of raunfome to redeeme vs from the guiltinesse of death. Being justified by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ, whome God hath let to be the propitiorie by faith which is in his blood. Paul commendeth the grace of God in this point, because hee hath given the price of redemption in the death of Christ: and then he biddeth vs to flee vnto his bloode, that hauing obtained righteousness, wee may stande boldly before the judgement of God. And to the same effect is that saying of Peter: that we are redeemed not by gold and filuer, but by the precious blood of the unspotted Lambe. For the comparison also woude not agree, vnlesse with that price satisfaction had beene made for sins: for which reason Paul faith, that we are preciously bought. Alfo that other saying of his would not stand together.

There is one mediator that gaue himselfe to bee a redemption, vnlesse the paine had beene caft vpon him which wee had defercued: Therefore the same Apostle defineth, that the redemption in the blood of Christ is the forgiueneffe of sinnes: as if hee shoulde haue faide, that wee are iustified or acquitted before God, because that bloode answereth for satisfaction for vs. Wherewith also agreeth the other place, that the hande writing which was against vs, was cancelled vpon the crosse. For therein is meant, the painement or recompence that acquiteth vs from guiltinesse. There is also great weight in these wordes of Paul: If we be iustified by the workes of the lawe, then Christ died for nothing. For hereby wee gather, that wee must fetch from Christ that which the lawe woulde giue, if any man can fulfill it: or (which is all one) that we obteyne by the grace of Christ that, which God promised to our workes in the lawe when he faide: Hee that doth these things, shall live in them. Which hee no lesse plainly confirmeth in his sermon made at Antioch, affirming that by beleewing in Christ wee are iustified from all those things, from which wee coulde not bee iustified in the lawe of Moses. For if the keeping of the lawe bee rightoue, who can deny that Christ derserued fauour vs, when taking that burden vpon him, hee reconciled vs to God, as if we our selves had kept the lawe? To the same purpose saith that he afterward writeth to the Galatians: God sent his son subject to the lawe, he might redeeme those that were vnder the lawe. For to what ende sauered that submission of his, but that he purchased to vs rightouenesse, taking vpon him to make good that which we were not able to pay? Hereof commeth that imputation of rightouesnesse without workes, whereof Paul speaketh, because the rightouenesse is reckoned to vs which was founde in Christ only. And truely for no other cause is the flesh of Christ called our meate, but because wee find him the substance of life. And that power procedeth from nothing els, but because the Sonne of God was crucified, to be the price of our rightouenesse. As Paul faith, that hee gaue himselfe a sacrifice of sweete fauour. And in other place: Hee died for our sinnes, he rose againe for our iustification. Here vpon is gathered, that not onely saluation is giuen vs by Christe, but alfo for that his fake his father is nowe fauourable vnto vs. For there is no doubte that ye is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God vnnder a figure pronounceth by Esay, saying: I will doe it for mine owne fake, and for David my seruantes fake. Whereof the Apostle is a right good witnessse, where hee faith: Your sinnes are forgiven you for his names sake. For though the name of Christ be not expressed, yet John after his accustomed manner signifieth him by this pronoun He. In which sense also the Lorde pronounceth: As I liue because of my father, to shal ye also liue because of mee. Wherewith agr-eth that which Paul faith, It is giuen you because of Christ, not onely to be—Phil.1.39.

But to demand, whether Christ desiered for him selues (as Lombard, & Sentent. li. 3 the other scholemen do) is no lees foolish curiousitie, than it is a rash determination when they affirme it. For what needed the sonne of God to come downe to purchase any new thing for him selues? And the Lord declaring his owne counsell, doth put it wholly out of doubt. For it is not said, that the father provided for the commoditie of his sonne in his deseruing, but that he deliered him to death, & spared him not, because he loved the world.

And the Prophets manners of speaking are to be noted, as, A child is borne. Ets. 9.6. to vs. Againe: Rejoyce thou daughter of Sion: behold thy king commeth to thee. Also that confirmation of love should be very cold, which Paul setteteth out, that Christ suffered death for his enemies. For thereupon wee gather, y he had no respect of himself, and that same he plainly affirmeth in sauing, I sanctifie my selfe for them. For he that giueth away the fruite of his holines to other, doth thereby teyifie that he purchaseth nothing for himself.
And truely this is most worthily to be noted, that Christ, to giue himselfe wholy to saue vs, did after a certaine maner forget himselfe. But to this pur-purpose they do wrongfullly draw this testimonie of Paul: Therefore the father hath exalted him, and giuen him a name, &c. For by what deseruing could man obraine to be judge of the world, & the heade of the Angels, & to enjoy the soueraigne dominion of God, & that in him should rest that fame maiestie, the thousandth parte whereof all the powers of men & Angels can not reach vnto: But the solution therof is easie & plaine, that Paul doth not there entreat of the cause of exaltting of Christ, but onely to shew the effect ensuing thereof, that it might be for an example to vs. And no other thing is meant by that which is spoken in another place, that it behoueth that Christ should suffer, and so enter into the glorie of his Father.

THE THIRD BOOKE
CHRISTIAN RELIGION, WHICH intreateth of the manner howe to receive the grace of Christ, and what profits do growe vnto vs, & what effectes ensue therof.

The first Chapter.
That those things which are spoken of Christ, do profe vs by secrete warking of the holy Ghoft.

Owe it is to be seen how those good things do come vnto vs, which the Father hath giuen to his only begotten Sonne, not for his own private vs, but to enrich them that were without them & needed Aa. them.
them. And first this is to be learned, that so long as Christ is out of vs, and we be soured from him, whatsoever he suffered or did for the salvation of mankind, is vnprofitable and nothing availeth for vs. Therefore that he may enterparten with vs those things that he hath received of his Father, it behoveth that he become ours, and dwell in vs. And for that cause he is called our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is saide, that we are grafted into him, and did put on him. For (as I haue before said) all that euer he posseth belongeth nothing to vs, vntill we growe together into one with him. But although it be true that we obtaine this by faith: yet forasmuch as we see that not all without difference do embrace this enterpartening of Christ, which is offered by ye Gospel, therefore very reason teacheth vs to clime vp hier, and to enquire of the secret effectual working of the Spirit, by which it is brought to passe, that we enjoy Christ and all his good things. I haue before entreated of the eternall godhead and essence of the Spirit, at this present let vs be content with this one speciall article, that Christ so came in water and bloude that the Spirit should testifie of him, leaft the salvation that he hath purchased, should slip away from vs. For as there are alleged three witnesse in heauen, the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, so are there also three in earth, Water, Bloude, and the Spirit, and not without cause is the testimonie of the Spiritie twife reported, which we feele to be engraven in our hearts in steede of a seale: whereby commeth to passe, that it sealeth the washing & sacrifice of Christ. After which meaning Peter also faith, that the faithful are chosen in sanctification of the spirite vnto obedience and sprinkling of the bloud of Christ, by which words he telleth vs, that to the extent the shedding of that holy bloud should not become voide, our soules are cleansed with it by the secret watering of the holy Spiritie. According whereunto Paul also speaking of cleansing and justification, sayeth that we are made partakers of them both in the name of Iesus Christ & in the Spiritie of our God. Finally, this is the summe, that the holy Spiritie is the bonde wherewith Christ effectually bindeth vs vnto him. For proofe wherof alfo do serue all that we haue taught in the last booke before this, concerning his anointing.

But that this, being a matter specially worthie to be known, may be made more certainely evident, we must holde this in minde, that Christ came furnished with the holy Spirit after a certeine peculiar maner, to the end that he might feuer vs from the world, and gather vs together into the hope of an eternall inheritance. For this cause he is called the Spiritie of sanctification, because he doth not onely quicken and nourish vs with that generall power which appeareth as well in mankinde, as in all other living creatures, but also is in vs the roote and seede of heavenly life. Therefore the Prophets do principally commend the kingdom of Christ by this title of prerogatiue, that then should flourish more plenteous abundance of the Spiritie. And notable above all the rest is that place of Ioe: In that day I will powre of my Spirit upon all flees. For though the Prophet there seem to restraine the gifts of the Spirit to the office of prophecyng, yet under a figure he meaneth, that God by the enlightening of his Spiritie will make those those his scholers which before were vs. skilfull and void of all heavenly doctrine. Now for as much as God the Father doth for his sonnes sake giue vs his holy Spirite, and yet hath left with him the whole fulnesse thereof, to the end that he should be a minister and distributer of his liberalitie: he is sometime called the spirite of the Father, and sometime the Spirite of the Sonne. Ye are not (faith Paul) in the flesh, but in the Spirite, for the Spirite of God dwellth in you. But if any haue not the spirite of Christ, he is not his. And hereupon he putteth vs in hope of full remuing, for that he which raised vp Christ from the dead, shall quicken our mortall bodies because of his Spirite dwelling in us. For it is no abfurditie, that to the Father be ascrib’d the praise of his owne gifts, whereof he is the author: and yet that the same be ascrib’d to Christ, with whom the gifts of the Spirite are left, that he may giue them to those that be his. Therefore he calleth all them that thirst, to come to him to drinke. And Paul teacheth that the Spirite is distributed to every one, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. And it is to be known, that he is called the Spirite of Christ, not only in respect that the eternall Worde of God is with the same Spirite joyned with Father, but also according to his person of Mediator, because if he had not had that power, he had come to vs in vaine. After which meaning he is called the second Adam giuen from heauen, to be a quickening Spirite: whereby Paul compareth the singular life that the sonne of God breatheth into the that be his that they may be all one with him, with the naturall life that is also common to the reprobate. Likewise where he wiseth to the faithfull the fauour of Christ and the loue of God, he ioyneth withall the common partaking of the Spirite, without which no man can taste neither of the fatherly fauour of God, nor of the bountifulnesse of Christ. As also he faith in another place: The loue of God is poured out into our heartes by the holy Spirite that is giuen vs.

3 And here it shalbe profitable to note, with what titles the Scripture setteth out the holy Spirite, where it entreateth of beginning & whole restoring of our salvation. First, he is called the Spirite of adoption, because he is a witness unto vs of the free goodwill of God, wherewith God the Father hath embraced vs in his beloved only begotten Sonne; he might be a father unto vs, and doeth encourage vs to pray boldly, yea and both minister vs words to criе without feare, Abba, Father: by the same reason he is called the earnest pledge, and seale of our inheritance, because he so giveth life from heauen to vs wandring in the worlde, and being like to dead men, that we may be assured that our soule is in safegard vnder the faithfull keeping of God: for which cause he is also called life, by reason of righteounes. And forasmuch as by his secret watering he maketh vs fruitful to bring forth the buddes of righteounes, he is oftentimes called water, as in Efaie: Al ye that thirst come to the waters. Againe: I wil poure out my spirite vpon ye thirstie, & floods vpon the drie land: wherewith agreeth that saying of Christ, which I did euen now allege. If any thirst let him come to me. Albeit sometime he is so called, by reason of his power to purge and cleanse, as in Ezechiel where the Lord promiseth cleane waters wherewith he will wash his people from filthinesse. And forasmuch as hee restoreth and nourisheth into lively quicknes, them upon whom he hath powered liquor of his grace, he is therefore called by the name of oil and anointement. Againe because in continually seething out & burning vp the vices of our luff, he setteth our hearts on fire with the love of God and zeale of godliness, he is also for this effect worthily called fire. Finally, he is described vnto vs as a fountaine, from whence doe flowe vnto vs all heavenly riches, or the hand of God, wherewith he vesth his power: because by the breath of his power he so breatheth divine life into vs, that we are not now stifled by our selues, but ruled by his stirring & mouing; so that if there be any good things in vs, they be the fruities of his grace: but our owne giftes without him, be darknesse of minde, & perturbenesse of heart. This point is set out plainly enough, that til our mindes be bent upon the holy Ghost, Christ lyeth in a maner idle, because we coldly espie him without vs, yea & farrer away from vs. But wee knowe that he profeth none other but them whose head he is, and the first begotten among brethren, and them which haue put on Him. This conioyning only maketh that, as concerning vs, he is come not vnproufitably with the name of Saviour. And for prooue hereof, setteth that holy marriage, whereby we are made flesh of his flesh, & bones of his bones, yea and all one with him. But by the Spiriute onely he maketh him selfe one with vs: by the grace and power of the same Spiriute we are made his members, so that he containeth vs under him, and wee againe possess him.

4 But forasmuch as faith is his principal worke, to it are for the moste part referred all those things, that wee commonly finde spoken to express his force & working; because he bringeth vs into the light of the Gospel by nothing but by faith: as John Baptift teacheth, that this prerogatue is giue to them that beleue in Christ, that they be the children of God which are borne not of flesh and bloud, but of God: where setting God against flesh and bloud, he affirmeth it to be a supernaturall gift that they receive Christ by faith, who otherwise should remaine subject to their owne infidellitie. Like where vnto is that aunfwere of Christ: Flesh and bloud hath not reveale it to thee, but my Father which is in heaven. These things I doe now but shortly touche, because I haue alreadie intreated of them at large. And like alfo is that sayinge of Paul, that the Ephesians were sealed vp with the holy Spiriute of promifie. For Paul sheweth that he is an inward teacher, by whose working the promisse of salvacion is seate into our minds, which otherwife should but beare the aire or our cares. Likewise when he sayeth, that the Thaefalonians were chosen of God in the sanctification of the spiriute and beleuung of the trueth: by which ionying of them together, he briefly admonishteth that faith it selfe proceedeth from nothing else but from the holy spiriute: which thing John setteth out more plainly, sayinge: Wee knowe that there abideth in vs of the spiriute which he hath giuen vs. Again, By this we knowe that we dwell in him, and he in vs, because he hath giuen vs of his spiriute. Therefore Christ promised to his Disciples the Spiriute of trueth which the worlde cannot receive, that they might be able to receive the heavenly wisdome. And he assigneeth to the same spiriute this proper office, to put them in minde of those things. things that he had taught them by mouth. Because in vaine should y light shewe it selfe to the blinde, vnlesse the same spirit of understanding should open the eyes of their minde: so as a man may rightly call the holy spirit, the keye by which the treasures of the heauenly kingdome are opened vn to vs: and may call his enlightning, the eyefight of our minde to see. There fore doth Saint Paul so much commend the minifterie of the spirit: because teachers should crie without profiting, vnlesse Christ himselfe the inwarde master should drawe them with his spirit that are giuen him by his Fa ther. Therefore as we haue faide, that perfect saluation is found in the per son of Christ: so that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize vs in the holy spirit and fire, lightning vs into the faith of his Gospel, and so newe begetting vs, that wee may be newe creatures: and purging vs from vnholy filthinesse, doth dedicate vs to be holy temples to God.

The ij. Chapter.

Of faith, wherein both is set the definition of it, and the properies that is hath, are declared.

By all these things shalbe easie to understand, when there is shewed a plaine definition of faith, that the readers may knowe the force & nature thereof. But first it is convenient to call to minde againe these things that haue beene already spoken, that first God doth appoint vs by his lawe what we ought to do, if wee fall in any point thereof, the same terrible judgement of eternall death that he pronounceth doth rest vp on vs. Again, that forasmuch as it is not onely heard but altogether aboue our strength and beyond all our power to fulfil the law, if wee onely be hold our soules, and wyse what estate is worthie for our deseruings, there is no good hope left, but we lie cast away from God vnder eternall destruction. Thirdly, this hath bene declared, that there is but one meane of deluerance to draw vs out of so wretched calamitie: wherein appeareth Christ the Redeemer, by whose hand it pleased the heauenly father, hauing mercy vpon vs of his infinite goodnesse and clemencie, to succour vs, so that wee with sounde faith embrace this mercy, and with constant hope rest vpon it. But now it is convenient for vs to wyse this, what maner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to be his children, doe enter vpon the possession of the heauenly kingdome; forasmuch as it is certaine, not euery opinion nor yet euery persuasion is sufficient to bring to passe so great a thing. And with so much the more care and study must wee looke about for, and search out the naturall proprietie of faith, by howe much the more hurtful at this day is the error of many in this behalfe. For a great part of the world, hearing the name of faith, conceiueneth no hier thing, but a certeine common assent to the historie of the gospel. Yea when they dispute of faith in the scholes, in barely calling God the object of faith, they do noting but (as we haue saide in another place) by vain speculation rather draw wretched soules out of the right way, than direct them to y true marke. For wheras God dwelleth in a light y none can attaine to, it behoueth of necesstie that Christ become meane betweene vs and it. For which cause he calleth himselfe the light of the world: & in another place, The way, the truth, and the Life, because no man commeth to the father (which is the fountain of life) but by him: because he only knoweth the Father, & by him the faithful to whom it pleaseth him to disclose him. According to this reason, Paul affirmeth, that he accounteth nothing excellent to be known, but Christ: and in the xx. chapter of the Acts he faith, that he preached faith in Christ, &c. And in another place he bringeth in Christ speaking after this manner, I will send thee among the Gentiles, that they may receive forgiveness of finnes, & portion among holy ones, by the faith which is in mee.

And Paul testifieth, the glory of God is in his person visible vnto vs: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightening of the knowledge of God glorie shineth in his face. It is true in deed, that faith hath respect one only to the one God, but this also is to be added, that it acknowledge him whom he hath fent, even Jesus Christ. Because God himselfe should have lyen secret & hidden farre from vs, vndele the brightnes of Christ did cast his beames vpon vs. For this entent the father left alll he had with his onely begotten sonne, even by the communicating of good things with him to expresse the true image of his glorie. For as it is said, that we must be drawn by \( \psi \) spirit, that we may be starred to feeke Christ, so againe we ought to be admonished, that the insensible father is no where else to be sought but in this image. Of which matter Augustine speaketh excellently well, which intreating of the marke that faith should shoot at, faith that we must knowe whether we must go and which way: and then by and by after he gathereth that the safest way against all erroneous is he that is both God and man. For it is God to whom we goe, & man by whom we go: and both these are founde no where but in Christ. Neither doth Paul when he speketh of faith in God, meane to ouerthrowe that which he so oft repeareth of faith that hath her whole stay vpon Christ. And Peter doth most silly lyone them both together, saying that by him we beleue in God.

1. Therefore this euil, even as innumerable other, is to be imputed to the Schoolemen, which have hidden Christ as it were with a veile drawn before him, to the beholding of whom we vnlesse we be directly bent, we shall alway wander in many vncertaine mazes. But beside this that with their darke definition they do deface and in a maner bring to naught the whole force of faith, they have forged a deuise of vnexpressed faith, with which name they garnishing their most grosse ignorance do with great harte deceiue the silly people, yea (to say truely and plainly as the thing is in deed) this devise doth not only burie but vterly destroy the true faith. Is this to beleue, to understand nothing, so that thou obediently submit thy selfe to the Church? Faith standeth not in ignorance, but in knowledge, and that not only of God, but of the will of God. For neither do we obteine salvation by this that we either are ready to embrace for true whatsoeuer \( \psi \) Church appointeth, or that we do commit to it all the office of searching and knowing; but when wee acknowledge God to be a mercifull father to vs by the reconciliation made by Christ, and that Christ is giuen vs into righteousnesse, sanctification, and life. By this knowledge, I say, not by submit-submitting of our sense, we attaine an entrie into the kingdom of heaven.
For when the Apostile faith, that with the heart we beleue to righteousnes, and with the mouth confession is made to salvation, he sheweth that it is not enough, if a man vnexpressedly beleue that which he understandeth not, nor seeketh to learne: but he requireth an expressed acknowledging of Gods goodnesse, in which confiath our righteousnesse.

3. In deede I deny not (such is the ignorance wherewith we are compaf-seed) that there nowe be and hereafter shalbe many things wrapped and hidden from vs, till having put of the burden of our flesh we come nearer to the presence of God: in which very things that be hidden from vs, nothing is more profitable than to suspend our judgement, but to stay our minde in determined purpose to keepe vntrouble with the Church. But vnder this cocolour to intitle ignorance tempered with humilitie by the name of faith, is a great absurditie. For faith lieth in knowledge of God and of Christ, not in reuerence of the Church. And we see what a maze they haue framed with this their hidden implicati6, that any thing whatsoever it be without any choife, so that it be thrust in vnder title of the Church, is greedily receiued of the ignorant as it were an oracle, yea sometime also most monftrous errouers.
Which vnaduised lightnesse of believe, whereas it is a most certaine downfall to ruine, is yet excused by them, for that it beleueth nothing determin-nately, but with this condition adjoyned, If the faith of the Church be such.
So do they faine, that truth is holden in error, light in blindnes, true knowledge in ignorance. But because we will not tarry long in confuting them, we doe onely warne the readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the very plainesse of the truth it selfe will of it selfe minister a confutation ready enough. For this is not the question among them, whether faith be yet wrapped with many remnantes of ignorance, but they definitively say that they beleue a right, which stande amased in their ignorance, yea and do flatter themselues therein, so that they doe agree to the authority and judgement of the Church, concerning things vnknowen. As though the Scripture did not euer where teach, that with faith is joyned knowledge.

4. But we do grant, that so long as we wander from home in this world, our faith is not fully expressed, not onely because many things are yet hidden from vs, but because being compasse with many mistes of errouers, we attaine not all things. For the highest wisdome of the most perfect is this, to profit more and procede on further forarde with gentle willingnesse, to learne. Therefore saul exhorteth the faithfull, if vpon any thing they differ one from another, to abide for religion. And truly experience teacheth, that till we be vncovered of our flesh, we attaine to knowe lesse than were to be wished, and dayly in reading wee light vpon many darke places which doe convinue vs of ignorance. And with this bridile God holdeth vs in modestie, assingning to every one a measure of faith, that eu'n the very best teacher may be ready to learne. And notable examples of this vnexpressed faith, we may marke in the Disciples of Christ, before they had obtained to be fully enlightened. We see, howe they hardly tasted the very first introductions, how they did sticke eu'n in the smallest points, how they hang-g at the mouth of their maister did not yet much procede, yea when at the women's information they ranne to the grave, the resurrection of their master was like a dreame vnto them. Sith Christ did before beare witnesse of their faith, we may not say that they were utterly without faith: but rather, if they had not beene perswaded that Christ should rise againe, all care of him would have perishd in them. For it was not superstition that did drawe the women to embalme with spices the corpors of a dead man of whome there was no hope of life: but although they beleued his wordes whome they knewe to be a speaker of truth, yet the grovesse that stil persisted their minde wrapped their faith in darkenesse, that they were in a maner amazed at it. Whereupon it is sayd, that they then at the last beleued when they had triall of the thing itselfe proved the truth of the words of Christ, not that they then beganne to beleue, but because the seed of hidden faith which was as it were dead in their heartes, then receiuing liue-lineesse, did spring vp. There was therefore a true faith in them, but an vnexpressed faith, because they reuerently embraced Christes for their onely teacher, and then being taught of him, they determined that he was the author of their salvation: Finally, they beleued that he came from heauen, by the grace of his father to gather his Disciples to heauen. And we neede not to fecke any more familiar proofe hereof than this, that in all things alway vnbeleefe is mingled with faith.

5. We may also call it an vnexpressed faith, which yet in deed is nothing but a preparation of faith. The Euangelists do rehearfe that many beleued, which only being raisd to admiration with miracles, proceeded no further but Christ was the Messias which had bin promisid, albeit they tasted not so much as any scelender learning of the Gospell. Such obedience which brought them in subjection willingly to submit themselves to Christ, beareth the name of faith where it was in deed but the beginning of faith. So the courtier that beleued Christ's promise, concerning the healing of his sonne when he came home, as the Euangelist testifieth, beleued againe: because he receivd as an oracle that which he heard of the mouth of Christ, & then submitted himselfe to his authoritie to receive his doctrine. Albeit it is to be known, that he was so tractable and ready to learne, that yet in the first place the word of the beleuing signifieth a particular beleefe: and in the second place maketh him of the number of the Disciples, that professed to be the scholers of Christ. A like example doth Iohn set forth in the Samaritans, which so beleued the womans report, that they ranne earnestly to Christ, which yet when they had heard him, said thus: Now we beleue not because of thy report, but we haue heard him, and we know that he is the Saviour of the world. Hereby appeareth that they which are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so they be disposed to obedience, are called faithfull, in deed not properly, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindenesse vouchsafeth to graunt so great honour to that godly affection, but this willingnesse to learne, with a desire to procede further, different farre from that grosse ignoraunce, wherein they lie dull that are content with the vnexpressed faith, such as the Papistes have imagined. For if Paul feuerely condemndeth them which alway learning, yet never come to the knowledge of truth, how much more gressuous reproche doe they deserue that of purpose.

6 This therefore is the true knowledge of Christ, if wee receive him such as hee is offered of his father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. For as he is appointed to bee the marke of our faith, so we can not goe the right way to him, but by the Gospell going before to guide us. And truly there are opened to vs ye treasures of grace, which being shut vp, Christ flold little profit vs. So Paul sheweth faith an vnseparable companion to doctrine, where he faith: Ye haue not so learned Christ, for ye haue beene taught what is the trueth in Christ. Yet doe I not so restraine faith to the Gospell, but that I confesse that there hath beene so much taught by Moses and the Prophete, as sufficed to the edification of faith, but because there hath beene delivered in the Gospell a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is worthless called of Paul, the doctrine of faith. For which cause also hee faith in an other place, that by the comming of faith the law is taken away, meaning by this wordes faith, the newe and vnaccustomed manner of teaching, whereby Christ since he appeared our scholemaster, hath more plainly set forth the mercie of his father, and more certainly testified of our salvation. Albeit it shalbe ye more easie and more convenient order, if we descende by degrees from the generallie to the specialtie. First wee must bee put in minde that there is a generall relation of faith to the worde, and that faith can no more be seuered from the worde, than the sunne beams from the sunne from whome they proceede. Therefore in Efa God crieth out: Hear me and your soule shall liue. And that the same is the fountaine of faith, John sheweth in these wordes: these things are written that ye may beleeue. And the Prophete meaning to exhort the people to beleefe, faith: This day if yee shall heare his voice. And to heare is commonly taken for to Beleeue. Moreover, God doeth not without caufe in Efa fixt his marke of difference betweene the children of the Church and strangers, that hee will instruct them all, that they may be taught of him. For if it were a benefite vniuerfal to all, why should hee directe his wordes to a fewe? Wherewith agreeeth this that the Evangeliastes doe commonly vs ye wordes Faithfull, and Difeiples, as seueral wordes expressing one thing, and specially Luke verie oft in the Acts of the Apostles. Yea and he stretcheth that name euen to a woman in the ninth chapter of the Acts. Wherefore if faith doe swarue never fo little from this marke, to which it ought to bee directly leuellled, it keepeth not her owne nature, but becometh an vncaerte lightnesse of beleefe and wandring errour of minde. The same Worde is the foundation wherewith faith is vpholden and sustaine, from which if it swarue, it falleth downe. Therefore take away the Worde, and then there shall remaine no faith. Wee doe not here dispute whether the ministerie of man be necessarie to folks the worde of God that faith may bee conceived thereby, which question we will els where intreate of: but we say that the worde it selfe, howsoever it bee conueied to vs, is like a mirrow when faith may beholde God. Whether God doeth therein vs the seruice of man, or worke it by his owne onely power, yet he doeth alway shewe himselfe by his worde to those, whome his will is to drawe vnto him: Wherupon Paul defineth faith to bee an obedience that is giuen to the Gospell. Rom. 1.

And
Cap. 2. Of the manner how to receive

Phil. 2.17. And in another place he prayseth the obedience of faith in the Philippians. For this is not the only purpose in the understanding of faith, that we know that there is a God, but this also, yea this chearfully, that we understand what will hee beareth vs. For it not so much behooueth vs to knowe what hee is in himselfe, but what a one he will bee to vs. Nowe therefore wee are come to this point, that faith is a knowledge of the will of God, perceiued by the words. And the foundation hereof is a foreconceiued persuasion of the truth of God. Of the assurednesse whereof so long as thy minde shall disperse with itselfe, the worde shall be but of doubtfull and weake credite, yea rather no credite at all. But also it sufficeth not to beleue that God is a true speaker, which can neither deceiue nor lie, vnlesse thou further holde this for vn doubtedly determined, that whatsoeuer proceedeth from him, is the sacred and inviolable truth.

7 But because not at euerie worde of God mans hearte is rais'd vp to faith, wee muft yet further search what this faith in the word hath properly respect vnto. It was the saying of God to Adam: Thou shalt die the death. It was the saying of God to Cain: The bloode of thy brother crieth to me out of the earth. Yet these are such sayinges as of them selves can doe nothing but shake faith, so much lesse are they able to stablish faith. We denie not in the meane season that it is the office of faith to agree to the truth of God, how off foeuer, what foeuer, and in what sorte foeuer it speaketh: but now our question is onely, what faith findeth in the worde of the Lord to leane and rest vpon. When our conscience beholdeth onely indignation & vengeance, how can it but tremble and quake for feare? And how should it but flee God, of whom he is afraide? But faith ought to seeke God, and not to flee from him. It is plain therefore, that we haue not yet a full definition of faith, because it is not to be accompted for faith to know the will of God, of what sorte foeuer it be: But what if in the place of will, whereof many times the mesage is sorrowfull and the declaration dreadful, we put kindnesse or mercie? Truely so wee shall come neerer to the nature of faith. For we are then allured to seeke God, after that we haue learned that salvation is laide vp in store with him for vs. Which thing is confirmed vnto vs, when he declareth that hee hath care and loue of vs. Therefore there needeth a promise of grace, whereby he may testifie that he is our merciful father, for that otherwisme we cannot approch vnto him, and vpon that alone the heart of man may safely rest. For this reason commonly in the Pulsnes these two things Mercie & Truth do cleaue together, because neither shold it any thing profit vs to knowe that God is true, vnlesse hee did mercifully allure vs vnto him: neither were it in our power to embrace his mercie, vnlesse he did with his owne mouth offer it. I haue reported thy truth and thy salvation, I haue not hidden thy goodnes and thy truth. Thy goodnes and thy truth keepe me. In another place: Thy mercy to the heauens, thy truth even to the clouds. Againe: All the wayes of the Lord are mercie and truth, to them that keepe his covenent. Againe, His mercie is multiplied vpon vs, and the truth of the Lorde abideth for ever. Againe: I will sing to thy name vpon thy mercie and truth. I omit that which is in the Prophets to the same meaning, that God is mercifull and faithfull in his promises. For we shall shall rashly determine that God is mercifull vnto vs, vnlesse himselfe doe restitute of himselfe, and present vs with his calling, lest his will should bee doubtfull and vnknowne. But we haue alreadie seene, that Christ is the only pledge of his loue, without whome on euery side appeare the tokens of hatred and wrath. Nowe forasmuch as the knowledge of Gods goodnesse shall not much prouaile, vnlesse hee make vs to rest in it, therefore such an understanding is to be banished as is mingled with doubting, and doth not soundely agree in it selfe, but as it were, disputeth with it selfe. But mans wit, as it is blind and darkened, is farre from attaining and climbing vp to perceive the verie will of God: and also the heart of man, as it wauere with perpetual doubting, is farre from resting assured in that persuasion. Therefore it behoueth both that our wit bee lightened, and our heart strengthened by some other meanes, that the worde of God may be of full credite with vs. Nowe wee shall haue a perfect definition of faith, if wee say, that it is a steadfast and assured knowledge of Gods kindnesse toward vs, which being grounded vpon the trueth of the free promisfe in Christ, is both receiued to our minde, and sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost.

8 But before I proceed any further, it shall bee necessarie, that I make some preambles to disloque certaine doubtes that otherwise might make some stoppe to the readers. And first I must confute that distinction of first about in the scholes, betwene faith formed and vnformed. For they imagine that such as are touched with no feare of God, with no feeling of godlinesse, doe beleue all that is necessarie to salvation. As though the holy Ghost in lightening our harts vnto faith, weere not a witnesse to vs of our adoption. And yet presumptuously, when all the Scripture crieth out against it, they give the name of faith to such persuasion vioide of the feare of God. Wee neede to trie no further with their definition, but simply to rehearse the nature of faith, such as it is declared by the worde of God. Whereby shall plainly appear howe vnskilfully and foolishly they rather make a noise than speake of it. I haue alreadie touched parte, the rest I will addde hereafter as place shall serue. At this present I say, that there cannot bee imagined a greater absurditie, than this inuention of theirs. They will haue faith to bee an affent, whereby euery despiser of God may receive y which is vterted out of the Scripture. But first they should haue seene whether euery man of his owne power do bring faith to himselfe, or whether the holy Ghost be it a witnesse of adoption. Therefore they do childishly plaie the fools, in demanding, whether faith, which qualitie addeth doth forme, be the same faith or an other and a newe faith. Whereby appeareth certeinerly, that in so babbling they never thought of the singular gift of the holy Ghost. For the beginning of beleueing doeth alreadie conteine in it the reconciliation, whereby man approcheth to God. But if they did weye that saying of Paul: With the heart is beleueed to righteousnesse, they woulde cease to faine that same cold qualitie. If we had but this one reason, it should be sufficient to ende this contention: that the verie same affent (as I haue alreadie touched, and will againe more largely repeate) is rather of the heartes than of the braines, rather of affection than of understanding. For
For which cause it is called the obedience of faith, which is such as Lorde preferreth no kinde of obedience aboue it: and that worthily, forasmuch as nothing is more preuius to him than his trueth, which as John the Baptist witnessth, the beleuers doe as it were subfribe and feale vnto. Sith the matter is not doubtfull wee doe in one worde determinately say, that they speake fondly when they say that faith is formed by adding of godly affection vnto affent: whereas affent it selfe, at least such affent as is declared in the Scriptures, consisteth of godly affection. But yet there is an other plainer argument that offereth it selfe to bee alladge. For whereas faith embraceth Christ as hee is offered vs of the Father: and Christ is offered not onely for righteousnesse, forgiuenesse of sinnes and peace, but also for sanctification, and a fountaine of living water: without doubte no man can ever truly knowe him, vnlesse hee doe therewithall receive the sanctification of the Spirite. Or, if any man desire to haue it more plainly spoken, Faith consisteth in the knowledge of Christ. And Christ can not be known, but with sanctification of his spirite: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no meane be seuered from godly affection.

Whereas they are wont to lay this against vs, that Paul faith: If a man haue all faith, so that hee remove mountaines: if he haue not charitie, he is nothing: whereby they woulde deform faith, in spoiling it of charitie: they consider not what the Apostle in that place meaneth by faith. For when in the chapter next before it, he had spoken of the diuerse gifts of the holy Ghost, among the which hee had reckned the diuerse kinds of languages, power and prophacie, and had exhorted the Corinthians to followe the best of these gifts, that is to say, such gifts whereby more profite and commoditie might come to the whole body of the Church: hee freigthway saide further, that he woulde shew them yet a more excellent way. That all such gifts, howe excellent soeter they bee of them selues, yet are nothing to bee esteemed, vnlesse they serue charitie. For they were given to the edifying of the Church, and vnlesse they bee applied thereunto, they lose their grace. For proofe of this he particularly rehearseth them repeting the same same gifts that hee had spoken of before, but in other names. And he vseth the wordes Powers and Faith, for all one thing, that is for the power to do miracles. Sith therefore this, whether ye call it power or faith, is a particular gifte of God, which every vngodly man may both haue and abuse, as the gifte of tongues, as prophacie and other giftes of grace: it is no maruall if it bee seuered from charitie. But all the error of these men standeth in this, that where this worde Faith, hath diuerse significations, they not considering the diuerstie of the thing signified, dispute as though it were taken for one thing in all places alike. The place of James which they alledge for mainteinance of the same error, shall bee else where discusset. But although for teachinges sake, when wee meane to shew what manner of knowledge of God there is in the wicked, wee grant that there are diuerse forces of faith: yet wee acknowledge and speake of but one faith of the godly, as the Scripture teacheth. Many in deede doe beleewe that there is a God, they thinke that the Historie of the Gospell & other partes of the Scripture are true (as commonly wee are wont to judge judge of such things, as either are reported being done long ago, or such as we our selves have beene present at and scene.) There be also some that goe further, for both they beleue the word of God, to be a most assured oracle, and they doe not altogether despise his commandements, and they somewhat after a sorte are mouted with his threatninges and promises. It is in deede testified that such hath faith: but that is spoken out by abuse, because they do not with open vngodlines fight against the wordes of God, or refuse or despife it: but rather pretend a certaine shewe of obedience.

10 But this image or shadow of faith, as it is of no value, so it is not worthy of the name of faith. From the founde trueth whereof howe farre it differeth, although it shall be hereafter more largely entreated, yet there is no cause to $ contrary, why it should not now be touched by the way. It is sayde that Simon Magus beleueed, which yet within a little after bearely ed his owne vnbeliefe. And wheras it is sayde that he beleued, we doe not understande it as some doe, that he fayned a beleue when he had none in his heart, but we rather thinke that being overcome with the majesty of the Gospell, he had a certaine faith such as it was, and so acknowledged Christ to be the author of life and salvation, that he willingly confessed himselfe to be one of his. After the same manner it is sayde in the Gospell of Luke, that they beleue for a time, in whom the seed of the worde is choked vp before it bring forth fruit, or before it take any roote at all, it by and by withereth away and perisheth: we doubt not that such delited with a certaine taft of the word doe greedily receive it, and begin to feel the diuine force of it: so farre that with deceitfull counterfaiting of faith, they beguile not onely other mens eyes, but also their owne minde: For they perswade themselves, that that reverence which they shewe to the word of GOD, is most true godlinesse, because they thinke that there is no vngodlinesse but manifest and confessed reproch or contempt of his worde. But what maner of affent souer that be, it pearseth not to the very heart to remaine there stablished: and though sometime it seemeth to have taken rootes, yet those are not liuely roots. The heart of man hath so many secret corners of vanity, is full of so many hiding holes of lying, is covered with so guileful hypocrisie, that it oft deceiueh himself. But let them that glory in such shadowes of faith understand, that therein they are no better than the Deuil. But that first sort of men are farre worse than the Deuil, which doe sensely heare and understand those things for knowledge whereof the Deuils doe tremble. And the other are in this point equall with the Deuil, that the feeling such as it is whereith they are touched, turneth onely to terroure and discouragement.

11 I knowe that some thinke it heard, that we affigne faith to the reprobate, whereas Paul affirme that faith to be the fruite of election. Which doubt yet is easilie disfloshed: for though none receive the light of faith, nor doe truely see the effectuall working of the Gospell, but they that are fore-ordained to salvation: yet experience theweth that the reprobate are sometime moved with the same feeling that the elect are, so that in their owne judgement they nothing differ from the elect. Wherefore it is no absurdity, that the Apostle ascribeth to them the caufe of the heavenly gifts, that Christ ascribeth to them a faith for a time: not that they soundly perceive the spiritual force of grace and assured light of faith: but because the Lord, the more to condemn them and make them inexusable, confeyeth himselfe into their mindes so farre forth, as his goodnesse may be tasted without the spirite of adoption. If any object, that then there remaineth nothing more to the faithfull whereby to proue certesly their adoption: I answer, that though there be a great likenes and affinities betwixt, yet elect of God, and them that be endued with a falling faith for a time, yet there liueth in the elect onely that affiance which Paul speaketh of, that they cry with full mouth, Abba, Father. Therefore as God doth regenerate onely the elect with incorruptible seede for ever, so the seede of life planted in their harts neuer perisheth: so soundly doth he seale in them the grace of his adoption, that it may be stable and sure. But this withstandeth not but that that other inferior working of the Spirit may haue his course, even in the reprobate. In the meane seafon, his faithfull are taught, carefully and humbly to examine themselves, least in seede of assurednesse of faith, do crepe in careless confidence of the flesh. Beside that, the reprobates do neuer conceiue but a confused feeling of grace, so that they rather take hold of the shadow there of the founde body, because the holy Spiritte doth properly feale the remission of sinnes in the elect onely, so that they apply it by special faith to their seale. But yet it is truly said, that the reprobate beleue God to be mercifull vnto the, because they receive the gift of reconciliation, although confusedly and not plainly enough: nor that they are partakers of the selle same faith or regeneration with the children of God, but because they feeme to haue as well as they, the same beginning of faith, ynder a cloke of Hypocrifte. And I deny not, that God doth so farre giue light vnto their minde, that they acknowledge his grace, but he maketh that same feeling so different from the peculiar testimony which he giueth to his elect, that they never come to the founde effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore shewe himself mercifull vnto them, for that he hauing truly deliuered them from death, doth receiue them to his safegarde, but onely he discloseth to them a present mercy. But he vouchsafteth to giue to the only elect his liuely roote of faith, so that they continue to the ende. So is that objection answered, if God do truely shewe his grace, that the same remaineth perpetuallly established, for that there is no cause to the contrary, but that God may enlighten some with a present feeling of his grace, which afterwarde vanishteth away.

12 Allo though faith be a knowledge of Gods kindenesse towad vs, and an assured persuasion of the truth thereof: yet it is no martel that the feeling of Gods loue in temporall things doth vanisht away: which although it haue an affinitie with faith, yet doth it much differ from faith. I grant, the will of God is vnchangeable, and the truth thereof doth alway stedfastly agree with it selfe, but I deny that the reprobate doe procede so farre as to attayne vnto that secrete revelation, which the Scripture sayeth to belong to the electe onely. Therefore I deny that they doe either conceiue the will of GOD as it is vnchangeable, or doe stedfastly embrace the truth thereof,because they abide in a feeling that vanishteth away.
Like as a tree that is not planted deepe enough to take liuely rootes, in proffesse of time waxeth drie, although for a fewe yeares it bringeth forth not onely blossomes and leaues but also fruit. Finally, as by the fall of the first man, the Image of God might have been blotted out of his minde, & soule, so it is no maruell, if God doe shine vpon the reprobate with certaine beames of his grace, which afterwarde he suffereth to be quenched. And there is no cause to the contrarie, but that hee may lightly overwath some, and throughly hose other some with the knowledge of his Gospell. This is in the mean time to be holden for trueth, that howe small and weake fo- cueur faith be in the elect, yet because it is to them a sure pleadge of the spi- rite of God, and a scale of their adoption, the pripte thereof can never bee blotted out of their heartes: as for the reprobate, that they are over- spred with such a light as afterwarde commeth to nought. And yet the Sprite is not deceitfull,because he gueth not life to the seede that hee ca- steth in their heartes, to make it abide always incorruptible, as he doth in the elect. I goe yet further, for whereas it is evident by the teachinge of Scripture and by dayly experience, that the reprobate are sometime touch- ed with the feeling of Gods grace, it must needs be that there is raised in their heartes a certaine desire of mutuall loue. So for a time their liued in Saul a godly affeccion to loue God, by whome he knewe himselfe to be fatherly handled, and therefore was delighted with a certaine sweetness of his goodnesse. But as the persuasion of the fatherly loue of God is not fast rooted in the reprobate, so doe they not soundly loue him againe as his children, but are led with a certaine affection like hired seruantes. For to Christ onely was the spirite of loue gien, to this ende, that he should poure it into his members. And truely that saying of Paul extendeth no further, but to the elect onely: The loue of God is poured abroad into our heartes by the holy Spirite that is giuen vs, even the same loue that ingendrath the same confidence of calling vpon him, which I haue before touched. As on the contrarie side we see God to be maruellously angrie with his chil- dren, whome yet hee castrith not to loue: not that in himselfe hee hateth them, but because his will is to make them afaide with the feeling of his wrath, to the intent to abare their pride of flese, to shake of their drou- sinesses, and to moue them to repentance. And therefore al at onse time they conceiue him to be both angrie with them or with their sinnes, and also mercifull vnto them: because they not fainedly doe pray to appease his wrath, to whome yet they fleec with quiete assurred trueth. Hereby it ap- peareth that it is not true that some doe counterfaite a shewe of faith, whiche yet doe lacke the true fayth, but while they are caried with a So- dayne violent motion of Zeale, they deceiue themselues with false opinion. And it is no doubte that sluggishness lo possessth them, that they doe not well examine their heart as they ought to haue done. It is like- ly that they were such to whome (as John witnesseth) Christ did not com- mitte him selfe when yet they beleived in him: because hee knewe them all, and knew what was in man. If many did not fall from the common faith (I call it common,because the faith that lasteth but a time hath a great like- nesse and affinitie with the liuely & continuing faith) Christ would not haue faide.

Ioh. 8. 31. saide to his Disciples: If ye abide in my worde, then are ye truly my Disciples, and yee shall knowe the trueth, and the trueth shall make you free. For hee speaketh to them that had embraced his doctrine, and exhorteth them to the increase of faith, that they should not by their owne sluggishe ness quench the light that is given them. Therefore dooth Paul affirme, that faith peculiarly belongeth to the elect, declaring that many vanishe away, because they haue not taken liuely root. Like as Christ also faith in Matthew: every tree that my father hath not planted, shall bee rooted vp. In other there is a greater kinde of lying, they are not ashamed to mocke both God and men. James inuieueth against that kinde of men, that with deceitful pretence doe wickedly abuse faith. Neither woulde Paul require of the children of God a faith vnfaigned, but in respect that manie doe presumptuously challenge vnto themselves that which they haue not, and with vaine coloured deceit to beguile other or sometime themselves. Therefore he compriseth a good confidence to a cheshe wherein faie this is kept, because manie in falling from good confidence, haue suffered shipwracke of their faith.

13 We must also remember the doubtfull signification of the word faith. For oftentimes faith signifieth the founde doctrine of religion, as in the place that we nowe alledge, and in the same Epistle where Paul will haue Deacons to holde faie the mysteries of faith in a pure confidence. Againe, where he publisheth the falling away of certaine from the faith. But on the other side he saith that Timothie was nourished vp with the worde of faith. Againe, where hee faith that prohpane vanities and oppositions, falsely named sciences, are the cause that manie depaule from the faith: whom in another place he calleth reprobate touching faith. As againe he chargeth Titus, saying, Warne them that they be found in the faith. By foundenesse he meaneth nothing else but purenesse of doctrine, which is easily corrupted and brought out of kinde by the lightnesse of men. Even because in Christ, whom faith poelesteth, are hidden all the treasures of wisedome and knowledge: therefore faith is worthily extended to signifie the whole summe of heavenly doctrine, from which it can not be seuered. Contrariwise sometime it is restraine to signifie some particular object, as when Matthew faith, that Christ faie the faith of them that did let downe the man sickle of the palle through the tiles and Christ himselfe crieth out that hee founde not in Israel so great faith as the Centurion brought. But it is likly that the Centurion was earneftlie bent to the healing of his daughter, the care whereof occupied all his minde: yet because being contented with the onely assent and aunswere of Christ, hee required not Christes bodilie presence, therefore in respect of this circumsaintance his faith was so much commend. And a little here before we haue shewed, that Paul taketh faith for the gift of working miracles, which gift they haue neither are regenerate by the Spirite of God, nor do hartily worship him. Also in another place to secteth faith for the doctrine whereby wee are instructed in faith. For where wee writeth that faith shall be abolished, it is out of question that that is meant by the ministrie of the Church, which at this time is profitable for our weakenesse. In these forms of speach standeth a portiportional relation. But when the name of faith is unproperly removed, to signify a false profession, or a lying title of faith, that should seeme to be as harde a figurative abuse, as when the fear of God is set for a corrupt and wrongfull manner of worshipping, as when it is oftentimes said in the holy History, that the foraine nations which had beene transplanted into Samaria and the places bordering thereabout, feared the fained Gods & the God of Israel, which is as much as to mingle heauen and earth together. But now our question is, What is that faith which maketh the children of God different from the vnbelieuers, by which we call vpon God by the name of our Father, by which we passe from death to life, and by which Christ the eternall salvation and life dwellithe in vs. The force and nature thereof I thinke I have shortly and plainly declared.

14 Now let vs againe go through all the partes of it, even from the beginning, which being diligently examined, (as I thinke) there shall remaine nothing doutfull. When in defining faith we call it a knowledge, we meane not thereby a comprehending, such as men vfe to haue of those things that are subiect to mans vnderstanding. For it is so farre above it, that mans wit must go beyond & surmount it selfe to come vnto it. yea, & when it is come vnto it, yet doth it not attaine to that which it feeleth, but while it is perused of that which it conceiueth not, it vnderstandeth more by the very assuredness of persuasion, than if it did with mans owne capacitie throughly perceiue any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paul saith very well, where he calleth it to comprehende what is the length, breadth, depth, & heighth, & to know the loute of Chrifl that farre surmounteth knowledge. For his meaning was to signifie, that the thing which our minde conceiued by faith, is every way infinite, and that this kinde of knowledge is farre hyer than all vnderstanding. But yet because the Lorde hath disclofed to his Saintes the secretes of his will which was hidden from ages and generations, therefore by good reason faith is in Scripture sometime called an acknowleding; and John calleth it a certaine knowledge, where he testifieth, that the faithfull do certainly know that they are the children of God. And vndoubtedly they knowe it assuredly; but rather by being confirmed by persuasion of Gods trueth, than by being informed by naturall demonstration. And this also the words of Paul do declare saying, that while wee dwell in the bodie, wee are wandering abroad from the Lord, because we walke by faith and not by sight: whereby he sheweth that those things which we vnderstand by faith, are yet absent from vs and are hidden from our sight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowledge of faith standeth rather in certaine then in comprehending.

15 We further call it, a sure and stedfaft knowledge, to expresse thereby a more sound constancie of persuasion. For as faith is not contented with a doutfull and rowling opinion, so is it also not contented with a darke & entangled vnderstanding; but requireth a full & fixed assurednes, such as men are wont to haue of things found by experience and proved. For vnbelieue stalketh so fast and is so deepe rooted in our hearts, and we are so bent vnto it, that this which all men confesse with their mouth to be true, that God is faithfull, no man is without great contention persuaded in his heart. Specia cally when he commeth to the proofe, then the wauering of all men dis closeth the fault that before was hidden. And not without cause the Scripture with so notable titles of commendation mainteinneth the authoritie of the word of God, but endeououreth to giue remedy for the aforesaid diseas, that God may obtainge to be fully beleeued of vs in his promises. The words of the Lord (faith David) are pure wordes, as the Siluer tried in a fomace of earth, fined seven times. Againe, The word of the Lorde fined is a shield to all that trust in him. And Salomon confirming the fame, & in a maner in the same words, faith: Every word of God is pure. But sith the whole 119. Psalm entreateth only in a manner upon the same, it were superfluous to alleage any mo places. Truely so oft as God doth so commend his word vnfo vs, he dothing therein by the way reproche vs with our vnbeleeuingneffe: because that commendation tendeth to no other ende, but to roote vp al perturfe doutings out of our hearts. There bee also many which so conceive the mercy of God, that they take little comfort thereof. For they be euen therewithall pinched with a miserable carefulnesse, while they doute whether hee will be merciful to them or no, because they enclose within too narrow bounds the very same mercifullenesse, of which they thinke themselves most affuredly persaued. For thus they think with themselves, that his mercie is in deedes great & plentiful poured vpun many, offring it selues & ready for al men: but that it is not cernaine whether it wil extend vnfo them or no, or rather whether they shall attaine vnfo it or no. This thought when it stayeth in the mid race, is but an halfe. Therefore it doth not so confirme the spirit with affurred quietnes, as it doth trouble it with vnquiet doutfulnesse.
But there is a far other feeling of full assurednesse, which in the Scriptures is alway aigned to faith, euyn such a one as plainly setting before vs the goodnes of God, doth clearly put it out of doute. And that cannot be, but that we must needs truely feel & proue in our selues the sweetenesse thereof.
And therefore the Apostle out of faith deuicieth assured confidence, & out of it againe boldnesse. For thus he faith, That by Christ we haue boldnesse, and an entrance with confidence, which is through faith in him. By which words truely he sheweth, that it is no right faith, but when wee are bolde with quiet minds to shew our selues in the presence of God. Which boldnesse procedeth not but of assured confidence of Gods good wil & our sal-uation. Which is so true, y many times this word Faith, is vsed for Confidence.
16 But hereupon hangeth the chiefe stay of our faith, that wee doe not think the promises of mercie which the Lord offreth to be true onely in o-other beside vs, & not at all in our selues: but rather that in inwardly embacing them, we make them our own. From hence proceedeth that confidence which the fame Paul in another place calleth peace, vnlesse from had rather say, that peace is derived of it. It is an assurednesse that maketh y confidence quiet & chereful before God, without which the conscience must of necréfitie be vexed, & in a maner torne in pieces with troublesome trembling, vnlesse perhaps it do forget God & it selue, and so slumber a little while. And I may truely say, For a little while, for it doth not long enioy that miserable forgetfulness, but is with often recourse of the remembrance of Gods judgment sharply tormentted. Briefely, there is none truely faithfull, but hee
that being persuaded with a found assuredness that God is his merciful and loving father, doth promise himselfe all things upon trust of God's goodness: and none but he that trusting upon the promises of God's good will toward him, conceiueth an undoubted looking for of salvation: as the Apostle declareth in these words: if we keepe sure to the end our confidence and glorying of hope. For hereby he meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lord, but he that with confidence giorieth that he is heire of the kindgome of heaven. There is none (I say) faithfull, but he that leaning upon the assuredness of his owne salvation, both confidently triumph upon the Decuill and death, as we are taught by that notable concluding sentence of Paul: I am persuaded (saith he) that neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shalbe able to separate vs from y love of God, wherewith he embraceth vs in Christ Jesus. And in like manner, the same Apostle thinketh, that the eyes of our minde are by no other meanes well lightened, vnlesse we see what is the hope of the eternall inheritance to which we are called. And ech where his common maner of teaching is such, that he declareth that no other wise we doe not well comprehend the goodnesse of God, vnlesse we gather of it the frute of greate assuredness.

17 But some man will say, faithfull do find by experience a farre other thing within themselves, which in recording the grace of God toward them, are not only tempted with vnquietnesse, which oftentimes chaunceth into them, but also are sometime shaken with most grievous terrours: so great is the vehement of temptations to throwe downe their mindest: which thing seemeth not sufficiently well to agree with that assurednesse of faith. Therefore this doubt must be answered, if we will have our aforesayde doctrine to stand. But truely, when we teach that faith ought to be certaine and assured, wee doe not imagine such a certaintie as is touched with no doubting, nor such an assurednesse as is assailed with no carefullnesse: but rather wee say, that the faithfull hace a perpetuall strife with their owne distrustfullnesse. So farre be we from settling their consciences in such a peaseable quietnesse, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other side we say, that in what sorte soever they be afflicted, they do never fail and depart from that assured confidence which they haue conceived of the mercy of God. The Scripture fretteth forth no example of faith more plaine, or more notable than in Dauid, specially if a man beholde the whole continuall course of his life. But yet howe he was not alwaye of quiete minde, himselfe declareth by innumerable complaintes, of which at this time it shalbe sufficient to choose out a fewe. When he reprocheth his owne soule with troublesome motions, what is it else but that he is angry with his owne vnbeleeuingnesse? Why tremblest thou my soule (sayth he) and why art thou disquieted within me? trust in God. And truly y fame discouragement was a plaine token of destruction, even as if he thought himselfe to be forsaken of God. And in an other place we reade a larger confession there-of, where he sayth: I sayd in my ouerthrowe, I am cast out from the sight of thy eyes. Also in an other place he w disputeth himselfe in carefull miserable perplexity yea and quarelleth of the very nature of God, saying: Hath God
Of the maner how to receive

Ps. 77.10. God forgotten to haue mercy? will he cast of for euer? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I haue fayde, To die is mine: charges are of the right hande of the hieft. For, as in despaire he condemmeth himselfe to destuction, and not only confefteth himselfe to be tossed with douting, but as if he were vanquished in battell, he leaueeth nothing to himselfe, because God hath forfaken him, and hath turned to deftoy him, the fame hand that was wont to be his helper. Wherefore not without cause he exhorteeth his soule to returne to her quietnesse, because he had founde by experience, that he was tossed among troublesome waues. And yet (which is marueilous) in all these assaults, faith yfholdeth the heartes of the godly, and is truly like unto a Date tree to endeuour and rise vpward against all burdennes, how great fooner they be: as Dauid when he might feeme to be verilly overwhelmed, yet in rebuking himselfe, caufeth not to rise vp to God. And truely he that striuing with his owne weakenesse, reforoeth to faith in his troubles, is already in a maner conquerour. Which may be gathered by this sentence and other like: Waite for the Lorde, be strong, he shall strengthen thy heart: wait for the Lord. He reprocheth himselfe of fearefullnes, and in repeating the same twife, confefteth himselfe to be somtimes subject to many troublesome motions. And in the mean time he doth not onely become displeased with himselfe in these faultes, but earnestlie endeauoureth to amendement. Truly if wee will more neerely by good examination compare him with Achatz, there halbe found greater difference. Elsy was sent to bring remedy to the carefull grieue of the wicked king & hypocrite, and spake vnto him in these words: Be in safegarde and be quiet: feare not, &c. But what did Achatz? As it was before fayde, that his heart was moued as the trees of the wood are shaken with winde, though he heard the promife, yet he ceafe not to quake for feare. This therefore is the proper reward and punishment of vnbelief, so to tremble for feare, that in temptation he turneth himselfe away from God,y doth not open to himselfe the gate by faith. Contrariwise the faithful whom the weightie burden of temptations makes to floupe, and in a maner oppreffeth, do constantly rise vp, although not without trouble and hardinesse. And because they know their owne weakenesse, they pray with the Prophet: Take not the worde of truth away from my mouth continually. By which worde we are taught, that somtime they become dumme as though their faith were verilly overthrown,yet they faim not, nor tread their backes, but proceede in their battell, & with praiie do encourage their flouthfulnesse, leaft by fauling themseues they should growe to vnfeifiable dulleffe.

Ps. 116.7. For the ynderstanding thereof, it is needfull to returne to that diuifion of the flesh and the spirite, whereof we made mention in another place, which doth in this behalfe most clearely appeare. The godly heart therefore feeleth a diuision in it selfe, which is partly delited with sweeteenes by acknowledging of the goodnes of God, and partly grieved w bitterness by feeling of his owne misery, partly refeth vpon the promife of the Gospell, and partly trembleth by reason of the testimony of his owne wickednesse: partly rejoyseth with conceiuing of life, and partly quakeith for feare of death.
Which variation commeth by imperfecton of faith, forasmuch as we neuer be be in so good case in the course of this present life, as being healed from all disease of distrustfulness to be altogether filled and possessed with faith.
Hereupon proceed those battles, when the distrustfulness that abideth in the remnants of the flesh, riseth vp to assaile the faith that is inwardly concealed. But if in a faithfull minde assuredness be mixed with doubtfulness, come we not then alway to this point, that faith standeth not in a certaine & clear knowledge, but in a dark & doubtfully entangled knowledge of Gods will toward vs? No, not so. For though we be diversely drawn with fun-dry thoughts, yet are we not therefore by and by seuered from faith, though we be vexed with tossing vp & downe of distrustfulness, yet are we not therfore drowned in the bottomlesse depth thereof: and though wee be shaken, yet be we not thrust down out of our place. For this is alway the end of this battel, that faith doth at length with wraftling overcome those harde troubles wherewith when she is so besieged, she seemeth to be in danger.

19 Let this be the summe of all. So soone as any drop of faith, be it neer so small, is poured into our hearts, wee by and by begin to beholde the face of God milde and pleasant, and loyning toward vs: yet the same wee see from a farre off, & farre distant from vs, but with so sure sight, that we knowe we are not deceived. From thenceforward, how much we profit (as we ought continually to profit) as it were by proceeding further, wee come vnto so much the neerer, & therefore certainer beholding of him, & by very continuance he is made more familiar vnto vs. So we see, that the minde enlightened with the knowledge of God, is first helden wrapped in much ignorance, which by little & little is wiped away. Yet the same minde is not so hindered by being ignorant of some things, or by darkely seeing which she seeth, but that she enjoyeth a clear knowledge of Gods will toward her, which is the first and principal point in faith. For as if a man being shut vp in prison, haue beames of the sunne shinning in, sildelong at a narrowe windowe, or as it were but halfe glummering, he wanteth in deede the free beholding of the Sunne, yet he seeth with his eyes an undoubted brightness thereof, and receiueneth the vfe of it: so we being bound with the fetters of an earthly body, howsoever wee be on eche side shadowed with much darkenes, yet we are sufficiently enlightened vnto perfect assuredness, by the light of God, extending his beames of light vpon vs, though it be but a little, to shewe forth his mercie.

20 Both these pointes the Apostle very well teacheth in divers place.

For when he faith, that we know vnperfectly, and prophetic vnperfectly, & see by a darke speaking as by a glasse, he sheweth how slender a little portion of the true godly wisdome is giuen vs in this present life. For though those wordes do not expressely sheweth that our faith is vnperfect so long as wee groane vnnder this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth vnto vs by our owne imperfection we haue need to be continually exercised in learning, yet he secretly declareth that that thing which is infinite, cannot be com-prehended by our small capacitie, and narrow compasse. And this Paul re-porteth of the whole church, but vnto euery one of vs, his owne dulness be an hinderance and stay that he cannot come so neere as were to be wished.
But how sure and vndeceivable a taste of it felle, eu en a small drop of faith

Bb 3   docth
2 Cor. 3. 18. doth make vs feel, the same Apos- tle sheweth in another place, where hee affirmeth, that by the Gospel wee behold the glorie of God with uncoured face, hauing no veile betweene vs and it, so effectually that we be transformed into the same image. In such entanglements of ignorance there must needs be wrapped together both much douting and fearfull trembling, specially forasmuch as our heart, by a certaine natural instinct of it selfe, is enclined to vnbelieuingness. Beside that, there be tentations which both infinite in number, and divers in kinde, do oftentimes with great so-daine violence assaile vs. But specially our owne conscience oppreßed with heavy burden of finnes lying vpon it, dooth sometime lament and grone w it selfe; and sometime accuseth it selfe: sometime secretlye murmureth, and sometime is openly troubled. Whether therefore aduersities doe shew an appearance of the wrath of God, or the conscience doth finde in it selfe any proove or matter of his wrath, from thence vnbeliefe doth take weapons & engines to vanquish faith withall: which are alway directed to this ende, yet wee thinking God to be our aduersarie and hatefully bent against vs, should both not hope for any helpe at his hande, and also be afraid of him as of our deadly enemie.

21 To beare these assaults, faith, doth arme and forseke her selfe with his word of God. And when such a tentation assaileth, that God is our enyme, because he is sharpe against vs: faith on the other side answereth, that euen when he punisheth he is also mercifull, because his chasticement commeth rather of loue than of wrath. When faith is striken with this thought, that god is a revenger of iniquities, against that stroke he setteth his pardon readie for all offences, so oft as the sinner forsetteth to the mercifullness of the Lord. So a godly minde howsoever it be in meruailous wife tossed & vexed, yet at length rифeth vp above all dangers, & neuer suffereth the confidence of Gods mercy to be plucked away from it: But rather whatsoever contentions do trouble & wearie it, in the end they turne to the assurednes of this confidence. And hereof is this a profess that the holy ones, when they think themselves most of all pressed with the vengeance of God, yet euen then do make their complaints to the same God: and when it seemeth that they shall not be heard at all, euen then euermetheless they call vpon him. For to what purpose were it, to make their moane to him from whose they hoped for no comfort:truly they would neuer finde in their hearts to call vpon him, vnlesse they beleued that there were some helpe at his hand prepared for them. So the Disciples, in whom Christ blameth their smallnesse of faith, complained in deed that they perished, but yet they called to him for help.
And when he rebuke them for their small faith, yet he dooth not reject them from the number of his, nor maketh them of the number of the vnbelieuers, but stirreth them to shake off the fault. Therefore we affirme againe which wee haue above spoken, that the roote of faith is neuer plucked out of a godly heart, but sticketh so fast in the bottome, that howsoever it be shaken & seeme to bend this way or that way, the light thereof is so neuer quenched or choked vp, but that it lieth at lease hidden vnnder some embers: and by this token is plainly shewed, that the worde which is an inccorrup-tible seede, bringeth forth fruits like to it selfe, the spring whereof doth neuer neuer wither and utterly perish. For whereas this is the extremest matter of defeire to the holy ones, to seale according to the consideration of present thinegs, the hande of God bent to their destruction: yet Job affirmeth that his hope shall proceed so farre, that though God do kill him, yet hee will not therefore cease to trust in him. This is the truth therefore: Vmbeliefe reigneth not within the heartes of the godly, but outwardly affaileth them: neither doth the deadly wound them with her weapons, but onely troubleth them, or so hurteth them, that yet the wound is curable. For faith, as Paul teacheth, vertue vs for a shield that being holden vp against weapons, doth so receive the force of them, that it either vertely driueth them backe, or at least so breaketh their violence, that they can not pearce them to danger of life. Therefore when faith is shaken, it is like as if a strong souliour with the violent stroke of a dart be compelled to remove his foote, and giue ground a little: and when faith it selfe is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by some stroke be in some part broken, but yet so that it is not striken through. For alway the godly minde will attaine to rife thus his as to say with David, If I walke in the midst of the shadowe of death, I will fear none euell, because thou art with me. It is in deed terrible to walke in the darkenes of death, & it can not be but that the faithfull, how much strength souer they have, must be afraide of it. Yet because this thought surmounteth it, they have God present with them, and providing for their safety, that fear is o-uercome with affurednesse. For (as Augustine sayth) howe great engines soouer the deuill raiseth vp against vs, so long as he pouleth not the place of the heart, where faith dwelleth, he is cast out of the dores. And so if wee may judge by the suuccesse, the faithfull not only ecape safe from every battell, so that by and by receiving fresch courage they are ready to come again into the fielde: but also that is fulfilled which John faith in his canonicall Epistle: This is the victorie that ouercometh the worlde, even your faith.
For he affirmeth that it shal not onely win, the victorie in one or few battels, or against some one assault, but also that it shal get the oue:hand of ye whole world, although it be a thousand times affaile.

22 There is another kind of feare and trembling, but such a one as by it the affurednesse of faith is so nothing at all diminishe, that therby it is the more soundly stablished. That is, when the faithfull either in thinking that the examples of Gods vengeance against the wicked are shewed for lessons for them to learne by, do carefuly beware that they happen not to prouoke Gods wrath against themselfes with the same offences: or recording with themselves their own misery, do learne to hange altogether vpon the Lord without whom they see themselfes to be more fickell and sooneer vanishing than any blast of winde. For when the Apostlle, in setting forth the sours-ges wherewith the Lorde in olde time had punished the people of Israel,put-teth the Corinthians in feare that they entangle not themselves with like e-uits: he doth not therby abate their affiance, but only shaketh away the dulness of the fleshe by which faith is wont more to be oppresse and strengthened.
And when he taketh occasion of the Iewes fall to exhorte him that standeth, to take heed he fall not, he doth not therby bid vs to ouer, as though we were not fully assured of our stedfastnes, but only he taketh away
Of the manner how to receive arrogat presumption and rash trusting too much in our owne strength, that after the trusting out of the Iewes, the Gentiles being received into their place, should not too much outragiously triumph against them. Albeit he speaketh there not only to the faithfull, but also in y same saying comprehended the Hypocrites ȝ gloried only in outward shewe. For neither doth he admonish every man particularly, but making a comparison between y Iewes and the Gentils, after that he had shewed y the Iewes in this that they were rejected, did suffer such judgemen't for their vnbelieve & vnthankfulnes, he also exhorted the Gentils that they should not, by being proud and extolling themselves, loose the grace of adoption lately conveyed into them. But as in that general rejecting of the Iewes, there remained yet some ȝ were not fallen from the covenent of adoption, so out of the Gentiles there might arise some, which without true faith, should be puffed vp onely with foolish confidence of the flesh, & so abuse Gods loving kindnes to their own destruction. But although you take this as spoken to the elect and faithfull, yet thereupon shall follow no inconuenienc. For it is one thing to hold downe the rash presumption which out of the remnantes of the flesh creepeth sometime eu'n into the holy ones, that with vaine confidence it waxe not outrageousely wanting: and an other thing to strik the conscience with feare, that it rest not with full assurednes in the mercy of God.

Phil. 2.12. 23 Then, when he teacheth, ȝ with feare and trembling we should worke our owne salvation, he requireth nothing else, but that we should accustome vs with much abacing of our selves, reuerently to looke vp into the mightines of God. For truely nothing doth so much awake vs to cast all our confidence and assurance of mind upon the Lord as doth the distrust of our selves and carefulnesse conceiued by knowledge in conscience of our own wretchiness. And according to this meaning is that saying in the Prophete to be taken: In the multitude of thy goodnesse I will enter into thy temple: I will worship in feare. Where he comly conioyneth the boldnes of faith that leaneth upon Gods mercy with a reverent feare, which we must needs feele so oft as coming into the sight of Gods majesty, we perceiue by the glorious brightnesse thereof, how great is our owne filthines. And Salomon faith truly, where he pronounceth the man blessed, that continually makest his owne heart afraide, for by hardning thereof men fall headlong into evil. But such feare he meaneth as may make vs more heedfull, not such whereby we should be troubled and vterly fai: eu'n such a feare as when the mind confounded in it felfe, doth recourer it felfe againe in God: when despairing it felfe, it requiurth by trust in him. Therfore there is no caufe to the contrary, but that the faithfull may at one time both be in feare, and also enjoy most assured comfort, in respect ȝ sometime they turne their eyes to behold their owne vanity, and sometime they cast the thought of their minde upon the truth of God. But how( will some man say) shall feare and faith dwell both in one minde eu'n thus, as contrarily vn sensible dulnesse, and carefulnesse. For whereas the wicked travaile to procure to themselfe a want of grief, that no feare of God might trouble them, yet, the judgement of God so preffeth them, that they can not attaine that which they desire. So there is nothing to withstand, but that God may exercise them that be his to humility, that that in fighting valiantly, they may restrained themselves under the bridle of modesty. And by the process of the text it appeareth, that this was the content of the Apostle, where he assigneth the cause of fear, and trembling to be the good pleasure of God, whereby he gieeth to them that be his both to will well, and valiantly to goe through with it. According to this meaning ought we to take that laying of the Prophete: The children of Israel shall fear God and his goodnes: because not only, godliness engendreth the reverence of God, but the very sweetenesse and pleasant tast of grace, filleth man being discouraged in himselfe with fear and admiration, to make him hang upon God, and humbly yeede himselfe subject to his power.

24 Yet we do not hereby make roome to that most pestilent Philosophy, which many halfe papistes at this day beginne to coyne in corners. For, because they can not defende that grosse doutfulness which hath bin taught in schooles, they flie to an other deuise, to make a confidence mingled with diuertfulnesse. They confesse, that so oft as we looke vnto Chriift, wee finde in him full matter to hope well: but because we are always vnworthy of those good things that are offered vs in Chriift, they would haue vs to wauer and stagger in beholding of our own vnworthines. Briefly, they place confidence to betwene hope and fear, that it altereth from the one to the other, by enterchangeable times and courfes: & they so compare faith and hope together, that when the one springeth vp, the other is pressed downe, when the one ariseth, the other againe falleth. So when Satan seeth y those open engines wherewith before time he was wont to destroy the asurednes of faith, do now nothing preuaile, he endeoureth by crooked underminingsto ouerthrowe it. But what maner of confidence shall that be, which shall now and then yeeld to desperation? If (say they) thou confider Chriift, there is assured saluation: but if thou returne to thy selfe, there is assur'd damnation. Therefore of necessitate diuertful and good hope must by enterchangable courfes reigne in thy minde: As though wee ought to imagine Christ standing a farre of, and not rather dwelling within vs. For therfore we looke for saluation at his hande, not because he appeareth a farre of vnto vs, but because he hath graffed vs into his body, & so maketh vs partakers not only of all his good things, but also of himselfe. Therfore I thus turne this their argument against themselves: If thou confider thy selfe, there is certaine damnation. But because Christ with all his good things is by way of communicating so giuen vnto thee that all his things are made thine, and thou art made a member of him, yea and all one with him: his rightcousnesse drowneth thy finnes, his saluation taketh away thy damnation: hee by his worthines commeth betwene thee and God, that thy vnworthinesse come not in the sight of God. Briefly, this is the truth: we ought neither to separate Christ from vs, nor from him, but with both handes to hold fast that fellowship whereby he hath coupled himselfe vnto vs. So the Apostle teacheth vs: The body in deede (sayth he) is dead by reason of finnes: but the Spirit of Christ that dwelleth in you, is life for rightcousnesse. According to these men, trifling deuise he should haue sayde, Chriift in deede hath life with himselfe: but you, as you be sinners, remaine subject to death and damnation. But he saith farre otherwise. For he teacheth that that damnation which we deserve of our felues, is swallowed vp by the salvation of Christ, and to prove it, he vsteth the same reason that I have alleaged, because Christ is not without vs, but dwelleth within vs, and cleaueeth vnto vs not onely with vndiuible knot of fellowship, but with a certaine marueulous communion daily more and more greweth with vs into one body, till he be made altogether one with vs. And yet I denie not, as I haue sado a little before, that sometime there happen certaine interruptions of faith, as the weaknesses thereof is among violent fodieine motions bowed hither or thither. So in the thicke mist of temptation the light thereof is choked, but what so euer happeneth, it ceaseth not from endeuentour to seeke God.

25 And no otherwise doth Bernard argue, when he purposely intrateath of this question in his fift Homely in the Dedication of the temple. Oftentimes (I say) by the benefit of God studying vpon the soule, me thinke I find in it two things as it were contrary. If I beholde the soule it selfe, as it is in it selfe and of it selfe, I can say nothing more truely of it, than that it is utterly brought to naught. What neede I now to rekeon vp particularly all the miseries of the soule, how it is loaden with sinnes, covered with darkness, entangled with deceitfull entifementes, itching with lustes, subiect to passions, filled with illusions, alway enclined to euill, bente to all kinds of vice, finally full of shame and confusion? Now if all the very righteousnesses of it being looked vpon by the light of truth be found like a cloth stained with flowres, then what shall the unrighteousnesse thereof be accounted? If the light that is in vs be darkness, how great shall the very darkness be? What then? without doubt man is made like vnto vanity: man is brought to naught: man is nothing. But howe then is he utterly nothing, whom God doth magnifie? How then is he nothing, toward whom Gods heart is set? Brethren, let vs take heart againe. Though we be nothing in our owne heartes, peradventure there may somwhat of vs lie hidden in the heart of God. O father of mercies? O father of the miserable, how dost thou set thy heart toward vs? For thy heart is where thy treasure is. But howe be thy treasure, if we be nothing? All nations are so before thee as if they were not, they shalbe reputed as nothing. Even before thee, not within thee: so in the judgement of thy truth, but not in the affection of thy pitie. Thou callest those things that are not, as though they were. Therefore both they are not, because thou callest those things that are not, and also they are because thou callest them. For though they are not, in respect of the felues, yet with thee they are, according to that saying of Paul, not of the worke of righteousness, but of him that calleth. And then he faith, that this coupling together of both considerations is marueulous. Truely those things that are knit together, doe not the one destroy the other. Which also in the conclusion he more plainly declarith in these wordes. Now if with both these considerations we diligently looke vpon our felues what we be, yea in the one consideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, I thinke our glorying seemeth to be tempered, but peradventure it is more encreased. Truely it is perfectly stablished, that we glory not in our felues but in the Lorde. If we thinke thus: if he hath determined to saue vs, we shall by and by be delivered: now in this we we may take courage. But let us climb vp into a hier watche toure, & seeke for the citie of God, seeke for the temple, seeke for the house, seeke for the spouse. I have not forgotten, but I say it with feare and reuerence, wee I say be but in the heart of God. Wee be, but by his allowing as worthie, not by our owne worthines.

26 Nowe, the feare of the Lorde, whereof commonly in euery place witness is borne to al the holy ones, and which is in some places called the beginning of wisedome, and in some places wisedome it selfe, although it be but one, yet it proceedeth from a double vnderstanding. For God hath in himselfe the reverence both of a father and of a Lorde. Therefore hee that will truely worshippe him, will endeauour to sweewe himselfe both an obedient sonne and a serviable seruauant vnto him. The obedience that is given to him as to a father, The Lord by the Prophete calleth honour: the servitue that is done to him as to a lord, he calleth feare. The sonne (faith he) honoreth the father, and the seruauant the lorde. If I be a father, where is my honour? If I bee a lorde, where is my feare? But howe soever hee putteth difference betwene them, thou seest how he confoundeth them both together. Therefore let the feare of the Lord be vnto vs a reverence mingled with that fame honour and feare. Neither is it any maruell if one minde receive both those affections. For hee that considereth with himselfe what a father Godis vnto vs, hath cause enough, although there were no hells at al, why he should dread his displeasure more grceously then any death. But also (such is the wantonness of our flethe to runne to licentiousnesse of sinning,) to restraine the same by all meanes, wee ought therewithall to take holde of this thought, that the Lorde vnder whose power wee lye, abhorreth all iniquity, whose vengeancence they shall not escape, that in living wickedly doe prouoke his wrath against themselfes.

27 But that which John faith, that feare is not in charitie, but perfect charitie calleth our feare, because feare conteyneth punishment, disagree-th not with this that we say. For the wicked feare not God in this respect that they dread to incurre his displeasure, if they might doe it without punishment: but because they know him to be armed with power to reuenge: therefore they thake for feare at the hearing of his wrath. And alfo they doe feare his wrath, because they thinke that it hangeth over them, for they looke euery moment when it shall fall vpon their heads. As for the faithfull: they (as is abowe faide) both feare his displeasure more than punishment, and are not troubled with feare of punishment as if it did hang over their neckes, but they are made the more ware not to procure it. So saith the Apostle, when he speaketh to the faithfull: Be ye not deceived: for this commeth thy wrath of God vpon the children of vnbeliefe. He threateneth not thy Gods wrath wil come vpon the, but puttest the in mind to think vpon this, thy the wrath of God is prepared, for such wicked doinges as he had recited, they theselues should not be willing also to proove it. Albeit it feldome happeneth that the reprobate be awakened with onely and bare threateninges, but rather being alreadie grosse and vnsensible dul with their owne hardenes, so oftes God thundreth from heauen they harden the selues to obtinan-cie, but but when they are once striken with his hande, then whether they will or no, they bee enforced to feare. This feare they commonly call a suruill feare: and in comparison set it for contrarie to free nature and willing feare which becometh children. Some other doe suttely thrust in a middle kinde, becaufe that same suruile and constrained affection sometime so subdueth mens minde, that they come willingly to the feare of God.

28 Nowe wee understand, that in the good will of God, whereunto faith is said to have respect, the possession of salvation and eternall life is obtained. For if wee can want no good thing, while God is fauourable vnto vs, it abundantly sufficeth vs to the assurednesse of salvation, when he him selfe doeth assurance of his loue. Let him shew his face (faith the Prophet) and wee shall bee safe. Whereupon the Scriptures determine this to bee the summe of our salvation, that God putting away all enimities, hath received vs into fauour. Whereby they shew, by when God is reconciled vnto vs there remaineth no peril, but that all things shall prosper well with vs. Therefore faith, hauing taken hold of the loue of God, hath promises of the present life and of the life to come, and perfect assurednesse of all good things: but that same such as may be gathered out of the word of God. For faith doth not certainly promise to it selfe either by length or honor or welth of his life, for as much as God willed none of these things to bee appointed unto vs, but is contented with this assurednes. By God will weuer faile how so ever many things faile vs that pertaine to the maintenance of this present life. But the cheefe assurednesse of faith resteth in expectation of the life to come, which is set out of doubt by the worde of God. But what soever miseries and calamities betide vnto them whome God loueth, they can not worke the contrarie, but that his good will is perfect felicitie. Therefore when wee did meane to expresse the summe of blessednes, wee named the fauour of God, out of which springe doth flowe vnto vs all kindes of good things. And this wee may commonly note through out the Scriptures, that when soever mention is made not onely of eternall salvation, but also of any good thing in vs, wee bee alwaye called backe to the loue of God.
For which cause Dauid faith, that the goodnesse of God when it is felt in a godly heart, is sweeter and more to be desired than life it selfe. Finally, if all things else doe flowe vnto vs according to our owne wishing, and wee bee uncertaine of God's loue or hatred, our felicitie shall be accursed, and therefore miserable: But if the fauourable face of God doe shine vnto vs, even our verie miseries shal bee blessed, because they are turned to helps of our salvation. As Paul, when hee heapeth vp a rehearfall of all aduerseires, yet hee glorieth that hee was not by them seuered from the loue of God: and in his prayers he alwaye beginneth at the fauour of God, from whence floweth all prosperitie. Likewiie Dauid setteth the onely fauour of God against all the terrors that trouble vs. If (faith hee) I shall walke in the midst of the shadowe of death, I will feare no euils, because thou art with me. And we alwaye feele that our minde doth waue, vnllest being contented with the fauour of God, they seek their peace in it, and haue this inwardly fixed in them that is saide in the Psalme, Blessed is the people whose GOD is the Psal. 80. 4. Lord, and the nation whom he hath chosen to him for his inheritance.
29 Wee make the foundation of faith to bee the free promise of God, because faith properly stayeth upon it. For though faith doe beleue God to bee true in all things, whether hee commaunde or forbid, whether hee promise or threaten, and also obediently receueth his commaundements, and beware of thinges that he prohibiteth, and hath regard to his threatenings, yet properly it beginneth at the promise, and therein continueth, and therupon endeth. For faith seeketh for life in God, which is not founde in commaundements or declarations of penalties, but in promise of mercie, and in no other promise, but such as is freely gien. For the conditionall promise, by which we are sent to our owne workes, doeth no otherwise promise life, but if we perceiue it to stand in our owne. Therefore if we will nor haue our faith to tremble and waver, we must stay it with that promise of salvation, which is willingly and liberally offred vs of the Lord, rather in respect of our miserie, than of our owne worthinesse. Wherefore the Apostle beareth this witnesse of the Gospell, that it is the word of faith, which name he taketh both from the commaundementes and also from the promises of the lawe, because there is nothing that can stablish faith, but that liberal embassage, by which God reconcileth the world to himselfe. Therefore the same Apostle oftentimes maketh a relation of faith and the Gospell together, when hee teacheth that the ministerie of the Gospell was committed to him vnto the obedience of faith, that the same is the power of God, to saluation to every one that beleueth: that in it is revealed the righteousness of God from faith to faith. And no manuell. For sith the Gospell is the ministerie of reconciliation, there is no other testimonie sure enough of Gods good will toward vs, the knowledge whereof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest vpon free promise, wee doe not deny but that the faithful doe euerie way embrace and receive the word of God, but wee appoint the promise of mercie to be the proper marke of faith. Euen as the faithfull ought indeede to acknowledge God to bee the judge and punisher of wicked doings, and yet they properly haue regard vnto his mercifull kindenesse: for as much as hee is described to them to bee considered such a one as islowing and mercifull, farre from wrath, of much goodnesse, gentle vnto all, pouring forth his mercy vpon all his workes.

30 Neither yet doe I regarde the barkinges of Pighius, or such other dogges, when they finde fault with this restraint, as though in diuiding faith it did take holde but of one pece thereof. I graunt (as I haue alreadye said) that the generall object of faith (as they terme it) is the truth of God, whether hee threaten or pur vs in hope of fauour. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noe feared the destruction of the worlde, when it was not yet seene. If the feare of a punishment shortly to come, was the worke of faith, then ought not the threatenings to bee excluded out of the definition of faith. This is indeede true. But the calulers doe vniustly accufe vs, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the partes of the worde of God. For our meaning is onely to shewe those two thinges, first, that faith never steedfastly standeth vntill it come to free promise: and then that wee are no otherwise by it to bee reconciled to God, but because it coupleth vs to Christ. Both those pointes are worthy to bee noted. We fecke such a faith, which may make difference betweene the children of God and the reprobate, betwene faithfull and the vnbelieuing. If a man do beleeue that God both liustly commaundeth all that he commaundeth, and truely threatneth, shall hee bee therefore called faithfull? Nothing lesse. Therefore there can be no stedsfast stay of faith, vnlesse it be grounded vppon the mercie of God. But nowe to what ende doe we dispute of faith? Is it not that we may learne the way of saluation? But how doth faith bring saluation but in respect that it graffeth vs into the body of Christ? Therefore there is no inconuenience, if in the definition we doe enforce the principall effect thereof, and do ioyne vpnto the generall name, in stead of a difference y marke y seuereth the faithfull from the vnbelieuing. Finally, the malicious haue nothing to find fault withall in this dectetin, but they must wrap vp Paul with vs in y same blame, which calleth the Gospel properly the word of faith. 31 But herevpon againe we gather that which wee haue before declared, that faith doth no lesse neede the worde than the fruite doth neede the liuely roote of the tree, because no other (as David testifieth) can trueth in the Lord, but they that knowe his name. But this knowledge is not according to euery mans imagination, but so far as God himselfe is wittnes of his owne goodnes. Which the same Prophet confirmeth in another place, saying: Thy saluation is according to thy wordes. Againe, I haue trusted in thy wordes, Iaue mee, Where is to bee noted the relation of faith to the word, and then how saluation followeth. And yet in the meanet ime we doe not exclude the power of God, with beholding whereof, vnlesse faith fisteine itselfe, it can never giue vpnto God his due honour. Paul seemeth to rehearse a certaine felender and common thing of Abraham, that he beleeued that God which had promised him his blessed seede, was able to performe it. Againe in an other place, speaking of him selde: I know whom I haue beleeued and I am sure that he is able to keep that which I haue left with him vntill that day. But if a man wey with himselfe how many doubtings of the power of God doe oftenet times creepe into mans minde, he shal well perceiue that they which doe highly esteeme it as it is worthie, haue not a little profitted in faith. We all will confesse that God is able to doe whatsoever he will, but when even the least tentation throweth vs downe with feare, and amazeth vs with horror, therby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the estimation of Gods power, when we prefer aboue it those thinges, y Satan threatneth against Gods promises. This is the reason why Elay, meaning to print into the harts of the people y assuradnes of saluation, doth so honorably intreate of the infinite power of God. It seemeth oft that so soone as he hath begonne to speake of the hope of pardon and reconciliation, he by and by tourneth to an other thing, and wandreth about in long and superfusious circumstances, rehearsing how maruellously hee Lorde gouerneth the frame of heauen and earth and the whole order of nature, yet is here nothing that serueth not fully for the circumstance of the matter that he speaketh of. For vnlesse the power of God whereby he is able to doe all things be presently set before our eyes, our cares will hardly heare the worde, or will not esteeme it so much as it is worthie. Beside that, here is declared his effectueffectuall power, because godliness (as wee haue alreadie shewd in an other place) doeth alway applye the power of God to vs and worke, especially it setteth before it selfe those worke of God, whereby hee hath testified himselfe to be a father. Hereupon commeth that in the Scriptures is so oft-ten mention made of the redemption, whereby the Israelites might haue learned that God which was once the authour of saluation, will bee an ever-lafting preferuer thereof. And Davi putteth vs in minde by his owne example, that those benefits which God hath particularly bestowed vpon euyery man, doe afterwarde assure to the confirmation of his faith. Yea when God seemeth to haue forsaken vs, it behoueth vs to stretch our wits further, that his auncient benefits may recomfort vs, as it is said in an other Pfalme, I haue beene mindfull of olde dayes. I haue studied vpon all thy worke, &c. Again, I will remember the worke of the Lord, and his meruellcs from the beginning. But because without the word all quickly vanisheth away that we conceive of the power of God and of his worke, therefore we doe not without cause affirme that there is no faith, vnlesse God giue light vnto it with testimonie of his grace. But here a question might be mouded, what is to be thought of Sara and Rebecca, both which being mouded as it seemeth with zeale offaith, passe beyonde the bondes of the worde. Sara, when she ferenously desired the promisd issue, gaue her bondmaide to her husbande. It can not be denied but she the many waze-s sinnen: but nowe I touch only this faulte, that being carried away with her zeale, shee did not restraine herselue within the boundes of Gods worde; yet it is certayne that that desire proceeded of faith. Rebecca being certified by the oracle of God of the election of her sonne Iacob, procured his blessing by euyl craftie meanes: she deceuied her husband the witnesse and ministre of the grace of God: shee compelled her sonne to lie: she by diuerse guiles and decepts corrupted the truthe of God: Finally in making a scorne of his promis, she did as much as in her lay, destroye it. And yet this act, howe much fouer it was euill, and worthie of blamc, was not without faith, for it was necessarie that she should overcome many offences, that she might so earnestly endeavor to attaine that which without hope of earthly profite was full of great troubles and daungers. As we may not say that the holy Patriarch Isaac was altogether without faith, because he being by the same oracle of God admo-ished of the honour transferred to the yonger sonne, yet ceased not to bee more fauourably bent to his first begotten sonne Efau. Truely these examples doe teach, that oftentimes errors are mingled with faith, but yet so that faith if it bee a true faith, hath alway the upper hand. For as the particular error of Rebecca did not make voide the effecte of the blef-ling, io neither did it make voyde her faith which generally reigned in her minde, and was the beginning and cause of that doing. Neverthelesse therein Rebecca vterted howe readie mans minde is to fall so soone as hee giueth himselfe, neuer so little liberry. But though the mans defaulte and weakenesse doeth darken Faith, yet it doeth not quenche it: in the mean time it putteth vs in minde, howe carefully wee ought to hange vpon the mouth of G O D, and also confirmeth that whiche wee haue taught, that Fayth vaffheth awaye, vnlesse it bee vpholden by the worde: as the mindes both of Sara, and Isaac and Rebeka had had become vaine in their crooked wanderinges out of the waye, vnlesse they had bene by Gods secreete bridle holden in obedience of the word.

32. Againe, not without cause wee include all the promises in Christes, forasmuch as in the knowledge of him the Apostle includeth all the Gospel: and in an other place he teacheth, that all the promises of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reason whereof is readie to be shewed. For if God promise any thing, hee therein sheweth his good will: so that there is no promise of his, that is not a testimonie of his loue. Neither makest it any matter that the wicked when they have great and continual benefits of Gods liberalitie heaped vpon them, doe thereby wrap, them selues in so much the more greuous judgement. For if they doe neither thinke nor acknowledge that those things come vnto them from the hande of God, for if they acknowledge it, they do not with them selues consider his goodness, therefore they can not thereby bee better taught of his mercie than brute beasts, which according to the measure of their estate, doe receive the same fruite of Gods liberalitie, and yet they perceive it not. Neither doeth it any more make against vs, that many times in refusing the promises appointed for them, they doe by that occasion procure to themselues the greater vengeance. For although the effectuall working of the promises do then onely appeare, when they haue founde faith with vs, yet is force and natural properitie of them isuer extinguished by our vnbeliefe or vnthankfulnesse. Therefore when the Lord by his promises doth prouoke man not onely to receiue, but also to thinke vpon the fruities of his bountifulnes, he doth therewithall declare vnto him his loue. Whereupon we must returne to this point, that every promise is a testifying of Gods loue toward vs. But it is out of question, y no man is loued of God but in Christ, he is the beloued Sonne, in whom the loue of the father abideth & refteth, & then from him powreth it selfe abrode vnto vs; as Paul teacheth, that wee haue obtained favour in the beloued one. Therefore it must needs bee derived and come vnto vs by meanes of him. For this caufe the Apostle in an other place calleth him our peace; in another place he setteth him out as a bond, whereby God is with fatherly natural kindnes bounde vnto vs. It followeth then y we must caft our eyes vpon him, so oft as any promise is offered vs. And that Paul teacheth no absurditie, y al Gods promises whatsoever they be, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. Therebe certaine examples y make for the contrarie, For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when hee required of the Prophet the manner how to worship God aright, was instructed concerning the Mediator: yet his godlines is praysed. Cornelins a Gentile and a Romane, could scarcely understand that which was known not to all the Jewes, yea & that very darkely: yet his almes and prayers were acceptable to God. And the sacrifice of Naaman, by the Prophets answere allowed. Which thing neither of them could obtaine but by faith. Likewise it may be said of the Eunuch to whom Philip was carried, which if hee had not had some faith, would not have taken vpon him the trauel & expenses of so long a journey, to worship. Yet we see, when Philip examined him, howe he be- wraied his ignorance of the Mediator. And truly I grant that their faith was partly vnexpressed, not only concerning Christs person, but also concerning his power & the office committed vnto him of the Father. Yet in the meane time it is certain, that they were instruct ed in such principles, as gave them some tafft of Christ, although but very small. Neither ought this to seeme strange. For neither would y Eunuch haue come in haft to Jerusalem from a farre countrey to worship an vnknownen God, neither did Cornelius when he had once embraced the Jewish religion spend so much time, without being acquainted with the first grounds of true doctrin. As for Naaman, it had bene too fond an abfurdtie for Eizeus when he taught him of small things, to have said nothing of the principall point. Therefore although there were among them a dark knowledge of Christ, yet it is not likely that there was no knowledge because they did vse themselves in the sacrifices of the lawe, which must haue bene discerned by the very ende of them, that is Christ, from the false sacrifices of the Gentiles.

33 But this bare & outward declaration of the worde of God, ought to haue largely sufficed to make it be beleued, if our owne blindnesse & stubbornesse did not withstand it. But our minde hath such an inclination to vanity, y it can never cleave faft vnto the trueth of God, & hath such a dulnes, y it is alway blind & cannot see the light thereof. Therefore there is nothing availably done by the worde without the enlightning of the holy Ghost. Whereby also appeareth, that faith is farre aboue mans vnderstanding. Neither shal it be sufficient, that the minde be lightened with the spirit of God, vnlesse the heart be also strengthened & stablized with his power. Wherein the Schoolemen do altogether erre, which in considering of faith, do only take hold of a bare & simple attent by knowledge, leaving out y confidence & assurednesse of the heart. Therefore faith is both ways a singular gift of God, both y the mind of man is clenched to tast the trueth of God, & that his heart is stablized therein. For the holy Ghost not only is the beginner of faith, but also by degrees encereth it, untill by it he bring vs to the heavenly kingdom. That good thing (faith Paul) which was committed to thy keeping, keep in the holy Ghost which dwelleth in vs. But howe Paul faith y the holy Ghost is giuen by the hearing of faith, wee may easilly difcover it. If there had bene but one onely gift of the holy Ghost, then it had bene an abfurdtie for him to call the holy Ghost the effect of faith, which is the author & cause of faith. But when hee maketh report of the giftes wherewith God garnisheth his Church, & by encreasings of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no mutuall if he ascribe those things to faith which maketh vs fit to receive them. This is reckoned a most strange conclusion, when it is saide, that no man but he to whom it is giuen, can beleue in Christ. But that is partly because they do not consider either how secret & hie the heavenly wisdome is, or how great mans dulleesse is in conceiuing the mysteries of God: and partly because they looke not vnto that assured & stedfast constantnesse of heart, that is to say, the chiefe part of faith.

34 But if (as Paul preacheth) no man is witnesse of the will of man, but 1 Cor. 2.11; the spirit of man that is within him, then how should man be sure of the wil of God? And if the trueth of God be uncertaine among vs, in those things y we presently behold with our eye, howe should it be assured and stedfast among vs there where the Lord promiseth such things as neither eye seeth,

not wit comprehended? But herein mans sharpness of understanding is so overthrown and faileth, that the first degree of profiting in Gods schoole, is to forsake his owne wit. For by it as by a veile cast before vs, wee are hindered that we cannot attaine the mysteries of God, which are not discloed but to little ones. For neither doth Heath and bloud disclofe, nor naturall man perceive those things that are of the Spirite, but rather to him the learning of God is foolishnesse, because it is spiritually to be judged. Therefore herein the helpe of the holy ghost is necessarie, or rather herein his force only reigneth. There is no man that knoweth the mind of God, or hath ben his counsellor: but the holy spirit searcheth out all things, even the deep secretes of God, by whome it is brought to passe, that we knowe the minde of Christ. No man (faith he) can come to me: vnlesse my father that sent me, drawe him. Every one therefor that hath heared and learned of my father, commeth. Not that any man hath seene the father, but he that is sent of God. Even as therefore we cannot come vnto Christ, but beeing drawen by the Spirite of God: so when wee be drawen, wee are lift up in wit & mind above our understanding. For the soule enlightened by him, taketh as it were a newe sharpnesse of understanding, wherewith it may behold heavenly mysteries, with brightnesse whereof it was before daied in it selfe. And so mans understanding receiuing brightnesse by the light of the holy Ghost, doeth neuer til then truely begin to taste of those things that belong to the kingdom of God, being before altogether vnclaunguerie & without judgement of taste to take avay of them. Therefore when Christ did notably set out vnto two of his disciples the mysteries of his kingdom, yet he nothing prevailed, vntill he opened their senses that they might understand the Scriptures. When the Apostles were so taught by his godly mouth, yet the Spirite of trueth must bee sent vnto them, to pour in their minde the same doctrine which they had heared with their ears. The worde of GOD is like vnto the Sunne that shineth vnto all them to whome it is preached, but to no profite among blinde men. But wee are all in this behalfe blinde by nature, therefore it cannot peree into our minde but by the inward matter the holy Ghost, making by his enlightning an entrye for it.

35 In another place, when wee had to entreat of the corruption of nature, we haue more largely shewed how vnsit men are to beleue. Therefore I wil not weare the readers with repeiting the same againe. Let this be sufficient that the spirite of faith is called of Paul faith itself, which the spirite giueth vs, but not which we haue naturally. Therefore he prayeth that God fulfill in the Thessalonians all his good pleasure, and the worke of faith in power. Wherein calling faith the worke of God, and giuing it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of apposition Gods good pleasure, he denieth it is of mans own motion: and not contented therwith he addeth further, it is a declaration of Gods power: writing to the Corinthians, where he faith, that faith hangeth not vpon the wisdome of men, but is grounded vpon the power of the holy Ghost. He speaketh in deed of outward miracles: but because ye reproube are blind at the beholding of them, he comprehended also that inwarde scale, whereof he makest mention in an other place. And God, the more gloriously to set forth his liberality in so noble a gift; vouchsaeth not to grant it to all universally without difference, but by singular privilege giueth it to whom he wil. For proofe whereof we have alleged testimonies before. Of which Augustine being a faithfull expeditor, crieth out that it would please the Saviour to teach him, and that the very beleeuing it selfe, is of gift and not of deferring. No man (faith he) commeth to me, vnlesse my father drawe him, and to whom it is giuen of my father. It is maruellous that two doe heare, the one despiseth, the other ascendeth vp. Let him that despiseth, impute it vnto himselfe: lette him that ascendeth, not arrogantly assigne it to himselfe. In an other place. Why is it giuen to one and not to an other? It greueth me not to say it, this is the depth of the crosse. Out of I wore not what depth of the judgements of God which we may not search, proceedeth all that we can. What I can, I see: whereby I can, I see not, sauing that I see thus fatre, that it is of God. But why him, and not him? That is much to me. It is a bottomlesse depth, it is the depth of the crosse. I may cry out with wondering, but not shewe it in disputing. Finally the summe commeth to this, that Christ when hee enlightneth vs vnto faith by the power of his Spirit, doeth there withall graffe vs into his bodie, that wee may be made partakers of all good things.

36 Now it remaineth that which the minde hath received, may bee further conteyed into your heart. For the word of God is not thoroughlie receiued by faith, if it swimme in the topppe of the braine, but when it hath taken roote in the bottome of the heart yet it may be an inuincible defence to beare and repulse al the engines of tentations. Now if it be true, that your understanding of the minde is the enlightning thereof, then in such confirmation of the heart, his power much more evidently appeareth, even by so much as the difficultfulnesse of the heart is greater than the blindness of the wit: and as it is harder to haue the minde furnished with assurednesse, than your wit to be instructed with thinking. Therefore the Spirit perfoormeth the office of a seal, to seale vp in our hearts those same promises, the assurance whereof is first enprinted in our wits, and serueth for an earnest to confirm and establish them. Sith ye beleue, (sayth the Apostle) ye are seale vp with the holy Spirite of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the spirite the hearts of the faithfull are grauen as with a seale? and how for the same reason he calleth him the Spirite of promise, because he raiseth the Gospel vnto vs? Likewise to the Corinthians he sayth: God which annotated vs, which hath also seale vs, and giuen the earnest of his Spirit in our hearts. And in an other place when he speakeith of confidence and boldenesse of hopinge well, he maketh the pledge of the Spirit the foundation thereof.

37 Neither yet haue I forgotten that which I saide before, the remembrance whereof experience continually reneweth, that is, that faith is tossed with divers doubtings, so that the mindes of the godly are seldom quiet, or at lais not alway enjoy a peaceable state: but with whatsoeuer engine they be shaken, either they rise vp out of the very gulf of temptations, or doe abide fast in their standing. Truely this assurednesse onely nourisheth and defendeth
...defendeth faith, when we holde fast that which is sayd in the Psalme: The Lord is our protection, our helpe in trouble, therfore we wil not feare, when the earth shall tremble, and the mountaines shall leape into the heart of the sea. Also this most sweete quietness is spoken of in an other place: I lay downe and slept, and rose againe, because the Lorde hath sustainted me. It is not meant therby that Dauid was alway with one undisturbed course framed to a merry cheerfulnesse: but in respect that he tasted the grace of God, according to his proportion of faith, therfore he glorieth that he without feare despifeth all that euer might desquit the peace of his mind. Therfore the Scripture meaning to exhort vs to faith, biddeth vs to be quiet. In Efaie it is sayde: In hoppe and silence shall be your strength. In the Psalme: Holde thee still in the Lord, and waite for him. Wherewith agreeeth that saying of the Apostle to the Hebrues: Patience is needefull, &c.

38 Hereby we may judge howe pestilent is that doctrine of the Scholemen, that we can no otherwise determine of the grace of God towarde vs, than by morall coniecture as every man thinketh himself worthy of it. Truely if we shall wye by our works how God is minded towarde vs, I grant that we can attaine it with any coniecture, be it never so sclender: but faith ought to have relation to a simple and free promise, there is left no cause of doubting. For with what confidence (I befeech you) shall wee be armed, if we say that God is favourable vnto vs vpon this condition: so that the purenesse of our life doe deserve it? But because I have appointed one place properly for the disscussing hereof, therefore I will speake no more of them at this present, specially forasmuch as it is plaine enough, that there is nothing more contrary to faith, than either coniecture or any thing neere vnto doubting. And they do very ill wright to this purpose that testimony of the preacher which they haue oft in their mouthes: No man knoweth whether he be worthy of hatred or love. For (to speake nothing how this place is in the common translation corruptly turned) yet very children can not be ignorant what Salomon meaneth by such wordes: that is, that if any man will judge by the present state of things, whom God hateth, or whom God loueth, he laboreth in vaine, & troublcth himselfe to no profit for his paines: but all things happen alike, both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offereth sacrifices and him that offereth none. Whereupon followeth, that God doth not alway witness his love to them to whom he maketh all things happen prosperously, nor doeth alwayes vster the hatred to them whom he punisheth. And that he doeth to condemne the vanitie of mans wit, sith it is so dull in things most needefull to be known. As he had written a little before, that it can not be discerned what the soule of a man differeth from the soule of a beast, because it seemeth to dy in like manner. If any man will gather thereof, that the opinion that we holde of the immortality of soules, standeth vpon coniecture: may he not worthily be counted a mad man? Are they then in their right wittes which gather that there is no certainty of Gods grace, because wee can conceie none by the carnall beholding of present things?

39 But they allege that it is a point of rash presumption, to take vpon vs an undoubtèd knowledge of Gods will. I woulde in deedes graunt it...

unto them, if we did take so much upon vs, that we would make the incomprehensible secret purpose of God subiect to the slenderenesse of our witte. But when we simply fay with Paul, that we have received not the Spirit of this world, but the Spirit that is of God, by whose teaching we may knowe those things that are gien vs of God, what can they barke against it, but they must flanderously speake against the Spirit of God? But if it be a horrible robberie of God to accuse the revelation that commeth from him, either to be lying, or vnaffur'd or doubtfull, what do wee offende in affirming that it is assured? But they fay, that this also is not without great presump-tuonsenesse, that we dare so glorie of the Spirite of Christ. Who would think that their dulness were so great that would be counted masters of y world, that they so fowly stumble in the first principles of religion? Surely I would not thinke it credible, vnlesse their owne writings that are abroad did tefticie it. Paul pronounceth that they oncely are the children of God, that are moued with his Spirite: and these men woulde haue them that be the children of God, to be moued with their owne spirite, and to be without the Spirite of God. Paul teacheth that we call God our Father, as the holy ghost miniftreth that worde vn to vs, which oncely can beare witneffe to our spirite that we are the children of God: These men, although they forbid vs not to call vpon God, yet doe take away his Spirite, by whose guiding hee should haue bene rightly called vpon. Paul denyeth that they are the seruaunts of Christ, that are not moued with the Spirite of Christ: these men faine a Christianitie that needeth not the Spirite of Christ. Paul maketh no hope of the blessed resurrection, vnlesse wee feele the holy Ghost abiding in vs: they forge a hope without any such feeling. But peraduenture they will answere, that they do not deny that wee ought to be endued with it, but that it is a point of modestie & humilitie not to acknowledge it. What meaneth he then, when he biddeth the Corinthians to trie whither they be in the faith, to prove themselves whether they haue Christ, whom vnlesse a man do acknowledge to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobat? But by the Spirit that God hath gien vs (faith John) we know that he abideth in vs. And what do we else but call the promises of Christ in dout, when wee will be counted the seruaunts of God without his Spirite, which he hath openely declared, that he would poure out upon all his? Beside that, wee doe wrong to the holy Ghost, which doe seperate from him faith that is his peccular worke. Sith these are the first leasons of godly religion, it is a token of miserable blindness, to haue Christians noted of arrogancie, that dare glorie of the presence of the holy Ghost, without which glorifying Christianitie it selfe doth not stand. But they declare by their example how truely Christ faide, that his Spirit is vknown to the worlde, & is onely known of them with whome he abideth.

40 And because they will not go about to overthrowe the stedfastnesse of faith with digging oncely of one mine, they affaile it also otherwise. For they fay, that although according to our present state of righteounesse, wee may gather a judgement of the grace of God, yet the knowledge of perseverence to the end abideth in stypen. A goodly confidence of salvation forsooth is left vnto vs, if we judge by morall conieecture, that for a present moment we be in favour, and what shall become of us to morrow we cannot tell. The Apostle teacheth farre otherwife: I am surely persuaded (faith he) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalities, neither death, nor life, neither present things nor things to come, shall sever vs from the love wherewith the Lord embraceth vs in Christ. They seeke to escape with a trifling solution, prating that the Apostle had that by speciall revelation, But they are holden too hard to slip away so. For there he entreateth of those good things y commonly come by faith to the faithfull, not those that he himself specially feeleth. But the same Paul in another place putteth vs in feare with mention of our weakenesse & vnstedfastnesse: Let him that standeth (faith he) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not such a seare whereby we should be ouerthrown, but whereby we may learne to humble our selves vnder the mightie hand of God, as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against order and truth is it to limit the assurednesse of faith to a moment of time, whose property is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortalitie to come? Sith therefore the faithfull do impute it to the grace of God, that being lightened with his spiritie do by faith enjoy the beholding of the heauenly life: so far is such glorying from presumptuousnes, that if any man be affhamed to confess it, he doth therein more betray his extreme vnthankfulness, in unkindly hiding Gods goodnes, than he doeth declare his modestie or submission.

41 Because it seemed that the nature of faith could not otherwise better or more plainly be declared than by the substance of the promise vp6 which it refeth as upon her proper foundation, so that if the promise be taken away, faith by and by falleth downe or rather vaniseth away: therefore we tooke our definition from thence, which yet varieeth not from that definition, or rather description of the Apostle, that he applyeth to his discourse, where he faith that faith is a substance of things to be hoped for, & a certainty of things that are not seene. For by this worde Hypostasis substance (for that terme he vseth) he meaneth as it were, an vpholding stay, whervp-on the godly mind leaneth and refeth. As if he should say faith is a certaine & assured possession of those things y are promised vs of God, vnlesse a man had rather to take Hypostasis for affiance, which I mislike not, albe-it I follow that which is more commonly receiued. Againie, to signifie that even to the last day when the books shalbe opened, they are hier than those things that may be perceiued with our fen ses, or seene with our eyes, or handeled with our handes, and that the same are no other wise possi fied by vs, but if we goe beyond the capacity of our owne wit, & bend our understanding about all those y are in the worlde, yea and clime above our selves, he hath therefore added that this assurednes of possession, is of things that lie in hope, and therefore are not seene. For plain appearance (as Paul wry teth) is not hope, neither hope we for those things that we see. And when he calleth a certaintie or prove (or as Augustine hath or translated it) a conjunction of things not present: for in Grecce it is Elenchos, he faith as much as if he did say, that it is an evident shewing of things not appearing, a seeing of things not seene, a plainnesse of dark things, a presence of things absent, an open shewing of hidden things. For the mysteries of God, such.
such as they be that pertain to our salvation, cannot be scene in themselves & in their owne nature as they call it: but we behold them only in his word, of whose trueth we ought to be so fully perswaded, that we ought to hold all that he speaketh as it were alreadie done & fulfilled. But how can the minde lift vp it selfe to receive such a taft of Gods goodnesse, but that it must needs be therewith wholly kindled to love God againe? For that flowing plente of sweetenes which God hath layd vp in store for them that feare him, can not be truely known, but that it muft therewith vehemently moue affection: and whose affection it once moueth, it utterly rauiseth & carieth him beyond himselfe. Therefore it is no marueile, if into a peruerse & crooked heart never entreteth this affection, by which being conveyed vp into {y} very heaven, we are sufffied to come to the most secretly hidden treaures of god, & the most sacred priuie places of his kingdome, which may not be defiled with the entrance of an vnpleane heart. For that which the Schoolemen teach, that charitie is before faith and hope, is a meere madness. For it is faith onely that first engendret charitie in vs. Howe much more rightely doth Bernard teach: I beleue (faith he) that the testimonie of confidence, which Paul calleth the glory of the godly, consisteth in three things. For first of al it is necessarie to beleue {y} thou canst not haue forgiuenes of sins, by {y} pardon of God: then {y} thou canst not haue no good worke at all, vnlesse he also giueth it: last of all {y} thou canst by no works deserue eternal life, vnlesse it also be giuen freely. A little after he addeth {y} these things suffice not, but {y} there is a certeine beginning of faith, because in beleuynge {y} sines cannot be forgiuen but of God, we ought also to beleue {y} they are not forgiuen vs, til also we be persuaded by the testimonie of the holy Ghost, {y} salvation is layd vp in store for vs: because God forgiueth sines, he himself giueth merits, & he himselfe also giueth rewards, that we may not stay til in this beginning. But these & other things shalbe to be entretied of in places fit for them. Now let it onely suffice to know what faith is.

42 Nowe wherfoeter this luely faith shalbe, it cannot be possible but {y} it hath with it the hope of eternal salvation: as an vnduable companion: or rather that it engendret or bringeth it fourthe out of itselfe, which hope being taken away, how eloquently, gloriously foeter we talke of faith, yet we are convinced to haue no faith at all, for if faith (as is abouesaid) be an assured persualion of Gods trueth, that it cannot lye vnto vs nor deceiue vs, nor become voide, then they that haue conceiued this assurrednesse, truely doe thereby all looke for a time to come that God shall performe his promises, which in their persualion cannot be but true: so that briefly, hope is nothing else, but a looking for those things which faith hath beleued to be truly promisfed of God. So faith beleueth {y} God is true, hope looketh for the performance of his trueth in convenient time. Faith beleueth {y} he is our Father, hope looketh for him to shewe himselfe such a one towarde vs. Faith beleueth {y} eternall life is giuen vs, hope looketh that it be one day reuiled. Faith is the foundation whereupon hope resteth, hope nouriseth & sustainteth faith. For as no man can looke for any thing at Gods hande, but he {y} hath first beleued his promises: so againe the weaknesse of our faith must with pacient hope & expectation bee sustainted and cherished.
Of the manner how to receive the assurance of hope.

Rom. 8. 24.

that it fall not as fainting for weariness. For which reason Paul doeth well place our salvation in hope. For hope, while it in silence looketh for the Lord, restraineth faith that it fail not headlong with too much haste: hope strengtheneth faith, that it waver not in God's promises, nor begin to doubt of the truth of them: hope strengtheneth faith that it waxe not wearie: Hope strengtheneth faith to the uttermost bound, that it faint not in the mid course, nor in the very beginning. Finally, hope by continually renewing and restoring, it maketh it newe and then to rise vp frether than it selfe to continuance. But how many ways the helps of hope are necessary to the strengthening of faith, shall better appeare, if we consider with howe many fortes of temptations they are assailed and shaken, that have embraced the words of God. First, the Lord in differing his promises doeth oftentimes hold our minds longer in suspense than we would, or; here it is the office of hope to peroume, that which the Prophet commandeth, that though his promises do bare, yet we should waite stil for them. Sometimes he suffereth vs not onely to faint, but also seemeth to be highly displeased: here it is much more necessary to haue hope to helpe vs, that according to the saying of an other Prophet, wee may still looke for the Lord, that hath hidden his face from Iacob. There rise vp all learners (as Peter faith) that aske where is his promise or his comming? For as much as since the fathers slept, all things so continue from the beginning of the creation. Yea the flesh & the world do whisper the same thing in our ears. Here must faith staye with sufferance of hope be holden fast fixed in beholding of eternity, it may accompt a thousand yeares like as one day.

Heb. 2. 3.

2. Pet. 3. 17.

Phil. 1. 5.

Ps. 90. 4.

43 For this conioyning and alliance the Scripture sometimes confounds the names of Faith and Hope. For when Peter teacheth that wee are by the power of God preferved through faith, vnto the disclosing of salvation, he giueth that vnto faith which did more fitly agree with hope, and not without cause, forasmuch as we haue alreadie taught, that hope is nothing else but the nourishment & strength of faith. Sometimes they are joyned together: as in the same Epistle. That your faith & hope should be in God. But Paul to the Philippians out of faith dierueth expectation, because in patiently hoping, we hold our desires in suspence, till God's conuenient opportunities be open: All which matter we may better understand by the tenth chapter to the Hebrews, which I haue alreadie allaged. Paul in another place, although he speake vnproperly, yet meaneth the same thing in these words: We looke in the spirit through faith for hope of righteousnes: even becaus we embraceth the testimonie of the Gospel concerning his free loue, do looke for the time when God shal openly shewe that which is nowe hidden vnder hope. And now it is plaine how foolishly Peter Lombard layeth two foundations of hope that is the grace of God, & the desiruing of workes. Hope can haue no other marke to be directed vnto, but faith: & wee haue alreadie declared faith hath one onely marke the mercie of God, to which it ought to looke (as I may so speake) with both eyes. But it is good to heare what a luely reacon he bringeth. If (faith he) thou darst hope for anything without desirings, y shal not be worthie to be called hope, but presumption. Who (gentle reader) wil not worthy abhorre such beastes, that say, it is a rash and presumptuous deede, if a man haue confidence that God is true of his worde? For where the Lorde willoth vs to looke for all things at his goodnesse, they say it is presumption to learne and rest vpon it. A maister meete for such scholers as he founde in the mad schoole of filthy bablers. But as for vs, when we see that we are commanded by the oracles of God to conceive a hope of saluation, let vs gladly presume so much vpon his trueth, as trusting vpon his only mercy, casting away the confidence of workes, to be bolde to hope well. He will not deceuie that sayde: Be it not so, you according to your faith.

The iii. Chapter.

That we are regenerate by faith. Wherein is entreated of Repentance.

Albeit wee haue already partly taught howe faith possesteth Christ, & howe by it we enjoy his benefites: notethelesse this were yet darke, vnlesse we did also make declaration of the effectes that we seele thereby. Not without cause it is sayde, that the sum of the Gospell standeth in repentance and in forgiueneffe of sinnes. Therefore leaving out those two pointes, whatsoever we shall say of faith, shalbe but a hungry and vnperfect, yea and in manner vnprofitable disputation of faith. Now forasmuch as Christ doth giue both vnto vs, and wee obtaine both by faith, that is to say, both newnesse of life and free reconciliacion, reason and order of teaching required, that in this place I beginne to speake of both. Our next paffage from faith shalbe to Repentance, because when this article is well perceived, it shalbe the better appeare how man is iustified by only faith and meere pardon, and yet how real holines of life(as I may so cal it) is not seuered from free impurator of righteousness. Now it ought to be out of question, that Repentance doth not only immediatly follow faith, but also spring out of it. For whereas pardon & forgiuenees is therefore offered by the preaching of the Gospell, that the sinner being delivered from the tyranny of Satan, from the yoke of sinne, and from miserable bondage of vices, may passe into the kingdom of God, truly no man can embrace the grace of the Gospell, but he must returne from the errours of his former life into the right way, and apply all his study to the meditation of repentance. As for them that thinke that repentance doth rather go before faith than flow or spring forth of it, as a fruite out of a tree, they never knew the force thereof, and are mowed with too weake an argument to thinke so.

2 Christ(fay they) and John in their preachings doe first exhort the people to repentance, and then they afterward say that the kingdom of heauen is at hande. Such commandement to preach, the Apostles receiued, such order Paul followed, as Luke reporteth. But while they superstitiously sticke vpon the ioyning together of syllables, they marke not in what meaning the wordes hang together. For when y Lorde Christ & John do preach in this manner: Repent ye, for the kingdom of heauen is come neere at hande: do they not fetch the caufe of repentance from very grace and promise of saluation? Therefore their wordes are aunsmuch in effect as if they had sayde: because the kingdom of heauen is come neere at hande, therefore
Cap. 3. Of the manner how to receive repentance.

For Matthew, when he hath shewed that John so preached faith that in him was fulfilled the prophesie of Esay, concerning the voyage crying in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord, make strait the pathes of our God. But in the Prophet that voice is commanded to begin at comfort and glad tidinges. Yet when we refer the beginning of repentance to faith, we do not dreame a certaine meane space of time, wherein it bringeth it out: but we mean to shewe that a man can not earnestly apply himselfe to repentance, vnselde he know himselfe to be of God. But no man is truly perfwaded that he is of God, but he that hath first received his grace. But these things shall be more plainly disposed in the proccede following. Paraduenture this deceived them, that many are first by terrours of conscience tamed, or framed to obedience, before that they haue throughly digested, yea before they haue tasted the knowledge of grace. And this is the feare at the beginning, which some account among vertues, because they see that it is necer to true and iust obedience. But our question is not here how diversely Christ draweth vs into him, or prepareth vs to the endeouer of godliness: only this I say, that there can be no vprightnesse found where reigneth not the Spirit which Christ received to communicate the same to his members. Then according to that saying of the Psalme: With thee is mercifullnesse, that thou mayest be feared. No man shall ever reverently feare God, but he that truteth that God is mercifull vs to him: no man will willingly prepare himselfe to the keeping of the lawe; but he that is persuaded that his servises please him: which tendernesse in pardoning and bearing with faultes, is a signe of fatherly favoure. Which is also shewed by that exhortation of Osee, Come let vs returne to the Lord, because he hath plucked vs and he will heale vs; he hath striken vs, and he will cure vs, because the hope of pardon is vssed as a prick to make them not to be dull in their sinnes. But their doing errore is without all colour of reason, which to beginne at repentance do appoint certaine dayes to their newe concertes, during the which they must exercife themselves in penance: and when those dayes are once past, they admit them to the communion of the grace of the Gospel. I speake of many of the Anabaptistes, specially those that marvellously rejoynce to be counted spiritual, and their companions the Lefuits, and such other drags. Such fruits forsooth that spirit of giddines bringeth forth, to determine repentance within compasse of a few dayes, which a Christian man ought to extend in continuance throughout his whole life.

But certaine learned men, euen long before these times, meaning to speake simply & sincerely of repentance, according to the truth of Scripture, have laid that it consisteth of two parts, mortification, and viuificatio. Mortification they expounde to be a sorrow of the soule and feare conceived of the acknowledging of sinne, and of the feeling of the judgement of God. For when a man is once brought into knowledge of sinne, then he truely beginneth to hate and abhorre sinne: then he heartily misliketh himselfe, confesseth himselfe to be miserable and lost, and witheth himselfe to bee an other man. Further, when hee is touched with some feeling of the judgement of G O D (for the one immediately followeth vpon the other) then he lieth striken and overthrown, then he trembleth, humbled and cast downe, downe, then hee is discouraged and despaireth. This is the first part of repentance, which they haue commonly called contrition. Viuisication they expounde to be the comfort that growth of faith, when a man ouerthrowne with conscience of sinne, and stricken with feare of God, looking afterwaide vnto the goodness of God, vnto the mercy, fauour and Salvation, that is though Christ, raiseth vp himselfe, taketh breath againe, recouereth courage, and returneth as it were from death to life. And these words, if they haue a right exposition, do aptly enough expresse the nature of repentance. But where they take Viuisication for the cheerefulness, which the mind receiueueth being brought into quietnesse from trouble and feare, therein I agree not with them; forasmuch it rather signifieth a desire to live holy and godly which growth of regenration, as if it were said, that man dieth to himselfe, to begin to live to God.

4 Some other, because they lawe this word diversely taken in Scripture, haue made two fortes of repentance; and because they shoulde make them differently knowne by some marke, they haue called the one Repentance of the Law, by which the sinner wounded with the fearing iron of sinne, & worn away with feare of the wrath of God, sticketh fast in that trouble & can not wipe himselfe out of it. The other Repentance they call of the Gospel, by which the sinner is in deede, greeuously vexed with himselfe, but he raiseth vp higher and taketh hold of Christ, the salue of his fore, the comfort of his feare, the hauen of his miserie. Of the repentance of the lawe they put those examples: Cain, Saul, and Iudas. Whose repentance when the Scripture rehearseth vnto vs, it meaneth that they acknowledging the greevousnesse of their sinne, were afraide of the wrath of God, but in thinking vpon God onely as a reuenger and judge, they fainted in that feeling. Therefore their repentance was nothing else but a certaine entrie of hell, whereinto they being entred into this present life beganne alreadie to suffer punishment, from the face of the wrath of Gods Maiestie. The repentance of the Gospel, wee see in all them, that being galled with the spurre of sinne in themselues, but recomforted and refreshed with confidence of the mercie of God, are turned vnto the Lorde. Ezechias was stricken with feare, when he receiued the message of Death: but he prayed weeping, and looking vnto the goodness of God, hee tooke againe good confidence vnto him. The Ninivites were troubled with the horrible threatening of destruction. But they clothed the selues in sackcloth and ashes & prayed, hoping that the Lord might be turned to the & turned fro the furor of his wrath. David confessed he had too much sinned in numbring of people: but he saide further, Lorde take away the wickedness of thy seruant. Hee acknowledged his offence of adulterie, when Nathan rebuked him, & did cast himselfe downe before the Lorde, but therewithall he also looked for pardon. Such was the repentance of them that at the preaching of Peter were pricked in their heart: but trusting vpon the goodness of God, they steade furthermore: Ye men and brethren, what shall we do? And such was the repentance of Peter himselfe, which wept indeede bitterly, but he ceased not to hope well.

5 Although all these things be true, yet the vorie name of repentance...
Of the manner how to receive

(As far as I can learn by the Scriptures) is otherwise to be taken. For where they comprehend faith vnder repentance, it disagreeth with that which Paul faith in the Acts, that he testified to the Iewes and Gentiles repentance vnto God and faith in Iesus Christ, where he reckoneth repentance & faith as two diverse things. What then? Can true repentance stande without faith? No: But though they can not bee seuered, yet they must bee distinguisht. As faith is not without hope, and yet faith and hope are diverse things: so repentance and faith, although they hang together, with one perpetual bonde, yet they rather woulde bee confused then confused. And truely I am not ignorant, that vnder the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning vnto God, wherof faith is not the least part: but in what meaning it is so comprehended, shall most easilie appeare when the force and nature thereof shall bee declared. The name of repentance in Hebrewes is directed of conversing or returning, in Greeke of changing of the minde or purpoce, and the thing it selfe doeth not ill agree with eather derivations, where of the summe is, that we departing from our felues shoulde turne vnto God, and putting off our olde minde, shoulde put on a newe: Wherefore in my judgement, repentance may thus not amisse bee defined: that it is a true turning of our life vnto God, proceeding from a pure and earnest feare of God, which consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and of the olde man, and in the quickening of the spirit. In this sense are to bee taken all the preachinges wherein either the Prophets in olde time, or the Apostles afterwarde exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this onely thing they travell'd to perswade, that confounded with their owne sinnes, and pricked with feare of the Lordeb judgement, they shoulde fall downe and bee humbled before him, against whom they had offended, and with true amendement returne into his right way. Therefore these wordes, To be turned or returne vnto the Lorde, To repent, or doe penance, are among them vsed without difference in all one signification. And therefore also the holy historie faith, that men repent after the Lorde, when they that liued wantonly in their owne lustes, not regarding him, doe beginne to followe his worde, and are ready at their captains commandement to goe whither hee calleth them. And Iohn and Paul vsed these wordes, to bring forth fruite worthic of repentance, for, to leade such a life as may represent and testifie such an amendement in all their doings.

6 But before wee goe any further, It shall bee profitable that wee doe more plainly set out at large the definition that we have made. Wherein there bee chiefly three pointes to bee considered. First when wee call it a turning of life vnto God, wee require a transforming, not onely in outward workes, but also in the soule it selfe, which when it hath put of her oldnesse, then beginneth to bring forth the fruiets of workes agreeable to her renewing. Which when the Prophete goeth about to expresse, he commandeth them whome hee calleth to repentance, to make them a newe hearte. Therefore Moses oftentimes meaning to shew howe the Israelites might repent, and so be rightly turned vnto y Lorde, teacheth that it bee done with all their heart, and with all their soule (which manner of speaking... king we see often repeated of the Prophetes;) and naming it the circumcising of the heart, he shaketh away all inwarde affections. But there is no place whereby a man may better perceive what is the natural propriety of repentance than the fourth Chapter of Jeremey. If thou returne to me, O Fsraell, (faith the Lord) returne to me, plowe vp your arable land and sowe not upon thornes. Be circumcised to the Lord, and take away the uncircumcised skinnes of your heartes. See how he pronounceth that they shall nothing prevail in taking upon them the following of righteousnes, vnlesse wicked-dnes be first plucked out of the bottome of their heartes. And to move them throughly, he warneth them that they haue to do with God, with whom there is nothing gotten by dalying; because he hateth a double heart. Therefore Esay laugheth to scorn the foolish endeavours of hypocrites, which did in deepe buffly go about an outwarde repentance in ceremonies, but in the meane time they had no care to loose the bundles of wickednes wherewith they helde poor men fast tied. Where also he very well fieweth in what duties vnfained repentance properly standeth.

7 The seconde point was, that we taught that repentance proceedeth of an earnest feare of God. For, before that the minde of a sinner be enclined to repentance, it must be stirred vp with thinking upon the judgement of God. But when this thought is once thoroughly setted, that God wil one day go vp into his judgement seate, to require an account of all sayings and doings: it will not suffer the silly man to rest, nor to take breath one minute of time, but continually stirreth him vp to thinke upon a newe trade of life, wherby he may safely appeare at that judgement. Therefore oftentimes the Scripture, when it exhorteth to repentance maketh mention of the judgment: as in Jeremey: least paraduenture my wrath go out as fire, and there be none to quench it, because of the naughtines of your workes. In Paules sermon to the Athenians: And whereas hitherto God hath borne with thy times of this ignorance, now he giueth warning to men, that all men euer where may repent them, because he hath appointed the day wherein he wil judge the worlde in equity. And in many other places. Sometimes it declareth by the punishments already extended, that God is a judge, that sinners should think with themselves, that worse things hang ouer them if they doe not repent in time. You haue an example thereof in the 29. of Exodus. But because the turning beginneth at the abhorring & hatred of sinne, therefore the Apostle maketh forowfulnes, such as is according to God, the cause of repentance. And he calleth forowfulnes according to God, when we are not only afraid of punishment, but do hate & abhorre sin it selfe, so farre much as we understand y it displeaeth God. And no maruel. For vnlesse we be sharply pricked, y frowndulnes of our flesh could not be corrected, yea prickings would not suffice for y dulnes and frowndulnes thereof, vnles God in stretching out his roddes should parece more deeply. This is also an obstinacie which must be beaten downe as it were with beetles. Therefore the pervertines of our nature enforcest God to the severitie that he vseth in threatning, because he should in vaine call vs alluringly with faire speech while we lie a sleepe. I recite not the testimonies y commonly offer the-selles to be found.
The feare of God is in another manner also the beginning of repentance. For
Cap. 3.

For though man's life were absolutely furnished with all points of virtues, if it be not applied to the worshipping of God, it may in deed be praised of the world, but in heaven it shall be more abomination, forasmuch as the chief part of our righteousness is to give God his due right and honour, whereof he is wickedly robbed, when we bend not ourSELVES to yelde vs subject to this government.

8 Thirdly, it remaineth that we declare what is meant by this that wee say, that Repentance consisteth in two partes, that is to say, mortifying the flesh, and quenching of the spirit. The Prophets do plainly express it, although somewhat simply and grossly according to the capacity of the carnall people, when they say: Cease from evil, and do goodnes. Again: Be washed, be cleane, take away the euill of your works from mine eyes: Cease to doe petuery, learn to doe well,seeke judgement, helpe the oppresseed, &c. For when they call men away from wickednes, they require the death of the whole flesh, which is stuffed full of wickednesse and peruetenes. It is in deed an vncaffe and hard thing to put off our fulesse, and to depart from our natural disposition. Neither can it be thought that the flesh is throughly deceade, vnlesse all that we haue of our fulesse be abolisshed. But forasmuch as all the affectation of the flesh is enemy against God, the first entrie to the obeying of his law, is the forsaking of our owne nature. Afterward they express the renting by the frutes that follow thereof, as righteousness, judgment and mercy. For it were not enough to doe those duties rightly, vnlesse the minde it selfe and the heart haue first put on the affection of righteousness, judgement and mercy. That is done when his spirit of God hath so stuck in new thoughts and affections, our soules first washed with his holines, that they may rightly be counted newe. And truely as we are naturally turned away from God, so vnlesse the forsaking of our fulesse do goe before, we can never goe towards that which is right. Therefore we are so oft commanded to put of the olde man, to forfacke the world and flesh, to bid our lustes farewell, &c to be renued in the spirit of our minde. Moreover the very name of mortification doth put vs in mind how hard it is to forget our former nature: because we therby gather that we are not otherwise framed to the feare of God, nor do learne the principles of godlines, but when we are violently blaine with the word of the Spirit, and so brought to nought euon as though God should pronounce, that to haue vs to be accounted among his children there needeth a death of all our common nature.

9 Both these things do happen unto vs by the partaking of Christ. For if we do truly communicte of his death, by his power therof our old man is crucified, and the body of sin dieh, the corruption of our former nature may live no more. If we be partakers of his resurrection, by it we are raised vp into a newnes of life, that may agree with the righteousness of God. In one worde I expounde repentance to be regeneration, which hath no other marke whereunto it is directed, but that the image of God which was by Adams offence fowlly defaced and in a maner vterly blotted out, may be renued in life. So the Aposttle teacheth, when he faileth: but we representing the glory of God with vncouered face are transformed into the same image, out of glory into glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord. Again: Be ye renued in the spirit of... your minde and put on the newe man, which is created according to God in righteousnesse and holinesse of truth. Againe in an other place: putting on the newe man, which is renewed after the knowledge and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneration wee bee by the benefit of Christ restored into this righteousneses of God, from which we were fallen by Adam. After which manner it pleaseth the Lord wholly to restore all those who he adopteth into the inheritance of life. And this restoring is fulfilled not in one moment, or one day, or one yeare, but by continual, yea and sometimes flowe proceedinges God taketh away the corruptions of the flesh in his elect, cleanseth them from filthines, and consecrateth them for temples to himselfe, renewing all their senses to true purenes, that they may exercise themselves all their life in repentance, and know that this war hath no end but in death. And so much the greater is the lewdnes of that filthie raile & apostate Staphilus, which foolishly faith that I confound the state of this present life with the heavenly glorie, when I expounde by Paul, the image of God to be holinesse and true righteousnesse. As though when any thing is defined, we should not seeke the whole fulnes & perfection of it. And yet we denie not place for increaseth. But I say that how neere any man approacheth to the likenes of God, so much the image of God shineth in him. That the faithfull may attaine hereunto, God assigneth them the race of repentance wherein to run all their life long.

10 The children of God therefore are so delivered by regeneration from the bondage of sin, not that haing nowe obtained the full possession of libertie, they should feele no more trouble by their flesh, but that they should haue remaining a continual manner of strive, wherewith they may be exercised, and not only be exercised, but also may better learne their owne weaknesses. And in this point all writers of sound judgement agree together, that there remaineth in man regenerate a feeding of euill, from whence continually spring desires that allure & stir him to sin. They confesse also that the holy ones are still so holden intangled with that disease of lusting, that they cannot withstand but that sometime they are tickled and stirred either to lust or to covetousnesse, or to ambition or to other vices. Neither is it needfull to labour much in searching what the olde writers have thought herein, forasmuch as only Augustine may be sufficient for it, which hath faithfully and with great diligence gathered all their judgements. Therefore let the readers gather out of him, such certaintie as they shall desire to learne of his opinion of antiquitie. But there may seeme to be this difference between him and vs, that he when he graunteth that the faithfull so long as they dwell in a mortall body are so holden bound with lustes, they cannot but lust, yet darest not cal that disease sin; but being content to express it by its name of weakness, he teacheth then only it becometh sin, when either work or consent is added to it; and receyving its, whiche yeldeth to the first desire, but we apprehend very shame for sin, my man is tickled with any desire at all against the law of God, Yea we affirm that very corruption that ingendreth such desires in vs is sinne. We teach therefore it there is alway sinne in the holy ones, until they be unclothed of the mortall body, because there remaineth in their fleshly perswasions of lusting that fighseth against unrightnes.
And yet he doth not alway forbear to use the name of Sinne, as when he faith: This Paule calleth by the name of Sinne, from whence springe all sins vnto a fleshly concupiscence. This as much as pertaineth to the holy ones, looseth the kingdome in earth, and perisheth in heauen. By which words he confesseth, the faithfull are guilty of Sinne, in as much as they are subject to the lustes of the flesh.

Rom.5.6. But this that is saide, that God purgeth his Church from all Sinne, that he promiseth that grace of deliverance by baptism, and fulfilleth it in his elect; we referre rather to the guiltinesse of Sinne, than to the verie matter of Sinne. God truely performeth this by regenerating them that be his, that in them that kingdome of Sinne is abolished. For the holy Ghost ministreth them strengthe, whereby they get the ypper hande and are conquerors in the battel: but it ceaseth onely to reigne & not so to dwell in them. Therefore we fo say, that the olde man is crucified and the lawe of Sinne abolished in the children of God, that yet there remaine some leauinges, not to haue dominion in them, but to humble them by knowledge in conscience of their owne weakenes. And wee confesse that the same are not imputed, as if they were not: but wee affirme that this commeth to passe by the mercie of God, that the holy ones are deliuered from this guiltinesse, which otherwise shoulde justly bee reckened sinners and guiltie before God. And this sentence it shall not be harde for vs to confirme, forasmuch as their are evident testimonies of the Scripture vpon their matter. For what would we have more plaine, than that which Paul crieth out to the Romanes chapter 7? First both wee haue in an other place shewed, and Augustine proue by strong reasons, that Paul their speake in the person of a man regenerate. I speake not of this, that hee vlieth these wordes Euill and Sinne, that they which will speake against vs may not cavell against those wordes; but who canne deny, that a struing against the law of God is euill, who can deny a withstanding of lustee to be Sinne? Finally, who will not grant that there is a fault, where is a spirituall miserie? But all these things are reported of this disease by Paul. Againe, we haue an assured demonstration by the Lawe, by which this whole quesion may easilly be discusst. For we are commanded to love God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our powers. Sith all the partes of our soule ought to be so occupied with the loue of God, it is certaine, that they satisfie not the commandement that conceive in their heart any desire be it never so little, or suffer any such thought at all to enter into their minde, as may withdraw them from the loue of God into vanitie. For what are not these the powers of the soule, to be affected with sodaine motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceive with minde? Therefore, when these doe open a way for vaine or corrupt thoughtes to enter into them, doe they not shew that they are euens so much void of the loue of God? Wherefore, who so confesseth not that all the lustes of the flesh are sinnes, and that the same disease of lustinge, which they call a feeding, is the well spring of sinne, hee must needs deme that the transgression of the lawe is sinne.

If any man thinke it an absurditie, that all the desires wherewith man is naturally mowed in affection, are uniuerally condemned, whereas they be put into man by God the author of nature. We answer, that we do not condemn those desires that God hath so engraven into the mind of man at the first creation, that they cannot be rooted out without destroying the vertic nature of man, but only outrageous & unbridled motions that fight against the ordinance of God. But now fith by reason of the perverse nes of nature, all her powers are infected & corrupted, that in all her doings appeareth a continual disorder & intemperance, because the desires cannot be feuered from such intemperance: therefore we fay that they are corrupt. Or (if you like to have the whole summe in fewer wordes) we teach that all the desires of men are evil: and we accuse them to be gilte of sinne, not in they are naturally, but for that they are inordinate: and we call them inordinate, because no pure or cleane thing can come out of a corrupt & vnclene nature. And Augustine doth not so much vary from this doctrine as he appeareth in his eue, while he somewhat too much feareth the enuie that the Pelagians laboured to bring him into, he sometime forbeareth to speake the name of sinne: Yet where he writeth that the law of sinne stil remaining in the holy ones, the one gilte is taken away, he plainly sheweth that he doth not so much disagree from our meaning.

13 We will alleage some other sentences, whereby shall better appeare what he thought. In the second booke against Julian: This lawe of sinne is both released by the spirituall regeneration, & abideth in the mortall flesh, released herein, because the giltes is taken away in the sacrament whereby the faithfull are regenerate: & it abideth, because it worketh the desires against which the faithfull do fight. Againe, Therefor the lawe of sinne (which was also in the members of so great an Apostle) is released in baptisme, but not ended. Againe, The lawe of sinne (of which yet remaining the gilte is in baptisme discharged) Ambrose called wickednes: because it is wickednes for the flesh to lust against the Spirit. Againe, Sinne is dead in respect of the giltes wherein it held vs, & even being dead, it stil rebelleth til it be healed with perfection of burial, And yet plainer in the fifth book. As the blindnesse of heart is both a sinne, whereby man beleueth not in God: and also a punishment of sinne, whereby a proud heart is chastised with worthie correction: and the caufe of sinne when any thing is committed by the error of a blinde heart: to the lust of flesh against which a good spirit lusteth, is both sinne, because there is in it disobedience against the government of his mind: and also the punishment of sinne, because it is giuen for recompence to the defuerings of the disobedient: and the caufe of sinne in man, when he consenteth by defection, or in man, when he is borne by infection. Here without any doutfull speach he calleth it sinne, because when error was once overthrown, and the truemest confirmed, he lesse feared slanderous reportes. As in the 41. Homely vpon Iohn, where doubtlesse he speaketh according to the true meaning of his minde, he faith: If in the flesh thou serue the law of sinne, do that which the Apostle himselfe faith: let not sinne reigne in your mortall body to obey the desires thereof. He sayeth not, let it not be, but let it not reigne. So long as thou liuest, sinne muft needs be in thy members at least, let reigne be taken from it. Let not that be done which it commandeth. They that defende that lust is no sinne, are wont to objefct that saying saying of James: Lust, after that it hath conceived, bringeth forth sinne. But this is easily confuted. For vnleffe wee thinke that he speakest of only ill workes or actual sinnes, euil wilt selfe, shall not be accounted sinne. But where he calleth mischievous deeds & wicked offences offspring of sin, & giueth unto them the name of sinne, it doth not by and by follow thereof, but that to lust, is an euil thing & damnable before God.
James 3:14

14. Certaine Anabaptistes in this age, deuise I wote not what phrautike intemperance in stead of spiritual regeneration: saying that the children of god restored into the state of innocencie, now ought no more to be carefull for bridling of the lust of the flesh: that the Spirit is to be followed for their guide, vnder whose guiding they never go out of the way. It were incredible that mans minde coulde fall to so great madness, vnleffe they did openly & proudly babble abroad this doctrine. Truely it is monstrous. But it is meete, such shoulde suffer the punishment of such blasphemous boldnesse, so haue persuaded their minde to turne the trueth of God into a lie. Shall all the choyse of honestie & dishonestie, right & wrong, good and euill, vertue & vice, be taken away? Such difference (say they) commeth of the cursednesse of old Adam, from which we are exempted by Christ. So nowe there shalbe no difference betwene fornication & chastitie, plaine dealing & suitelie, trueth & lying, justice & extortion. Take away vaine seare, say they, the Spirit wil command thee no euil thing, so that thou boldly and without feare yelde thee to the guiding thereof. Who can choose but be astonished at these monstrous things? Yet it is a common learning among them, which blinded with madness of lustes, haue put off all common reason, but what Christ (I beseech you) do they frame vnto vs, and what spirit do they belch out? For we reknowledg one Christ, & his only Spirit whom the Prophets have commended, whom the Gospel giuen vs dooth preach, of whome we there haue no such thing. That Spirit is no patron of manslaughter, whoredom, drunkennes, pride, contention, courtoysnesse, & guile: but the author of loue, chastitie, sobrietie, modestie, peace, temperance and trueth. It is not a giddie spirit, & runneth headlong without consideration through right & wrong, but is full of wisedome & understanding, that differeth rightely betwene luft & vniuitt. It stirreth not vnto disolute & unbridled licentiousnesse, but maketh difference betwene lawfull and unlawful, and teacheth to keepe measure and temperance: but why do we labour any longer in confuting this beastly rage? To Christians the Spirit of the Lord is not a troublesome phantaasie, which either themselves have brought forth in a dreame, or have received being forged of other: but they reverently seek the knowledge of him at the Scriptures, where these two things bee taught of him: First that he is giuen vs vnto sanctification, that hee might bring vs into the obedience of Gods will, being purged from vnclennesse & deffilings, which obedience cannot stand, vnleffe lustes be tamed & subdued, whereunto these men would giue the bridle at libertie. Secondly we are taught that wee are so cleansed by his sanctification, that we are full befieged with many vices & much weakenesse, so long as we are enclosed in the burden of our body; whereby it commeth to passe, that being farre distant from perfection, wee haue neede alway to encrease somewhat, and being entangled tangled in vices, we have neede daily to wrangle with them. Wherupon also followeth, that shalke of sloth and carelessnesse, we must watch with heed ful minde, that wee be not compassed vnware with the shames of our fleth. Vnleffe paraduenture we thynke that we haue proceeded further than y Apo tlle, which yet was weried of the Angel of Satan, that his strength might be made perfect with weaknesse and which did vnfaithfully represent in his fleth that division of the fleth & of the spirit.

15 But whereas the Apostle in describing of repentance recketh se uen either causes or effects or partes thereof, he doeth that of a very good cause: and these they be: endeavour or carefulnesse, excusing, indignation, seare, desire, zeale, punishment. Neither ought it to seeeme any abfurditie, for I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be counted causes or effects. For both may be defended in disputation. They may be also called affections sojourned with repentance: but because, leaving out those que stions, we may understand what Paul meaneth, wee shalbe content with a simple declaration of them. He faith therefore, that of the heavinesse which is according to God, arifeth carefulnesse. For he is touched with an earnest feeling of displeasure because he hath sinned against his God, is therewithal stirred vp to diligence & needfulnes, to winde himselfe clearely out of the shames of the diuile, to take better heede of his shames, to fall no more from the governance of the holy Ghost, not to be oppressed with securitie. Next is Excusing, which in this place signifieth not the defence, whereby a sinner to escape the judgement of God, either doeth denie that he hath offended, or diminisheth the hainousnesse of his fault, but a puration which standeth rather in crauing of pardon, than in defence of his caufe. Like as the chil dren that are not reprobate when they acknowledge and confess their faults, do yet see entreatyng, and that it may take place, they protest by all meanes that they can, that they have not cast away the reuenance they owe to their parents. Finally, they so excuse them, as they go not about to prooue themselves righteous and innocent, but onely that they may ob taine pardon. Then followeth Indignation, whereby the sinner freteth inwardly with himselfe, quarrelleth with himself, is angrie with himselfe, when he recordeth his owne peruersitie and his owne vnthankfulitie to God. By the name of seare, he meaneth that trembling that is striken into our minde so oft as we thinke both what wee haue defuered, and how horri ble is the seueritie of Gods wrath against sinners. For we must needs then be vexed with a meruailous vnquietitie, which both instructeth vs to hu militie, and maketh vs more ware against the time to come. Now if out of seare do springe that carefulnesse, whereof he had spoken before, then wee see with what linking they hang together. It seemeth to mee that he hath vsed this worde Desire for diligence in our ductie and readie cheerfulnesse to obey, whereunto the acknowledging of our owne faules ought chieffely to prouoke vs. And thereunto also belongeth zeale, which he soyneth im mediately next vnto it. For it signifieth a fearfullnesse, wherwith we be kindled when we be spurred forward with these pricking thoughts: what have I done? whither had I thrown my self? hedlong, if the mercie of God did not help me? The last of all is punishment, for the more rigorouss that wee be to our

to our selues, & the straightly er that we examine our owne sinnes, so much the more we ought to tryst that God is fauour able and mercifull vnto vs.
And truely it is not possible, but that the soule being striken with horror of the judgement of God must needes do some execution in the punishing of it selfe. Truely the godly do feel what punishments are shame, confusion, mourning, loathing of their selues, & other affections that spring out of earnest acknowledging of sinnes. But let vs remember that there is a meaoure to be kept, that sorrow we do not swallow vs vp, because nothing more readily happeneth to fearfull confusions than falling to despair. And also by that craftie means whose souer Satan findeth overthrown with dread of God, he more and more drowneth them in the gulf of sorrowe, that they may never rise vp againe. Truely the fearre cannot be too great which endeth with humilitie, and departeth not from hope of pardon. But alway as the Apostle teacheth the sinner must beware, that while he move himselfe to the loathing of himselfe, he despair not, oppressed with too great fearre, for so do we flee away from God which calles vs to him by repentance. Upon which point this lesson of Bernard is verie profitable: Sorrow for sinnes is necessary, if it be not continuall. I counsell you sometime to return your faute from grievous and painfull remembrance of your owne wayes, and to clime vp to the plaine grounde of chearefull remembrance of benefites of God. Let vs mingle hony with wormewood, that the holome bitterness may bring vs health, when it shalbe dronke tempered with sweetenesse. And if ye think of your selues in humilitie, thinke also of the Lord in goodnesse.

16 Now it may be also perceived what be the fruits of repentance, euen the duties of godlinesse toward God, and of charitie toward men, & therawithall a holines and purenesse in all our life. Finally, the more earnestly y any man examineth his life by the rule of Gods lawe, so much the surer tokens he theeweth of his repentance. Therefore the holy Ghost oftentimes, when he exhorteth vs to repentance, calleth vs sometime to all the com-mandements of the law, sometime to the duties of the second table. Albeit in other places after that hee hath condemned vn cleanness in the very fountaine of the heart, he descendeth afterwarde to outward testimonies y do sett true repentance; of which thing I wil hereafter sett before the readers eyes a table in the description of a Christian life. I will not gather tes-rimonies out of the Prophets, wherein they partly scorne at their follies y go about to appease God with ceremonies, & do thewe that they be meere mockeries, and partly do teache that outward vprightnesse of life is not the principal part of repentance, because God looketh vpon the heart, whose souer is euyn meanly exercised in the scripture, shal be perceived of himselfe without any other mans putting in minde, that when we haue to doe with God, we labour in vaine, vnlesse wee beginne at the inward affection of the heart. And the place of Joel shall not be a little helpe to the understanding of the rest, where he sayth: Tearre your hearts and not your garments. Also both those pointes are expressed in these wordes of Iames: Ye wicked doers, cleanse your handes: ye double men, purge your heartes. Where in deede there is an addition joyned to the fiftte parte, but after is shewed the the verie fountaine and beginning that they must wipe away their secret filthinesse, that there may be an altar set vp to God in the very heart. Befide this there are alfo certaine outward exercises which wee vsuall ly as remedies to humble our felues or to tame our fleshe, & publiquely for the declaration of repentance. And they proceed from that punishment of which Paul speaketh, for these are the properties of an afflieted minde, to be in lonthomeflesse, mourning & weeping, to fleect gorgeousnesse & all trimming, and to forfake all delites. Then he that feeleth how great an evil is the rebellion of the fleshe, seeketh all remedies to bridle it. Moreover he that well bethinketh him how grievous a thing it is to have offended the iuftice of God, cannot rest vntil he haue in his owne humiliatton glorie to God.
Such exercises the old writers do ofteentimes rehearse, when they speake of the fruits of repentance. But albeit they do not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readers shal pardon me, if I speake what I think: it seemeth vnto me that they ftdand too much vpnon them. And if any man will wisely wey it, I truft he will agree with mee, that they haue two wayes gone beyond measure. For when they so much enforced, & with immeasurable commendations advanced that bodily discipline, this in deed they obtained, that the people did the more earnestly embrace it, but they in a manner darkened that, which ought to haue beene of much greater importance. Secondly, in giving punishments they were somewhat more rigorous than eccleaffaticall mildnesse may beare, as we shal haue occasion to thewe in an other place.

17 But because many when they heare weeping, faying & ahes spoken of, both often in other places & specially in Joel, they measure the chief part of repentance by faying & weeping: therefore their error is to be takened away. That which is there spoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lord, of cutting their hearts and not their garments, is properly begnongto repentance; but weeping & faying are not joined as continual or necceffarie effectes thereof, but are spoken of in respect of a special circumstance. Because he had prophesied, that they hanged ouer the Iewes a moft griuous deftruction, therefore he counfelleth them to prevent the wrath of God, not only in repenting, but also in vterrinf tokens of their forrowe.
For as a man standing to be arraigned, vfeith humbly to abace himfelfe with an ouergrowned beard, uncombed haire & black apparel, to moout the judge to pitty, fo it behooved them when they ftoode accused before the judge-mentfeate of God in pitious array, to befeec him not to ex tend his rigor.
But although ahes and fackcloth did paradumente more fitly agree with those times: Yet it is certaine, that weeping and faying should be to a very conuenient good vs among vs, fo oft as the Lord feemeth to threaten vs any plague or calamitie. For when he maketh any danger to appeare, he doth after a certaine manner giue warning, that he is prepared or armed to revenge. Therefore the Prophet did well, when he exhorted his contremen to weeping and faying, that is to the sorrowfull manner of accused men, whose offences he laid a little before, were had in examination. Even as the Pastors of the Church should noe doe ill at this daye, if when they see any ruine hanging ouer the neckes of their people, they woulde cry out vpon
them to make haste to fasting and weeping; so that they would be with greater and more inward care and diligence, alway enforce that which is the principal point, that they must cut their hearts and not their garments. It is out of doubt, that fasting is not always ioyned with repentance, but is apointed peculiarly for times of miserable plagues; and therefore Christ ioyneth it with wailing, when he acquiteth the Apostles from need thereof, vntil the time that being spoiled of his presence, they should be tormented with grief. I speake of solemn fasting. For the private life of the godly ought to be tempered with honest sparing & obstetricie, that in the whole course thereof there may appeare a certaine kind of fasting. But because all this matter shalbe to be declared againe in the place where we shall entreate of the discipline of the Church, therefore I do now the more slenderly touch it. But this one thing I wil adde here by the way: when the name of repentance is applied to this outward profession, then it is vnproperly turned from the natural meaning which I have abowe set forth of it. For it is not so much a turning vnto God as a confession of fault, with a beseeching of God not to charge them with the paine & gilteinne. So do to penance in ashes & sackcloth is nothing else, than to utter a displeasednes when God is angry with vs for grievous offences. And this is a publike kind of confession, whereby we condemning our felues before the Angels & the worlde, do present the judgement of god. For Paul rebuking their slothfulness that tenderly bare with their own faults, faith: if we did judge our felues, wee should not be judged of God. But it is not alway necessarie to make men openly of counsell and wittnesse of our repentance: but to confess privetely to God is a parte of true repentance which cannot bee omitted. For there is nothing more unreasonable than to looke to haue God to pardon vs the finnes in which we flatter our felues and do hide them by Hypocrisie, least he should bring them to light. And it behoueth vs not onely to confesse those finnes which we daily commit, but more grievous offences ought to drawe vs further, & to call againe into our remembrance thinges that seeme long ago buried. Which leffon David gueueth vs by his example. For beeing touched with shame of his newly committed fault, hee examineth himselfe even to the time when he was in his mothers wombe, & confesseth that euene then hee was corrupted & infected with the filthiness of the fleth. And this he doth not to diminishe the haynousnes of his fault, as many hide themselves in the multitude, and seeke to escape punishment by wrapping other with them. But David dooth farre otherwise which with simple plainnes enforceth his fault in saying, that being corrupt from his first infancie, he hath not ceased to haue euils upon euils. Also in another place hee likewiie fo examineth his passeid life, that hee raueth the mercie of God for the sins of his youth. And truly then onely should wee proue our drownes to be shaken awaye from vs, if groning vnder our burden and bewailing our euils, wee asketh the discipke of God. It is moreover to be noted, that the repentance which we are commandd continually to apply, differeth from that repentance, that lifteth vp as it were from death, them that eyther haue willfully, fallen, or with unbridled licentiousnesse have thrown forth themselves to sinne, or after a certaine manner of rebellious revolting, have shaken off the yoke yoke of God. For the Scripture oftentimes, whè it exhorteth to repentance meaneth thereby as it were a passage or rising againe from death into life: and when it rehearseth that the people did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatry and other grosser offences. And in like manner Paul threateneth mourning vnto sinners that have not done penance for their wantonnesse, fornication and vniclstitie. This difference is to be diligently marked, least we heare few are called to penance, a more than carelessnesse assuredly should creepe vpon vs, as though the mortifying of the flethe did no more belong vnto vs, the care whereof, the corrupt desires that alway tickle vs, and the vices that commonly bud vp in vs, do not suffer vs to relafe. Therefore the speciall repentance which is required but of some, whom the Deuill hath violently carried away from the fear of God, and fast bound with damnable snares, taketh not away the ordinary repentance which the corruptnesse of nature compelleth vs to apply throughout all the whole course of our life.

19 Nowe if that be true, which is most evidently certaine, that all the summe of the Gospell is contained in these two principall pointes, Repentance and forgiuenesse of sinnes: do we not see, that the Lord doth therefore freely inuitle thee to be his, that he may also by the sanctification of his Spirit restore them into true righteousness? John the Angel sent before the face of Christ to prepare his wayes, preached: Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is come neere at hande. In calling them to repentance, he did put them in minde to acknowledge themselves sinners, & al that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lorde, that they might with all their heartes desire the mortifying of their fleth and a newe regeneration in the Spirit. In telling them of the kingdom of God, he called them to faith. For by the kingdom of God which he taught to be at hande, he meant forgiuenesse of sinnes, salvation, and life, and all that ever we get in Christ. Wherefore in the other Evangelistes it is written, John came preaching the Baptisme of repentance vnto forgiuenesse of sinnes. And what is that els, but that they being oppressed and wearied with the burden of sinnes, should turne to the Lorde, and conceive good hope of forgiuenesse and salvation? So Christ also beganne his preachings: The kingdom of God is come neere at hand: repent ye and beleue the Gospell. First he declareth that the treasures of Gods mercy are opened in him, and then hee required repentance, andlaff of al confidence in the promises of God. Therefore when hee meant briefly to comprehend the whole summe of the Gospell, he sayde that he must suffer and rise againe from the dead, and that repentance and forgiuenesse of sinnes must be preached in his name. The Apostles also preached the same after his resurrection, that he was raised vp by God, to give to Israel repentance and forgiuenesse of sinnes. Repentance is preached in the name of Christ, when men doe heare by the doctrine of the Gospell that all their thoughtes, their affections, and their endeavours are corrupt and faulty, and that therefore it is necessarie that they be borne againe if they will enter into the kingdom of God. Forgiuenesse of sinnes is preached when men are taught Christ is made to them redemption, righteousnes, salvation and life: in whose name they are freely accounted righteous and innocent in the sight of God, whereas both these graces are received by faith, as I have in another place declared: yet because the goodness of God whereby sins are forgiven, is the prove of object of faith, therefore it shall be good that it be diligently distinguished from repentance.

20 Now as the hatred of sinne, which is the beginning of repentance, openeth vs the first entrance into Christ, which sheweth himselfe to none but to miserable and afflicted sinners, which groan, labour, are laden, are hungry and thirsty, and pine away with sorrow and miserie; so must we endeavor toward repentance, throughout all our life to apply it, and follow it to the end, if we will abide in Christ. For he came to call sinners, but to repentance: he was sent to bless the unworthy, but that every one should turne himselfe from his wickednesse. The Scripture is full of such sayings. Wherefore when God offereth forgiveness of sinnes, he likewise vth thee to require on our part repentance, secretly declaring thereby, that his mercy ought to be to men a cause to repent them. Doe (sayth he) judgement and righteousnes, because salvation is come nere at hande. Again, There shall come to Si on a redeemer, and to them that in Jacob repent from their sinnes. Again, Seeke the Lord while he may be found: call vs upon him while he is nere. Let y wicked leave his way & the wickednes of his thoughts, & be turned to the Lord, and he shall have mercy on him. Again, Turne ye and repent, that your sinnes may be done away. Where yet is to be noted, that this condi tion is not so annexed as though our repentance were a foundation to de ferue pardon, but rather (because the Lord hath determined to have mercy upon men to this end that they shold repent) he teacheth men whither they shall trauaile if they will obtaine grace. Therefore so long as we shall dwell in the prison of our body, we must continually wrestle with the vices of our corrupt flesh, yea with our own natural soule. Plato faith in certain places, that the life of a Philosopher is a meditation of death, but we may more tru ly say, that the life of a Christian man is a perpetual study and exercise of mortifying the flesh, till it being utterly slaine, the Spirit of God get the do mination in vs. Therefore I think that he hath much profited, that hath learn d much to dislike himselfe: not that he should sticke fast in that mire and go no further, but rather that he should hast and long towards God, that being graffed into the death and life of Christ, he should sticke vpon a con tinual repentance: as truely they can not otherwise do, that have a natural hatred of sinne: for no man caner hated sinne, vnlesse he were first in love with righteousnesse. This doctrine, as it was most simple of all other, so I thought it best to agree with the truth of the Scripture.

21 Now that Repentance is a singular gift of God, I thinke it be so well known by the doctrine above taught, that I neede not to repeate a long dis course to prove it againe. Therefore the Church prayeth and hath in ad miration the benefit of God, that he hath given the Gentiles repentance v salvation. And Paul commending Timothee to be patient and milde towards the vnbelieuers, saith: If at any time GOD gie them repent ance that they may repent from the slares of the Devil, God in deed affir meth that he willth the conversion of all men, and directeth his exhortati ons generally to all men: but the effectual working thereof hangeth vpon the Spirit.
Spirite of regeneration. Because it were more easie to create vs men, than of our owne power to put on a better nature. Therefore in the whole course of regeneration we are not without cause called, the worke of God created to good works, which hee hath prepared that wee shoulde walke in them. Whom fower the Lords will is to deliuer from death, those he quicke-neth with the spirite of regeneration: not that repentance is properly y cause of saluation, but because it is alreadie seene that it is vnseparable from faith and from the mercie of God: where (as Esay tefteth) that there is a redeemer come to him, and to those that in Iacob are returned from their wickednesse. This truely standeth steadfastly determined, that where fower liueth the feare of God, there the spirite hath wrought vnto the saluation of man. Therefore, in Esay, when the faithfull complaine and lament that they are forfaken of God, they recken this as a token of being reprobates, that their hearts were hardened by God. The Apostle also meaneing to exclude apostataes from hope of saluation, appointeth this reafon, that it is impoffible for them to bee renewed vnto repentance: because God in renewing them whom he will not haue perifhe, sheweth a token of his fatherly favour, and in a manner draweth them vnto him with y beams of his cheerefull and merie countenaunce: on the other side with hardening them, he thundereth against the reprobate, whose wickednesse is unpardonable. Which kinde of vengeance the Apostle threateneth to willfull apostataes, which when they depart from the faith of the Gofpell, doe make a scorne of God, reprochfully dispife his grace, and defile and tread vnder feet the blood of Christ, yea as much as in them is they crucife him againe. For he doeth not (as some fondly rigorous men woulde haue it) cut of hope of pardon from all willfull sinnes: but teachevt that apostasie is vnworthie of all excufe: so that it is no maruell that GOD doeth punifhe a contempte of himselfe so full of sacrilege, with vnpeaasable rigor. For he faith that it is impoffible, that they which haue once beene Enlightened, haue tafted of the heauenly gift, haue beene made partakers of the holy Ghoft, haue tafted of the good worde of God and the powers of the worlde to come, if they fall, shoulde be renewed to repentance, crucifying againe of newe, and making a scorne of the fonne of God. Againe in another place: If(faith Heb. 10. 25.) hee wee willingly sinne after knowledge of the truth receiued, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinnes, but a certaine dreadfull expectation of judgement, &c. These also bee the places, out of the wrong understanding whereof, the Noutians in old time haue gathered matter to play the madmen with whose rigorousnesse certaine good men being offended, beleued this to be a counterafte Epiftle in the Apostles name, which yet in all partes doe truly fauour of an Apostolike spirite. But becaufe we contende with none but with them that allowe it, it is easie to shewe, how these sentences doe nothing maintaine their errour. First it is necessarie that the Apostle agree with his maister, which affirneth that all sinne and blasphemie shall be forgiven, except the sinne against the holy Ghoft, which is not forgiven neither in this worlde nor in the worlde to come. It is certaine (I say) that the Apostle was contented with this exception, vnlesse wee will make him an aduersarie to the grace of Chrift. Whereuupon followeth, that
Of the manner how to receive

pardon is denied to no speciall offences, but onely to one, which proceeding of a desperate rage, cannot be ascribed to weaknesses, and openly speaketh that a man is possessed of the Deuill.

22 But to discourse this, it behoueth to enquire what is that same so horrible offence, that shall haue no forgivinge. Whereas Augustine in one place defineth it an obstinate stinences even unto death; with despite of pardon, that doeth not well agree with the verie wordes of Christ, that it shall not be forgiven in this worlde. For either that is spoked in vaine, or it may be committed in this life. But if Augustine's definition be true, then it is not committed, yntil it continue even unto death. Wheras some other say that hee finneth against the holy Ghost, that enuiteth the grace bestowed vpon his brother: I see not from whence that is fetched. But let vs bring a true definition, which being once proued with sure testimonies, shall easie by it selfe overthrowe all the rest. I say therefore, that they sinne against the holy Ghost, which of set purpose reftit the truth of God, with brightness whereof they are so daunted, that they can not pretend ignorance: which they doe onely to this end to reftit. For Christ meaning to expound that which he had saide immediately added: He spaketh a word against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiven him: but he that blasphemeth against the holy Ghost, shall not be forgiven. And Matthew for the blasphemie against the holy Spirit, putteth the spirit of blasphemie. But how can a man speake a reproch against the Sonne, but it is also spoken against the holy Ghost? They that stumble vnware against the truth of God, not knowing it, which doe ignorantly speake euill of Christ, having yet this minde, that they would not extinguish the truth of God disclosed vnto them, or once with one worde offend him, whom they had known to be the Lordes anointed: these men sinne against the father and the sonne. So there are many at this day, that doe most hauently detest the doctrine of the Gospel, which if they did know it to be the doctrine of the Gospel, they wold be ready to worship with all their heart. But they whose conscience is convinced, that it is the worde of God which they for sake and fight against, and yet cease not to fight against it, they are lade to blaspheme the holy Ghost forasmuch as they wrastle against the enlightening that is the worke of the holy Ghost. Such were many of the Iewes, which when they coulde not reftit the Spirit that spake by Stephen, yet endeavoured to reftit. It is no doubt but that many of them were caried vnto it with zeale of the lawe, but it appeareth that there were some other that of malicious wickednes did rage against God himselfe: that is to say against the doctrine, which they were not ignorant to be of God. And such were those Pharisees, against whom the Lord inuercith, which to overthrow the power of the holy Ghost, desamed him with the name of Beelzebub. This therefore is the spirit of blasphemie, when mans boldnes of set purpose, leapeth forth to reproch of the name of God, Which Paul signifieth when he saith, that he obtained mercie, because he had ignorantly committeth those things through vnbeliefe, for which otherwise he had beene vnworthie of Gods favour. If ignorance joyned with vnbeliefe was the cause that he obtained pardon, therewith foloweth, that there is no place for pardon, where knowledge is joyned to vnbeliefe.

23 But if thou marke it well, thou shalt perceiue that the Apostile speaketh keth not of one or other particular fall, but of vnuiuerfall departing whereby the reprobate doe forfake saluation. And it is no maruell, that they who Iohn in his canonickall Epiftle affirmeth not to have beene of the elect, from whome they went out, doe feele God vnappeafeable. For hee directly his speech against them, that imagined, that they might returne to the Christian religion, although they had once departed from it; and calling the from this fallse and pestilent opinion, he faith that which is most true, that there is no way of returne open for them to the communion of Christ, that wis-tingly and willingly haue cast it away; but they cast it not away, that onely in diuifolte licentioufities of life tranfgresse the worde of the Lord, but they that of fet purpose cast away his whole doctrine. Therefore the deceite is in these wordes of falling and sinning. Because the Notatians expounde Fall-ling to be, if a man being taught by the lawe of the Lorde, that he ought not to steal or to commit fornication, ablitcineth not from stealing or fornication. But contrariwise I affhine, that there is a secret comparison of contraryes, wherein ought to bee repeted all things contrarie to that whiche was first spoken, so that here is expressed not any particular faulte, but the whole turning away from God, and (as I may so call it) the Apostasie of the whole man. Therefore when he faith, they which haue fallen after they haue once beene enlightened, and haue tafted the heauenly gift, and beene made partakers of the holy Ghost, and also tafted the good wordes of God and the powers of the worlde to come: it is to bee vnderstaunded of them, that with aduised vngodliness haue choked the light of the holy spirite; haue fpit out against the taft of the heauenly gift, haue enstranged them-theselves from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, haue troden under foot the word of God and the powers of the worlde to come. And more to expresse that aduised purpose of wickednes, in an other place afterward he addeth this word by name Wilfully. For when he faith, that there is left no sacrifice for them that finne willingly, after knowledge of the truth received, he doth not deny, that Christ is a continuall sacrifice to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which he expressly crieth out almost in the whome Epiftle, where he declareth the priesthoode of Christ) but he faith, that there remaineth no other when they are once forsaken: and it is forsaken, when the truth of the Gospel is of better purpose renounced.

24 But whereas some doe thinke it too harde and too far from the tender mercifulnesse of God, that any are put away; that wee to beseeching the Lorde di mercie: that is easily aunswered. For he doeth not say, that pard on is denied them if they turne to the Lorde: but hee vterely denyeth, that they can rise vnfo repenentance, because they are by the iuft judgement of God stricken with eternall blindenes for their vnhankfulenes. And it ma-keth nothing to the contrarie that afterward he applieth to this purpose the example of Efau, which in vaine attempted with howling & weping to recuper his right of the first begotten. And no more doth that threatening of the Prophete, when they crie, I will not heare. For in such Phrases of speach is meant neither the true conversion, nor calling vpon God, but that carelesnes of the wicked wherewith being bounde, they are compelled in extremitie to looke vnto that which before they carelesly neglected, that

that there is no good thing for them but in the Lords helpe. But this they do not so much call vpon, as they mourne that it is taken from them. Therefore the prophete meaneth nothing else by crying, and the apostle nothing else by Weeping, but that horrible torment which by desperation fretteth and vexeth the wicked. This it is good to marke diligently, for else God should disagree with himselfe, which crieth by the prophete that he will be mercifull so foone as the sinner turneth. And as I haue alreadie saied, it is certaine that the minde of man is not turned to better, but by Gods grace preventing it. Also his promise concerning calling vppon him, will never deceive. But that blinde torment wherewith the reprobate are diversly drawn, when they see that they must needs seeke God, that they may finde remedie for their evils, and yet doe flee from his presence, is unproperly called Conversion and prayer.

25 But a question is moued; whereas the apostle denieth that God is appeased with fained repentance, howe Ahab obtained pardon & turned away the punishment pronounced vpon him, whom yet it appearedeth by the rest of the course of his life to haue beene onely striken amazed with sudden fear. Hee did indeede put on sackcloth, scattered ashes vpon him, lay vpon the grounde, and (as it is testified of him) hee was humbled before God: but it was not enought to cut his garments when his hart remained thicke and swollen with malice. Yet wee see howe God is turned to mercie. I aunge there that so sometime hypocrites are spared for a time, but yet so that euuer the wrath of God lieth vpon them, and that is done not so much for their sakes, as for common example. For whereas Ahab had his punishment mitigate vnto him, what profite got hee thereby, but that he should not feele it a blite in earth? Therefore the course of GOD although it were hidden, yet had a fast abiding place in his house, and he himselfe went into eternall destruction. This same is to bee seene in Esay.

For though hee had a repulse, yet a temporal blessing was granted him at his weeping. But because the spirituall inheritance, by the oracle of God could not rest but with one of the brethren, when Iacob was chosen and Esau refused, that putting away did exclude the mercie of God: this comforte was left him as to a heathy man, that hee shoulde bee far with the fat of the earth and the daeoe of Heauen. And this is it that I said euennowe, that it ought to bee referred to the example of the other, that wee shoulde learne the more chearefully to apply our minds and endeavours to repentance, because it is not to be doubted that when we are truly and heartily turned, God will bee readie to forgie vs, whose mercifullnesse extendeth it selfe euuen to the vnworthie, so long as they shewe any greese at all. And therewithall wee bee also taught, howe terrible judgement is preparèd for all the obstinate, which nowe make it a sporte with no leste shamelesse face than yron hearts to despise and fett nought by the threatninges of God. After this manner hee oftentimes reached out his hande to the children of Israel, to releue their miseries, although their crimes were

Phil. 78. 36. counterfaite, and their heartes double and false, as himselfe in the Pfalme complaineth, that they by and by returned to their nature, and so minded with so friendly gentle dealing to bring them to earnest conversion, or to make make them vnexecutable. Yet in releasing punishments for a time, he doth not binde himselfe to a perpetuall lawe thereby, but rather rifeeth sometimes more rigorously against Hypocrites, and doubleth their paines, that thereby may appear how much faining displeaseth him. But (as I haue sayd) he sheweth some examples of his readines to give pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendment of life, & their pride may be the more gravely condemned, that stubbornely kick against the pricke.

The iiiij. Chapter.

That all that the Sophisters babble in their schooles of Penance, is far from the purenesse of the Gospel. Where is entreated of Confession and satisfaction.

Nowe I come to discouer those thinges, which the Schoole Sophisters haue taught of repentance. Which I will runne ouer in as fewe words as may be, because I mind not to go through all, least this booke, which I labour to drawe into a short abridgement, should growe to a huge greatness. And the Sophisters haue entangled it in so many volumes, seeing a matter otherwise not very harde, that a man shall hardly finde howe to get out, if he once fall into their dregges. First, in defining it, they shewe that they never understood what repentance was. For they take holde of certaine sayynges of the old writers, which doe nothing at all expresse that nature of repentance, as that to repent is to weepe for finnes passed, and not to commit finnes to be wept for: Againe, that it is to lament euils past, and not to commit againe other euils to be lamented. Againe: that it is a certaine sorrowfull requenge, punishing in himselfe that which he is sorry to haue committed. Againe: that it is a sorowe of heart, and bitterness of soule, for the euils that a man hath committed or to which he hath consented. But, to grant these thinges well sayd of the fathers, (which a contentious man might easily enough deny) yet they were not spoken to this entent to describe repentance, but only to exhort them to whom they wrote, that they should not fall again into the same offences, out of which they had beene drawn: But if we lift to turne all such titles of commendation into definitions, then other may also be adiioned as rightfullie as they. As this of Chrystoyme, Repentance is a medicine that destroyeth sinne, a gift given from heauen, a maruellous vertue, a grace surmounting the force of the lawe. Yea and the doctrine which they afterwaide teach, is somewhat worse than these definitions. For they sticke so earnestlie in outwaide exercises, that a man can gather nothing els out of infinite volumes, but that repentance is a discipline and rigoroussesse that ferueth partly to tame the flesh, and partly to chastice and punish vices: but they kepe maruellous silence of the inward renewing of the minde that draweth with it correction of life. There is in deede much talke among them of Contrition and Attriotion, they torment soules with many doubtes, and do thrust into them much trouble and caurefulness: but when they seeme to have thoroughly wounded the hearts, they heale the bitterness with a light sprinkling of ceremonies.

And
And when they have thus curiously defined repentance, they divide it into contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of works, no more logically than they defined it, although they would seeme to have wafted all their age in framing of scholastick reasons. But if a man will goe about to prove by the definition(which kind of argument is of force among logicians) that a man may weep for his sinnes passed, and commit no more to be wept for, that he may bewaie his euils passed, and commit no more to be bewaied, and that he may punishe himselfe for that which he was for to haue committed, &c. although he doe not confesse with his mouth: how will they maintaine their diuision? For if that true penitent man doe not confesse, then repentance may be without confession. But if they answere, that this diuision is referred to repentance, in respect that it is a sacrament, or is meant of the whole perfection of repentance, which they comprehend not in their definitions, then is there no cause to blame mee, but let them lay the fault in themselves that make not a purer and plainer definition, I truely (according to my grossenesse) when any thing is disputed of, do referre all things to the very definition, which is the flye and grounde of the whole disputation. But admette that to be their matterlike licence. Nowe let vs particulaerly consider all the parties in order. Whereas I do negligently leape ouer as triffles those things that they with great grauitie of countenance do publish for mysteries, I do it not unwittingly,(neither were it very painefull for me to confute all) they thinke those to haue deepeely & furtherly disputed) but I would thinke it against conscience to weare the readers with such things without any profit. Truly it is easy to knowe by the questions which they moue and toffe, and wherewith they miserably encomber themselves, that they prate of things that they knowe not. As for example: whether the repentance of our sinne pleaseth God, when obstinacie endureth in other. Againe: whether the punishments layed vpon man by God, do auail to satisfaction. Againe: whether repentance may be oftentimes reiterate for deadly sinnes: where they lowly and wickedly define, that penance is daily done but for veniall sinnes. Likewise they very much torment themselves with a grosse errour, vpon the saying of Hierome, that repentance is a second boude after shipwracke. Wherin they shew that they never waked from their brutifh dulnes, to feele so much as a farre of the thousandth part of their faultes.

2 But I would the readers should note, that here is not a quearel about the shadowe of an asse, but the most earnest matter of all other is entreated of, that is to say, forgiuenesse of sinnes. For whereas they require three things to repentance, contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke: they doe therewithall teach that those three things are necessarie to the obtayning of forgiuenesse of sinnes. But if it behowe vs to knowe any thing at all in all our religion, this truely behoueth vs most of all, I meane to vnderstande and knowe well by what maner of what lawe, vpon what condition, with what easinesse or hardenesse the forgiuenesse of sinnes is obtained. If this knowledge stand not plaine and certaine, the confence shall have no reft at all, no peace with God, no confidence or assurednesse, but continually trembleth, wau eth, is troubled, is tormented, is vexed, horribly dreadeth, hateth and fleeth the sight of God. But if the forgiveness of sins hang upon those conditions to which they doe binde it, then nothing is more miserable, nothing in more lamentable case than wee. They make Contrition the first parte of obyning pardon, and they require that to bee a true contrition, that is to lay perfect and full: but in the mean time they doe not determine when a man may be assured, that hee hath to the full measure perfectly performed this contrition. Truely I grant that every man oughht diligently and earnestly to enforce himselfe, with bitterly weeping for his sinnes, to whet himselfe more and more to a loathing and hatred of them. For this is a sorrowne not to bee repented, that breedeth repentance into salvation. But when there is such a bitterness of sorrowe required as may proportionally aumfweare the greatnesse of the fault, and such as may in balance counterpaise with the truth of pardon, here the pure consciences are marvellously tormented and troubled, when they see them selues changed with a due contrition of sinnes, and doe not so attaine the measure of that due, that they can determine with themselues, why they haue duly performed so much as they duely ought.
If they say that wee must doe as much as lieth in vs, then come wee still to the same point that we were at before: for how dare any man assure him-selues that hee hath employed all his force to bewaile his sinnes? So when the consciences haue long wraffled with themselues, and long beene exercised with battells, doe at length finde no hauen to rest in, yet somewhat to ease themselues, they enforce themselues to a sorrowe, and wring out teares to make perfect their contrition.

3 But if they say that I flawnder them: Let them come forth and shewe any one man, that by such doctrine of contrition hath not either bene driuen to despaire, or hath not set for his defense a counterfaiting of sorrowe instead of true sorrowe, against the judgement of God. Wee haue also our selues saide in one place, that forgivness of sins neuer commeth without repentance, because none but the afflicted and wounded with conscience of sinnes, can sincerely call vpon the mercie of God: but wee haue therewithall further saide, that repentance is not the cause of the for-givnesse of sinnes. As for those tormentes of soulis, which they say must bee performed of duetie, wee haue taken them away: wee haue taught the sinner not to looke vpon his owne contrition nor his owne teares, but to fa-ten both his eyes vpon the onely mercie of God. Wei haue onely put him in minde that Christ called the laboring and loden, when hee was sent to publish the glad tidinges to the poore, to heale the contrite in harte, to preach remission to captiues, to deliver prisoners, and to comfort them y mourne.
From which should be excluded both the Pharisees, y filled with their owne righteousnes, doe not acknowledge their owne povertie, and alfo the despisers that carelesse of Gods wrath doe fecke no remedie for their evils.
For such doe not labour, nor are loden, nor contrite in heart, nor bond, nor captiue. But there is great difference betweene teaching a man to deferue forgivenesse of sins with due and full contrition, which the sinner can never performe: and instructing him to hunger and thirste for the mercie of GOD, that by the acknowledgning of his owne miserie, by his owne

Vnquietsesse, wearnessse and captiuitie, it may bee shewed him, where hee ought to seeke for releefe, rest and libertie: and finallie, he may bee taught in the humbling of himselfe, to giue giorie to God.

4 Concerning confession, there hath bene alwayes great strife betwene the Canonistes and Scholediuines: while the one forte affirme, that confession is commanded by the speeiall commaundement of God; and the other forte deny it and say, that it is commaundoned onely by the Ecclesiasticall constitutions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable shamelesnes of the diuines, that have corrupted and violationly wrifed as many places of Scripture, as they alleaged for their purpose. And when they saw that they could not so obtayne which they required, they which would be thought more furtle than the rest escaped away with this shift, that confession came from the lawe of God, in respect of the substantia of it, but afterwars receiued forme of the lawe Positiae. Even as the foolsheft fort among the lawyers doe say, that Citations came from the law of God, because it is saide: Adam where art thou? And likewise Exceptions, because Adam answered as it were by way of exception saying: The wife that thou gaues me, &c. But that both citations and exceptions receiued forme given them by the Ciuill lawe. But let vs see by what argumentes they proue this confession, either Formed or Unformed to bee the commaundemente of God. The Lord (say they) sent the lepros men to the Priestes. But what? Sent he them to confession? Who euer hearde it spoken, that the Leuitical priestes were appointed to heare confessions? Therefore they flye to Allegories, and say: It was commaunded by the Law of Moses, that the priestes shoulde dispenser betweene leprosie and leprosie: sinne is a spiritual leprosie: therefore it is the priestes office to pronounce vpon it. Before that I aunswered them, I asketh by the way, If this place make them Judges of the spiritual leprosie, why do they drawe to them the knowledge of natural and fleshly leprosie? This forsooth is not to mocke with the Scriptures. The lawe giueth to the Leuitical Priestes the knowledge of the Leprose, therefore let vs take it vpon vs. Sinne is a spiritual leprosie, therefore let vs also be examiners of sinne. Nowe I aunswered: fith the priesthooode is remoued, it is necessarie that the Lawe be remoued also. All priesthoodes are remoued to Christ, and fulfilled, and ended in him, therefore to him onely all the right and honour of priesthooide is also remoued. If they loue so well to followe allegories, let him set Christ before them for the onely priest, and heape vpon his judgemensteate the free iurisdiction of all things: this wee can easilie bee contentent to suffer. Moreover their allegorie is verie ynit, that setteth among the ceremonies that Lawe which is merely politike. Why then did Christe sende the lepros men to the Priestes? That the Priestes shoulde not cauall that he did breake the lawe that commaundeth the man healed of the leprosie, to bee shewed before the Priest and purged with offering of sacrifice: therefore he commaundeth the lepros men being cleansed, to doe that which belonged to the Lawe. Goe (faith hee) and fiwe your sutable to the Prieste, and offer the gifts that Moses hath commaundeth in the Lawe that it should bee for a witness vnto them. And truely this miracle should haue bene a witness vnto them, for they they had pronounced them leprous, and now they pronounce them healed.

Are they not whether they will or no compelled to become witnesses of Christ's miracles: Christ leaueth to them his miracle to be examined, they cannot deny it. But because they still daily with it, therefore this worke is for a witness unto them. So in another place: This Gospel shalbe preached in all the world, for a witness to all nations. Again: Ye shalbe led before kings & governors, for a witness to them, that is: that in the judgement of God they may be more strongly convinced. But if they had rather follow Chrysostome: he also teacheth that Christ did this for the Jewes sake, y he should not be accounted a breaker of the law. Albeit in fo clear a matter I am ashamed to allege the witness of any man: whereas Christ pronounceth y he leaueth the right of the lawe whole to the priestes as to the professed enemies of the Gospel, which were alway bent to carpe against it, if their mouth had not bene stopped. Wherefore that the popish sacrificing priestes may still keepe this possession, let them openly take partes with them which mutt of necessity be restrained by force, that they speake not ill against Christ. For this nothing belongeth to his true ministers.

5 They bring their second argument out of the same fountaine, that is from an allegorie, as though allegories were of great force to confirm any doctrine. But let them be of force, if I do not prove that I can make a fairer shewe of them for my side, than they can for theirs. They say, The Lorde commanded his Disciples, that when Lazarus was raised vp, they shoulde unbind & loose him from his bonds. Here first they lie: for it is no where read that the Lord said this to the Disciples: and it is much more likely that he said it to the Jewes that stood by him, that the miracle might be made the more evident without suspicion of fraud, & his power appeare the greater; y without any touching, with his only worde he raised vp dead men. For thus I expound it: that the Lord, to take away all wrongful opinion from the Jewes, willed them to roll away the stone, to seeke the stinke, to behold assured tokens of death, to see him rising by the onely power of his worde, and them first to seeke him living. And this is the judgement of Chrysostome. But let vs graunt that this was spoken to the Disciples: what will they get thereby? That the Lord gave his Apostles power to loose. But how much more fitly & more handfomly might these things be applied by way of allegorie, to say that by this signe the Lorde meant to instruct his faithfull, to loose them that he had raised vp: that is, that they should not call into remembrance those sinnes that he had forgotten: that they shoulde not condemne them for sinners whome he had acquitted: that they should not reproch men with those things that he had forgiven: that they should not be rigorous to punish, & lightly offended, where he is mercifull & easily enterred to spare? Truely, nothing ought to move vs more to readiness to forgие, than the example of the Judge that threateneth that he wil be unappeasable to them that be too rigorous & vngentle. Now let them goe and boast of their allegories.

6 But nowe they ioyne more neere hande with vs, when they figh (as they thinke) with open sentences. They that came to Johne baptisme, did confesse their sinnes, and James willeth that wee confesse our sinnes one to another.
Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive an other. No maruelle if they that woulde be baptised did confesse their sinnes, for it was said before that John preached baptism of repentance, and baptised in water vnto repentance. Whome should he then haue baptised, but them that had confesst themselves sinners? Baptisme is a token of the forgiuenesse of sinnes; and who shoulde be admitted to this token but sinners, & they that acknowledge themselues to be such? Therefore they confessed their sinnes, that they might be baptised. And not without a cause doth James bid vs confesse one to another. But if they did marke what followed: next after, they woulde vnderstande, that this also maketh little for them. Confesse (faith he) one to another your sinnes, & pray one for another. He ioyneth together mutual confession & mutual prayer. If we must confesse to priests only, then must we also pray for priests only. Yea, What and if it might follow of the wordes of James, that onely priests might con-fesse? for when he willeth that we should confesse one to another, he speaketh onely to them that may heare the confessions of other: his worde is in Greeke Allelous, mutually, interchangeably, by turns, or (if they so like best to terme it) by way of reciprocation one to another. But so interchangeably none can confesse, but they that are meete to heare confessions. Which prerogative sith they vouchsafe to grant only to priests, we do also put out the office of confessting to them only. Therefore away with such trullings, & let us take the very meaning of the Apostle which is simple & plain: that is, that we should lay our weaknesses one in anothers bosome to receive mutual counsel, mutual compassion, & mutual comfort one of another: then that we being naturally prone to the weakensse of our brethren, should pray for them to the Lord. Why do they then alcause James against vs, which do so earnestly require the confession of the mercy of God? but no man can con-fesse Gods mercie, vnlesse he haue first confesst his owne misery. Yea we rather pronounce him accursed that doeth not before God, before his Angels, before the Church, yea and before all men confesse himself a sinnier. For the Lorde hath concluded all vnder sinnes, that all mouthes might be stopped, and all flesh humbled before God, and he onely justified and exalted.

But I maruelle with what face they dare affirme, that the confession whereof they speake, is of the lawe of God: the vs whereof we grante in deede to be very auncient, but such as wee are able to prove in olde time to have bene at libertie. Truely euie their owne chronicles declare, that there was no certaine law or constitution of it before the times of Innocent the thirde. Surely, if they had had a more auncient lawe, they would rather haue taken hold thereof, than have bene contented with the decree of the counsel of Laterane, and so made themselves to be laught at, euin of children. In other things they sticke not to make forged decrees, which they father vp the most auncient Councels, that they may with vter reverence of antiquitie dafele the eyes of simple. In this point, it came not in their minde to thrust in such a falfe pack. Therefore by their owne wisnesse, there are not yet passed three hundred yeres since Innocent the third laid vp that snare vpon men, & charged them with necessitie of Confession. But to speake nothing of the time: the very barbarouynes of the wordes minisheth the credeite of that lawe.

Lawe. For where these good fathers command every one of both kindes, male and female, once every yeare to confess all his sins to his owne priest, pleasant men doe merily take exception, that in this commandement are contained only Hermaphrodites, and say that it belongeth not to such a one as is either male or female only. Since that time, a more gross beleuines hath bewrayed it self in their scholers, y can not expound what is meant by his owne priest. Whatsoever al the Popes hyed babblers do prate, we hold both that Christ was neuer the author of this lawe that compelleth men to reckon upon their sinnes, and also that there past a thousand & two hundred yeares from the resurrection of Christ before that any such lawe was made. And so, that this tyrannye was then first brought in, when all godlineesse and learning being destroyed, the visors of Pastors had without choyse taken all licentiousnesse vpon them. Moreover there are euident testimonies both in histories and other auancient writers, which teach that this confession was a politike discipline redeemed by the Bishops, not a lawe made by Christ or his Apostles. I will allege but one out of many, which shall be a plaine proofe thereof. Sozomenus reporteth that this constitutio of bishops was diligentlie kept in all the west Churches, but specially at Rome. Whereby he sheweth that it was no vniversal ordinance of all Churches. But he fayth that there was one of the priests peculiarly appointed to serue for this occasion. Whereby he doth sufficiently confute that which these men do falsely say of the keyes given for this vse vniversalie to the whole order of priesthoode. For it was not the common office of all priests, but the speciall dutie of some one that was choen thereunto by the bishop. The same is he, whom at this day in all cathedrall Churches they call Peusentiarie, the examiner of hainons offences, and such whereof the punishment pertaineth to good example. Then he fayth immediately after, that this was also the manner at Constantinople, till a certaine woman faining that she came to confession, was found so to have coloured vnder that pretence the vnhonest company that she vsed with a certaine Deacon. For this act, Nestarius a man notable in holinesse and learning, bishop of that Church, tooke away that custome of confessing. Here, here let these asies lift vp their ears. If auricular confession were the lawe of God, how durst Nestarius repell and destroy it? What they accuse for an heretike and chifmatike Nestarius a holy man of God, allowed by the confessing voyses of all the olde fathers? But by the same sentence they must condemne the Church of Constantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmez that the manner of confessing was not only let slip for a time, but also discontinued even till within time of his remembrance. Yea let them condemne of apostasie not only the Church of Constantinople, but also all the east Churches which haue neglected that lawe, which (if they say true) is inuolable and commanded to all Christians.

8 This abrogation Chryfotome, which was also bishop of Constantinople, doth in so many places euidently teftifie, that it is maruell y these dare mutter to the contrary. Tell (saithe he) thy sins that thou maist do them away, if thou be ashamed tell any man the sins that thou haft done, tel them daily in thy soule. I do not say, Confesse them to thy fellow seruant, that may reproc the: tell them to God that taketh care of them. Confesse thy sins vpon thy bed, that there thy conscience may daily recognize her evils. Again: But now it is not necessary to confess when witnesses be present: let the examination of thy sins be done with thy thought: let this judgement be without witness: let only God see thee confessing. Again: I do not lead thee into a stage of thy fellow servants, I do not compel thee to disclose thy sins to men, rehearse & utter thy conscience before God. Show thy wounds to the Lord the best surgeon, and asketh justice of him. Show to him that will reproach thee with nothing, but will most gently heal thee. Again: Tell not man, least he reproach thee, for neither is it to be confessed to thy fellow servants, that may utter it abroad, but to the Lord. To the Lord shew thy wounds which hath care of thee, that is both gentle and a Physician. Afterward he bringeth in God speaking thus: I compel thee not to come into the midst of a stage, and call many witnesses, tell thy sin to me alone privately, that I may heal thy sore. Shall we say that Chrysostome did so rashly, when he wrote this and other like things, that he would deliver men confessions from these bonds wherewith they be bound by the law of God? Not so. But he dare not require that as of necessary, which he doth not understand to be commanded by the word of God.

9 But that the matter may be made the plainer & easier, first we will faithfully rehearse what kind of confession is taught by the word of God: & then we will also declare their inventions, but not all (for who could draw such an infinite sea?) but only those wherein they comprehend the sum of their secret confession. Here I am loth to rehearse how oft the old translator hath given in translation this word Confession for Praise: which the grossest unlearned men commonly knowing, sauing that it is good to have their prehumps upon these betrayed, that doe give away that which was written of the praises of God, to their own tyrannical commandment. To prove that confession availeth to cheare the mindes they thrust in that place of the Psalme: In the voice of reioysing and confession. But if such change may serue, then we shall have what we lift, proved by what we lift. But seing they are so become past shame, let the godly readers remember that by the just vengeance of God they have bin cast into a reprobatemind, that their presumption should be the more despicable. But if we will rest in the simple doctrine of Scripture, we shall not be in danger of any such deceit to beguile vs. For therein is appointed one order of confessing, that forasmuch as it is the Lord that forgiveth, forgetteth, and putteth away sins, therefore we should confess our sins to him for to obtaine pardon, he is the Physician, therefore let vs shewe our diseases vnto him. It is he that is grieved & offended, therefore let vs seek peace at his hand. He is the knower of hearts; and priuie to all thoughts, therefore let vs make haft to powre out our hearts before him. Finally it is he that calleth sinners, therefore let vs not delay to come to him. I have (faith Dauid) made my sinne known vnto thee, and haue not hidden my vnrighteousnes, I haue said, I will confess against me my vnrighteousnes to thy Lord, and thou haft forgiven my wickednes of my heart. Such is the other confession of Dauid. Haue mercy vpon me O God, according to thy great mercie. And such is the confession of Dauiel: We haue sinned, Lorde we haue done peruersely, we haue committed iniquities, and haue bin rebellious in in swearing from thy commandments. And such are other confessions that are commonly found in the Scriptures, the rehearal whereof would almost fill a great volume. If we confesse our finnes (faith John) the Lord is faithfull to forgive vs our finnes. To whom should we confesse? even to him: that is, if we fall downe with a troubled & humbled heart before him, if heartily accusing and condemning our selues before him we pray to be acquitted by his goodnes and mercy.

10 He that heartily & before God shall embrace this confession, shall undoubtedly haue both a tongue ready to confesse, so oft as it shalbe needfull for him to publish the mercy of God before men, & not onely to whisper the secret of his heart to one man, & once & in his care: but oft & openly, & in the hearing of all the world simply to rehearse both his owne shame and the magnificence & glory of God. After this manner when David was rebuked of Nathan, he was pricked with the sting of conscience, & confessed his sinne before both God & man. I haue (faith he) sinned to the Lorde, that is to say, now I allege nothing for my excuse, I vse no shifte, but that all men may judge me a sinner, and that the same thing which I haue had secret from the Lord, may be also open to men. Therefore a willing confession before men alway followeth the secret confession that is made to God, so oft as it is profitable for the glorie of God or for the humbling of our selues. For this reason the Lord in old time ordained in the people of Israel, that the priest should first speake the words, and the people saying after him should openly confesse their iniquitie in the Church. For he foresaw this help was necessary for them that euer man might be better brought to a just reknowledging of himselfe. And meete it is that with the confession of our owne misery wee should among our selues, & before all the world glorifie the goodnes and mercy of our God.

11 And it is convenient that this kinde of confession be both ordinary in the church, & also extraordinarily vfed in special maner, if it happen at any time the people to be guilty of any generall fault. Of this seconde kinde wee haue an example in that solemne confession which all the people vfed by the meanes and guiding of Esdras & of Nehemias. For whereas that long banishment, the destruction of the City & Temple, the dissoluting of religion, was the punishment of the common revolting of the al: they could not acknowledge the benefit of deliverance in such sort as was meete, vnlesse they did first condemne themselves. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole Congregation some fewe sometime be innocent. For sith they be the members of a feeble and diseased body, they ought not to boaste of healthfulness. Yeit it is not possible but they must also themselves gather some infection & bear part of the blame. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, either with pestilence or war, or barrenness or any other plague: if it bee our duty to fly to mourning, to fasting, & to other signes of giltenesse; then confession it self, whereupon all these things do hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinary confession, beside that it is commended by the Lordes owne mouth, there is no wise man that considering the profit thereof, dare disallow it. Where for as in all holy assemblies we make our appearance in the sight of God and the Angels: what other beginning may there be of our pleading, but our reknowledging of vnworthinesse: But that (some man wil say) is done by evey prayer. For so oft as we pray for pardon, we thereby confesse our finnes: I grant. But if you consider how great is our carelesnesse, or droufinesse, or sluggishnesse, you wil grant me that it should be a profitable ordinance, if by some solemn vse of confession, the Christian common people should bee exercized to humbling themselves. For though the ceremonie that y Lorde commanded the Israelites, was parcel of the nurture of the law, yet in some maner it also belongeth to vs. And truely we see that this vse is in well ordered churches profitably observed, that euer Sunday the minister shoulde rehearse a forme of confession in the name of himselfe & of all the people, wherein he accuseth all of wickednes, and craueth pardon of the Lord. Finally with this keye the gate to prayer is opened as well privately to euer man, as universally to all men.

12 Moreover the Scripture alloweth two formes of private confession, one that is made for our owne sake, whereof that lying of James is spoken, that we shoulde confesse our finnes one to another, for his meaning is, that disclosing our wickednesse one to another, wee should one helpe another with mutual counsell and comfort. The other forme, that is to be vsed for our neighbours sake, to appease him and reconcile him vnto vs, if he haue in any thing bene offended by vs. Now in the first kinde of confession, although James in this hath assigned no man by name, into whose bosome we should vnload our selues, leaueth vs a free choice, to confesse to him y shal semee meetest vnto vs of all the flocke of the church: yet wee ought principally to choose the Pastors, because they are for the most parte in comparison of the other to be judged meetest. I say that they are meetest in comparison of the rest, because the Lorde appointeth them by the very calling of their ministerie, at whose mouth we should be instructed to subdue & correct our finnes, and also may receive comfort by trust of pardon. For as the office of mutual admonishment & reproving is committed to all men, yet it is specially enjoyned to the ministers. So when as we all ought to comfort & confirme one another in confidence of Gods mercy: yet wee see that the ministers, to assurre our consciences of the forgiveness of finnes, are ordained as it were witnesses and pledges thereof, in so much that they be saide to forgive finnes and loose foules. When thou hearest this to be ascribed vnto them, thinke that it is for thy profit. Therefore let every one of the faithfull remember this to be his dutie, if he be privately so vexed & troubled with the feeling of finnes that he cannot winde out himselfe without help of another, nor to neglect the medicie that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his relief to vse the private confession to his owne Pastor: and for his comfort to craue the private helpe of him, whose dutie it is both publiquely and privately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the Gospel. But alway this moderation is to be vsed, where God appointeth no certeintie, not to bnde consciences with a certaine yoke. Hereupon followeth that such Confession ought to be free; not to bee required of all men, but to be commended to those onely that shall vnderstande themselves to have neede of it. Then that euen they vse it for their neede, shoulde not bee compelled by any commandement, or trayned by any deccri,
Of the other sort of confession Christ speaketh in Matthew. If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath any thing against thee, leave thy gift there, and go, & first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. For to charity thy hat bin appaied by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowledging and craving pardon of the offence that we have committed. Under this kind is contained their confession that have sinned even to the offending of the whole church. For if Christ maketh so great a matter of the private offence of one man, to forbid from holy mysteries all them that have sinned against their brother, til they be with just amendes reconciled; how much greater reason is it, that he that hath offended the church with any euill example, should recover the favour of the church with acknowledging his fault? So was the Corinthian received againe to the communion, when he had yielded himselfe obedient to correction. Also this forme of confession was vtd in the old church, as Cyprian maketh mention. They do penance (faith he) in due time, & then they come to confession, and by laying on of the hands of the bishop and Clergy, they receive Leave to come to the communion. Any other order or forme of confessing, the Scripture utterly knoweth not, & it is not our dutie to bind confeences with new bonds, whom Christ most sharply forbiddeth vs to bring in bondage. In the mean time I do so much not speake against it that the sheep should present themselves to their shepheard when they meant to be partakers of the holy supper, that I would most gladly have it every where obserued. For both they that have an encombred conscience, may from thence receive singular profit, & they that are to be admonished do by that meane prepare place for admonishment, but so alway that tyrannie and superstition be away.

14 In these three kindes of confession, the power of the keyes hath place: that is, either when the whole church with solemn reknowledging of their faults, crie eth pardon: or when a private man, by any notable fault hath bred common offence, doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the unquietnesse of his conscience, doth need help of the minister discloseth his weaknes vnto him. But there are diuerse wayes of taking away offence, because although thereby also the peace of conscience is provided for, yet the principal end is, that hatred should be taken away, and mens minds knit together with a bond of peace. But this vfe that I have spoken of, is not to be dispised, that we may the more willingly confess our finnes. For when the whole church standeth as it were before the judgement seare of God, confesseth it selfe guilty, and hath one onely refuge vnto the mercy of God: it is no sceller or light comfort to haue there present Christis embassadour, having commandement of reconciliation, of whom it may heare absolution pronounced vnto it. Here the profitableness of the keyes is worthy commended, whe this embassage is performed rightly, & with such order & religiousnes.

as becometh it. Likewise when he that had in a manner estranged himself from the Church, receiued pardon and is restored into brotherly unity: how great a benefit is it that he understand himselfe to be forgiven by them, to whom Christ hath saide: To whomsoever ye forgive sins, they shall be forgiven in heaven. And of no lesser effectualnes and profit is private absolution, when it is asked by them that have neede of speciall remedy to relieve their weaknesses. For it happeneth oftentimes, that he which heareth the general promises that are directed to the whole congregation of the faithful, remaineth nevertheless in some dout, and hath stil an vnquiet mind, as though he had not yet obtained pardon: and if he have disclofed to his person the secret sore of his mind, and heareth peculiarly directed to himselfe that saying of the Gospel, Thy sins are forgiven thee, be of good hope, establisheth his minde vnto affurèdnesse and is deliuere from.y trembling, wherewith he was before tormented. But when we speake of y keyes, we must take heede that we dreame not of a certain power seuered from the preaching of the Gospel. In an other place we shall have occasion more fully to declare this matter againe, where we shall entreat of the government of the church: and there shall we see that all the power to bind and to loose, which Christ hath giuen to his church, is bound to the worde. But this is most true in the mystery of the keyes, the whole force whereof standeth in this, that the grace of the Gospell be publikly and privately sealed vp in the hearts of the faithfull, by them whom the Lord hath ordained: which can not be done but by onely preaching.

15 But what say the Romish diuines? They decree that euery one of either kinde, so soone as they come to the yeres of discretion, must yearly once at the least confess all their sins to their own priest: and that their sin is not forgiven, vnsle he have firmly conceived an entent to confess it: which intent if they perform not when occasion is offred that they may doe it, there is now no more entry open for them into Paradise. And yt the priest hath the power of the keyes, wherewith he may loose and bind a sinner: because yt word of Christ is not vnlawne. Whatsoeuer ye binde, &c. About this power they stoutely fight among themselues. Some say that there is but one keye in substance, that is the power to bind and loose, and as for knowledge, that it is in deede requisite for a good vs, but that it is onely as an accesse and is not essentially joyned with the other. Some other, because they faue this to be too much an vnbridled licence, have reckned vp two keyes: discretion & power. Other again, when they saw the lewd boldnes of priests to be refrained by this moderation, haue forfet other keyes, that is to say, authority of discerning which they should vsie in giving determinate sentence: & power, which they hold praetic in executing of their sentence: and knowledge standeth by as a counsellor. But they dare not simply expound this binding and loosing to be to forgive and put away sinnes, because they heare the Lorde crying out in the Prophet: It is I, and none other but I: it is I that put away thy sinnes, O Israel. But they say it is the priests office to pronounce who be bound or loosed, and to declare wholesinnes are forgiven or retained: and that he doth declare it, either by confession when he absolveth and retained sinnes, or by sentence when he excommunicated and receiueth receive a second time to partaking of the Sacraments. Finally, when they understand that they be not yet out of this doubt, but that it still may be objected against them, that oftentimes their priests do bind and loose men unworthy, which are not therefore bound or loosed in heaven: then (which is their last refuge) they answer that the giving of the keys, must be construed with a limitation, that is to say, that Christ hath promised, that before his judgment seat such sentence of the Priest shall be allowed as hath been unjustly pronounced, according as the determining of him that is bound or loosed, did require. Moreover they say, these keys are given by Christ to all priests, and are delivered to them by their bishops, at the time of their promoting to priesthood: but the free use of them, remaineth only with such as doe exercise Ecclesiasticall offices: and that the excommunicate and suspended priests have in deed the keys, but rusty and bound vp. And they say these things may well seeme modest and sober in comparison of the rest, which upon a newe annielde have forgot new keys with which they say the treasure of the church is locked vp. These keys we shall hereafter trie in place fit for it.

16 Now I will in fewe words answere to every one of these particularly. But at this present I speake not by what right or what wrong they binde the soules of the faithfull with their laws, forasmuch as we will consider that when place seueth. But where they charge men with a lawe of reckoning vp all their sinnes: where they say that sinne is not forgiuen but vp vn condition, if there be an intent conceived to confess it, where they babble that there remaineth no entrie into Paradise, if occasion of confessing be neglected: this is in no wise to be suffered. Must all sinnes be reckned vp? But David, (Who as I think) had well studied vp on the confession of his sinnes, yet cried out: who shall understand his errors? Lord cleanse me from my secret sinnes. And in another place, My iniquities have passed aboue my head, & like a weightie burden have waxed beautie aboue my strength. Truely he understood how great was the bottomlesse depth of our sinnes: how many were yet fortes of our mischievous doings, how many heads this monster Hydra did beare, and how long a taisle she drewe after her. Therefore he went not about to recken vp a register of them, but out of the depth of euils, he cryed vnto the Lord: I am outwhelmed, I am buried and choked, the gates of hel haue compassed me, let thy hand drawe me out, which am drowned in the great pit, and am fainting and ready to die. Who now may thinke vp the numbering of his sinnes, when he seeth that David can make no number of his?

17 With this butchery, the soules that haue bin touched with any feeling of God, haue bin more cruelly vexed. First they called them felues to account: then they deuided sinnes into armes, into bowes, into branches, and into twiggues, according to these mens rules: then they weyed the qualities, quantities, and circumstances. And so the matter went a little further. But when they had proceeded a little further, than was on eche side skie, and on eche side sea, no hauen, no safe roade: the not that they had passed over, the greater heape alway did thrust it selfe into their sight, yea they rose vp as his mountaine, & there appeared no hope, not so much as after long compassings, any way to escape. And so they did sticke fast betwenee the sacrifice and the stone, & at last was found no other issue but desparation. Then these cruel butchers, to cast the woundes that themselves had made, laide certaine gentle plaisterers, y every man should do as much as he could. But new cares againe rose vp, yea new tormentes did sea the sily soules, as to thinke: I haue not employed time enough, I haue not endeavoured my selfe with suche diligence as I ought, I haue passed ouer many things by negligence, and the forgetfulnes y commeth by negligence is not excufable. Then were there ministrd other plaisterers to assuage suche paines, as, Repent thee of thy negligence: if it be not altogether carleffe, it shalbe pardoned. But al these things can not close vp the wound, and are not so much easment of the eul, as poyson cowered with honie, that they should not with their bitterness offend the first taft but enter into the bowels before that they be perceiued. Therefore this terrible saying alway calleth vp them & foundeth in their cares: Confesse all thy finnes. And this horrour can not be appeased but by assured comfort. Here let the readers consider, how possible it is to bring into account all the doings of a whole yere, and to gather together what fins they haue done euery day: forasmuch as experience proueth to euery man, that when at euening he shall recken vp the faultes but of one day, his memory is confounded therwith, so great a multitude and diversitie presenteth it selfe. For I speake not of grosse and blockish hypocrits y thynke they have done sufficiently, if they have noted three or foure of the greatest fins: but I speake of the true worshippers of God, which when they see themselves oppresst with the examination that they haue made, do addde also this saying of Iohn: If our owne heart do accuse vs, God is greater then our heart: and so they quake for feare at the sight of that judge, whose knowledge farre surmounteth our understanding.

18 But whereas a great part of the worlde rested them vpon such flatteries, wherewith so deadly a poyson was tempered, this came not so to passe, because they beleued that God was satisfi'd, or because they themselves were fully satisfi'd: but y the anchor cast as it were in the middle sea, should rest a little from sayling, or as a wayfaring man weary and fainting, should lie downe in the way. I labour not much in prouing this. For euery man may be witnesse to himselfe. I will in a short summe shew, what manner of lawe this was. First simply it is impossible, and therefore it can do nothing but destroy, damne, confound, and cast in ruine & desparation. And then when it hath ledde sinners from the true feeling of their sinnes, it makest them hypocrites and ignorant of God and themselves. For while they are wholly busied in reckning vp of their sinnes, in the meantime they forget the secret sinke of vices, their hidden Iniquities, and inward slighnes, by knowledge whereof they should chiefly haue w eyed their miserie. But this was a most certaine rule of confession, to acknowledge and confesse the bottomlesse depth of our euill to be so great as passeth our understanding. After this rule we see that the Publicanes confession was made. Lorde be merciful to me a sinner: as if he should say: All that euer I am, I am altogether a sinner, and I can not attayne with witte or expresse with tongue the greatness of my sinnes; let the bottomlesse depth of thy mercy swallowe vp the bottomlesse depth of my sin. But then thou wilt say, what? are not all our sinnes to bee confessed? is no confession acceptable to God, but that which is knittet vp in these two worde Is a sinner? No, but rather wee muette endeavour our selves as much as in vs lieth, to powre out our heartes before y Lorde, and not onely in one worde confess our selves sinners, but also truly and heartily acknowledge our selves to be such: and with all our thought recorde, howe great and diuere is our filth of sinnes, not onely that wee bee vncleanse, but what, howe great, and in howe many partes is our vncleanesse: not onely that we bee detteres, but with howe great dettes we be loden, and howe many wayes charged: not onely that we be wounded, but also with howe many and deadly strokes we be wounded. With this reknowinge when the sinner hath wholie powred our himselfe before God, let him earnestly & sincerely thynke, that yet there remaine moe sinnes, and the secret corners of their evils are so deepe, that they cannot be throughly dislosed. And he crieth out with David: Who understandeth his errous? Lord cleanse me from my hidden sinnes. Nowe where they affirm, that sinnes are not forgiuen but with an intent of confessing firmely con-ceiued, and that the gate of paradize is shut against him that negleeterh occasion offered when he may be confessed, God forbid that we should graunt them that. For there is no other forgiuennesse of sinnes, than alwayes hath beene. It is not read that all they haue confessed their sinnes in the eare of some priest, y we read to haue obtained forgiuences of sinnes at Chrits hand.
And truely they could not confess, where there were neither any priestes confessors, nor any confessing at all. And in many ages after, this confession was vnheard of, at which time sinnes were forgiuen without this condition. But that we may not neede to dispute longer about this, as about a doubtfull matter; the word of God is plaine, which abideth for euer: When foeuer the sinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. He that dare adde any thing to this worde, bindeth not sinnes, but the mercie of God. For whereas they say, that judgement cannot be giuen but when the caufe is hearde, we haue a solution in readinesse, that they doe presumptuously take that upon themselves, which have made themselves judges. And it is a maruell that they do so boldly frame to themselves such principles, as no man in his right wit will graunt. They boast that the office of Binding & Losinge is committed to them, as though it were a certaine injurisdiction joyned with Inquisition. Moreover their whole doctrine crieth out, that this authoritie was unknowne to the Apostles. Neither doeth it belong to the priest, but to him which defireth absolution, to know certainly whether the sinner be losed or no: forasmuch as heere that heareth can ever knowe whether the reckoning be just and perfecte. So should there be no absolution but such as is restrained to his wordes that is to be judged.
Moreover the whole order of losinge standeth of faith and repentance, which two thinges are hidden from the knowledge of man, when sentence must be giuen upon an other man. It followeth therefore that the assurance of binding and losinge is not subiect to the judgement of an earthly judge: because the minister of the worde, when he doeth his office, can not giue absolution but conditionally; but that this is spoken for the sinnes fake.
Of the manner how to receive

Whose sinnes ye forgie, &c. that they shoulde not doubt that the pardon which is promised by the commandement and worde of God, shalbe ratified in heauen.

Therefore it is no meruell, if wee condemn and desire to haue vterly taken away this Auricular confession, a thing so pestilent and so many ways hurtfull to the Church: but if it were a thing by it selfe indifferenyt, yet forasmuch as it is to no vse nor profite, and hath giuen cause to so many wickednesse, sacrileges and errores, who wil not thinke that it ought so bee presently abolished: They doe indeede reken vp some good vcs, which they boast vpon as verie profitable, but these either false or of no value at al. One onely they commend with a singular prerogatiue, that shame is a great punishment of him that confesseth, whereby the sinner both is for a time to come made warer, and preuenteth the punishment of God in punishing himselfe. As though wee did not humble a man with shamefastenes enough when wee call him to that his judgement, seate of heauen, I meane to the hearing of God. It is forsooth verie well profited, if for shame of one mans knowledge wee cease to sine, and bee not ashamed to haue God witnes of our euell conscience. Although the verie shame is also moste false, for it is to bee seen that by nothing growth greater confidence or licentiousnesse to sine, than when men having made confession to a priest, think y they may wipe their mouth and say, I did it not. And not only they are made all the yeare long the boulder to sine: but all the rest of the yere bearing themselves bolde vpon confession, they never sigh vnto God, they never returne to themselves, but haue sinnes vpon sinnes till they vomit vp all at once as they thinke. And when they haue once vomited them vp, they thinke them selves dischargd of there burden, and that they have taken away from God the judgement that they have giuen to the priest, and that they haue brought God in forgetfulness when they haue made the priests pruice. Moroe who doth merily see the day of confession at hand? Who goeth to confession with a cheerefull hearte, and commeth not to it rather against his will, and as it were drawing backwarde, like as if he were taken by the necke and drawn to prison? vnlesse paraduenture it be the verie priests, that vse joyfully to delight themselues with mutuell rehearsals of their doings, as it were with merie tales? I wil not defile much paper with monstruous abominations whereof auricular confession swarmeth full. Only this I say, If that holy man did not vnwisely, that for one rumor of fornication took away confession out of the Church, yea out of the remembrance of his flocke: then we be thereby put in minde what is needfull to bee done at this day vpon infinite whoredomes, adulteries, inceftes, and bawdaries.

Where the Confessioners alledge for this purpose the power of the keys, and doe thereupon set the peuple and proue of their kingdom, as the prouerbe is: it is to be seen how much they ought to aulaie. Then (say they,) are the keyes giuen without cause? Is it faine without cause: Whatsoever you looke vpon earth, shall be also looke in heauen? Doe we then make the worde of Christes voide? I aunswer there was a weightie cause why the keyes shoulde be giuen, as both I haue euen nowe alreadie decladeclared, and shall more plainly shew againe when I come to entreate of Excommunication. But what if I do with one swerd cut of the hold of all y they require, that is with saying, that sacrificing priests are not the vicars nor successors of the Apostles? But this shall also bee to be intreated of in another place: but nowe they raise vp an engine whereby they woulde most of all defende themselves, and thereby may all their buildinges bee ouerthrown. For Chrift did not give his Apostles the power to binde and loose, before that hee gaued them the holy Ghoft. Therefore I say, that none haue the power of the keyes that haue not firft receiued the holy Ghoft. I deny that any man can vse the keyes, but hauing the holy Ghoft going before, and teaching him and informing him what is to bee done. They triffling say, that they haue the holy Ghoft. But indeede they de- nie it, vnlcle paraudenture they faine (as they doe faine indeede) the ho- ly Ghoft to bee a vaine thing and a thing of nothing, but therein they fhall not be beleued. And by this engine they are vterly ouerthrown, that of whatsoever dore they boast that they haue the keye, a man may alway askem whether they haue the holy Ghoft which is the judge and go- vernour of the keyes. If they aunswer that they haue, then they may be asked againe, whether the holy Ghoft may erre. This they will not be glad to speake expressly, although they crookedly vter the fame by their doctrine. It is therefore to bee gathered, that no priests haue power of the keyes which doe commonly without consideration loose those things that the Lorde woulde haue to bee bounde, and binde those things that the Lorde comanunded to be loosed.

21 Whereas they see themselves convinced by moste cleere experi- mences, that they do without choise loose & bind the worthie and vnwor- thie, they vsurpe a power without knowledge. And though they dare not denye that knowledge is requisite for a good vse, yet they write that the ve- rie power is giuen to cuill dispofer of it. But this is the power, whatsoever thou bindeft or looseft in earth, shall bee bounde or loosed in heauen. Ei- ther the promife of Chrift mustlie, or they that haue this power doe well binde and loose. Neither may they dally and say, that the faying of Chrift is limited according to the deferuings of him that is bounde or loosed. And wee also confesse, that none can bee bounde or loosed, but they that are worthy to bee bound or loosed. But the messengers of the Gospel and the Church haue the worde, by which they measure this worthinesse, in this worde the messengers of the Gospell, may promis to all men foruenuenes of sinnes in Chrift by faith, they may proclaime damnation into all and upon all that embrace not Chrift. In this worde the Church pronouncing that fornicatours, adulterers, theuces, mansleyers, couetous men, vniust men, have no part in the kingdome of God, and binde fuch with mofte sure bonds. With the fame worde the Church loofeth them whom it comforteth being repentant. But what power shal this bee, not to knowe what is to bee bounde or loosed, and not to bee able to binde or loofe without knowledge? Why then doe they say that they loose by authori- tie giuen vnto them, when the loofing is vncertaine? What haue wee to do with this imaginatue power, if there be no vfe of it? But I haue it alrea-
Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive die proved that either there is no vse of it, or so vn certaine an vse, as may be accompted for none at all. For whereas they confesse there is a great part of Priests that doe not rightly vse the keyes, and that the power without lawfull vse is of no effecte. Who shall assure mee that he of whom I am loosed is a good vse of the keyes? if he be an euill vse of it, what hath he else but such a voide disposing of them, as to say, what is to be bounde or loosed in the. I know not; forasmuch as I lacke the right vse of the keyes, but if thou deterue I loose thee. But so much might doe, I will not say a lay man (for they could not beare that with patient cares) but a Turke or a Devill. For it is almus as to say, I haue not the word of God the sure rule of loosing, but there is power giuen mee to loofo thee, if thy deferuings bee so. We see therefore what they meant, when they defined the keyes to be the authoritie of discerning, and power of executing, and that knowledge is adjoynd for a counseller, and like a counseller serueth for a good vse; undoubtedely even they desired to rainge at their owne will, licentious without God and his word.

22. If any man take exceptione and say, that the lawfull ministers of Christ shall be no lesse doubtfull in their office, because the absolution that hangeth vpon faith shall alway remayne doubtfull: and then that sinners shall haue either none or a colde comfort, because the minister himselfe which is no competent judge of their faith, cannot be assured of their absolution: wee haue aunfwere thereunto in readinesse. For they say that no sinnes are forgiuen by the prieste, but such whereof himselfe hath beene the hearer: fo by their opinion, the forgiuenes hangeth vpon the judgemenet of the prieste, and if he doe not wisely discerne who be worthie of pardon, yt whole doing is voide and of no effect. Finally the power whereof they speake, is a jurisdiction adjoynd to examination, whereunto pardon and absolution is restraine. In this point is found no sure ground, but rather it is a bottomless depehe. For where the confession is not founde, the hope of pardon is also lame, and then the prieste himselfe must needs sticke in suspence while he can not tel, whether the sinner doe faithfully reckon vp all the euill deedes. Finally (such is the ignorance and rudenesse of priestes) the most part are no fitter to doe this office, than a shoomaker to plowe the ground, and the rest in a maner all ought worthy to suspect themselves. Hereupon therefore ifeth the perplexitie and doubtfulitie of the Papes absolution, because they will haue it grounded vpon the person of yt Prieste, and not only that, but also vpon knowledge, if he may judge only of things informed, examined and proued. Nowe if a man should aske of these good docters, whether a sinner be reconciled to God, when some sinnes are forgiuen: I see not what they have to aunswere, but that they shall bee compellled to confesse that all is vnprouitable, that the prieste pronounceth of the forgiennes of those sinnes that he hath hearde rehearsed, so long as the other sinns are not deliuered fro condemnation. On the behalfe of him that confesseth howe hurtful carefullitie holdeth his conscience bound, appeareth hereby that when he refeth vpon the priestes discretion, as they call it, hee can determine nothing certainly by the worde of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and cleare from all these absurdties. For the absolution is con-diti-
ditionall, that the sinner should trust that God is mercifull vnto him, so that hee sincerely seeke the cleansing of his sinnes in the sacrifice of Christ, & obey the grace offered him. So he can not erre; which according to the office of a preacher, proclaimeth that which is giuen him in instructions by the worde of God. And the sinner may embrace a sure and cleare absolution, when that simple condition is annexed of the embracing the grace of Christ, according to that general doctrine of the maifter himselfe: Bee it done to thee according to thy faith. Which hath beene wickedly despiised in the Papacie:

23 How foolishly they confounde those things that the Scripture teacheth of the power of keyes, I haue promised that I will speake in another place, and there shall be a more conuenient place for it, when I come to intreat of the government of the Church. But let the readers remember that those things are wrongfully wrested to Auricular and secrete confession, which are spoken by Christ partly of the preaching of the Gospell, and partly of excommunication. Wherefore when they object that the power of loosing is giuen to the Apostles, which prieftes may vse in forgiving sins acknowledged vnto them, it is plaine that they take a false and fonde principle, because the absolution that serueth faith, is nothing else but a witnesse of pardon taken out of the free promise of the Gospell. As for the other confession, that hangeth upon the discipline of the Church, it pertayneth nothing to secrete sinnes, but rather to example, that common offence of the Church may be taken away. But whereas they seare together here and there testimonies, to proove that it sufficeth not to confess sins either to God onely or to lay men, vnlesse a prieft be the hearer of them, their trauell therein is but lewde, and such as they may bee ashamed of. For when the auncient fathers counsell sinners to vnburden themselves to their owne paftour, it can not be expounded of particular rehearfall which then was not in vse. Then, Lumbard and such like (such was their sinister dealing) seeme ofset purpose to haue giuen themselves to sained books, by pretence whereof they might deceiue the simple. They doe indeede truely confess, that because absolution alway accompanieth repentance, therefore there properly remaineth no bond when a man is touched with repentance, although he haue not yet confessed, and therefore that then the prieft doeth not so much forgive sinnes as pronounce and declare them forgiven. Albeit in the word of declaring they liuely bring in a grosse error, thrusting a ceremonie in stead of doctrine. But whereas they patche vnto it, that he is absolved in the face of Church that had already obtained pardon before God; they do inconueniently draw to the peculiar vse of euery particular man, that which we haue already sayde to bee appointed for the common discipline, where the offence of a hainous and notorious fault is to bee taken away. But by and by after, they deprae and corrupt moderation, adding another manner of forgiving, with an enioynge of penaltie and satisfaction, wherein they presumptuously claime to their owne sacrifices a power to parte that in halles, which GOD hath in all places promised vs whole together. For when hee simplie requireth repentance and faith, this partition or exception is a verie robberie of God. For it is in effect almsuch as if the priest taking upon him the person of a Tribune, should become intercessour to God and woulde not suffer God of his meere liberalitie to receive him into favour, that hath lien prostrate before the Tribunes seats and there hath beene punished.

24. The whole summe commeth to this point, that if they will make God the authour of this counterfaite confession, therein is their falshood condemned, as I have shewed them false forgers in the fewe places that they alledge. But sith it is evident that it is a lawe made by men, I say ye it is both tyrannicall and made injuriously against God, who binding mens consciences to his worde, will haue them free from the bondage of men. Now when for the obteining of pardon, there is a necessitie prescribed of that thing which the Lorde woulde to bee free, I say that this is a sacrilege not to be suffered, because there is nothing more properly belonging to God, than to forgive sinnes, wherein consiflet saluation for vs. Moreover I haue shewed that this tyrannie was first brought in, when the world was oppressed with filthie barbarousnesse. I haue also taught that it is a pestilent lawe, that either throweth downe headlong into defperation the poore soules in whomm soeuer abideth a feare of God: or where there reigneth carelesnes, delighteth them with vaine flatteries, and fo makest the duller. Last of all I haue declared, that whatsoever mitigations they bring, tend to no other end, but to entangle, darken and depraue pure doctrine, and hide vngodlines with deceitful colors.

25. The third place in Repentance they assigne to satisfaction, whereof all that ever they babble may bee ouerthrown with one word. They say that it is not enough for him that repenteth, to absteine from his former euils, and change his behaviour into better, unleashe make satisfaction to God for those thinges that hee hath done: And that there bee many helpees by which wee may redeeme sinnes, as weepings, fastinges, oblations and the works of charitie. With these we must winne the Lorde to bee favorable, with these wee must pay our debtes to the righteousnes of God, with these wee must make amendes for our defaultes, with these wee muste deserve pardon. For although by the largenes of his mercie he hath forgiven our faultes, yet by the discipline of his justitie he receineth the peine, & that this is the paine that must bee redeemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they say commeth to this point, that wee doe in deede obtaine pardon of our sinnes at the merchifulnes of God, but by meannes of the desiring of our works, by which the offence of our sinnes may be recompened, that due satisfaction may bee fully made to Gods righteousnes. Against such lies, I see the free forgunenesse of sinnes, than which there is nothing more evidently spoken of in the scripture. First, what is forgiveness, but a gift of meere liberalitie? For the creditor is not said to forgive, y acknowledge by acquittance that the mony is paid, but he without any payment willingly of his owne liberalitie cancelleth the detters bond. Secondly, why is this word, Freely, added, but to take away al opinion of satisfaction? With what confidence therefore doe they yet set vp their satisfaction, that are stricken downe with so mightie a thunderbolt? But what: when the Lord crieth out by Esay, It is I, it is I, that doe put away iniquities for mine owne sake, and will not be mindfull of thy finnes: doeth he not openly declare, that he fet teth the cause & foundation of forgiueneffe onely from his owne goodnes?
Moreouer whereas the whole Scripture beareth this witnesse of Chrift,that forgiuenesse of finnes is to be receiued by his name, doth it not thereby exclude all other names: How then do they teache that it is receiued by the name of satisfactions? Neither can they denie that they gie this to satisfictions, although they say that the fame be vfed as helps by way of meanes.
For whereas the Scripture faith By the name of Chrift, it meaneth that wee bring nothing, we allege nothing of our owne, but refte vpon the onely commandement of Chrift. As Paul, where he affirmteth that God is reconciling his world to him selfe in Chrift, for his sake not imputing to men their finnes, he immediately fheweth the meane & maner how: because he that was withour finne, was made finne for vs.

26 But (such is their persuerfnesse) they say that both forgiuenesse of finnes and reconciliation are perfoummed both at one time, when we are in Baptisme receiued into the fauour of God by Chrift: that after baptisme we muft rife againe by satisfactions, and that the blood of Chrift profiteeth nothing, but fo far as it is distributed by the keyes of the Church. Neither do I speake of a doubtfull matter, for as much as they haue in moft euentuent writings bewrayed their owne filthinesse, & not one or two of them, but al 5 Schoole-men vnuerfally. For their matter after that he had confessed that Chrift had payed the penaltie of finnes vpon the tree, according to the doctrine of Peter, immediatly correcfeteth his saying with adding this exception, that in baptisme all temporal penalties of finnes are released, but after baptisme they are mimified by the helpe of penance, that so the cross of Chrift and our penance may worke together. But Iohn faith farre otherwife, if any fin, wes haue an advocate with the Father, euen Iesus Chrift, which is the propitiation for our finnes. I write vnto you children, because your finnes are forgiuen for his names fake. Truely, he speaketh to the faithfull, to whome when he setteth forth Chrift to be the propitiation of sinnes, he fhew-eth that there is no other satisfaction, by which God being displeased, may be made favourable and appeased. He doeth not say: God was once reconcilid vnto you by Chrift, nowe seeke you other meanes, but he ma-keth him a perpetuall advocate, alway to restore vs by his intcrceffion into the fauour of his father: a perpetuall propitiation, by which our finnes may be cleansed away. For this is euer true that the other Iohn faide: Beholde, the Lambe of God, beholde him that taketh away the finnes of the world.
He taketh them away (faith he) himselfe and none other, that is to say: for as much as he alone is the Lambe of God, he alone also is the oblation for finnes, he alone the propitiation sacrifice, he alone the satisfaction. For when as the right and power to forgiue belongeth properly to the father, in the respect that he is distinguished from the finne, as wee haue alreadie feene: Chrift is here set in another degree, that taking vpon himselfe the paine due vnto vs, he hath taken away our guiltinesse before the judgement of God.
Whereupon followeth, that we shall no otherwife be partakers of the satisfic-tation made by Chrift, vntleffe the fame honour remaine whole with him, which they doe wrongfully take to themselues that goe about to appeale

Ff God
God with their owne recompensings.

27 And here it is good to consider two things: that Christ may have his due honour kepte vnto him whole and vnminished: and that the conuences being assured of the forgivannesse of sinne, may have peace with God. Esay faith, that the father hath lyed the iniquities of vs all vpon his sone, that we shoule be healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other words faith: that Christ did in his body bear our sinnes vpon the tree. Paul wrieth that sinne was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sinne for vs. That is to say, that the force and curse of sinne was slaine in his flesh, when he was giuen to be a sacrifice, vpon which the whole heape of our sins with all their maldection and curse, with the dreadfull judgement of God, and condemnation of death shoule be caft. Here those triflings are in no cafe to be heard, that after the first purging, euery one of vs doth none other wise feele the effectuallnesse of the passion of Christ, than after the measure of satisfactorie repentance: but so oft as we fall, we be called backe to the onely satisfacon of Christ. Nowe set before thee their pestilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the first forgivannesse of sinnes: that if we afterwade fall, to the obtaining of a seconde forgivenes our worke doe worke with it. If these thinges may have place, do these things that are here before assigned to Christ remaine safe vnto him? It his a mercurous great difference, between this that our iniquities are layed vpon Christ, that they should be cleansed in him, and this that they are cleansed by our own worke: betwene this that Christ is the procuring of mercy, and this that God must be made mercyfull by worke. But if we speake of pacifying the conscience: what pacification shal this be for a mannes conscience, to heare that his sinnes are redeemed by satisfactions? When shall he certainly knowe the measure of his satisfacon? Therefore he shal alwaies dout whether he haue God mercifull or no, he shal alwaies be vexed, and alwaies quake for scare. For they that rest vpon light pettie satisfactions, doe too contempnuously esteeme the judgement of God, and doe little consider howe great is the grievousnesse of sinne, as wee shal declare in another place. But although we grant them to redeeme some sinnes with just satisfacon: yet what will they doe when they are oppressed with so many sinnes, for satisfacon whereof an hundred liues although they were wholly applied thereunto cannot suffice? Beseide that, all the places wherein the forgivannesse of sinnes is affirmed, doe not belong to yonglinges, but to the alreadie regenerate children of God, and them that haue beene long nourished in the bose of the Church. That embassage which Paul so honourably extoll eth, I beseech you in the name of God, be ye reconciled vnto God, is not direct ed to strangers, but to them that had bene alreadie regenerate. But he, bidding satisfactions farewell, sendeth them to the crose of Christ. So when he wrieth to the Colossians, that Christ by the bloud of the crose hath pacified all thin gs in heauen or in earth, he restrayneth not this to the onely moment wherein we are receiued into the Church, but extendeth it to our whole course. Which easilie appeareth by the procresse of the text, where he faith, the faithful haue a redemption by the bloud of Christ, that is forgivanesse of sinnes. Albeit it is superfluous to heape together no places, that readily readily offer themselves to be founde.

28 Here they flee to the sanctuary of the foolish distinction, that some sins are venial, and some deadly: that for deadly sins is great satisfaction due, that venial sins are purged with more easy remedies, as with flowing of the Lord's prayer, with sprinkling of holy water, with absolution at the mouth. So they mocke and trifle with God. But whereas they alway haue in their mouth venial and deadly sinne, yet they could never discerne the one from the other, sauing that they make ungodliness and uncleanness of heart a venial sinne. But we (as the Scripture the rule of right and wrong teach-eth vs) doe pronounce, that the reward of sinne is death, and that the soul that sinneth is worthy of death. But that the sins of the faithfull are venial, not for that they doe not deserve death, but because of the mercy of God there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, because they are not imputed: because they are taken away by pardon. I know how unfittly they flander this our doctrine. For they say, that it is the Stoikes strange conclusion, concerning the equalitie of sinnes. But they shall easily be convinced by their owne mouth. Fo I demaunde of them, whether among the very same sinnes that they confess to be deadly, they do not acknowledge one to be greater than an other. It doth not therefore immediately followe, that sinnes are equall, because they are altogether deadly. When the Scripture definitiuely telleth, that the reward of sinne is death, that the obedience of the lawe is the way of life, and that the transgression of the law is death, they cannot escape this sentence. What ende of satisfying then will they finde in to great a heape of sinnes? If the satisfaction of one day be the satisfaction of one sinne, while they are about that one satisfaction, they wrappe them felues in many sinnes, fith the justest man passeth no one day wherein he fall-leth not many times. Now when they shall prepare themselves to make satisfaction for these sins, they shall heape vp great numbers, ye a rather innume-rible. Then the hope of satisfying being cut of, what do they stay vpon? how dare they still thinke of satisfying?

29 They goe about to winde out themselves: but (as the prouerbe is) the water still cleaue them vp. They forge a distinction of fault and penal-tie. They confess that the fault is forgiven by the mercy of God, but that when the fault is forgiven, the penaltie remaineth which the righteousness of God requireth to be payed: and that satisfactions doe properly belong to the release of the penaltie. Good God, what a skipping lightnesse is this? now they confess that the forgiveness of the fault lieth freely open for men, which sometime they teach men to deserve with prayers and weepings, and all other kinde of preparations. But yet all that is taught vs in the scripture concerning the forgiveness of sinnes, doth directly fight against this distinction. Which although I thinke that I haue alreadie more than sufficiently confirmed, yet I will add some other testimonies wherewith these winding snakes may be holden so faile, that they shall not bee able once to folde in the toppe of their tail. This is the newe Testament which the Lorde hath covenanted with vs in his Christ, that he will not remember our iniquities. What he meant by these wordes, we learne by an other Prophet, where the Lorde sayeth: If the righteous turne away from his righteousnesse,
Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive

Esa. 38. 17. I will not remember all his righteousnesses. If the wicked depart from his wickedness, I will not remember all his iniquities. Whereas he sayth that he will not remember their righteousnesses, this is as much to say, that he will have no regard of them in respect to reward them. Therefore not to remember their iniquities, is as much as not to call them to punishment. The same thing is called in another place, to cast it behind his back, to wipe it away like a cloude, to drowne it in the bottome of the sea, not to impute it and to hide it. By such maner of speche the holy Ghost doth plainly express his meaning vnto vs, if we would apply vnto him willing ears to learn. Truly if God do punish sins, he imputeth them: if he taketh vengeance, he remembereth them: if he call them to judgement, he doth not hide them; if he examine them, he doth not cast them behind his backe: if hee looke vpon them, he hath not wiped them away like a cloud: if hee lift them, he hath not cast them into the bottome of the sea. And in this manner doth Augustine expounde it in plaine worde. If God haue couered sinnes, then he would not looke vpon them: if he would not looke vpon them, then he would not marke them: if he would not marke them, then he would not punish them: he would not know them, he had rather pardon them. Why therefore did he say that sinnes were couered, that they should not be seene? What was meant by this that God did see sinnes, but that he did punish them? But let vs heare also out of another place of the Prophet, vpon what conditions the Lorde forgiveth sinnes. If (sayth he) your sinnes be as scarlet, they shalbe made white as snow: if they be red like crimson in, they shalbe as well. And in Jeremy we reade thus: In that day the inquietie of Iacob shalbe fought for, and shall not be founde: the sinne of Judah, and it shall not be. Because I will be favourable to the remnantes that I shall preserue. Wilt thou briefly understand what is the meaning of those worde? Weyce on the other side what is meant by these speeches: that the Lord doth bind vp iniquities in a sack, doth gather them into a bundell and lay them vp, and doth graue them with an yron pointell in an Adamant stone. If they signific (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance shalbe given for recompense, then is it also not to be doubted, but that by contrary sentences the Lord affirmeth, that he remitteth all recompensing of vengeance. Here I must beseech the readers not to harken to my glosses, but onely that they will suffer the worde of God to take some place.

30 What, I pray you, had Christ done for vs, if we should still be compelled to suffer paine for sinnes? For when we say that he did beare all our sins in his body vpon the tree, we meane nothing else thereby, but that he suffered all the paine and punishment that was due vnto our sinnes. And if same hath Esaye more liuely declared where he sayth: the chastisement (or correction) of our peace, was vpon him. What is the correction of our peace but the paine due to sinnes? and which we should haue suffred before that we could be reconcilied to God, vnlesse he had entred into our stead? Lo, thou seest plainly, that Christ suffred the paines of sinnes, to deliver them that be his from them. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of the redemption performed by Christ, hee vseth to call it in Greeke Aπολυτος, whereby he meaneth not redemption, as it is commonly taken, but the very price price and satisfaction of redemption. After which manner he writeth, that Chrif, gave himselfe, Antitheton, a price of raumofe for vs. What propituation is there with the Lord (faith Augustine) but sacrifice? And what sacrifice is there, but that which is offered for vs in the death of Chrif? But that which is appointed in the law of Moses for cleansing the offences of finnes, mounteth vs a strong battell ramme. For the Lord doeth not there appoint this or that maner of satisfying, but requireth the whole recompence in sacrifices. Whereas yet in other things, he doeth most diligently and in most exact order set out all the ceremonies of expiation. Howe commeth it to passe, that he commandeth to recompence faultes committed, with no workes at all, but requireth onely sacrifices for satisfaction: but because his will is so to declare, that there is onely one kind of satisfaction, whereby his judgement is appeaied? For the sacrifices that the Israelites did then offer, were not wedy by the worke of men, but were esteemed by their trueth, that is to fay, by the onely sacrifice of Chrif. But what maner of recompence the Lorde receiuelth of vs, Osee hath very well expressed in few wordes. Thou shalt (fayeth he) take away iniquitie, O God. Loe, here is forgiuenesse of finnes. And wee shall pay thee values of our lippe: Loe, here is satisfaction. I knowe that they yet doe suddenly flip away, when they make distinction betwene euerlafting paine, and temporal paines. But when they teach that temporal paine is any kind of punishment that god taketh as well of the body as of the soule, except onely euerlafting death, this restraining of it doeth little helpe them. For the places that we have above recited, do expressly meaneth this, that God receiuelth vs into favour with this condition, that in pardoning the fault, he pardoneth all the peine whatsoever we had thereby deserved. And fo oft as Daud or the other Prophets do craue pardon of finnes, they do also therewithall pray to bee released of the peine. Yea, the very feeling of Gods judgement doeth drive them thereunto. Againe, when they promise mercie at the Lords hand, they do in manner alway of purpose preach of the peines and the forgiuenesse thereof. Truely, when the Lord in Ezechiel pronounceth that he wil make an end of the exile in Babylon, and that for his own sake, not for the Iewes sake, he doeth sufficiently shewe that both are of free gift. Finally, if wee be delivered by Chrif from giltinesse of fault, the peines that come thereof, must needs cease.

31 But forasmuch as they do also arme themselves with testimonies of Scripture, let vs see what manner of argumentes those be that they allege. Daud (fay they) being rebuked by Nathan the Prophet of aduertie & manslaughter, receiued pardon of his finne, and yet he was afterward punifhed by the death of his fonne that he had gotten by that adulterie. Wee are taught to redeeme with satisfaction such peines as were to be extended after forgiuenesse of the fault. For Daniel aduised Nebuchadnezer to redeem his finnes with almes. And Salomon writeth that for equitie and godlines, iniquities are forgiuen. And in another place, that with charitie the multitude of finnes is covered. Which sentence Peter also confirmeth. Againe, in Luke the Lorde fyeth of the woman that was a finner, that many finnes are forgiuen her, because shee hath loued much. Howe peruerfly and wrongfully they ever wy the doings of God. But if they had marked(as they should not have overpasse it) that there are two kinds of Gods judg-iment, they would have seen in this rebuking of David, a farre other maner of punishment, than such as might be thought to tende to reuenge.

But because it not a little behoueth vs all to vnderstand whereunto the chafticements haue respect, wherewith God correcteth vs for our sinnes, and how much they differ from those examples wherewith he pursueth y wicked and reproue with indignation; therefore I think it shalbe not beside the purpose to comprehend it shortly in a summe. For the order of plaine teaching, let vs call the one kind of judgement, the judgement of Reuenge, the other of Chasticement. It is to be vnderstanded, that God so punisheth his enimies with the judgement of reuenge, that he smiteth his wrath against them, confoundeth them, destroyeth them, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let vs take that to be properly the vengeance of God, when his punishing is joyned with his indignation: with the judgement of chastic-emnt he dealeth not so cruelly, as to be angrie: nor punisheth to destroy, nor sendeth downe his lighntening to kill. Therefore it is not properly punishment or vengeance, but correction and admonishment. The one is the doing of a judge, the other of a father. For the judge when he punisheth an euil doer, he hath regarde to the offence, and punisheth the very fault; when the father somewhat rigorously correcteth his child, he dooth it not to be reuenged on him, or to punish him, but rather to teache him, & make him warie in time to come. Chrysostome in a certaine place vseth a simi-litude somewhat differing from this, but yet it commeth to the same point.

The sonne (faith he) is beaten, and the seruant also is beaten: but the one is punished as a bondseruant, because he hath offended; and the other is cha-ficted as a free man and as a sonne, needing correction. To the one his correction serueth for profe & amendement, to the other for a scourge and punishment.

32. But that we may haue the whole matter shortly & in a readie summe, let this be the first of two distinctiones. Wherefouer punishment is to reueenge, there flweth it selfe the curse and wrath of God; which he alway withholdeth from the faithfull. Contrariwise, Chasticement both is a bles-ing of God, and beareth a testimonie of his love, as the Scripture teacheth.
This difference is commonly every where sufficiently expressed in y worde of God. For whatsoever afflictions the wicked suffer in this present life, therein is painted out vs as it were a certaine entrie of hell, from whence they do alreadie fee a farre off their eternall damnation: and they are so far from being amended or taking any profit thereby, that rather by such beginnings they are prepared to the most cruel hell that at length abideth for them. But the Lord chastising chastiseth his servants, but he doth not put them to death. Therefore they confesseth that to be beaten with his rodde, was good for them vs to true instruction. But as we read euer where that the holy ones suffer such punishments with quiet mind, so they have alway prayed to escape the first kind of scourges. Chastise me Lorde (faith Ier-emie) but in thy judgement, not in thy wrath, lest thou destroy mee. Pour out thy wrath vpon the nations that haue not known thee; and vpon the kingdomes
kingdomes that haue not called uppon thy name. And David sayeth: Lorde Ps. 6. 2, & rebuke me not in thy wrath, nor correct me in thine anger. And it makest nothing to the contrary, that oftentimes it is said, that the Lorde is angrie with them that be his, when he punifheth their finnes. As in Efay: I will confesse to thee O Lorde, because thou haft bee ne angrie with me: thy wrath is turned, & thou haft comforted me. Asegaine Abacuc. Thou haft benn angrie shall remember mercie. And Michee: I will beare the wrath of the Lorde, because I haue sinned against him. Where he putteth vs in minde that not onely they that are iustly punished, nothing preuaile with murmuring against him, but also that the faithfull haue aflwagement of their forrowe, in considering the purpose of God. For after the same manner it is said that he doeth defile his owne inheritance, which yet (as we knowe) he wil neuer defile. But that is spoken not in respect of the purpose or meaning of God that punisheeth, but of the vehement feeling of forrowe which they feele that suffer any of his seueritie whatsoever it be. But he not onely prickteth his faithfull with no small rigour, but sometimes so woundeth them, that they thinke themselues not farre from the damnation of hel. So he testifieth that they haue deserued his wrath, and so it behoueth that they should loathe themselues in their euils, and be touched with the greater care to appease God, and carefully make haft to cruze pardon. But euery in the very fame doing he sheweth a more euident testimonie of his fauourable kindnesse than of his wrath. For the covenant continueth that was made with vs in our true Salomon: the truthe whereof he that cannot decree, hath affirmed, that it shall neuer be made voide. If (faith he) his children forfake my law, & walke not in my judgements: if they desfre my statutes, and keepe not my commandements. I will visite their finnes with a rodde and with stripes: but I will not take away my mercie from him. Of which mercie to make vs assured, he sayeth, that the rodde wherewith he will correct the posteritie of Salomon, shalbe of men, and stripes of the children of men: by which claues when he meaneeth moderation and lenitie, he therewithall secretely declareth, that they cannot but be confounded with extreme and deadly horror, that feele the hand of God to be against them. How great regard he hath of this lenitie in chastifying his Israel, he sheweth in the Prophet: he haue purged thee (faith he) in fire: But not as Siluer, for then thou shouldst haue beene all consomned. Albeit he teacheth that chastificemastes serue him for to cleanse him, but he further sayeth, that he vext the same so temperatly, that he bee not too much consumed by them. And that is needefull. For the more that euery man reverently searech G O D, and giueh himselfe to followe godlinesse, so much the tenderer he is to beare his wrath. For the reprobate, although they goare vnder his scourges, yet for that they weye not the cause, but rather tunne their backe both to their owne finnes and to the judgement of G O D, by that slouthfulnesse they gather a hardnesse: or because they murmur and kicke against him, and do make an vprore against their judge, that furious sudden rage affontie them with madnesse and furor. But the faithfull being admonished by his correction, by and by descende to consider their finnes, and being striken with dread and horror, they unc in humble wife to pray to him for pardon, vnlesse the Lorde.
Lorde did allwage these forrowes wherewith the poore soules torment themselves, they wold be a hundred times euen in small tokens of his wrath.

Then let this be the second distinction, that when the reprobate are striken with the scourges of God, they doe alreadie after a certaine maner begin to suffer peines by his judgement, and though they shall not escape unpunished, for that they haue not taken heed to such tokens of the wrath of God, yet they are not punished to this end, to make them come to a better minde: but onely that, to their great hurt, they should proove God to be a judge and revenger. But children are beaten with roddes, not they should thereby be punyshed of God for their sinnes, but that they should thereby profit to amendment. Therefore wee take it that they rather have respect to y time to come, than to the time past. This I had rather expresse in Chryfoftomes wordes than mine owne. For this (faith he) God doth lay peine upon vs, not punishing our sinnes past, but correcting vs against time to come. And so faith Augustine: That which thou sufferest, that for which thou lamentest, is a medicine to thee and no peine, a chastisement and no damnation. But not away the scourge, if thou wilt not be put away from the inheritance, &c. Know ye brethren that all this miserie of mankinde when the world groeth is a medicinall forrowe, and not a penall sentence, &c. These sentences I haue therefore thought good to alleage, that the manner of speach that I haue abouve written, should not seeme to any man newe and vnusued. And hereunto serue all the complaints full of indignation wherin the Lorde oftentimes doeth expostulate of the vnkindnesse of the people, for that they stiffeely despiseth all punishments. In Esay he saith: To what purpose should I strike you any more from the sole of the soote to y crowne of the head, there is no whole place. But because the Prophets are full of such sayings, it shalbe sufficient to haue briefly shewed that God doth punish his Church for none other intent, but that it should be tamed and amended. Therefore when he did cast Saul out of the kingdome, he punished him to reuengement: When he tooke from Dauid his yong sonne, he corrected him to amendement. According to this meaning is that to be taken which Paul faith, when we are judged of the Lorde, wee are correctedy we should not be damned with this world. That is, when wee that be the children of God are afflicted with the hande of our heauenly father, this is no peine werewith we should be confounded, but onely a chastisement wherewith we should be instructed. In which point Augustine is plainly on our side. For he teacheth that the peines wherewith men are a like chafticed by God, are diversely to be considered; because to the holy ones they are battels and exercises after the forgiuensesse of their sinnes, to the reprobate they are without forgiuensesse peines of wickednesse. In which place hee rehearseth how peines were layde vpon Dauid and other godly men, and faith, that the same tended to this end, that their godlinesse should by such humbling of them, be exercisid and prooued. And where Esaye faith, that the Iewes had their iniquitie forgiuen them, because they had receiued full chastisement at the Lords hand: this prooueth not that y pardon of sinnes hangeth vpon the full painement of the peine: but it is in effect as much as much as if he had sayde: Because ye have already suffered paines enough, and by the greeuoufneffe and multitude thereof haue ben now pined away with long mourning and sorrow, therefore it is now time that receiving the tidings of full mercy, your heartes should rejoyce and feele me to be your father. For there God did take vpon him the perfon of a father, which repented him euene of his iuft seueritie, when he was compell'd sharply to correct his fonne.

34 With these thoughts it is necessarie that the faithful be furnished in bitterneffe of afflictions. It is time that the judgement beganne at the house of the Lord, in which his name is called vpon. What should the children of God doe, if they did beleue the seueritie of God that they feele to be his vengeance? For he that being striken with the hande of God, imagineth God a punifhing judge, cannot conceiue him but angrie and enimie vnto him, and doeth the very scourge of God as a curse & damnation. Finally, he can never be persuaded that God loueth him, that shall thinke him so minded toward him, that he is stil minded to punish him. But he only proffeth vnder the rood of God, that thinkest him to be angrie with his sinnes, but mercifull and louing to himselfe. For otherwise that must needes happen, which the Prophet complaineth that he felt, where he faith: Thy wrathes, O God haue passed ouer my head, thy terrors haue oppressed me. Also that which Moses wrieth, because we have fainted in thy wrath: and we have been troubled in thy indignation, thou haft set our iniquities in thy fight, and our secretes in the light of thy countenance: because all our daies are gone away in thy wrath: our yeres are consumed as the worde that is passe out of a mouth. On the other side Dauid faith thus of his fatherly chastifements, to teach that the faithful are rather holpen than oppressed thereby: Blessed is the man whom thou haft corrected O Lorde, and haft instructed in thy law, to giue him quiet from euill daies, while a pit is digged for the sinner. Truely it is a hard temptation, when God sparing the vnbelieuers and winking at their faultes, seemeth more rigorous against them that be his. Therefore he gaued them a cause of comfort, the admonishment of the law, whereby they should learn, that it is done to provide for their saluation when they are called again into the way, and the wicked are caried hedlong into their errors, whole ende is the pit. And it is no difference whether the paine be euertlasting or during for a time. For as well warre, famine, pestilence, and sicknes, as the judgement of eternall death are the curses of God, when they are laid vpon men to this end, to be instrumentes of the Lordes wrath & vengeance against the reprobate.

35 Now (as I thinke) all men doe perceiue whereunto tended that chastifement of the Lord vpon Dauid: evene to be an instruction that God is greeuously displeased with manslaughter and adulterie, against which hee had shewed fo great an indignation in his beloved and faithful seruant: that Dauid should be taught to be no more so bold to doe the like deed: and not to be a paine whereby he should make a certaine recompence to God. And so is to be judged of the other kind of correction, whereby the Lord punished his people with a sore pestilence, for Dauids disobedience whereunto he was fallen in numbring the people. For he did in deed freely forgive to Oft they loued much. In which wordes (as you see) hee makest not her love the cause, but the prooue of the forgiuening of her sinnes. For they are derived vpon a similitude of that detourn, to whome five hundred was forgiuuen, to whome he did not say that therefore it was forgiuuen, because hee had loued much: but therefore loued much, because it was forgiuuen. And herevnto must that similitude be applied in this for: Thou thinkest this woman to be a sinner: but thou oughtest to knowe that she is none such, forso much as her sinnes be forgiuuen her. And that her sinnes be forgiuuen her, her love ought to proue vnto thee, whereby shee rendereth thanke for this benefit. It is an argument gathered of the following effect, whereby any thing is proved by signes ensuuing. By what meane shee obtained forgiuensesse of sinnes, the Lorde openly testifieth: Thy faith, faith hee, hath saued thee. Therefore wee obteine forgiuensesse by faith. By charitie we giue thankes, and testifie the bountiosenesse of the Lorde.

38. As for those things that are commonly found in the booke of old writers concerning satisfaction, they little moue me. I see in deed that many of them, (I will speake plainly) in a manner all whole bookees remaine, haue either errred in this point, or spoken too crabbedly and hardlie: but I will not graunt that they were so rude and vnskilfull as to haue written those things in that senfe that the newe Satisfactionars doe reade them. Chrysostome in one place writeth thus: where mercie is required, examination ceaseth: where mercie is asked, judgement is not rigorous: where mercie is craving, there is no place for paine: where is mercie, there is no inquisition. Where is mercie, the answer was pardoned. Which wordes howsoever they be wrested, yet they can never be made to agree with Scholemenes doctrines. In the booke of Ecclesiastical doctrines, which is fathered vpon Augustine, is red thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut off the causes of sinnes, and not to graunt an entrie to their suggestions. Whereby appeareth that the doctrine of satisfaction that was saide to bee giuen in recompence of sinnes committed, was eu'n in those times laugued to scorn: forasmuch as they referre all satisfaction to a heedefulnesse in abstaining from sinnes in time to come. I will not alledge that which the same Chrysostome faith, that hee requireth of vs no more, but that wee shoulde confesse our sinnes vnto him with teares: such sentences are manie times found in his wrtinges and others. Augustine indeede in some places calleth the workes of mercie, remedies to obteine forgiuensesse of sinnes: but because no man shoulde stumble at that little worde, hee himselfe pretieth it in an other place. The flesh of Christ (faith hee) the true and onely sacriifice for sinnes, not only these sinnes that are wholly put away in baptism, but also these that afterward crepe in by weakenesse: for which the whole Church crieth out at this day, Forgiue vs our trespassers. And they are forgiuuen by that singular sacriifice.

39. They haue for the most part called satisfaction, not a recompence to be rendred to God, but an open declaration whereby they that had bene excommunicate when they would be received againe to the communion, did asercine the Church of their repentance. For there were ioyned vnto them when they did repent certaine fastings and other things, whereby they might persuade men that they were truely and heartily weary of their former life, or rather blotte out the remembrance of their former doings: and so they were fayde to make satisfaction not to G O D, but to the Church. Which is also expressed of Augustine in these words in his Enchiridion to Laurence: Out of that auncient custome the confessions and satisfactions that are at this day vfed, tooke their beginning. Truely very vipers birthes, by which is brought to passe, that there remaineth not so much as a shadowe of that better forme. I know that the olde writers do sometime speake somewhat hardly, and as I sayd euynow, I do not deny that paradventure they erred herein. But those things that were be sprinkled with a fewe spots, when they are once handled with these mens vnwashéd handes, are altogether defiled. And if we must contende with the authoritie of old writers: good God, what old writers do they trust vnto vs? A good part of those wherewith Peter Lombarde their champion hath botched vp his patched Sentences, is gathered out of vnfauory dotages of certain monks that are carried about vnder the name of Ambrose, Hierome, Augustine, and Chryfofomme. As about this present question he taketh in a maner all out of Augustinians booke of repentance, which is foolishly botched of good and bad by some scraper together. It beareth in deed the name of Augustine, but such a booke as no man being but meanely learned, would vouche safe to acknowledge for his. But Whereas I do not so narowly examine their follies, lette the readers pardon me whome I would ease of that tedioufnesse. For to me it should not be very labourfome, and yet very paffible to bewray to their great shame those things that they haue heretofore boasted vpon as mysteries, but because my purpose is to teach truftefully, therefore I passe them ouer.

Of the supplyings which they adde to satisfactions, as pardons and purgatoris.

Ov of this doctrine of satisfactions do fowre indulgences or pardons. For they say that which our power wanteth to make satisfaction, is supplied by these pardons. And they runne fo farre foorth into madnesse, that they define them to be the distribution of the merites of Christ and of the martyres, which the Pope dealeth abroade by his bulles. But although they haue more neede of Hellebors to purge their frentik braine, than argumentes to aunswere them, so that it is not much worthie the trauayle to stande vpon confuting fuch trilling errours, which are already flaken with many baretclarmmes, and of them selves growe into decayed age, and bend toward falling: yet because a short confutation of them shallbe profitable for some that be ignorant, I will not altogether omitte it. As for this that pardons haue so long stand safe, and haue so long beene vnpunished, haung beene vfed with so outrageous and furious licentiousenesse: this may serue to teach vs in howe darke a night of errours, men in certaine ages past haue bin drowned. They sawe themselves to be openly and vn colouredly scorned of the Pope and his Bulbeares, gainsfull markets to be made made of the salvation of their foules, the price of salvation to be valued at a few pence, & nothing set out to be freely given: that by this colour they be wyped of offftinges to be filthyly spent upon brothels, bawdes and bannings: that the greatest blowers abroad of pardons are the greatest dispisers of them: that this monter doth daily more and more with greater licentiousnesse overrule the world, and growe into outrage, and that there is no ende, new leade daily brought, and new mony gotten. Yet with hye reverence they received, they worshipped and bought pardons, & such as among the rest sawe somewhat farther, yet thought them to be godly deceitis, whereby men might be beguiled with some profit. At the length, since the worlde suffeted itselfe to be somewhat wiser, pardons waxe colde, and by little and little become frozen, till they utterly vanishe away.

2 But so much as many that see the filthy gameinges, the deceites, theftes, and robberyes, whereas the pardoners have heretofore mocked & beguiled vs, yet see not the very fountain of vngodlines from whence they spring: it is good to have not onely of what sort pardons be, but also what they be, when they are wiped from all spottes. They call the treasurie of the church, the merites of Christ and of the holy Apostles and Martyrs. The principal custodie of this barne (as I haue already touched) they faine to be delivered to the bishop of Rome, that he should have the distribution of so great gifts, that he might both give them by himeselfe, and also graunte injustice to other to give them. Hereupon proceede from the Pope somtime plenary pardons, some time pardons for certaine yeeres: from the Cardinals, pardons for a hundred dayes: from Bishops, pardons for forty dayes. But they be (as I may naturally describe them) by profaning of the bloud of Christ, Satans mockery, to leade away the christian people from the grace of God, from the life that is in Christ, and to turne them from the true way of salvation. For how could the bloud of Christ be more filthyly prophane, than when it is denied to suffice the remission of sinnes, to reconciliation and satisfaction, vntele the want thereof as being withered and wasted, should be otherwise applieed and profited? The law and all the Prophets (faith Peter) beare witnesse of Christ, that by him forgiuenesse of sinne is to be receiued: Pardons giue remission of sinnes by Peter, Paul and the Martyrs. The bloud of Christ (faith John) cleanseth vs from sinne: Pardons do make the bloud of Martyrs the washing away of sins. Christ (faith Paul) which knew not sin, was made sin for vs, that is, the satisfaction of sin, that we might be made the rightcousyne of God in him: Pardons doe sette the satisfaction of sins in the bloud of Martyrs. Paul cryed out and testified to the Corinthians, that onely Christ was crucified and died for them: the pardons pronounce, that Paul and other died for vs. In an other place he saith that Christ purchased the church with his bloud: the pardons appoint another price of purchase in the bloud of Martyrs. The Apostle saith, that Christ with one oblation made perfect for euery them that were sanctified: the pardons cry out to the contrary and saie, that sanctification is made perfect by the Martyrs, which otherwise were not sufficient. John saith that all the saints washed their gowynes in the bloud of the lambe: the pardons teache men to wash their gowynes in bloud of saints.
Leo Bishop of Rome, writeth notable well to the Palestinines against these sacrileges. Although (faith he) the death of manie saintes hath beene precious in the sight of the Lorde, yet the killing of no innocent hath beene the propitiation of the world. The righteous received, but guae not crownes: and out of the valiantnesse of the faithfull are grauen examples of patience, not gifts of righteousnesse. For their deaths were everie one singular to themselfes, and none of them did by his ende pay the dette of another, for as much as there is one Lord Christ, in whom all are crucified, all are dead, buried, and raised vp againe. Which sentence (as it was worthie to bee remembred) he repeated in an other place. There can nothing bee required more plaine to destroye this wicked doctrine. Yet Augustine speakest no lesse fitly to the same effect. Though (faith he) we die brethren for brethren, yet the bloud of no Martyrs shal be shed for the forgivenesse of finnes. Which thing Christ hath done for vs, neither hath he therein done that for vs, that wee shoulde followe him, but hath given vs a thing to rejoicye vpon. Againe in an other place. As onely the sonne of God was made the fonne of man, to make vs with him the sonnes of God; so he alone for vs hath taken vpon him punishment without euil deseruings, y we by him might without good deseruings owne grace not due vnto vs. Truely whereas all their doctrine is patcht together of horrible sacrileges & blasphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blasphemie than all the other. Let them remember themselves, whether these be not their decrees. y the Martyrs haue by their death done more to God, and deserued more, than was needfull for themselves: and y they had remaining fo great a plentie of deseruings, as did alfo overflow vnto other: and y therefore, least fo great goodness should be superfluous, their blood is mingled with the blood of Christ, and of both these bloods is made the treasure of the Church, for the remission and satisfaction of finnes. And that fo is the saying of Paul to bee taken: I supplic in my bodie those things that want of the sufferings of Christ for his bodie, which is the Church. What is this else but to leave Christ onely his name, otherwife to make him but a common pettie saint, y may scarceely among the multitude be known from the rest: He onely, only should haue bene preached, he only fet forth, he onely named, he onely ben looked vnto, when the obtaining of forgiveness of sin, satisfaction, and sanctification are entreated of: But let vs heare their curtalled arguments. Least the bloud of y Martyrs shald be shed in vaine, therefore let it be employed to the common benificite of the Church. Is it so? was it no profit to glorifie God by their death? to subscribe to his truth with their bloud? by definising this present life, to testifie that they sought for a better life? by their steadfastnesse to strengthe the faith of the Church, & ouercome the stubbornesse of the enemies? But this is the matter indeed: they acknowledge no profit of the Martyrs death, if Christ onely be the propitiatore, if he onely dyed for our sinnes if he onely was offered vp for our redemption. So (say they) Peter and Paul might not otherly haue obtained the crowne of victorie, if they had died in their beddes. And whereas they have fought even to the sheeding of their bloud, it woulde not agree with the justice of God to leave y same barren and fruitless. As though God could not tell how to encrease in his servants their glorie, according to the the measure of his gifts. But the Church receiues them in common together for the Church at the price of their sufferings, encouraged to a zealous defire to fight.

4. But howe maliciously doe they wrest that place of Paul where he faith, that hee suppieth in his bodie those things that wanted of the suf-feringes of Christ: for he referreth not the default of supplying, to y worke of redemption, satisfaction, and expiation: but to those afflyations wherewith all the members of Christ, that is to say, all the faithfull must be excercised so long as they shall be in this flethe. He faith therefore, that this remaineth of the sufferings of Christ, that he dayly suffereth in his members the same that he once suffered in himselfe. Christ vouchsaufeth to doe vs so great honours, to reekon and accompt our afflyations his owne. Whereas Paul addeth these words: For the Church, he meanteth not for y redemption, for the reconciliation, for the satisfaction of the Church, but for the edifying and profite of the Church. As in an other place he faith, that hee suffereth all things for the electes sake, that he may obteine the saluation which is in Christ left. And he wrote to the Corinthians, that hee suffered all the troubles that he suffred, for their comfort and saluation. And immediately in the same place expoundeth himselfe, when he faith further, that he was made a minister of the Church, not for redemption, but according to the dispensation that was committed vnto him, to preach the Gospel of Christ. If they yet require an other expostour, let them heare Augustine.
The sufferings of Christ (faith hee) are in Christ onely as in the head: & both in Christ and the Church, as in the whole body. Whereby Paul being one member faith, I suppiie in my bodie that which wanteth in the suf-feringes of Christ. Therefore if thou what socuer thou bee that hearest this, artone of the members of Christ, whatsoever thou suffrest of them that are not the members of Christ, that same wanted in the sufferings of Christ.
But wherevnto the sufferings of y Apostles taken for the Church of Christ doe tende, he expoundeth in an other place where hee faith: Christ is to me the gate vnto you: because yee are the sheepe of Christ bought with his bloode: acknowledging your price, which is not given of me, but preached by me. Then he addeth. As he hath given his soule, so ought wee to give our soules for our brethren, to edifie peace, and to conforme faith. These are Augustine wordes. But God forbid, that Paul should haue thought that any thing wanted in the sufferings of Christ, as concerning all fulnes of righteousnes, saluation and life: or that hee meant to adde any thing therevnto, which so plainly and honorable preacheth, that y abundance of grace was so largely powered out by Christ, that it farre surmounted all the force of sinne. By it onely all the faintes haue beene saued, and not by the merite of their owne life or death, as Peter expresslye testifieth: so that he should bee lauderous against God and Christ, that shoulde repose the worthines of any faint any where else than in the onely mercy of God.
But why doe I tarie herevpon any longer, as vpon a matter yet doubtfull, with the verie bewraying of such monstrous errous is a sufficient confutatton of them?

5. Nowe(to passe ouer such abominations) who taught the Pope to enclo to enclose in lead and parchment the grace of Jesus Christ, which the Lord willed to be distributed by the word of the Gospel. Truely either the Gospel of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered vs in the Gospel, with all abundance of heavenly benefits, with all his merites, all his righteousness, wisdom and grace, without any exception, Paul witnesseth where he faith, that the word of reconciliation was delivered to the ministers, whereby they might vse this forme of message, as it were Christ gi-ing exhortation by them: we beeche you, be ye so reconciled to God. Hee hath made him that knewe no sinne, to be made sinne for vs, that wee might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. And the faithfull knowe of what value is that common partaking of Christ, which (as the same Apostle witnesseth) is offered vs to be enjoyed in the Gospel. Contrariwise the pardons do bring out of the stourehouse of the Pope, a certaine pittance of grace, and fasten it to lead, parchment, yea and to a certaine place, and seuer it from the word of God. If a man should ask whence this abuse tooke beginning: it seemeth to haue proceeded herof, that when in time past penitentes were charged with more rigorous satisfactions than all could bear, they which felt themselves above measure oppressed with penance enjoyned them, required of the church a release. The mitigation that was granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned satisfactions from the Church to God, and said that they were recompenes whereby men may redeeme themselues from the judgement of God, then they therewith did also draw these indulgences or pardons to be propitiorie remedies, to de-liuer vs from deferred punishments. As for these blasphemers that we haue recited, they forged them so shamelesly, that they can haue no colour at al.

6 Now let them no more trouble vs with their purgation, because it is with this axe already broken, hewed down, & ouerthrown from the very fundations. For I do not agree to some men, y think best to dissemble in this point, & make no mention at all of Purgatorio, wherupon (as they say) great contentions do arise, but small edification is gotten. Truely I my selfe would also think such trifles worthie to be negligently passed ouer, if they did not account them earnest matters. But forasmuch as purgatorio is builded of many blasphemies, & is daily vpholde with newe blasphemies, & raileth vp many & grievous offences, truly it is not to be winked at. This para venture might after a sort haue bene dissembled for a time, that it was invented by curious and bold rashnes without the worde of God: that men beleued of it by I wot not what reuelations, saine by the craft of Sathan: that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested. Albeit the Lorde giueth not leave to mans presumtuousnes to so to breake into the secrete places of his judgements, and hath seuerely forbidden men to enquire for trueh at dead men, neglecting his worde, and permiteth not his worde to be so vnerentierly defiled. But let vs graunt, that all those things might for a while haue bene borne with, as things of no great importance.
But when the cleaning of sinnes is sought else where than in the bloue of Christ, when satisfaction is given away to any other thing, then it is moste perillous not to speake of it. Therefore we must crie out not onely with vehement stretching of our voice, but also of our throate and sides: that Pur-
Of the manner how to receive

Purgatorie is the damnable devise of Sathan, that it maketh void the Cross of Christ, that it layeth an intolerable hinder upon the mercie of God; that it feebleseth and overthroweth our faith. For what else is Purgatorie among them, but the satisfaction that the soules of men departed do pay after their death? So that overthrowing the opinion of satisfaction, Purgatorie is immediately overthrown by the verie rootes. But if in our former discourse it is more than euident that the bloud of Christ is the only satisfaction, propriatorie sacrifice, and cleansing for the finnes of the faithfull: what remaineth but that purgatorie is a mere & horrible blaspheme against Christ? I passe over the robberies of God wherewith it is daily defended, the offences that it breedeth in religion, and other things innumerable, which we see to haue come out of the same spring of vngodlineesse.

7 But it is good to wring out of their handes such places as they haue fallly & wrongfully out of the Scripture. When (say they) the Lord affirmeth that the sinne against the holy Ghost should not bee forgive[n] in this world, nor in the world to come, thereby he sheweth that there is a forgiving of some finnes in the world to come. But who seeth not that the Lord there speaketh of the fault of sinne? Nowe if it be so, what is that to their purgatorie, forasmuch as by their opinion the paine is there sufffied of those sinnes, whereof they deny not the fault to be forgive[n] in this present life? But they may no more carp against vs, they shal haue yet a plainer solution. When the Lord meant to cut off all hope of pardon from so hainous wickednesse, he thought it not enough to say that it should never be forgive[n]; but the more to amplifie it, he vled a diuision, wherein he comprehended both the judgement y every mans conscience feeleth in this life, & the last judgement y shalbe openly pronounced at the resurrection: as though hee should haue said: Beware ye of malicious rebellion, as of most present damnation. For he that of set purpose shal endeuer to quench the light of holy Ghost, shal not obtaine pardon, neither in this life which is gien to sinners for their conversion, nor in the last day when the lambs shalbe seuered by the Angels of God from the goates, & the kingdom of heauen shalbe cleened from all offences. Then they bring forth y parable out of Matthew: Agree with thine aduерarias, leaff haue not that the Judge to the Sargeant, & the Sargeant to the prison, from whence thou shalt not get out, vntil thou haue paid the uttermost farthing. If in this place y judge do signifie God, & the aduersarie signifie the Diuel, the Sargeant the Angel, & the prison purgatorie, I wil gladly yeeld vnto them. But if it be euident to all men, y Christ meant there to shewe into howe many daungers & murcieues they cast themselues, that had rather obstinately pursue the extremitie of the law, than deale according to equitie & good right, to the end to exhorte his disciples the more earnestly to agreement with equitie: where then I pray you shal Purgatorie be found?

8 They fetch an argument out of the sayeing of Paul, where he affirmeth, that the knees of things in heauen, earth & hell, shal bowe to Christ. For they take it as confessed, that hell cannot there be meant of those that are aduudged to eternall damnation. Therefore it remaineth that it must be the soules lying in paine in Purgatorie. They did not reason verie euill, if the Apostle Apostle did by kneeling mean the true godly worshipping. But ifhe teacheth only, that there is a dominion given to Christ, whereby all creatures are to be subdued, what proofe is there to the contrary, but that we may by his understanding of the Deuils, that shalbe brought before the judgement of God, to acknowledge him their judge with fear & trembling? Like as Paul himselfe expoundeth the same prophecy in another place. All (fayeth he) shalbe brought before the judgement seat of Christ. For it is written: So truly as I liue, every knee shall bowe to me. &c. But we may not so expounde that which is in the Revelation: I have heard all creatures, both these things that are in heaven, and those that are upon the earth, and these that are under the earth, and those that are in the sea, and all those are in them, I have heard them all say to him that sitteth on the Throne and to the Lamb, Blessing, & honor, and glory, & power, for ever & ever. That I do in deede easily grant, but what creatures doe they thinke to be here rehearsed? For it is most certaine, that there are contained creatures both without reason and without sense. Whereby is affirmed nothing else, but that all the partes of the world, from the hieft top of the heavens to the very middle point of the earth do in their maner declare their glory of their creator. As for that which they allege out of the hystory of the Machabees, I will not vouchsafe to answere it, least I shoulde seem to reckon that work in the number of the holy books. But Augustine received it for Canonical. But first, of what sure credit did he receive it? The iews (faith he) cesteeme not the writing of the Machabees as they do the lawe, the Prophesda and the Pfalms, of which the Lorde himselfe hath witnessed as of his witnesses, saying: It was necessarie, that all things should be fulfilled that are written in the lawe, and the Pfalms, and Prophesda concerning me. But it hath bin received of the Church not unprofitably, if it be soberly read or heard. And Hierom teacheth without any doubt that the authority thereof is of no force to prouing of doctrines. And it evidently appeareth by that olde booke, which is entituled vnder the name of Cyprian, concerning the exposition of the Creed, that it had no place at all in the olde Church. But why do I here striue without cause? As though the author himselfe doth not sufficiently shew, how much he is to be credited when in end he craueth pardon, if he haue spoken anything not well. Truly he that confesseth his writings to neede pardon, sayeth plainely that they are not the oracles of the holy Ghost. Beside that, the godlinesse of Iudah is praysed for none other cause, but for that hee had an assured hope of the last resurrection, when he sent an offering for the dead to Hierusalem. Neither doth the wryter of that hystory referre that which Iudah did to bee a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of the eternall life with the other faithful, that had dyed for their country and religion. This doing was indeede not without superstition and preposterous zeal, but they are more than foole, that drawe a sacrifice of the lawe so farre as vnto vs: forasmuch as we knowe that things doe cease by the comming of Christ, that then were in vfe.

9 But they haue an invincible bulwarke in Paul, which can not so easely be battered. If any man (fayth he) builde vpon this foundation, gold, siluer, precious stones, timber, heye, stubble; the Lord shall shewe euerie mans worke.
Cap. 5. Of the manner how to receive what it is; because it shalbe revealed in fire, & the fire shall trie every mans worke what it is, if any mans worke do burne, it shal suffer losse, but he shalbe safe, but as through the fire. What fire (say they) can that be, but the fire of Purgatorie? by which the sinneres offinne are clened away, that we may enter pure into the kingdom of God? But the most part of the olde writers thought it to be another fire, that is to say, Trouble or the croffe, by which the Lord trieth them that be his, that they should not rest in the filathines of the flesh: & that is much more probable, than in faining purgatorie. Albeit I do neither agree with these men, because I thinke I have attained a certaine and much plainer understanding of that place. But before I vnder it, I would haue them answere me, whether the Apostles and all the fainetes must haue gone through this fire of Purgatorie? I knowe they will say, nay. For it were too much inconvenient that they must haue needed to be purged, whose merites they dreame to overflour above measure to all the members of the church. But the Apostle afirmeth it. For he doeth not say the worke of some shalbe proued, but the worke of all. Neither is this my argument, but Augustines, which fo confuiteth that exposition. And (which is more absurditie) he doeth not say, that they shal passe through the fire for all works; but if they haue faithfully builded the church, they shall receive reward when their worke is examined with fire. First we see that the Apostle vsed a Metaphore, when he called the doctrines inuented by mans braines, wood, hey, & stubble. And the Metaphore hath an apparant rescue: that as wood is burned as it is put in the fire, consumeth & wasteth, so cannot those doctrines continue when they come to be examined. Now no man is ignorant, such triall commeth of the holy Ghost. Therefore to followe the true cause of his metaphor, & match the partes together with just relation, hee called the triall of the holy Ghost, fire. For euen as the nearer that gold and siluer are put to the fire, so much the spirer of them haue of their goodnes & fineselles: so the Lords trueth, the more exactly it is weyed with Spirituall examination, so much the greater confirmation of credit it receiveth. As hey, wood, & stubble put to the fire, are brought to sudden conurning, so the inuentions of men not stablised by the worde of God, cannot beare a trial of the holy Ghost, but they by and by fall away & perish. Finally, if forced doctrines be compared to wood, hey, and stubble, because like wood, hey, and stubble, they are burned with fire & destroyed: but they are not destroyed or druen away but by the spirite of the Lord: it foloweth the holy Ghost is the fire where with they shalbe proued, whose profe Paul, according to the common vse of the Scripture, calleth The day of the Lord. For it is called the day of the Lord, whensoever he doeth any way shew his presence to men. But then his face principally shineth, when his trueth shineth vpon vs. Nowe haue we proued, that Paul meneth no other fire, but the trial of the holy ghost. But how are they saued by fire, that suffer losse of their work? That shal not be hard to understand, if we consider of what kind of men he speaketh. For he toucheth those builders of the church, that keeping the true fundation, do build disagreeing matter vpon it, that is to say, they that not swanning from the chief & necessarie articles of faith, do erre in points that be smaller and lesse perilous, mingling their owne deuices with the worde of God. Such I say, say, must suffer loss of their works, having their deceits destroyed. But these theses are saued, but as by the fire: that is to say, not that their ignorance & error is allowable before the Lord, but because they are cleansed from it by the grace and power of the holy Ghost. Therefore, whosoever have defiled the golden sinnesse of God's word with this dong of purgatorie, they must needs suffer loss of their worke.

10 But they will say, it hath beene an ancient vsage of the church. Paul answereth this objection when he comprehended his owne time in that sentence, where he faith, that all they must suffer loss of their worke, that in the building of the church, doe lay any thing vpon the foundation that-agree not with it. Therefore when the aduersaries object against me, that it hath bene vsed above a thousand & three hundred yeares, to haue prayers made for the dead; I aske them againe, by what word of God, by what Reeuation, by what example it was done. For here they doe not onely want testimonies of Scripture but also all such examples of holy men that there are red, do they see no such thing. Of the mourning & order of funerals there are sometimes found many & long tales: but of prayers you cannot fee one title. But of the greater weight that the matter is, the more it ought to haue beene expressly spoken. But the very olde fathers themselves that prayed for the dead, did see that herein they wanted both commandement of God, & lawful example. Why then durft they do so? In this I say, they did suffer somwhat as men: & thence I affirme that that which they did, ought not to be drawn in example. For where as the faithful ought to enterprize the doing of nothing but vpon assured confidence, as Paul teacheth: this assurednesse is principally required in prayer. But it is likely that they were led by some reason vnto it: they sought some comfort to relieve their sorrow: and it seemed unnaturall not to doe we before God some testimonie of their loue towards the dead. How mans wit is enclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Also y receiv'd custome was like a burning brand to set many mens minds on fire. We know that with all nations & in all ages there were fune-erals done for the dead, & their soules yerely purged. For though Satan beguiled foolish men with these deceits: yet he tooke occasion so to begile by a ttrue princiiple: that death is not a destruction, but a passage out of this life into another. And it is no doubt, but that even very superstition condemneth y Gentiles before the judgement seat of God, for neglecting the care of y life to come, which they professed themselves to beleue. Now Christians, be-because they would not be worse than Heathen men, were ashamed to do nothing for the dead, as though they were utterly destroyed. Hereupon came y il adused diligence: because if they were slowe in looking to the funerals, in bankettings and offerings, they thought that they had put themselves in danger of a great reproche. And that which first proceeded from a wrongful following of the Heathens example, was so multiplied by often new encreases, that now it is the principal holiness of Papistry, to helpe the dead in disfresse. But the Scripture miniftreth another much better & perfecter comfort, when it testifizeth, that the dead are blessed that die in the Lorde. And it addeth a reason: because from thenceforth they rest from their labours. And we ought not so much tenderly to follow our owne affection of loue, to set Cap. 5. Of the manner how to receive upon a wrongful manner of praying in the church. Truely he which but mean wisedome, doth one perceiue that all that is red hereof in the old writers, was done to beare with the common usage, & the ignorance of the people.

They themselfes also, I grant, were caried away into error and as vnadu-iwed lightnes of believe is wont to rob mens wits of judgement. But in ye mean time the vereie reading of them doth shew, howe doubtingly they commande prayers for the dead. Augustine in his booke of confessions, reporteth that Monica his mother did earnestly desire, that the might be remembered in celebrating the ministreries at the Altar. An old wise request, which the sonne neuer examined by the rule of the Scripture, but according to his affection of nature, would haue it allowed of other. As for the booke that he made of care for the dead, containeth so many doutings, that of riight it ought with the coldnes thereof to quench the heart of a foolish zeal: if any man desire to be a proctor for dead men, truly with cold likehhothes it will bring them out of care that were before careful. For this is one pilister of it, that this doing is not to be despisde, because it is a custome grown in use, that the dead should be prayed for. But though I grant to the old writers of the church, yhet is a charitale use to help the dead: yet wee must still hold one rule which cannot deceive: that it is not lawfull for vs in our prayers to use any thing of our own, but our requestes must be made subject to the worde of God: because it is in his wil to appoint what vs haue to be asked. Now where as the whole law and the Gospel do not so much as in one syllable give libertie to pray for the dead, it is a prophane abuse of the inquisition of God to attempt more than he commandeth vs. But that our adversaries may not boast that they haue the ancient church companion of their errour: I say there is great difference betweene them & it. They vsed a memoriale of the dead, least they should seeme to haue cast away all care of them: but they did therewithall confesse ye they doubted of their estate. As for purgatory, they so affirmed nothing that they held it for a thing vncertaine. These men require to haue ye which they haue dreamed of purgatorie, to be holden without question for an article of faith. They slenderly & only to passe it lightly outer, did in the communion of the holy supper comend their dead to God: These do continually call upon the care of the dead, & with importunate praying it, do make it to be preferred above all dutifull works of charitie. Yea, and it were not hard for vs to bring forth some testimonies of the old writers, ye do manifestly overthrow all those prayers for the dead, which then were v-osed. As this of Augustine, when he teacheth that all men looke for the ressureccion of the flesh and the eternall glorie, and that every man then received the rest that followeth after death, if he be worthie when he dieth.
And therefore he teesisteth, that all the godly do immediately after death enjoy the blessed rest as well as the Prophets, Apositles, and Martyrs. If their etate be such, what I beseech you, shall our prayers availe them? I passe ouer the grosser superstitions, wherewith they haue bewitched the mindes of the simple: which yet are so innumerable and the most parte so monstrous, that they can haue no honest couraze to exauce them. Also I let passe those most filthie byings and sellings that they haue vse, while the world was in such grosse senflesse ignorance. For both I should never make an We have already sayde, that the mark whereunto regeneration tendeth, is that in the life of the faithful there should appeare an agreement and consent betweene the righteousness of God and their obedience: and that so they should conforme the adoption, whereby they are receiued to be children. But although his lawe conteine in it selfe that newnesse, whereby the image of God is restored in vs, yet because our dulleesse hath neede both of many prickinges forward and helps, therefore it shall be profitable to gather out of divers places of the Scripture an order of framing of life, that they that have a defirous minde of amendement, may not wander out of the way in their endeauour. Nowe when I take upon me the framing of a Christian mans life, I am not ignorant that I enter into a manifold and plentious argument, and such as may with the greatnesse thereof fill a long volume, if I would absolutely entreat of it in all points. For we see into what great length are stretched the exhortatorie orations of olde writers, made onely every one of one seuerall vertue. And that is not done with too much idle babbling. For what so ever vertue a man purpose to set out in oration, the stile runneth of it selfe into such largenesse with plentie of matter, that a man can not seeme to haue discoursed well of it, vnlesse he haue spoken much. But my minde is not to stretch so farre the institution of life, which I promise to teache, as peculiarly to goe through every sepeciall vertue, and wander abroade into exhortations. Lette such things be fetched out of other mens writings, and specially out of the Homelies of the olde fathers. It shall be enough for me to shewe an orderly trade, whereby a godly man may be guided to a right marke of framing his life, and shortly to appoint out a certaine vniversall rule, by which he may well trie what be his duties. There shall paraduentaure at some other season be a fitt time to make declamations, or I will leaue that to other, which I myselfe am not meete to doe. I doe naturally love shortenesse, and paraduentaure if I would speake more at large, it would not frame well with me. And if a longer manner of teaching were never so much pleasing, yet I would scarce haue minde to put it in prooфе. But the course of this present worke requireth to knit vp a simple doctrine with as great shortenesse as I may. As the Phylophers have their certaine endes of right and honestie, from which they derive particular duties and all the companie of vertues: so the Scripture is not without her order in this matter: but holdeth a moat goodly well ordered disposition, and much more certaine than all the Phylophers orders. This onely is the difference, that they (as they were vainglorious men) haue diligently endeavoured to attaine an exquisite plainenes of order, to shewe foorth the ready aptnesse of their witte. But the Spirit of God, because he taught without curious affectation, hath not so exactly nor continually kept an orderly trade: which yet when he sometime slid, he doth sufficiently declare, that it is not to be neglected of vs.

2 This instruction that the Scripture teacheth, whereof we now speake, standeth chiefly upon two partes. The first, that there be powred & brought into our mindes a love of righteousness, to which otherwise we are of nature nothing inclined. The second, that there be a rule set out vnto vs, that may not suffer vs to go out of the way in following righteousness. In commendation of righteousness it hath both very many and very good reasons: of which we have herebefore in divers places spoken of some, and other some we shall in this place briefly touch. At what foundation may it better beginne, than when it putteth vs in minde that we must be holy, because our God is holy? For when we were scattered abroad like straying sheepe, and dispersed abroad in the maze of the world, he gathered vs together againe, to ioyne vs in one flocke with himselfe. When we heare mention made of our ioyning with God, let vs remember that holinesse must be the bond thereof. Not that by the merite of holinesse we come into common with him: (whereas rather we must first cleaue vnto him, that being endued with his holinesse, we may follow whither he calleth) but because it greatly perteineth to his glory, that he have no fellowwhippe with wickednesse and vn-cleanness. Therefore also it teacheth, that this is the ende of our calling, which we ought alwaye to have respect vnto, if we will answere God that calleth vs. For to what purpose was it, that we should be drawn out of the wickednesse and filthinesse of the world, if we give our selves leaue all our life long to wallowe in them still? Moreover it also admonishteth vs that to the end we may be reckned among the people of God, we must dwell in the holy city Hierusalem. Which as he hath halowed to himselfe, so is it unlawfull that it be vnholily profaned by the vn-cleane of the inhabitantes. From hence came these sayinges, that they shall have a place in the tabernacle of God that walke without spot, and study to followe righteousness, &c. Because it is not meete that the Sanctuarie whereon he dwelleth, shoulde bee like a stable ful of filthinesse.

3 And the better to awake vs, it sheweth that God the father, as he hath ioyned vs to himselfe in his Christ, so hath printed an image for vs in him, after which he would have vs to be fashioned. Now let them finde me a better order among the Philosophers, that think that the philosophie concerning manners, is in them oneely orderly framed. They when they will excellently well exhort vs to vertue, bring nothing els but that we should live agreeably to nature. But the Scripture bringeth here exhortation from the true wellspring, when it not onely teacheth vs to referre our life to God, the author of it, to whome it is bonde: but also when she hath taught that we are swarued out of kinde from the true originall and state of our creation, shee immediatly addeth, that Christ by whome wee came againe into favoure with God, it set before vs for an example, that we should express the forme thereof in our life. What may a man require more effectuall then this one thing? Yea what may a man require more than this onely thing? For if the Lorde hath by adoption made vs children with this condition, that our life should resemble Christ the bonde of our adoption: if wee doe not glue and auowe our selues to righteousnes, wee doe not onely with most wicked breach of allegiance depart from our creatour, but also we forswaire him to be our sauiour. Then the scripture taketh matter of exhortation out of all the beneiftes of GOD, which tee reheareseth vnto vs, and all the partes of our saluation. And theveth that thith God hath shewed himselfe a father vnto vs, we are worthie to be condemned of extreme unhankfulneffe, if we doe not likewife in our behalfe shewe our selues children vnto him. Sith Christ hath cleansed vnto us with the washing of his blode, and hath made vs partakers of this cleansing by baptism, it is not seemly that wee should be spotted with new filthinesse. Sith he hath graffed vs into his bodie, we must carefully take heede that we sprinke not any spot or blot vpon vs that are his members. Sith he himselfe that is our heade, is ascended into heaven, it behooueth vs that laying away earthly affection, we do with all our heart aspire to heauenwarde: Sith the holy Ghost hath dedicated vs temples to God, we must indeouer that Gods glorie may bee honourable set out by vs, and must not doe any thing whereby we may bee prophaned with filthines of sinne: Sith both our foule and our bodie are ordained to heauenly incorruption and vnperifhing crowne, we must diligently trayel, that the same may be kept pure and vncorrupted vs vnto the day of our saluation. These (I say) be the best laye foundations to builde a mans life, and such as the like are not to bee founde among the Phylosophers, which in commendation of vertue do not emince aboue the naturall dignitie of man.

4. And here is a fit place to speake vnto them, that hauing nothing but the title and badge of Christ, yet would be named Christians. But with what face doe they boaste of his holy name: Sith none haue any fellowship with Christ, but they that haue received a true knowledge of him out of the worde of the Gospell? But the Apostle saith, that al they haue not righteously learned Christ, that are not taught that they must cast away the old man which is corrupted according to the desire of errour, and haue not put on Christ. Therefore it is proued that they falsely, yea and wrongfully pretende the knowledge of Christ, although they can eloquently and roundly talke of the Gospell. For it is not a doctrine of tongue, but of life: and is not conceiued as other learnings be, with onely vnderstanding and memorie, but is then onely receiued when it possesth the whole foule, and findeth a fante and place to holde it in the most inwarde affection of the harte. Therefore either let them cease, to the slander of God, to boaste of that which they are not, or let them shewe themselues not vnworthie schooleares for Christ their maister. Wee haue gaven the first place to the doctrine wherein our religion is containid, because our saluation beginneth at it: but the same must bee powerde into our heart, and passe into our manners, yea and transforme vs vnto it, that it be not vnfruitfull vnto vs. If the Philofophers doe insteely chaffe against them, and doe with shamefull reproche drive them from their companie, that professing an arte that ought to bee schoolemaisters of life, doe turne it into a Sophistical babbling: with howe much better reason shall wee deteact these trifling Sophiters, that are contented to role the Gospell vpon the toppe of their tongues, the effectuall working whereof ought to Pearce into the innermost affections of the harte, Cap. 7. Of the manner how to receive to rest in the soule, and to alter the whole man a hundred times more, than the cold exhortations of Phlyosophers?

Yet doe I not require that the manners of a Christian man savour of nothing but the absolute Gospell: which neitherthelesse both were to bee wished and we must indewoulue toward it. But I do not so seuerely require a gospellike perfection, that I would not acknowledg him for a Christian ye hath not yet attained vnto it. For so should all men be excluded from the church, sith there is no man founde that is not by a great space distant from it, and manie haue hitherto but a little way proceeded toward it, who yet shoulde be vnustly caft away. What then let that bee set for the marke before our eyes, to which alone all our endeavours may be directed. Let that bee appointed the goal for vs to run and trauell vnto. For it is not lawefull for thee so to make partition with God, to take vpon thee part of these things that are com-manded thee in his worde, and to laue part at thine owne choice. For first of all he euerywhere commendeth integritie as the cheefe part of worship-ping him, by which worde he meane there a pure simplicitie of minde that is without all deceitfull colour and faining: agaist which a double heart is set as contrarie: as if it should be said, that the beginning of liuing pvringly is spiritual, when the inward affection of the mind is without faining dedicate to God to obtene holinesse and rightcousnesse. But because no man in this earthly prifon of the bodie hath to great strength to haft with such freshness of running, as he perfectly ought to doe, and the greater number are so fee-ble, that with staggering and halting, yea and creeping vpon the grounde, they auaunce but slowely forarde. Let vs euery one goe according to the measure of his little power, and proceede on our iourney began. No man shal go so vntowardly, but he shal every day get some grounde, though it be but little. Therefore let vs not ceaue to trauel so, that we may continually proceed somewhat in the way of the Lorde. And let vs not despier upon the slenderes of our going forarde, for hówsoever the successfull anfwer were not our desyre, yet we have not lost our labour when this day passeth yesterdaie; so that with pure simplicitie we looke vnto our marke, and long toward the ende of our course, not fauorously flattering our felues, nor tenderly bearing with our owne euls, but with continual endeavoure vntoward to this, that wee may still become better then our felues, til we attaine to goodnes it selfe: which indeed we seek for and follow all our life long: but we shal then only atteine it, when being vnclerched of the weaknesses of the fleshe, we shall be received into the full fellowship thereof.

The viij Chapter.
The summe of a Christian life: where in is unstated of the for-faking of our felues.

Let that the law of the Lorde haue a most aptly well disposed order to frame a mans life, yet it seemed good to the heavenly schoolemaister to instruct men yet with a more exact trade to the same rule hee had set foorth in his law. And the beginning of that trade, is this: that it is the dutie of y faithful to yeld there bodies to God a liuing, holy and acceptable sacri-fice vnto him; and that therein standeth the true worshipping of him. Hereupon is gathered occasion to exhort men, that they do not apply themselves to the fashion of this world, but be transformed in renewing of their mind, that they may procure what the will of God is. Now this is a great thing, that we be consecrate and dedicate to God: that we should from thence forth think, speak, imagine, or do nothing but to his glory. For the thing that is consecrate, can not be applied to unholy verses, without great wrong done vnto him. If we be not our owne, but the Lords, it appeareth what error is to be avoided, and whereunto all the doings of our life are to be directed. We are not our owne: therefore let neither our owne reason nor our owne will bear rule in our counsels and doings. We are not our owne: therefore let vs not make this the ende for vs to tend vnto, to seeke that which may be expedient for vs according to the flesh. We are not our owne: therefore so much as we may, let vs forget our selves and all things that are our owne. On the other side, we are Gods: therefore let vs live and die to him. We are Gods: therefore let his wife dome and will govern all our doings. We are Gods: therefore let all the partes of our life tend toward him as their onely lawfull end. Oh how much hath he profited, that hauing learned that himselfe is not his owne, hauing taken from him selfe the rule and government of himselfe to give it to God: For as this is the most strong working pesterlence to destroy men, that they obey themselves: so it is the onely hauing of aetrie, neither to know nor will any thing by himselfe, but onely to followe God going before him. Let this therefore be the first steppe, that man depart from himselfe, that he may oppose all the force of his wit to the obeying of the Lord. Obeying I call not onely that which standeth in obedience of the worde, but whereby the minde of man, void of his owne sensualitie of flesh, bendeth himselfe wholly to the will of Gods spirit. Of this transformation (which Paul calleth renewing of the minde) whereas it is the first entrie into life, all the Philosophers were ignoramut. For they make onely Reason the governnse of man: they think he only ought to be heard; finally to her onely they greue & assigne the rule of maners. But the Christian Phylosophic biddeth her to giue place, and to yelde and be subject to the holy Ghost: so that man nowe may not liue himselfe, but bear Christ living and reigning in him.

2 Hereupon followeth also this other pointe, that wee seeke not the things that bee our owne, but those things that be according to the will of the Lorde, and that make to the advauncement of his glory. This is also a proue of great profiting, that in a maner forgetting our selves, & altogether leaving the regard of our selves, we trauell to employ our study to God & his commandements. For when the scripture biddeth vs to leaue priuie regard of our selves, it doth not only race out of our minds & countourines of hauing, the greedy seeking for power and favour of men: but also roothe out ambition and all desire of worldly glory, and other more secret pestilences. Truly a Christian man must bee so fashioned and disposed, to thinke through out all his life, that he hath to doe with God. In this sorte, as hee shall examine all his doings by Gods will and judgement: so hee shall reverently direct vs to him at the earnestly bent diligence of his mind. For hee that hath learned to looke vpon God in all things that hee hath to doe, is there withall turned away from all vaine thoughtes. This is that forsaking of our selves,
Of the manner how to receive felues, which Christ euen fr6 their first beginning of instruction so earnestly gave in charge to his Disciples: when he once hath gotten possession in thy heart leave not no place at al, first neither for pride, nor disdainfullnesse, nor vaine glorious boasting, then neither for courtise, nor filthie luft, nor riotousnesse, nor deintinesse, nor for other evils that are engendered of the love of our selues. Contrariwise, wheresover it reigneth not, there either most filthie vices doe rage without shame, or if there be any spic of vertue, it is corrupted with peruersie desire of glory. For shew me a man, if thou canst, that vnlesse he have forfaken himselfe according to the commandement of the Lorde, will of his owne free will vs goodnesse amongst men. For all they that have not beene possed with this feeling, if they haue followed vertue, they haue done it at the leaft for praises sake. And all the Phylofophers that euer most of all affirmed that vertue was to be desired for it selues sake, were puffed vp with so great pride, that it appeared they desired vertue for no other thing, but that they might have matter to be proud vpon. But God is so nothing at all delit, neither with those gapers for the peoples breath, nor with these swelling beasts, that hee pronounceth that they haue alreadie receiued their reward in the worlde, and maketh harlottes and publicanes neerer to the kingdom of heauen, than them. And yet we haue not throughly declared with howe many and how great stoppes man is hindred from that which is right, so long as he hath not forfaken him selfe. For it was truely faide in times past, that there is a worlde of vices hidden in the soule of man, And thou canst finde no other remedies, but denying thy selfe, and leaving regard of thy selues, to bend thy minde to seeke those things that the Lorde requireth of thee, and to seeke them therefore onely because they please him.

In an other place the same Paul doth more plainly, although shortly, goe through all the parts of a well ordered life, saying: The grace of God that bringeth salvation vnto all men, hath appeared and teache and that wee shoulde denie all vngodlinesse, and worldly lustes, and that we shoule sober minded, rightly and godly in this present worlde, looking for the blessed hope and glorious appearing of the mightie GOD, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which gave himselfe for vs to redeeme vs from all vnrighteousnesse, and to purge vs a peculiar people vnto him selfe perpetually given vnto good works. For after that hee hath set forth the grace of God to encourage them, to make ready the waye for vs to worshippe God, he taketh away two stoppes that doe most hinder vs, that is to saye, vngodlinesse, whereunto we are naturally too much inclined, and Worlde desires, which extendeth furthere. And under the name of vngodlinesse, he not onely meaneth superstitions, but also comprehendeth all that disagreeth with the earnest feare of God. And worldly lustes are in effecte as much as the afectiones of the felue. Therefore hee commandeth vs in respect of both the tables of the lawe, to put off our owne wit, and to forfaye all that our owne reason and will informeth vs. And all the doinges of our life hee bringeth into three partes, sobrietie, righteousnesse, & godlines, of the which sobrietie without doubt signifieth as well chastitie and temperance, as a pure and measurable sparing use of temporall things, and patient sufferance of povertie. Righteousnesse containeth all the duties of equity, to give every man his owne. The third is Godlinesse, that secur-eth vs from the deslings of the worlde, and with true holinesse ioyneth vs to God. These things, when they be knit together with an vnseparable knot, make a full perfection. But forasmuch as nothing is more heard, than forsaking the reason of the flesh, yea subduing and renouncing her desires, to give our selves to GO D and our brethren, and to study for an angelike life in the filthy state of this earth: therefore Paul, to loose our mindes from all snares, calleth vs backe to the hope of blessed immortalitie, admonishing vs not to strive in vaine because as Christ hath once appeared the redeemer, so at his last comming, he shall shew the fruit of the salutation that he hath purchased. And thus he driueth away the entiementes that blinde vs, & make vs not to aspire as we ought to the heavenly glorie: yea he teacheth that we must travaile as men being from home in this worlde, that the heavenly inheritance be not lost or fall away from vs.

4 Now in these wordes we perceiue, that the for sakeing of our selves hath partly respect to men, and partly, yea chiefly to God. For whereas the scripture biddeth vs so to behave our selves with men, that we preferre them before vs in honour, that we faithfully employ our selves wholly to procure their commodities: therefor it greeueth such commandements as our mind is not able to receive, but first being made voyde of natural sense. For (with such blindenesse wee runne all into loue of our selves) every man thinketh himselfe to have a just caufe to aduance himselfe, and to dispite all other in comparison of himselfe. If God haue given vs any good gift, by and by bearing our selves bold thereof, we lift vp our courage, and not onely swell, but in a manner burst with pride. The vices wherewith we abound, we do both diligently hide from other, and to our selves we flatteringly faine them light and slender, and sometime embrace them for vertues. And if the same good gifts, which we prayfe in our selves, or better do appeare in other, least we should be compelled to give place to them, we do with our enviousnesse deface them and finde faulte with them. If there be any faultes in them, we are not contented seuerely and sharply to marke it, but wee also odiously amplifie it. Hereupon groweth that insolence, that every one of vs, as though he were privileged from the common estate, would be hier than the rest, and carrelessly and proudly feel light by every man, or despise them as inferiours. The poore yeld to the rich, base people to gentlemen, seruants to their masters, vnlearned to the learned: but there is no man that doeth not nourish within himselfe some opinion of excellencie. So every man in flattering himselfe, beareth a certaine kingdome in his breit. For presumptuously taking vpon them somewhat whereby to please themselves, they judge vpon the wittes and manners of other men. But if they come to contention, there bursteth out their poysion. For many doe make a fhewe of great meekenesse, so long as they finde all thinges gentle and lowly; but howe many a one is there that keepeth that continuall course or modestie, when he is pricked and stirred to anger? And there is no remedy hereof, but that the most hurtful pestilence of loue, of soueraigntie and selfe loue be rooted out of the bottome of their heartes, as it is rooted out by the doctrine Cap. 7. Of the manner how to receive of the Scripture. For there we are so taught, that wee must remember that the good giftes that God hath giuen vs, are not our owne good things, but the free giftes of God, whereof if any be proud, they bewray their owne unthankfulnesse. Who maketh thee to excell? Paul sayth, if thou haft received all things, why doest thou boast as if they were not giuen thee? Then, that wee must with continuall reknowledging of our faultes, call our selues backe to humilitie. So shall there remaine in vs nothing to be proude vpon, but there shalbe much matter to abace our selues. Againe, wee are commanded, whatsoever giftes of God we see in other men, to reuerence and esteeme those giftes, that we also honour those men in whom they be. For it were a great leudnesse for vs, to take from them that honor, that God hath vouchsafed to giue them. As for their faultes, wee are taught to wince at them, not to cherish them with flattering, but that we shoulde not by reason of those faultes triumphe against them, to whome wee ought to beare good will and honour. So shall it come to passe, that with what man so ever wee haue to doe, we shal behaue our selues not onely temperately and modestly, but also gently and friendely. As a man shal neuer come any other way to true meckenesse, but if he haue a heart endued with abacing of himselfe, and reuering of other.

5 Now how hard is it, for thee to do thy dutie in seeking the profite of thy neighbour? Thou shalt herein labour in vaine, vnleffe thou depart from regarde of thy selue, and in a maner put of thy selue. For how canst thou performe these things that Paul teacheth to be the workes of charitie, vnleffe thou forake thy selue, to giue thy selue wholly to other? Charitic(fayth he) is pacient and gentle, not proude, not disdainfulle, erueth not, swellethe not, seeketh not her owne, is not angi, &c. If this one thing be required, that we seek not the things that are our owne, we shall doe no small violence to nature, which so bendeth vs to the onely loue of our selues, that it doeth not easily suffer vs negligently to passe ouer our selues and our owne things, to watch for other mens commodities, yea to depart with our owne right to resigne it to an other. But the Scripture, to leade vs thither as it were by the hande, warneth vs that what so ever gratious giftes we obtaine of the Lord, they are committed vnto vs vpon this condition, that they shoulde be bestowed to the common benefit of the Church: and that therefore the true vse of all Gods graces is a liberall and bountifull communicatig of them to other. There can be no certaine rule, nor more forceable exhortation could be deuised for the keeping of the same, then when we be taught that all the good giftes that we haue, are thinges of GOD delivered, committed to our trust vpon this condition, that they shoulde be disposed to the benefit of our neighbours. But the Scripture goeth yet further, when it compar eth them to the powers wherewith the members of mans bodie are endued. No member hath his power for himselfe, nor applyeth it to his private vse: but poureth it abroade into the other members of the same bodie, and taketh no profit thereof, but such as proceedeth from the common commoditie of the whole bodie. So whatsoever a godly man is able to doe, hee ought to be able to do it for his brethren, in prouiding none otherwise privately for himselfe, but so that his minde be bent to the common edification of of the Church. Let this therefore be our order for kindnesse and doing good: that whatsoever God hath bestowed vpon vs, whereby wee may helpe our neighbour, we are the Bailies thereof, and bounde to render accompte of the disposing of it. And that the onely right disposing is that which is tried by the rule of lour. So shall it come to passe, that we shall alway not onely ioyne the trauell for other mens commoditie with the care of our owne profit, but alfo set it before the care of our owne. And that we shoulde not happen to be ignorant that this is the true lawe of disposing all the gifts that wee receive of God, he hath in old time set the same lawe even in the smallest gifts of his liberalitie. For he commanded the first fruite of corne to be offered vn{to} him, by which the people might testifie that it was vnlawfull for them to take any fruite of the goods that were not first consecrate to him. If the gifts of God be so only then sanctified vnto vs, when we have with our owne hande dedicated them to the author thereof, it is evident that it is an vntrue abuse thereof that doeth not fauour of such dedication. But it shall bee vaine for thee to goe about to enrich the Lord with communicating to him of thy things. Therefore seeth thy liberalitie can not extende vnto him, as the Prophet faith, thou must vs it toward his fants that are in earth. Therefore almes are compared to holy obligations, that they may nowe be correspondant to these of the law.

6. But that wee shoulde not be wearie with doing good (which otherwise must needs come quickly to passe) that other thing must be adjoyned which the Apostle speakeh, that charitie is patient and not moued to anger. The Lorde commandeth to doe good to all vnuitually, of whom a great part are most vnworthie, if they be considered by their owne dejecting. But here the scripture helpeh with a verie good meane, when it teacheth that we must not haue respect what men defeerue of them selues, but that its image of God is to be considerd in all men, to which we owe all honour and lour. But the same is most diligently to be marked in them of the householde of faith, in so much as it is in them renewed and restored by the spirit of Chrift. Therefore whatsoever man thou light vppon, that needeth thy helpe, thou haft no caufe to withdrawe thy selfe from doing him good. If thou saybe that he is a stranger: but the Lorde hath given him a marke, that ought to bee familiar vnto thee, by the reason that hee forbideth thee to despise thine owne flesh. If thou say that he is base and naught worth: but its Lord sheweth him to bee such a one, to whom he hath vouchsafed to give its beaute of his image. If thou say thou owest him nothing for any thing that he hath done for thee: but God hath set him as it were in his place in respect of whom, thou knowest so many and so great benefites wherewith he hath bound thee vnto him. If thou say that he is vnworthie that thou shouldst labour anie thing at all for his sake: but the image of God whereby he is commended to thee, is worthie that thou shouldst give thy selfe and all that thou haft vnto it. But if he have not only defeerued no good at thy hande, but also prouoked thee with wronges and euill doings: euin this is no iuue cause why thou shouldest cease both to loue him and to doe for him the dutifull workes of loue. Thou wilt say, he hath farre otherwise defeerued of me. But what hath the Lorde defeerued? Which when he commandeth the Cap. 7. Of the maner how to receive thee to forgive all wherein he hath offended thee, truly he will then the same to bee imputed to himselfe. Truely this is that onely waye to come to that which is vitally agaunt the nature of man, much more is it harde for man. I meane, loue them that hate vs, to recompence euill with doing good, to render blessings for reproches: if wee remember that wee must not consider the malice of men, but looke vpon the image of God in them, which defacing and blotting out their faults, doth with the beautie and dignitie of it selfe allure vs to imbrace it.

7 Therefore this Mortification shall then onely take place in vs, when we performe the dutie of charitie. But it is not he that performeth them, that onely doeth all the dutiefull workes of charitie, although hee leave none of them undone, but he that doeth them of a syncre affection of loue. For it may happen, that a man may fully performe to all men all that he oweth, so much as concerneth outward dutie: and yet he may bee farre from the true performing of it. For you may see some that would feeme verie liberall, which yet doe giue nothing but either with pride of looke, or with churfhinesse of wordes they vpbraid it, And wee be come to such wretchednesse in this vnhappie worlde, that almost no almes are giuen of anie men, or at leaft of the most part of men, without reproaching. Which peruerfnesse shoulde not haue bene tollerable among the verie heathen. For of Christians is somewhat more required than to shewe a cherefulnes in countenance, and make their doinges louely with gentlenesse of wordes. First they must take vpon them the performance of him whom they fee to neede their helpe, and then so prtie their case, as if themselves did feele and suffer it: so that they may be caried with feeling of mercie and gentlenesse even as they woulde be to helpe themselves. Hee that shall come so minded to helpe his brethren, will not only not defile his doings with any arrogance or vpbraiding, but alfo neither will dispiete his brother to whom hee doeth good as one needing his helpe, nor tread him under foot as one bound vnto him: no more than we vfe to reproch a sicke member, for easing whereof the whole bodie laboureth, or to thinke it specially bounde to the other members, because it hath drawn more helpe vnto it than it hath recompened. For it is thought that the common interpartning of dutie betweene members of one bodie, hath no free kinde of gite, but rather that it is a payment of that which being due by the lawe of nature it were monstrous to deny. And by this reason it shall followe, that hee may not thinke himselfe discharged that hath performed one kinde of dutie, as its commonly veld, that when a rich man hath giuen any thing of his owne, hee leaueth other charges to other men, as not belonging to him. But rather euery man shall thinke thus with himselfe, that hee is altogether better to his neighbours, and that hee must determine none other ende of vsing his liberalitie, but when abilitie faileth, which howe large soever it bee, must bee measured by the rule of charitie.

8 Nowe let vs more fully declare the principall parte of forsaking our selfes, which wee saide to have respect to God. Wee haue sayde much of it already, which it were superfluous to rehearse againe: it shall be sufficient to entreate of it so farre as it frameth vs to quietnesse of minde and sufrancé. First therefore in seeking the commoditie or quietnesse of this present life, the Scripture calleth vs hereunto, that resigning vs and our things to the Lords will, we should yeeld vnto him the affections of our heart to be tamed and subdued. To covet wealth and honors, to compasse authoritie, to heape vp riches, to gather together all such follies as serue for royaltie & pompe, our lust is outrageous, and our greedineffe infinite. On the other side of pouertie, ignobilitie, and base estate, wee haue a marvellous feare and marvellous hatred, that moue vs to trauaile by all meanes to eschew them. Hereby a man may see, how vnquiet a minde they haue, how many shifte they attempt, with what studies they wareie their life, that frame their life after their owne deisise: to attaine those things that their affeciton of ambition or coueitousnesse requireth, and on the other side to escape pouertie & basenesse. Therefore the godly must keepe this way, that they be not entangled with such fnares. First let them not either desire, or hope for, or thinke upon any other meanes of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lord: and therefore let them safely and boldely rest themselves vpon it.

For howsoever the flesh thinke it felte sufficient of her selfe, when shee either trauaileth by her owne diligence, or endewoureth with her owne studie, or is holpen by the favour of men, to the attaining of honor & wealth: yet it is certaine, that these things are nothing, & that we shall nothing preuaine with wit or trauaile, but in so much as the Lord shal prosper both. But on the other side his only blessing findeth a way through all steps, to make all things proceeide with vs to a joyful & luckie end. Then howsoever we may moost of all obteine any glorye or wealth without it (as we daily see the wicked to get heaps of great honors & riches) yet for as much as they vpon whom refisteth the curse, do feele no parcel of felicitie, wee can obteine nothing without his blessing: by which vs the Lord may not turne vs to cuil. And it is not at all to be counted, that maketh men more miserable.

Therefore if we beleeue that all the meanes of prosperous secesshe and such as is to be wished, consisteth in the onely blessing of God, which being absent, all kindes of miserie and calamity must happen vnto vs: this remaineth also, that wee do not greedily endeavoure to wealth and honors standing vpon our owne sinenesse of wit or diligence, not leaning to the favour of men, nor trusting vpon a vaine imagination of fortune, but that wee alway looke vnto the Lord, to be led by his guiding to whatsoever he hath provided. So first it shall come to passe, that we shall not violently rush to the catching of richesse and inuading of honours, by wrong, by guile and cuill craftie meanes, or extortion with doing injurie to our neighbours, but shall onely followe those fortunes that may not lead vs from innocencie. For who may hope for the helpe of Gods blessing among fraudes, extortions, and other little meanes of wickednesse? For as Gods blessing followeth no man but him that thinketh purely, and doeth rightly, so it calleth backe all them of whom it is desired, from crooked thoughtes, and corrupt doings. Then wee shalbe bridled that wee burne not with vnmeasurable desir of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honours. For with what face may a man truist to be holpen of God, to obtaigne those things that hee desireth agaynst his word? For God forbid that God should giue the helpe of his blessing. blessing to that which he curseth with his owne mouth. Last of all, if it succeede not according to our wish & hope, yet wee shalbe restrained from impatience, and from curzing our estate whatsoever it be: because wee knowe that that is to murmer against God, at whose will richesse and pouertie, baseesse and honours are disposed. Briefely, he that refeth himselfe in such fort as is aforeside vpon the blessing of God, neither will by euiil fortunes hunt for those things that men are wont outrageously to couert, by which craftie meanes he thinketh that he shall nothing preuail: nor if any thing happen prosperously will impute it to himselfe, and to his owne diligence, endeuour or to fortune, but will assigne it to God the authour. But if while other mens estates do flourish, he go but flenderly forward, yea or slide backwarde, yet he will beare his ill fortune with greater quietnesse and moderation of minde, than a prophane man will beare a meanly good successse, which is not altogether so good as he defired: because he hath a comfort wherein he may more quietly rest, than vpon the highest tope of wealth and authority: because he accounteth that his things are ordered by God as is available for his salvation. So we see that David was minded, and yeldeth himselfe to bee ruled by G O D, he declareth himselfe to bee like to a weaned childe, and that hee walketh not in high thinges or maruillous aboue himselfe.

10 And the godly minde ought to haue that quietnesse & sufferance not onely consisting in this behalfe: but also it must extende to all chances whereunto our present life is subject. Therefore no man hath rightly forfaken him selfe, but he hath so resigned him selfe vp wholly to the Lord, that he suffrith all the partes of his life to be governed by his will. He that is so framed in minde, whatsoever happen, will neither thinke himselfe miserable, nor will with enviousnesse against God complaine of his fortune. Howe necessarie this affection is, shall hereby appeare, if you consider to how many chances we be subject. Divers kindes of diseases do trouble vs, sometime the pestilence cruelly reigneth, sometime wee are sharply vexed with calamities of warre, sometime frost or haile deouering the hope of the yere, bringeth barrenesse, that driueth vs to deareth: sometime our wife, parents, children or kinsfolkes are taken away by death, our house is consumed with fire: thefe be the things at chancing whereof men curse their life, detest the day of their birth, haue heauen & light in execration, murmer against god, and (as they be eloquent in blasphemies) accuse him of vnjustice & crueltie. But a faithfull man must euen in these chances beholde the mercifull kindnesse and fatherly tendernesse of God. Therefore whether he see his house destroyed, his kinsfolke slaine, yet he wil not therefore ceasse to praisse God, but rather will turne him selfe to this thought: Yet the Grace of the Lord that dwelth in my house, will not leaue it desolate. Or if when his corme is blasted or bitten, or consumed with frostes, or beaten downe with haile, he see famine at hand, yet he will not dispaire, nor speake hatefully of God, but will remaine in this confidence, Wee are yet in the Lordes protection, and theepe brought vp in his pastures: hee therefore will finde vs foode euen in extremest barrenesse. Or if he bee troubled with sickenesse, euen then hee will not bee discouraged with bitternesse of sorowe.
The grace of Christ.

Lib. 3. 229

to burst out into impatience and quarrel thus with God: but considering the righteousnesse and lenity in God's correction, he will call himselfe backe to patience. Finally, what so ever shall happen, because he knoweth it ordained by the hande of God, hee will take it with a well pleased and thankfull minde, least he should stubbornly resist his authoritie, into whose power he hath yielded himselfe and all his. Therefore let that foolish and most miserable comfort of the Heathen be far from a Christian mans heart, which to strengthen their mindes against adversitie, did impute the same to fortune, with whom they counted it foolish to be angry, because she was blind and vnaudied, that blindely wounded both the deferring and vndeferring. For contrariwise this is the rule of godlinesse, that the onely hande of God is the judge and gouernes of both fortunes, and that it runneth not forwarde with vnaudied sodaine rage, but with most orderly justice dealeth among vs both good things and euill.

The viii. Chapter.

Of the bearing of the crosse, which is a part of the forsaking of our selves.

But a Godly minde must yet clime vp hier, euent to that whereunto Christ calleth his discipules, that euery one take vp his crosse. For all whom the Lorde hath chosen and vouchsafed to receive into his companie, muf't prepare themselves to a harde, trauailefome and vnquiet life, and full of many and diverse kindes of incommodities. So it is the will of the heauenly father, to exercise them in such sorte, that he may have a true proofe of them that be his. Beginning at Christ, his first begotten sonne, he proceeded with this order toward all his children. For whereas Christ was the best beloved sonne about the rest, and in whom the fathers minde was fully pleased, yet we see howe he was not tenderly and dietly handeled: so that it may be true lyaye, that he was not onely exercisde with a perpetuall crosse so long as he dwelled in earth, but that all his life was nothing else but a kinde of continuall crosse. The Apostle sheweth the cause thereof to be, that it behoved that he should learne obedience by those things that he suffered. Why then should we proueledge our selues from that estate, whereunto it behoved Christ our head to be subiekt, specially when he became subiekt thereunto for our cause, to shewe vs an example of patience in himselfe? Therefore the Apostle sayeth that this is the appointed ende of all the children of God, to be fashioned like vnto him. Whereupon also in hard & sharp chaunces, which are reckned adversitie and euils, arisest a great comfort vnto vs, that we communicate with the suffringes of Christ; that as he entred out of a maze of all troubles into the heauenly glory, so we may by diverse tribulations be brought into the same glory. For so sayth Paul himselfe, that when we learne the communicacion of his afflictions, we doe also conceiue the power of his resurreccion: and when we are fashioned like vnto death, we are so prepared to the fellowshippe of his glorious rising againe. Howe much may this ease afford to asswage all the painefullnesse of the crosse, that the more we are afflicted with adversitie, so much the more sure is our fellowshippe with Christ confirmed: by communicating whereof, our suffringes

Hh2 are are not onely made blessed vnto vs, but also do much helpe vs to the furth-erness of our salutation.

2. Beside that, our Lord had no need to take vp one to beare the crosse, but to testifie and proue his obedience to his father: but we for diverse cau-es, have neede to leade our life vnder a continual crosse. First (as we be naturally bent to attribute all things to our flesh) vnlesse our weakeenes be shewed vs as it were before our eyes, we doe easilie esteeme our owne strength aboue due measure, and dout not that whatsoever happen, it wil continue vnbroken and vnovercome against all harde assaultes. Whereby we are cared into a foolish and vaine confidence of flesh, and then trusting thereupon, we stubbornely waxe proude against GOD himselfe, as though our owne powers without his grace did suffice vs. This arrogancy he can no way better beate down, than when he proueth vnto vs by experience,not only how feeble, but also howe fraile we be. Therefore he afflicteth vs either with shame, or pouerty, or losse of children,or sicknes,or other calamities,which we being vnable to beare in respect of our felues, do by and by sinke downe vnder them. Being so humbled we learne to call vp on his strenght, which only maketh vs to stande vpright vnder the heauy burden of afflictions. Ye the most holy, how well souer they knowe that they stande by the grace of God and not by their owne force, yet are too much assured of their owne strenght and constancy, vnlesse by the trial of the crosse, he bring them into a more inwarde knowledge of themselues. The flouthfullnes creep into Da-uid: I sayde in my rest, I shall never be moued, Lorde, thou hadst establisheth good pleasure a strenght to my hill, thou hiddest away thy face, I was stricken. For he confesseth that with sluggishnesse in prosperitie his senes were dulled, that not regarding the grace of GOD, vpon which he shoulde haue staid, he leaned vnto himselfe, to promise himselfe perpetuall continuance. If this chaunced to so great a Prophete:which of vs ought not to be fearefull, that we may be heedfull? Therefore whereas in prosperitie they flatter themselves with opinion of a greater constancy and patience, when they are once humbled with adversitie, they learne that their former opinion was but hypocriefe. The faithfull (I say) being admonished by such examples of their diseases, do therby profit to humility, that being vnclad of the wrongfull confidence of the flesh, they may retor to the grace of God.
And where they are once come to his grace, they feel the presence of Gods strenght, wherein is abundantly sufficient succour for them.

3 And this is it that Paul teacheth, that by troubles is engendred patience, by patience prooefe. For whereas God hath promised the faithfull that he will be present with them in troubles, they feele the same to be true, when they stand patiently being vpholder by his hand, which by their own streth they were not able to do. Patience therefore bringeth a profe by experience to the holy ones, that God when neede requireth, will in deed performe the help he hath promisid. And thereby also their hope is confirmed: for as much as it were too much vnhankfulnesse not to looke for in time to come, the same truth of God that they had already by experience proued to be constant and sure. We see nowe how many good things do come vnto us in one knott by the crosse. For, ouerthrowing the opinion that we falsly presume
4 The Lord hath also an other end of afflicting his, to trie their patience, and instruct vs to obedience. Not that they can vse any obedience towards him, other than the same that he giueth them: but so it pleaseth him by open examples to make approved by witnesse, and to set forth the graces that he hath bestowed vpon his holy ones, that they should not lie idly hid within them. And therefore in bringing forth into open shew his strength of suffrance and constancie, wherewith he hath furnished his seruants, it is saide that he trieth their patience. And from hence came these sayings: that God tempted Abraham, & had proofe of his godlineffe, by this that he refused not to offer vp in sacrifice his own & only sonne. Therefore Peter teacheth, that our faith is so proued in troubles, as gold is tried in a fornace: And who can say that it is not expedient, that the moste noble gift of patience, which a faithful man hath received of his God, shoulde be brought forth into vs, that it may be made certainly knowne & manifet? For otherwisse men will not esteeme it as it is worthie. Now if God himself doth rightfully when he ministreth matter to stire vp the vertues that he hath giuen to his faithfull, that they should not lie hidden, yea lie vnprofitable & perifh: then is there good reason of the afflictions of the holy ones, without which their patience shoulde be nothing. I say also by the crosse they are instructed to obedience, becaufe they are so taught to flue not after their owne winde, but after the will of God. Truely if all things should flowe vnto them after their owne minde, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearseth that this was an olde Proverb, when they exhorted any man to suffer adversities, Follow God. By which they declared, that then only man truely entred vnder the yoke of God, when he yielded his hande and backe to Gods correction. Nowe if it be most righteous, that wee should shewe our selues in all things obedient to the heavenly father, then wee ought not to refuse, that he shoulde by all meanes accustome vs to yeeld obedience vnto him.

5 But yet we perceiue not howe necessarie this obedience is for vs, vnlesse wee do also consider, how wanton our flesh is to shake off the yoke of God,

God, so soone as it hath been but a little while decently and tenderly handled. The same happeneth unto it, that chanceeth to stubborn horses, which if they be a fewe dayes pampered idlyly, they cannot afterwarde for fearfulness be tamed, neither do knowe their rider, to whose government they somewhat before obeyed. And this is continual in vs that God complaineth to have bene in the people of Israel, that being well fed & covered with fames, we kick against him that fed & nourished vs. The liberalitie of God should in deed haste have allured vs to consider and loue his goodnesse, but forasmuch as our euel nature is such, that we are alway corrupted with his tender usage, it is more than necessarie for vs, to be restrained by some discipline, that we runne not outrightly into such a stubborn wantonnesse. So that we should not grow fierce with anunmeasurable abundance of riches, yet we should not waxe proud being lifted vp with honors, that wee should not become insolent, being puffed vp with other good gifts, either of the soule, bodie, or fortune. the Lord himselfe, as he foreseeth it to be expedient, pretentieth it, & with the remedie of the cross he subdueth & bridleth the fearfulness of our flesh, & that divers ways, so much as is healthful for every man. For all are not alike sick of one diseases, or do alike need of hard healing. And thereupon is to be scene how some are exercis'd with one kind of crosse, & some with another. But whereas the heavenly Philisian handeleth some more gently, & purgeth some with sharper remedies, when he meaneth to provide for the health of all: Yet he leaueth none free or untouched, because he knoweth all without exception to be diseased.

6 Moreover, the most merciful father needeth not onely to prevent our weaknesses, but many times to correct our passed offences. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, the remembrance of our forepassed life ought by and by to enter into our mind: so without doubt we shall finde that we haue done somewhat worthie of chastisement. Yet we ought not chiefly to ground our exhortation to patience vpon the acknowledging of sinne. For the Scripture miniftreth vs a farre better consideration, when it saith, that the Lord correcteth vs with adversitie, yet we shoul not bee damned with this world. Therefore we ought euen in the very sharpenes of tribulations to acknowledge the kindness & goodnes of our father toward vs, forasmuch as euen then hee correcteth not to further our saluation. For he doth affift, not to destroy or kill vs, but rather to deliver vs from the damnation of the world. That thought shall lead vs to that, which Scripture teacheth in another place: My sonne, refuse not the Lords correction, nor be wearie when thou shalt be rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loueth, he correcteth, & embraceth him as a father doth his child. When we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our duty to recewe our fathers obedient children and willing to learn, than with obstinacie to doe like desperate men, that are hardened with euel doings? The Lord leefeth vs, unless he call vs backe by correction when wee are fallen away from him: so that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues rightly sayeth that wee are bastards, and not children if wee be out of correction. Therefore wee are moste frowarde, if wee cannot suffer him when he declareth his good will and the care that he hath for our saluation. This the Scripture teacheth to be the difference betweene the the unbelievers and the faithful, that the unbelievers as the bondslaves of a rooted and hardned wickednes, are made the worse and more obstinate whipping: the faithful, like children having an honest freedome of nature, do thereby profit to repentance. Now must thou choose of whether number thou wilt be. But because I have spoken of this matter in another place, I am content to touch it briefly, and so will make an ende.

7 Moreover it is a singular comfort, when we suffer persecution for righteousness. For then we ought to thinke, how great an honor God vouchsaeth to grant vs, that he do garnisheth vs with y peculiar mark of his saintly. I mean that they suffer persecution for righteousness, not only that suffer for defense of the Gospel, but also that are troubled for any defense of righteousness. Whether therefore in maintaining the truth of God against the lies of Satan, or in taking in hande the defense of good men and innocents against the wronges of the wicked, we be druen to runne into the displeasure and hatred of the world, whereby our life or goods, or estimation may come in danger: let it not be grievous or loathsome vs to employ our selues for God, or let vs not thinke our selues miserable in these thinges in which he hath with his owne mouth pronounced vs blessed. Poverty in deed, if it be considered in itselfe, is miserable: like wise banishment, contemptuous estate, imprisonment, shame: Finally, death is the uttermost of all calamities. But when the favour of our God breatheth vpon vs, there is none of all these things, but it turneth to our felicity. Therefore let vs rather be content with the testimony of Christ, than with the false estimation of the flesh. So shall it come to passe, that we shall rejoice as the Apostles did, when God shall account vs worthy to suffer reproch for his name. For why? If we being innocent, and knowing our selues elect in our consciences, are by the naughty dealing of wicked men spoyled of our goods: we are in deede brought to poverty thereby among men, but so riches do truly growe vnto vs in heaven before God. If we be thrust out of our houses, we are the more inwardly received into the household of God. If we be vexed and disquieted, we take so much the deeper roots in Christ. If we be noted with reproches and shame, we are in somuch the more honorable place in the kingdom of God. If wee be slaine, so is the entrance made open for vs vnto blessed life. Let vs be ashamed to esteeme these thinges, vpon which the Lorde hath set so great a price, than shadowish and fickle enticing pleasures of present life.

8 Sith therefore the Scripture doth with these and like admonitions give sufficient comfort for the shame or calamities, that we suffer for defense of righteousness, we are too much vnthankfull if we do not gladly and cheerfully receive them at the Lords hand: specially sith this is the kind of crose, most properly belonging to the faithful, whereby Christ will be glorified in us. As also Peter teacheth. But it is more gracious to gentle natures to suffer shame than a hundred deaths: therefore Paul expressly admonisheth that we shall not only suffer persecutions, but also reproches, because we truft in the living God. As in another place he teacheth vs after his example to walke through slander and good report. Yet there is not required of vs such a cheerfulnesse as may take away all feeling of bitterness and sorrowe.
or else the patience of the holy ones in the cross were no patience, unless they should be both tormented with sorrow and vexed with grief. If there were no hardines in poverty, no paine in sickenes, no griefe in shame, no horror in death, what valianantes or temperance were it to beare them indifferently? But when every one of these doth with the natural bitternes thereof bite the hearts of vs all, herein doth the valiantnes of a faithfull man shewe it selfe, if being afullylaid with the feeling of such bitternes, how grievously souuer he be troubled with it, yet with valiantly resisting he overcommeth it, his patience vttreth it selfe herein, if being sharply provoked, hee is yet so bridled with yeare of God, that he burseth not out into any diysterem. His cheerfulnes appeareth herein, if being wounded with fadnes and sorrow, he resteth upon the spirituall comfort of God.

9 This conflict, which the faithful do sustaine against the naturall feeling of sorrow, while they study for patience and temperance, Paul hath very well described in these wordes. We are put to distresse in all things, but we are not made sorrowfull: we labour, but we are not left destitute: we suffer persecution, but we are not forsaken in it: we are thrown downe, but we perish not. You see how to bær the cross patiently, is not to be altogether astonishe and without all feeling of sorrow. As the Stoikes in olde time did foolishly describe a valiant harted man, to be such a one, as putting of all nature of ma, was a like moued in prosperiteit and in aduerfitie, in sorrowfull and joyfull state, yea such a one as like a stone was moued with nothing. And what haue they profited with this hie wisdomes? Forsooth they haue painted out such an image of wisdomes as never was found, and never can hereafter be among men: But rather while they contred to haue to exact and precise a patience, they haue taken away all the vse of patience out of mans life. And at this day also among christians there are new Stoiks, that reekit in a fault not only to grone and wepe, but also to be sad and carefull. But these strange conclusions doe commonly proceede from idle men, which busying themselues rather in speculation than doing, can do nothing but breed vs such new foul doctrine. But we haue nothing to do with that Stony Phylosophie, which our maister and Lord hath condemned not onely by his word but also by his example. For he mourned and wept both at his owene & other mens aduerfities. The word (sayth he) shall rejoyce, but you shall mourne & wepe. And because no man shoulde finde fault therewith, by his open proclamation, he hath pronounced them blessed that mourne. And no maruel. For if all weeping be blamed, what shall we judge of the Lord himselfe, out of whose body dropped bloody tears? If every feare be noted of insenlity, what shall we judge of that quaking feare, wherewith we read that he was not slenderly striken. If all fadnes be misliked, howe shall we like this, that he confesseth his soule to be sad euen to the death.

10 This I thought good to speake to this ende, to call godly minde from despeirc: that they should not therefore altogether forsake the study of patience, because they can not put of y natural affection of sorrow: which must needs happen to them, that make of patience a senselesse dulnes, and of a valiant and constant man, a stocke. For the Scripture giueth to the holy ones the praise of patience, when they are so troubled with hardnes of aduerfities, that that yet they be not overcome nor thrown downe with it: when they be so pricked with bitterness, that they be also delited with spirittuall joye: when they be so distressed with griefe, that yet they receiue courage againe being cheared with the comfort of God. Yet in the meane time that repugnancie abideth still in their heartes, that natural sense ofheueth and dreedeth those things that it knoweth to be against it: but the affection of godliness first attrauiledeth even through all those difficulties to the obeying of Gods will. This repugnancie the Lorde expresse when he sayde thus to Peter: When thou wast young thou didst gird thy selfe and didst walke whither thou wouldest: But when thou art old, an other shall gird thee and lead thee whither thou shalt not be willing. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time came that he must glorifie God by his death, was drawn unwillingly and resisting vnto it. Else his martyr dome should have but small prayse. But howsoever he did with greater cheerfulnesse of heart obey the ordinance of God, yet because he had not put of the nature of man, he was doubly tained with two sortes of wils. For when he did by himselfe consider the bloody death that he should suffer, being striken with horroure thereof, he would gladly have escaped it. On the other side, when it came in his minde, that he was called vnto it by the commandement of God, then conquering and trea- ding downe feare, he gladly, yea and cheerfully tooke it vpon him. This therefore we must endure if we will be the Disciples of Christ, that our minde be inwardly filled with so great a reverence and obedience to God, as may tame and subdue to his ordinaunce all contrary affections. So shall it come to passe, that with whatsoever kinde of crosse we be vexed, euen in the greatest anguishes of minde, we shall constantly kepe patience. For adversities shall haue their sharpnesse, wherewith we shalbe bitten: so when we are afflicted with sickenesse, we shall both grone and be disquieted & desire health: so being pressed with povertie, we shalbe pricked with the stinges of carefulnesse and sorow: so shall we be striken with griefe of shame, contempt and injury: so shall we yelde due teares to nature at the buriall of our friends: but this alway shalbe the conclusion, but the Lord willed so. Therefore let vs follow his wil. Yea euen in the midst of the prickings of sorrow, in the midst of mourning and teares, this thought must needs come betweene, to encline our heart to take cheerfully the very same things, by reason whereof it is so moved.

But forasmuch as we haue taken the chief cause of bearing the crosse, out of the consideration of the will of God, we must in fewe wordes define what difference is betwenee Philosophical and Christian patience. Truly very fewe of the Philosophers climbed to so hie a reason, to understand that the hand of God doth exercise vs by afflictions, & to thinke y God is in this behalfe to be obeyed. But they bring no other reason, but because we must so do of necessity. What is this else, but to say that thou must yeelde vnto God, because thou shalt travaile in vaine to wrastle against him? For if we obey God, only because we so must of necessity: then if we might escape, we would cease to obey. But the Scripture biddeth vs to consider a farre other thing in the will of God, that is to say, first inducse and equitie, then the care of our salvation. Thence therefore be the Christian exhortations to patience, whether poverty, or banishment, or imprisonment, or shame, or sickness, or loss of parents, or children, or any other like thing do grieve vs, we must thinke that none of these things doeth happen, but by the will and providence of God, and that he doth nothing but by most just order: For why? do not our innumerable & daily offences deserve to be chastised more sharply, and with more grievous correction, than such as the mercifull kindness of God layeth upon vs? Is it not most great equity, that our flesh be tamed, and as it were made acquainted with the yoke, that the do not wantonly growe wild as according to her nature? Is not the righteousness and truth of God worthy, that we should take paine for it? But if there appeare an undoubted righteousness in our afflictions, we can not without vnrighteousnes either murmur or wrestle against it. Wee heare not now that colde songe: Wee must give place, because we so much of necessitie, but we heare a lively lesson and full of effectualnes: We must obey, because it is vnlawfull to refist: we must suffer patiently, because impatience is a stubbornnes against righteousnes of God. But now, because that thing onely is worthy to be louted of, which we know to be to our safety and benefit, the good father doth this way also comforte vs, when he affirmeth that even in this that he afflicteth vs with the croffe, he provideth for our safety. But if it be certaine that troubles are healthfull for vs, why should wee not receive them with a thankfull and well pleased minde? Therefore in patiently suffering them, we doe not forceably yeld to necessitie, but quietly agree to our owne benefit. These thoughts (I say) do make that how much our minds are grieved in the croffe with natural feeling of bitterness, so much they are cheered with spiritual gladnes. Wherupon alio followeth thanksgiving, which can not be without joy. But if the prayse of the Lorde and thanksgiving proceedeth of nothing but of a cheerefull and joyfull heart, and there is nothing that ought to interrupt the same praying of God and thanksgiving in vs: hereby appeareth how necessary it is that the bitterness of the croffe be tempered with spiritual joye.

Of the meditation of the life to come.

But with whatsoever kinde of trouble we be distresed, we must alwaye looke to this ende, to vfe ourselues to the contempt of this present life, and thereby be stirr'd to the meditation of the life to come. For, because God knoweth well howe much wee be by nature enclin'd to the beastly louse of this world, he visiteth a most fitte meanes to drawe vs backe, and to shake off our sluggishnesse, that we should not steeke too fast in that louse. There is none of vs that deireth not to cease to aspire and endeavour all their life long to heavenly immortalitie. For we are ashamed to excell brutte beastes in nothing: whose state should be nothing inferior to ours, vnlesse there remaine to vs a hope of eternitie after death. But if you examine the deuises, studies and doinges of every man, you shall finde nothing therein but earth. Hereupon growth that senseleseness, that our minde beeing dañeled with vaine glittering of riches, power and and houours, is so dulled that it cannot see farre. Our heart, also being possesse led with covetousnesse, ambition and lust, is so weied downe, that it cannot rise vp higher. Finally all our soule entangled with inticements of the flesh seeketh her felicitie in earth. The Lord to remedie this euill, doeth with continuall examples of miseries teach this of the vanitie of this present life. Therefore they should not promise themselves in this life a sound and quiet peace, hee suffereth them to bee many times disquieted and troubled either with warres; or vpores, or robberies, or other injuries. That they should not with too much greediness, gape for fraile and transtorie riche, or rest in the riche, that they alreadie possesse, sometime with banishment, sometime with barrenness, of the earth, sometime with fire, sometime by other meanes hee bringeth them to pouertie, or at least holdeth them in measure. That they should not with too much caine take pleasure in the benefits of Mariage, he either make them to be vexed with the frowardnes of their wives, or plucketh them downe with ill children, or punisheth them with want of sustaue. But if in all these things he tenderly beateth with them, yet least they should either swell with foolish glory, or inmeasurably reioyce with vain confidence, he doeth by diseases & dangers set before their eyes, howe unstable, and vanishing be all the goods that are subject to mortalitie. Then onely therefore we rightly profit in the discipline of the crosse when we learne that this life, when it is considered in itself, is vnquiet, troublesome and innumerable ways miserable, and in no point fully blessed; and that all those that are reckened the good things thereof are uncertaine, sicker, vaine, and corrupted with manie euils mixed with them. And hereupon we doe determine, that here is nothing to be fought or hoped for but strife: and that when we thinke of our crowne, then we must lift vp our eyes to heauen. For thus we must beleue, that our minde is never truly raised to the desire and meditation of the life to come, vnlesse it haue first conceived a contemp of this present life.

2. For betweene these two there is no meane, the earth must euther become vile in our sight, or holde vs bounde with intemperate loue of it. Therefore if we haue any care of eternitie, we must diligently endeavour to loose our selues from these fetters. Now because this present life hath many flattering pleasures wherewith to allure vs, a great shew of pleasure, grace and sweetnesse, wherewith to delight vs: it is much behouefull for vs to be nowe and then called away, that we bee not bewitched with such allurements. For what, I pray you, would be done if we did here enjoy a continual concourse of good things and felicitie, lest we cannot with continuall purres of euils be sufficiently awaked to consider the miserie thereof? Notonly the learned doe know, but also the common people haue no Proverbe more commonly than this, that mans life is like a fume or shadow: and because they faue it to be a thing verie profitable to be known, they haue set it out with manie notable sentences. But there is nothing that wee doe either more negligently consider, or lesse remember. For we goe about all things, as though we woulde frame to our selues an immortality in earth. If there be a corps carried to burials, or if wee walk among graves, then, because there is an image of death before our eyes, lgraunt we do merucene-

lously well discourse like Philosophers upon the vanity of this life. Albeit we do not continually, for many times at these things do nothing move us. But when it happeneth, our Philosophie lasteth but a while; which so soone as we turne our backes, vanisheth away, and leaueth no steppe at all of re membrance behind it: finally it passeth away as clapping of hands upon a stage at any pleasant sight. And we forgetting not only death, but also that we be subject to death, as though we had never heard any report thereof, fall to a careless assurance of earthly immortality. If any man in the meantime tell vs of the Proverb, that man is a creature of a dayes continuance, we grant it indeede: but so heedlesly, that still the thought of everlasting continuance resteth in our mind. Who therefore can desire, that it is a great profit to vs all, not onely to be admonished in words, but by all the examples of experience that may bee, to be convinced of the miserable estate of earthly life? forasmuch as even when wee are convinced, we fearfully cease to stande amazed with peruerse and foolish admiration of it, as though it contained the vertemouth ende of good things. But if it bee necessarie that God instructe vs, it is our duetie likewise on our behalfe to harken to him when hee calleth and awaketh our dulnesse, that despising the worlde wee may with all our harts endeavoure to the meditation of the life to come.

But let the faithfull accustome themselves to such a despising of present life, as may neither engender a hatred thereof, nor any vnthankfulness toward God. For this life, howsoever it is full of infinite miseries, is yet worthily reckoned among the not slender blessinges of God. Therefore if wee acknowledge no beneite of God in it, wee are guiltie of no small vnthankfulness toward God him selfe. But specially it ought to be to faithfull a testimonie of Gods good will, forasmuch as it is wholly directed to the furtherance of their salvation. For before that he openly deluer vnto vs the inheritance of eternal glory, his will is to shew him selfe a Father vnto vs by smaller examples: and therefore be ye benefits ye are daily bestowed vpon vs. Sith therefore this life feath vs to understand ye goodnes of God, shal we disdain it as though it had not a crum of goodnes in it? We must therefor put on this feeling & affection, to reckon it among ye gifts of goodnes ye are not to be refusèd. For though there waded testimonies of scripture, of which there are both many most cuitent, very nature it selfe doth exhort vs to giue thanks to the Lord, for that he hath brought vs into the light of it, he granteth vs the vie of it, that hee giueth vs all necessarie succours for the preservation of it. And this is a much greater reason, if we consider that we are in it after a certaine maner prepared to the glory of the heauenly kingdom. For so the Lorde hath ordeyned that they which in time to come shall bee crowned in heauen, must fight certaine battels in earth, that they should not triumphe, till they had overcome the hard adventures of the battell, and obtained the victorie. Then an other reason is, that wee doe by diuerse benefites beginne therein to taie the sweetness of Gods liberalitie, our hope and desire shoulde be whetted to long for the reueling thereof. When this is determined, that it is a gift of Gods clemencie, that we lye this earthly life, for which as we be bound vnto him, so we ought to be mindfull and thankfull: then wee shall in sic order come to consider the most miserable estate estate thereof, to this end that we may be delivered from too much greediness of it, whereunto as I have before saide, we are of our selves naturally inclined.

4. Nowe whatsoeuer is taken from the wrongesfull desire of this life, ought to be added to the desire of a better life. I graunt indeede that they thought truly, that thought it best not to bee borne, and the next, to die quickely. For what could they being destitute of the light of God and true religion, see therein but vnhappy and miserable? And they did not without reason, that mourned and wept at the birthes of their friends, and solemnly rejoysed at their burials, but they did it without profire, because, being without the right doctrine of faith, they did not see howe that may turne to good to the godlie, which is of it selfe neither blessed nor to be desired: and so they ended their judgement with desperation. Let this therefore bee the marke of the faithfull in judging of mortall life, that when they understand it to be of it selfe nothing but miserie, they may reforte wholy the more freshly and readily to the eternall life to come. When we come to this comparision, then this present life may not onely be safely neglected, but alio utterly despised and loathed in comparison of the other. For if heauen be our coutrie, what is the earth else but a place of banishment?
If the departing out of the worlde bee an entering into life, what is the world but a graue? to abide in it, what is it else but to bee drowned in death? If to be delivered from the bodie is to bee in perfect libertie, what is the bodie else but a prifon? If to enjoy the presence of God is the highest summe of feliciteit, is it not miserable to lack it? But til we be escaped out of this world, we wander abrod from the Lord. Therefore if the earthly life be compared with heauenly life, doubtles it ought to be despised & trodden vnnder foot. But it is never to bee hated, but in resepct that it holdeth vs in subjection to sinne, & yet this hatred is not properly to be laid vp ouer our life. But howsoeuer it be, yet we must bee so moued either with wearinesse or hatred of it, that desiring the ende of it, wee may bee also ready at the will of the Lord, to abide in it, so that our wearinesse may be farre from all grudding and impatience. For it is like a place in battell array, wherein the Lord hath placed vs, which we ought to keepe till he call vs away. Paul in deed lamenteth his state that he is holden bound in the bondes of the bodie longer than he wished, & figheth with fervent desire of his redemption: neuertheless to obey the commandeument of the Lorde, he proffesed himselfe ready to both, because he acknowledgest himselfe to owe this vnto God, to glorifie his name, ey-ther by death or life: and that it is in God to determine what is most expedient for his glorie. Therefore if we must live and die to the Lorde, let vs leave to his will the time of our life and death: but so that wee bee still serfuent in desire of death, and be continually occupied in meditation thereof, and despise this life in comparison of the immortalite to come, and wish to forsake it when it shall please the Lorde because of the bondage of sinne.

5 But this is monstruous, that instedee of that desire of death, many that boaste themselues to bee Christians, are so afraid of it, that they tremble at euery mention of it, as of a thing betokening vnluckily and vnhappy.

Truly
Truly it is no merueill, if natural sense in vs doe quake for feare when wee hear of the disloyling of vs. But this is in no wise tolerable, that there bee not in a Christian mans brede the light of godlinesse, that shoulde with greater comforte over come and suppreffe that feare, how great soever it bee. For if we consider that this vnstedfast, faultie, corruptible, fraile withering, and rotten tabernacle of our bodie, is therefore dissolued, that it may afterwardes be restored againe into a ftedfast, perfect, vncorruptible and hea-venly glorious: shall not faith compell vs seruently to desire that which nature feareth? If we consider that by death we are called home out of banishment, to inhabite our countrey, as a heavenly countrey, shall we obtaine no com- fort thereby? But there is nothing that desireth not to abide continually. I graunt, and therefore I affirme, that wee ought to looke vnto the immorta-litie to come, where wee may attaine a ftedfast state that no where appeareth in earth. For Paul doeth verie well teach, that the faithfull ought to go cheerfully to death: not because they would be vnclotted, but because they desire to be newly clothed. Shall brut beasts, yea and lifeles creatures, even stockes and stones, knowing their present vanitie, be earnestly bent to looking for the last day of the resurrection, that they may with the children of God be deliuered from vanitie, and shall wee that are enduaed with the light of wit, and above wit enlightened with the spirite of God, when it standeth vpon our being, not lift vp our minde beyond this rottennes of earth? But it pertaineth not to my present purpose, nor to this place, to speake against this peruerfion. And in the beginning I haue alreadie professed, that I would not here take vp me the large handling of common places. I would counsell such feareful minde to read Cyprians booke of mortalitie, vnlesse they were mee to be sent to the Phylofophers, that they may begin to be ashamed when they fee the contempt of death that those do shew. But this let vs holde for certainly determined, that no man hath well profited in Christ his schoole, but he that doeth joyfully looke for the day both of death and of the last resurrection. For both Paul desciibeth all the faithfull by this mark, and allo it is common in the scripture, to call vs thither as oft as it will set forth a ground of perfect gladnes. Rejoyce (faith the Lord) and lift vp your heads, for your redemption commeth neere at hande. Is it reasonable I pray you, that the thing which he willd to be done for great force to raise vp joy and cheerefulness in vs, should breed nothing but sorrow and discouragement? If it be so, why doe we still boast of him as of our schoole-master? Let vs therefore get a founder minde, and howsoever the blinde and senseless desire of the flesh do strive against it, let vs not doubt to wishe for the coming of the Lorde, not onely with wishing, but also with growing and fishing, as a thing most happie of all other. For he shall come a redeemer to vs, to drawe vs out of the infinit gulf of euils and miseries, and to lead vs into that blessed inheritance of his life and glorie.

6 This is certainly true: all the nation of the faithfull, so long as they dwel in earth, must be as sheep appointed to slaughter, that they may be fashioned like Christ their head. Therefore they were in most lamentable case, vnles they had their mind raised vp into heaven, & surmounted all that was in the world, and passed owr present face of things. Contrariwise when they haue that once lifted their heads above all earthly things, although they see the wealth and honors of the wicked flourishing, if they see them enjoying qui-er peace, if they see them proud in gorgiousnes & sumptuosities of all things, if they see them to flow in plentiful store of all delights, beside that if they be spoiled by their wickednesse, if they sustaine reprochfull dealings at their pride, if they be robbed by their countousnesse, if they be vexed by any other outrage of theirs; they will easily uphold themselves in such adulteries.
For that day shalbe before their eyes, when the Lord shall receive his faithful into the quiet of his kingdom, when he shal wipe al tears from their eyes, when he shal cloth them with the robe of glorie and gladness, when he shal feed them with the vnspakeable sweetnesse of his deinty, when he shal adnance them to the fellowship of his hie estate; finally when he shal vouchsaue to interparten his felicitie with them. But these wicked ones that haue flourished in the earth, he shal throw into extreme shame, he shal change their delights into tormentes, their laughing and mirth into weeping and gnashing of teeth, he shal disquiet their peace with terrible torment of conscience, he shal punish their deintiness with vnquenchable fire, & shal put their heads in subjection to those godly men, whose patience they have abused. For this is rightcountessesse (as Paul teitifieth) to give release to the miferable and to them that are vnjustly afflicted, and to render affliction to the wicked that doe afflict the godly, when the Lord Jesus shall be resealed from heauen. This truely is our onely comfort, which if it bee taken away, we muft of necesseitie either despire, or flatteringly delight our selves with the vaine confortes of the worlde to our owne destruction. For euen that Prophet confesseth, by his feet staggered, when he taried too long vpon considering the present prosperitie of the wicked, and that he could not otherwise stand stedfast, but when he entred into the sanctuarie of God, & bended his eyes to the last end of the godlie and the wicked. To conclude in one worde then onely the crosse of Christ triumpheth in the heartes of the faithful vpon the Devil, flesh, sinne, and the wicked, when our eyes are turned to the power of the resurrection.

The x. Chapter.
How we vve ought to vfe this present life, and the helpe thereof.

By such introductions the Scripture doeth also well informe vs what is ri-right vse of earthly benefits which is a thing not to be neglected in framing an order of life. For if we must lite we must also vse the necessarie helpe of life neither can we eschew euene those things that seeme rather to serue for delight than for necessarie. Therefore we must keepe a mea-true, we may vse them with a pure conscience, either for necessarie or for delight.
That measure the Lord appointeth by his word, when he teacheth that this life is to them that he his, a certaine iourney through a straunge countrey, by which they travell towards the kingdom of heauen. If we must but passe through the earth, doubtlesse we ought so farre to vse the good things of the earth, as they may rather further than hinder our iourney. Therefore Paul doeth not vuprofitably counsell vs to vse this world, as though we vse it not; and to buy possessions with such a minde as they vse to bee sulde. But because this place is slipperie, and so slope on both sides, that it quickly maketh vs to fall, let vs labour to fasten our foore there, where wee may stande safely. For there have beene some, that otherwaise were good and holy men, which when they sawe intemperance and ryt continuall, to range with unbridled lust, vnlesse it be sharply restrained, & were desirous to correct so great a mischief, they could find none other way, but suffered man to vfe the benefits of the earth, so farre as necessitie required. This was indeed a godly counsell, but they were to seuer. For (which is a yete perilous thing) they did put strighten bonds vpo consciences, than thofe wherewith they were bounde by the worde of God. And they expound necessitie, to absteine from all things which a man may be without. And so by their opinion, a man might scarceley take any more food than bread & water. And some bee yet more feuer: as it is red of Crates the Thesban, did throw his goods into the sea, because if they were not destroyed, he thought that he should bee destroyed by them. Many at this day, while they seeke a pretence whereby the intemperance of the flesh in vfe of outward things may be excused, and while they goe about to prepare a way for the flesh raging in wantonnesse, doe take that as a thing confessed, which I doe not graunt them, that this libertie is not to be restrayned with any limitation of measure, but that it is to be left to euery mans conscience to vfe as much as he seeth to be lawfull for him. Truely I confesse, that consciences neyther ought nor can in this pointe bee bounde by certaine and precise forms of lawes. But for as much as the Scripture teacheth general rules of lawes full vfe, wee must surely measure the vfe according to these rules.

2. Let this be a princible: that the vfe of Gods gifts is warueth not out of the way, when it is referred to that ende, whereunto the author himselfe hath created and appointed them for vs, for as much as hee hath created them for our good and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can keepe a righter way than hee that shall diligently looke vnto this ende. Nowe if wee consider to what ende hee hath created meates, wee shall finde that he meant to make provision not onely for necessitie, but also for delight and pleasure. So in apparell, beside necessitie hee appointed an other ende, which is comlineffe and honestie. In herbes, trees, and fruities, beside di-uerse profitable vses, there is also a pleasantnesse of sight, and sweetenesse of smell. For if this were not true, the Prophete woulde not recken among the benefits of God that wine maketh glad the heart of man, and that yole maketh his face to shine: the Scripture woulde not eather, to set forth his liberalitie, rehearse that hee hath giuen all such things to men. And the vete natural qualities of things doe sufficiently shewe, to what ende and howe farre wee may vfe them. Shall the Lorde haue set in floures to greate a beautie, as presented it se'fe to our eyes: shal he have giuen so great a sweetenesse of sauour as naturally floweth into our smelling: and shall it bee vnlawfull either for our eyes to take the vfe of that beautie, or for our smelling to se'fe that sweetenesse of sauour: what? Hath hee not so made difference of colours, that hee hath made some more acceptable than other? what? Hath hee not giuen to golde and siluer, to iuorie and marble, a speciall grace whereby they might be made more precious than other metalles or stones? Finally, hath hee not made many things commendable dable vnto vs without necessarie vse?

3 Therefore away with that vnnatural Philofophie, which in grunting vs of f creatures no vfe but of necessitie, not only doth niggardily bereauue vs of the lawfull vfe of Gods liberalitie, but also can not take place, vnlesse it firft haue spoiled man of all his fenses & made him a blocke. But on the other fide we muft with no leffe diligence provide a fay for the luft of the fleffe, which if it be not brought into order, ouerfloweth without measure: and it hath (as I have faid) defenders of it, which vnder pretence of allowed libertie do grant vnto it all things. Firft there is one bridle put in the mouth of it, if this be determined, that all things are created for vs to this ende, that wee should knowe the authour of them, and give him thankes for his tender kindnffe towards vs. Where is thy thankes giving, if thou fo glutonoufly fill thyfelfe with defaintie meates or with wine, that thou either bee made felfe, or vnfit to doe the dutyes of godlineffe and of thy calling?

Where is the reknowledging of God, if thy fleffe by too great abundance boyling in filthie luft, doth with her vnclennesse infect thy minde, if thou canft not fee any thing that is right or honett? In apparell, where is thankfulness to God, if with costly gorgeousfelle thereof we both fall in admiration of our felues and disdain other? If with the trimmiff and cleanlineffe of it, we prepare our felues to vnchaftitie? Where is the reknowledging of God, if our minde be fixed vpon the gainesffe of our apparell? For many so giue all their fenses to bodily delights, that the minde lieth overwhelmed. Many are so delited with marble, gold, and paintings, that they become as it were men made of marble, that they be as it were turned into metalles, and be like vnto painted images. The smell of the kitchen, or sweetenesse of favour doth dulche them, that they can smell nothing that is spiritual. And the fame is also to be seen in the ref. Therefore it is certaine that hereby the licenciousnesse of abufing is somewhat restrained, & that rule of Paul confirmed, that we be not too carefull of the fleffe, for the lustes thereof, to which if we grant too much, they boile out aboue measure and temper.

4 But there is no surer nor readier way than that which is made vs by the contempt of this prefent life, and the meditation of heavenly immortalitie. For therupon follow two rules: the one, that they which vfe this world, should be fo minded as though they vſed it not, they that mary wiuces, as though they did not mary: they by as though they did not bye, as Paul teacheth. The other, that they should learne as well to beare poverty, quietly and patientely, as abundance moderately. Hee that biddeth thee to vfe this world as though thou didst not vfe it, doth cut away not only the intenperance of gluttony in meate & drinke, too much deintenesse, sumptuous-nesse, pride, hautinesse, and niceneffe, in fare, building, & apparell, but also all care and affection that may either withdrawe thee or hinder thee from thinking of the heavenly life, or from studie to garnish thy foule. But this was long agoe truely said of Cato: there is great carennesse of trimming our body, and great carennesse of vertue. And it is an olde proverbe, that they which are much bufed in care of their body are commonly carenesse of their foule. Therefore, although the libertie of the faithful in outward things is not to be restrained to a certaine forme, yet truely it must be

1 Cor. 7.
Cap. 10. Of the manner how to receive

Subject to this law, to beare verie little with their owne affections, but contrariwise still call uppon them fulenes with continually bent minde, to cut off all theewe of superfluous plenties, much more to restraine riotous excesses, and to take diligent heed, that they do not of helpe make to them fulenes hinderances.

5 The other rule shalbe, that they that haue but small and slender riches, may learne to lack patienctly, that they be not carelesly mused with immeasurable desire of them: which patience they that kepe, haue not a little profited in the Lords schole: as he that hath not at least somewhat profitted in this behalfe, can scarcely have any thing whereby to prove himself the scholor of Christ. For besides this that the most part of other vices do accompany the desire of the earthly things, he that beareth pouertie impatiently, doth for the most part bewray the contrary diseafe in abundance. I mean hereby that he which wilbe ashamed of a poore cote, wilbe proude of a costly cote: he that will not be content with a hungerie supper, will be disquieted with desire of a daintier, & would alse incontinently abuse those deities if he had them: he that hardly & vnquietly beareth a private and base estate, wil not abstaine from pride if he clime to honours. Therefore let all them that haue an vnstained zeale of godliness endeavour to learne by the Apostles example, to be ful and hungry, to haue store and sufer want. The Scripture hath also a third rule, whereby it tempereth the use of earthly things, of which we haue spoken somewhat when we entreated of \( \text{I} \) precepts of charitie. For the Scripture declareth that all earthly things are so giuen vs by the bountifullnes of God, and appointed for our commodite, that they may be as thinges delivered vs to kepe, whereof wee must one daye yeald an account. We must therefore so dispose them, that this saying may continually found in our cares, yeald an account of thy bailiwick. Therefore withall let this also come in our mind, Who it is that asketh such an account, even he that hath so much commended abstinement, sobrietie, honest sparing, and modestie, and abhorrest riotous sumptuounes, pride, ostentation and vanitie, which alloweth no other disposing of goods, but such as is ioyned \( \text{v} \) charitie: which hath alreadie with his owne mouth condemned all those delectable thinges that do withdraw a mans mind from chastitie and cleanesse, or do dull his wit with darknesse.

6 Last of all, this is to be noted, that the Lord biddeth every one of vs in all the doings of his life, to haue an eye to his calling. He knoweth with how great vnquietnesse mans wit boileth, with how skipping lightneffe it is caried hither and thither, howe greedic his ambition is to holde diverse things at once. Therefore that all thinges should not be confounded with our folie and rashnesse, he hath appointed to euery man his duities in several kindes of life. And that no man rashly runne beyond his bonds, he hath named all such kindes of life, vocations. Therefore euery mans several kind of life is vnto him as it were his standing appointed him by GOD, that they should not all their life uncertainly wander about. And this division is so necessarie, that all our doings are measured thereby in his sight, and oftentimes contrarie to the judgement of mans reason & Philosophie. There is no acte accounted more noble, euens among the Philosophers, than for for a man to deliver his country from tyranny: but by the voice of God's judgement the private man is openly condemned that layeth hand on a tyrant. But I will not tarry upon rehearsing of examples. It is sufficient if we knowe that the calling of the Lord is in euery thing the beginning and foundation of well doing: to which he that doth not direct himselfe, shall never keepe a right way in his doinges. Hee may peraduenture sometime doe somewhat seeming worthy of prays: but what so euere that be in the sight of men, before the throne of God it shalbe rejected: moreouer there shalbe no convenient agreement in the partes of his life. Therefore our life shal then be best framed, when it shalbe directed to this marke: For then, no man caried with his owne rafhnes wil attempt more than his calling may beare, because he knoweth that it is not lawfull to passe beyond his boundes. He that shalbe a man of base estate, shall contentedly live a private life, least he sholde forsake the degree wherein God hath placed him. Againe this shalbe no small reliefe to cares, labours, greeces, and other burdens, when a man shal know that in all these things, God is his guid. The more willingly the magistrate will execute his office: the householder will binde himselfe to his dutie: euery man in his kind of life will beare and passe through the discommodities, cares, tediousnesse, and anguishes thereof: when they are persuaded that euery mans burden is layde vpon him by God. Hereupon also shal grow singular comfort, for as much as there shalbe no worke so filthy and vile, (if it be such a one as thou obey thy calling in it) but it shineth and is most precious in the sight of God.

The xi. Chapter.

Of the justification of Faith, and first of the definition of the name and of the thing.

I thinke I have already sufficiently declared before, howe there remaineth for men being accursed by the lawe one onely helpe to recover saluation: againe, what Faith is, and what benefites of God it bestoweth vpon man, and what frutes it bringeth forth in him. The summe of all was this, that Christ is giuen vs by the goodness of God, and conceiued and poiffed of vs by faith, by partaking of whom we receive principally two graces: the first, that being reconciled to God by his innocencie, we may nowe in steede of a judge haue a mercifull father in heauen: the second, that being sanctified by his Spirite, we may giue our selves to innocencie and purenesse of life. As for regeneration, which is the seconde grace, we haue already spoken of it as much as seemed to be sufficient. The maner of justification was therefore lesse touched, because it serued well for our purpose, first to understand both howe the Fayth by which alone we receive freely giuen righteousnesse by the mercie of God, is not idle from good works: and also what be the good works of the holy ones, whereupon part of this question entreateth. Therefore they are first to be throughly discouered, and so discouered that we must remember that this is the chiefes stay of vpholding religion, that we may be the more careful and heedful about it. For unless thou first knowe, in what state thou art with God, and what his judgement is of

is of thee: as thou hast no grounde to stablish thy salvation, so hast thou also none to raise thy reuerent feare toward God. But the necessity of this knowledge shall better appeare by knowledge it selue,

2 But that we stumble not at the first entrie, (which we should doe if we shoulde enter disputacion of a thing unkownen) let vs first declare what is meant by these speeches, Man to be iustified before God, To be iustified by faith or by works. He is sayde to be iustified afore God, that is pronounced by the iudgement of God both iust and accepted for his owne righteousnesse fake. For as wickednesse is abominable before God, so a sinner can not finde fauour in his eyes, in respect that he is a sinner, or so long as he is accounted such a one. Therefore wheresoeuer sinne is, there also appeareth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is iustified that is not accounted in place of a sinner but of a iust man, and by reason thereof he standeth fast before the iudgement seate of God when all sinners fell. As if an innocent be brought to be arained before the seat of a righteous iudge, when iudgement is gitten according to his innocencie, he is said to be iustified before y iudge: so he is iustified before God that being exempt out of the number of sinners hath God a witnesse and affirmere of his righteousness. Therefore after the same manner a man shalbe sayde to be iustified by works, in whose life there is founde such cleanesse and holinesse, as may deferue the testimo nie of righteousness before the throne of God: or he that with the vyrgetnessse of his works is able to answeres and satisfie Gods iudgement. Contrariwise he shalbe sayde to be iustified by faith that being excluded from the righteousnesses of works, doth by faith take hold of the righteousnesses of Christ: wherewith when he is clothed, he appeareth in the sight God, not as a sinner, but as righteous. So we simply expounde iustification to be an acceptation, whereby God receiueth vs into fauour taketh vs for righteous. And we say that the same consisteth in forgivenesse of sins, and imputation of the righteousness of Christ.

3 For confirmation hereof there are many and euident testimonies of Scripture. First it can not be denied, that this is the proper & most vfed signification of the word. But because it is too long to gather all the places and compare them together, it shalbe enough to put the readers in mind of the, for they may of themselues easely marke them. But I will bring forth some, where this iustification that we speake of is expressely entreated of by name. First where Luke sayeth that the people when they had hearde Christe did iustifie God. And where Christ pronounceth that wife dome is iustified by her children: he doth not meane there, that they doe give righteousness, which alway remaineth perfect with God, although all the worlde goe about to take it away from him: nor in this place also to make the doctrine of salvation righteous, which hath ever that of it selue. But both these speeches are as much in effect, as to give to God and his doctrine the praisse that they deserue. Againe when Christ reprocheth the Pharisees, that they iustifie themselves, he doth not meane that they obtaine righteousness by well doing, but doe vainegloriously secke for the fame of righteousness, whereof in deed they be voyde. They that are skilfull of the Hebrue tongue doe better understande the sene of this phrase: in which tongue they are not only called wicked doers, that are giltrie in their conscience of any wicked doing, but also they that come in danger of judgement of condemnation. For when Bersabe faith that shee and Solomon shalbe wicked doers, the doeth not therein, acknowledge any offence, but complaineth that she and her sonne shalbe put to shame, to be numbered among the reprobate and condemned. But by the procresse of the text it easilly appeareth, that the same word in Latin also, cannot otherwise be taken but by way of relation, and not to signifie any qualitie. But as concerning the matter that wee are now in hand with: where Paul faith, that the scripture did foresee, that God iustifieth the Gentiles by faith, what may a man understande thereby, but that God doeth impute righteousness by faith? Again, when he faith that God iustifieth the wicked man that is of the faith of Christ, what meaning can be thereof, but by the benefite of faith to deliver them from the damnation which their wicknednesse deserved? And yet he speaketh more plainly in the conclusion, when he cried out thus, Who shall accuse Gods elect? It is God that iustifieth, who shall condemn? It is Christ that died, yea that rofe againe, and nowe maketh intercession for vs. It is as much in effect as if he should say, Who shall accuse them whom God acquiteth? who shall condemn them whose patron Christ is and defendeth them? To iustifie therefore is nothing else, than to acquite him that was accused, from giltnesse as allowing his innocencie. Sith therefore God dooth iustifie vs by the intercession of Christ, he doeth acquite vs, not by allowance of our owne innocencie, but by imputation of righteousness, that wee may be counted for righteous in Christ, which are not righteous in our selves. So in the 13 Chapter of the Actes, in Paules sermon: by him is iustification of finnes preached vnto you, and every one that beleueth in him is iustified from all those thinges, from which you could not be iustified in the lawe of Moses. You see that after iustification of finnes, iustification is added in place of an exposition. You see plainly that it is taken for abolution, you see that it is taken away from the workes of the law, you see that it is the meer beneciall gift of Christ, you see that it is received by faith. Finally, you see that there is a satisfaction spoken of where he saith that wee are iustified from finnes by Christ. So when it is faide that the Publicke came iustified out of the Temple, we cannot say that he obtained righteousnes by any deseruing of workes. This therefore is faide, that after pardon of his finnes obtained, he was counted for righteous before God. He was therefore righteous, not by approving of workes, but by Gods free absolution. Wherefore Ambrose faith very well, that callyeth the confession of finnes a lawfull iustification.

4. But to leaue struing about the worde: If we looke vpon the thing it selfe, as it is described vnto vs, there shall remaine no more dout. For trulyly Paul doeth expresse iustification by the name of acceptation, when he faith (Ephes.1.5.) we are appointed vnto adoption by Christ, according to the good pleasure of God, vnto the praise of his glorious favoure, whereby he hath accounted vs acceptable or in favoure. For the fame is meant by it, y is faide in another place, that God doth freely iustifie. In the 4. Chapter to the Romans, he first callyeth it an imputation of righteousness, and sticketh not to say that it consistseth in forgivenessee of sinnes. That man (said he) is called of David a blessed man, to whom God accounteth or imputeth righteousnesse without workes, as it is written: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, &c. Truely he there doth entreat not of one part of justification, but of all justification wholly. And he testifieth that David in that place maketh a definition of justification, when he pronounceth that they are blessed to whom is given free forgivenessee of sinnes. Whereby appeareth this righteousness whereof he speaketh, is in comparison simply set as contrarie to giltiness. But for this purpose, that is the best place where he teacheth, that this is the summe of the meffage of the Gospel, that we should be reconciled to God: because it is his will to receiue vs into favour through Christ, in not imputing sinnes vs to vs. Let the readers diligently wee al the whole process of the text. For by and by after, where he addeth by way of exposition, that Christ which was without sinne was made sinne for vs, to expresse the manner of reconciliation, doubtlesse he meaneth nothing els by the word reconciling but justifying. And that which he sayeth in an other place, that we are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, couldn't stand together, vnlesse we be accounted righteous before God, in him, and without our felues.

5 But whereas Osander hath brought in, I wote not what monster of essentiaall righteousness, whereby, although his will was not to destroy free righteousness, yet he hath wrapped it within such a mist, as darkeneth godly mindes, and bereaeth them of the earnest feeling of the grace of Christ: therefore ere I passe further to other things, it is worth the Labour to confute this doting error. First this speculation is but of mere & hungrie curiositie. He doth in deede heape together many testimonies of Scripture, to prove that Christ is one with vs, & we one with him, which needeth no proofe: but because he keepeth not this bond of vnitie, he shaneth himselfe. But wee which hold that we are made all one with Christ by the power of his Spirit, may easie ly vnloke all his knottes. He had conceiued a certain thing very neere to the opinion of Manichees, to desire to convey the substance of God into men. Hereupon riseth an other invention of his that Adam was fashioned after the image of God, because even before the fall Christ was ordained father of the nature of man. But because I would be short, I will tarry upon the matter that I have preuently in hand. He saith that we are one with Christ. We grant. But we denye that the substance of Christ is mingled with ours. Moreover wee say, that this principle, that Christ is righteousnesse to vs, because he is an eternal God, the fountain of righteousness and the very selfe righteousness of God, is wrongfullly drawn to defend his deceits. The readers shal pardon mee, if I do now but touche these things that the order of teaching requireth to be differed into another place. But although he excuse himselfe from meaning nothing els by the name of essentiaall righteousness, but to refiit this opinion that we are accounted righteous for Christes sake: yet he plainly expresseth that he is not contented with that righteousness is purchased for vs by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, but faineth that we are substantially righteous in God, as well by substance as by qualitie poured into vs. For this is the reason why he so earnestly affirmeth, that that not onely Christ, but alsoc the father & the holy Ghost doe dwell in vs.
Which although I grant to be true, yet I say that he wrongfully writeth it.
For he should haue considered the manner of dwelling, that is, that the fa-ter & the holy Ghost are in Christ, & as the fulnesse of the Godhead dwelleth in him, so do we possesse whole God in him. Therefore all that he faith severally of the father & the holy Ghost, tendeth to no other ende but to draw the simple from Christ. And then he thrusteth in a mixture of substances, whereby God pouring himself into vs, doth make vs as it were a part of himself. For he recketh it almost a matter of nothing, that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghost, y we growe into one with Christ, & y he is our head & we his members, vnlesse his very substanc be mingled with vs.
But in the father & the holy ghost (as I haue said) he doth more openly be-way what he thinketh, euem this, that we be iustified not by the only grace of the Mediator, & that righteousness is not simply or perfectly offered vs in his person, but that we are made partakers of the righteousnes of God, when God is essentially made one with vs.

6. If he did say no more, but that Christ in iustifying vs, is by essentia-ll conioying made ours; and that not only he is our head, in that he is man, but also that the substanc of the divine nature is poured into vs: Hie should with lesse hurt feeede himselfe decently, & peraduenture so great a contem-thould not haue bene raisd for this doubting error. But sith this beginning is like a cuttle that with casting out of blacke and thicke bloud hideth her many eales, we must needes earnestly resift vnlesse wee wil wittingly & willingsly suffer that righteousness to be taken from vs, which onely bringeth vs to confidence to glory of iustification. For in all this discourse, the name of righteousnesse, and this worde iustifying, extendeth to two partes: that to be iustiified is not onely to be reconciled to God with free pardon, but also to bee made righteous, that righteousness is not a free imputation but a holines and vprightnesse, which the substanc of God remaining in vs doth breath into vs. Then he stoutly denieth, that Christ is our righteousness in respect that being a priest he did with satisfactorily purging sinnes appease his father towards vs, but in respect that he is eternall God and life. To prooue that first point, that God doeth iustifie not onely by forgiving but also by regenerating, he asketh whether God doth leaue them whome he doeth iustifie such as they were by nature, changing nothing of their vices.
The answere hereof is very easie: that as Christ cannot be torne in partes, so these two things which we together and jointly receiue in him, that is to say righteousness and sanctification, are inseparable. Therefore, whome-soever God receiueth into favour, he doeth also therewithall give them the spirite of adoption, by the power wherof he newly fashioned them af-after his image. But if the brightness of the sunne cannot be seuered from the heate thereof, shall we therefore say that the earth is warmed with the light, and enlightened with the heate? There is nothing more fit for this purpose, than this similitude, The sunne with his heate giveth life & fruit-fulnesse to the earth, with his beames he giveth light and brightness. Here is a mutuall and vnseparable conioying: yet reason forbiddeth to conuoy to the one that which is peculiar to the other. Like absurditie is in this

I 4 con-
confusion of two sortes of graces, that Osianader thrunfeeth in. For because God doth in deede renew them to the obferuing of righteousnesse whom he freely accounteth for righteous, therefore Osianader confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptance, and affirmeth that they be all one & the selfe same thing. But the Scripture joyning them both together, yet doth distinctly reckon them, that the manifole grace of God may the better appeare vnto vs. For that saying of Paul is not superfuous, that Christ was giuen vnto righteouſnes & sanctification. And whensoeuer he reasoneth to prove by the faluation purchased for vs by the fatherly love of God, & by the grace of Christ, we are called to holinesse & cleansenesse, hee plainly declareth that it is one thing to be iuſtified, and another to be made new creatures. But when Osianader commeth to the Scripture, he corrupteth as many places as he alleageth. Where Paul saith that faith is accounted for righteouſnesse to him that worketh not, but beleueth in him iuſtifieth the wicked man, he expoundeth it to make righteous. With like rashnesse, he depraueth all the fourth Chapter to the Romans, & sticketh not with like false colour to corrupt that place which I euen nowe alleged, Who shall accuse the elects of God? it is God that iuſtifieth: where it is plaine that he speaketh simply of giltnesse and acquiting, and the meaning of the Apostle hangeth vpon a comparing of contraries. Therefore Osianader is founde too fond a babbler, as well in that reaſon as in alleging the testimonies of Scripture. And no more rightly doeth he speake of the name of righteouſnesse, in saying that faith was accounted to Abraham for righteouſnesse, after that embracing Christ (which is the righteouſnesse of God and God him selfe) he excelled in singular vertues, whereby appareareth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteouſnesse that is there mentioned, pertaineth not to the whole course of his calling: but rather the holy Ghost testifieth, that although the vertues of Abraham were singularly excellent, and that with long continuance he at length had encreased them; yet he did no other way please God, but by this, that he received by faith the grace offered in the promis. Wherevpon followeth, that in iuſtification there is no place for works, as Paul very well affirmeth.

7 As for this that Osianader obiecteth, that the power of iuſtifying is not in faith of it selfe, but in respect that it receiwer Christ, I willingly grant it. For if faith did iuſtifie of it selfe, or by inwarde force, as they call it and as it is alway feele and vperfect, it could not work iuſtification but in part. So should the iuſtification be maimed, that should giue vs but a piece of faluation. As for vs, we imagine no fuch thing, but in proper speaking do say that God onely iuſtifieth; and then we giue the same to Christ, because he was giuen vnto righteouſnesse; and faith we compare as it were to a vell. For except we came emptie with open mouth of our soule to craue the grace of Christ, we cannot be able to receive Christ. Wherevpon we gather that we do not take from Christ the power of iuſtifying, when wee teache that he is first receiued by faith, before that his righteouſnesse be receiued. But yet I doe not admit the crooked figures of this Sophister, when he sayeth that faith is Christ: as if an earthen pot were a treasure, because gold gold is hidden in it. For the reason is not vnlike, but that faith although it be by it sole of no worthinesse or price, may iustifie vs in bringing Chrifl, as a pot full of money maketh a man rich. Therefore I say that faith, which is only the instrument to receive righteousness, is vnfitly mingled with Chrift, which is the material cause and both author and minifter of so great a benefit. Now is this doubt also dissolved. How this worde Faith ought to be underftood when we entreate of iustification.

8 In the receiuing of Chrifl he goeth further: for he sayeth, that the inwarde worde is receiued by the ministration of the outwarde worde, therefore to drawe vs from the priefhooode of Chrifl and the perfon of the Mediator to his outwarde Godhead. As for vs, we deuide not Chrifl, but wee say that he is the fame eternall worde of God, which reconciling vs to God in his flesh, gaue vs righteousness: and we confefs that otherwise he could not have fulfilled the office of Mediator, and purchafed vs righteousness, vnlesfe he had beene eternall God. But this is Osanders doctrine, where as Chrifl is both God and man, that he was made righteousness to vs, in respect of his nature of Godhead, and not of manhooде. But if this properly belong to the Godhead, then it shall not be peculiari Chrifl, but common with the father and the holy Ghost, for as much as there is not one righteousness of the one, and an other of the other. Moreover that which was naturally from eternitie, could not be conveniently fayde to be made to vs. But although we graunt this, that God was made righteousness for vs: how shall it agree that that which is fet between, is made of GOD? Truly that properly belongeth to the perfon of the Mediator: which though he containe in himselfe the nature of Godhead, yet here he is specially signified by his proper title, by which he is feterally discerned from the father and the holy Ghost. But he foolifhly triumpheth in that one worde of Hieremie, where he promiseth that the Lorde Iehoua fhall be our righteousness, but out of that hee fhall gather nothing, but that Chrifl which is righteousness, is God openly fhewed in the fleshe. In an other place wee haue reheard out of Pauls fermo, that GOD purchased to himselfe the Church with his bloude, if any man gather thereupon, that the bloud wherewith finnes were purged was divine, and of the nature of Godhead, who can abide fo foule an error? But Osander thinketh that with this fo childish he caulliation he hath gotten all thinges, he swellethe, he lepeth for joy, and stuffeth many leaues full with his bigge worde: when yet there is a plaine and ready solution for it in safying that the worde Iehoua in deede when he is made the iffue of David fhall be the righteousness of the godly: But Efaie teacheth in what fens, saying: My liarfent man shall with knowledge of himselfe iustifie many. Lette vs note that the father speaketh: that he giueth to the fonne the office of iustifying: he addeth a caufe, for that he is iuft, and fetteth the manner or meane as they call it in the doctrine whereby Chrifl is knowne. For it is a more commodious exposition to take this worde Daath knowledge paffively. Hereupon I gather firfte that Chrifl was made righteousness when he did put on the forme of a fentiant; secondely that he did iustifie vs in respect that hee fhowed himselfe obedient to his father: and that therefore he doeth not this for vs according to his nature of Godhead, but according to the office of dispensation committed unto him. For although God alone is the fountaine of righteousness, and we be made righteous by no other means but by the partaking of him: yet because we are by unhappy disagreement estranged from his righteousness, we must needs come downe to this lower remedy, that Christ may justifie vs with the force of his death and resurrection.

9 If the obiect that this is a worke of such excellencie, that it is about the nature of man, and therefore can not be ascribed but to the nature of God, the first I grant: but in the second I say that he is unwise folly deceived. For although Christ could neither cleanse our soules with his blood, nor appease his father with his sacrifice, nor acquite vs from giltnesse, nor do the office of a priest, unless he had beene true God, because the strength of the flesh had beene too weake for so great a burden: yet it is certaine that he performed all these things according to his nature of manhood: For if it be demanded howe we be justified, Paul answrth, by obedience of Christ. But did he any otherwise obey than by taking upon him the shape of a feruant? whereupon we gather that righteousness was given vs in his flesh. Likewise in the other wordes (which I maruell that Ofander is not ashamed to allege so often) he appointeth the fountaine of righteousness no where els but in the flesh of Christ. Him that knewe we sinne he made sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousness of God in him. Ofander with full mouth aduanceth the righteousnes of God, and triumpheth as though he had proved that it is his imaginative Ghost of essentiall righteousness: when the wordes founde farre otherwise, that we be righteous by the cleansing made by Christ. Very young beginners should not haue bee ignorant that the righteousness of God is taken for the righteousness that God alloweth, as in John, where the glorie of God is compared with the glorie of men. I knowe that sometime it is called the righteousness of God, whereof God is the author and which God gueth vs: but though I say nothing, the readers that haue their found wit do perceiue that nothing els is meant in this place but that we stand vp-right before the judgment seate of God, being vpholden by the cleansing sacrifice of Christes death. And there is not so great importance in the worde, so that Ofander do agree with vs in this point that we are justified in Christ, in this respect that he was made a propiciatory sacrifice for vs, which can not agree with his nature of Godhead. After which forre, when Christes meaneth to scale the righteousness and saluation that he hath brought vs, he fargeth before vs an allured pledge thereof in his flesh. Hee doeth in deede call himselfe the lucy bread, but expressing the manner here, he addeth that his flesh is verily meate, and his bloud is verily drinke. Which maner of teaching is seene in the sacramentes, which although they directe our faith to whole Christ, and not to halfe Christ, yet they do there with all teach that the matter of righteousness and saluation remaineth in his flesh: Not in that that hee is onely man, hee either justifieth or quickneth of himselfe, but because it pleased GOD to shewe openly in the mediatour that which was hidden and incomprehensible in himselfe. Whereupon I am wont to say, that Christ is as it were a fountaine set open for vs, out of which we may drawe that which otherwise should without fruite lie hidden in that close and deepspring that rieth vp vnto vs in the perfom of the mediators. In this manner and meaning, I doe not denye that Christ as he is God and man doth iustifie vs, and that this is also the worke of the father and the holy Ghost as well as his. Finally, that the righteousnesse whereof Christ maketh vs partakers, in the eternall righteousnesse of the eternall God, so that he yelde to the fue and plaine reasons that I haue alleged.

Nowe that he shoulde not with his caullations deliue the vnskilful, I graunthe that we want this incomparabile beneffe, till Christ bee made ours. Therefore wee set that conioyning of the head and the members, the dwelling of Christ in our hearts, and that mystical vnion, in the hieft degree: that Christ being made ours, may make vs partakers of the gifts wherewith he is endowed. Therefore wee doe not beholde him a farre off out of our felues, that righteousnes may be imputed vnto vs, but because wee haue put on him, & are graffed into his body: finally because he hath vouchsaufed to make vs one with him, therefore we glorye that we haue a fellowship of righteousnesse with him. So is Osianders flaunorous caullation confuted, where he saith that we count faith righteousnesse, as though wee spoiled Christ of his right, when we saye that we come by faith emptie to him, to giue roume to his grace, that he onely may fill vs. But Osiander refusing this spirituall conioyning, enforce a groffe mingling with the faithfull, and therefore he odiously calleth all them Zuinglians that subscribe not to his fantasticall errors, concerning essentiall righteousnes; because they do not thinke that Christ is substantially eaten in the Lordes supper. As for me, I count it a great gnicie to bee reproached of a proude man and giuen to his owne errors. Albeit he touched not me onely, but also other writers well known to the world, whom he ought to have modestly reverenced. It mooeneth me nothing, which meddle not with mine owne private cause: & so much the more sincerely I handle this cause, being free from all corrupt affection. Where as therefore he so importunateley requireth essentiall righteousnes, and the essentiall dwelling of Christ in vs, it tendeth to this end: First yt God shoulde with a groffe mixture pourre himselfe into vs, as he faineth a freshely eating of Christ in the supper: secondly that God should breath his righteousnesse into vs, whereby we may be really righteons with him: for by his opinion, this righteousnesse is as well God himselfe, as the goodness or holinesse, or presence of God. I will not spende much labour in wiping away the testimonies that he bringeth, which he wrongfully wresteth from the heauenly life to this present state. Through Christ (Faith Peter) are giuen vs yt precious and most great promises, that we should be made partakers of the nature of God: As though we were nowe such as the Gospel promised that we shall be at the last conning of Christ: yea John telleth vs, that we shall then see God as he is, because we shalbe like vnto him. Onely I thought good to giue a small tast to the readers, that I doe of purpose passe over these trifles: not for that it is hard to confute them, but because I will not be tedious in a superfluous worke.

But in the seconde point lurketh more poison, where he teacheth yt we are righteous together with God. I think I have already sufficiently proued, that that although this doctrine were not so pestilent, yet because it is colde and fruitelesse, and of itself so vaine that it melteth away, it ought worthlie to bee vnfaourie to sounde and godly Readers. But this is an untollerable wickednesse, vnder pretence of double righteousnesse, to enfeele the earnest assurance of saluation, and to care vs aboue the cloudes, that we shoule not embrace by faith the grace of propiciatio, & call vpon God with quieter mindes. Osiander scorneth them, that teach that this worde luftifying is a lawe terme: because, we must bee righteous indeede. And he abhorreth nothing more than to say, that we be luftified by free imputation. But, if God do not luftifie vs by acquiting and pardoning, what meaneth that saying of Paul, God was in Christ reconciling the worlde to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinnes? For, him that had done no sinne, he made sinne for vs, that hee might bee the righteousness of God in him. First I winne thus much, that they be judged righteous that be reconciled to God. The maner howe is declared, for that God luftifieth by forgiving: as in another place luftification is set as contrarie to accusation, which comparing of the as contraries, dooth clearly shew that it is a phrase borrowed from the vfe of the lawe. And there is no man being but meanely practised in the Hebrew tongue, if hee haue a sober braine, that is ignorant that this phrase came from thence, and whereunto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Nowe where Paul faith that Daviud des cribed the righteousness without workses, in these wordes, Blessed are those whose sinnes are forgiven: Let Osiander aunfrewe me whether this be a full definition or but halfe a one. Truly Paul bringeth not in the Prophete for a witnesse, as though he taught that forgiveness of sinnes is but a part of righteousnesse, or a thing that ioyneth with other to the luftifying of man: But he includeth whole righteousness in free forgiveness, pronouncing the man blessed, whose sinnes are couered, to whom God hath forgiven iniquities, and to whom hee imputeth no trangressions. He doth measure and judge such a mans felicitie therby, because hee is not this way righteous indeed, but by imputation. Osiander taketh exception and faith, that this shoule bee slanderous to God, and contrarie to his nature, if hee shoulde luftifie them that indeed remaine still wicked. But wee must remember, as I haue already faide, that the grace of luftifying is not feared fro regeneracion although they be feuerall things. But because it is more than sufficiently knowne by experience, that there abide always in the righteous some remnantes of sinne, it must needes bee that they be farre otherwise justified than they bee reformed into newenes of life. For this latter point of reformation, God do beginneth in his elect, and throughout the whole course of their life, by little and little, & sometime slowly proceedeth in it, that they be alwaye before his seate in danger of judgement of death. But he luftifieth them not by partemae, but so that they may freely, as clothed with the purenesse of Christ, appeare in heauen. For no portion of righteousness could appease our conscienties, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with vs, because wee bee righteous in his sight without exception. Whereupon followeth, that the doctrine of justification is misturned, yea overturned from the verie foundation, when doubts is cast into mens mindes, when the affiance of saluation is shaken, when when the free and freezedeke inuocation is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquilitie with spirituall joy is not established. Whereupon Paul gathereth an argument by contrarys, to prove, that the inheritance is not by the lawe. For by this meanes faith shoulde be made voyde, which if it haue respect to workes, is ouerthrown, because none of the most holy shall therein finde whereupon to trust. This difference of justifying and regenerating (which two thinges Ofander confounding together, calleth two sortes of righteoufnesse) is very well expresssed by Paul: For speaking of his reall righteoufnes in deed, or of the vprightnes wherewith he was endued (which Ofander nameth essentiaall righteoufnes) he lamentably cryeth out: Wretch that I am: who shall deliever me fro the body of this death? But fleeing to the righteoufnes which is grounded vpon the onely mercy of God, he gloriously triumpheth ouer both life, death, reproches, hunger, sword, and all aduersities. Who shall accuse the electes of God whom he justifieth? For I am Rom. 8.33. purely perswaded, that nothing shal feuer vs from his loue in Christ. He plainly publisseth, that he hath the righteoufnesse which alone fully sufficeth to salvation before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knowing to be in himself, did a little before beware his estate, may not minishe nor any way hinder his boldnes to glory. This diversitie is sufficiently known, & so familiar to all the holy ones, that grone vnder the burden of iniquities, and yet with victorious confidence, do mount vp aboue all feares. As for this that Ofander obiecseth, that it disagreeeth with the nature of God, it calleth vpon himselfe. For although he clotheth the holy ones with a double righteoufnes as it were with a furred garment, yet he is compelled to confesse, without forgiveneffe of finnes they never pleased God. If that be true, then at least let him graunt, that they which are not righteous in deed, are accounted righteous according to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But how farre shall a sinner extende this free acceptation that is put in place of righteoufnes? shall he measure it by a pound or by the ounce? Truly he shall hang doutfull and waetering to this side and that side, because he may not take vnto him so much righteoufnesse as shalbe necessarie to stablish confidence. It is happy that he that would binde God to a lawe, is not judge of this caufe. But this shall stande fledfast, that thou mayest be justifiied in thy sayinges and over come when thou art judged. But how great presumption is it to condemn the chiefe judge when he freely acquitte, that this aunfwere are may not be in force, I will haue mercy vpon whom I wil haue mercy. And yet the intercession of Mofes which God did put to silence with this sayinge, tended not to this ende that he should passe none, but that hee should acquitte altogether, taking away their condemnation although they were guilty of offense. And we do say that they which were losse haue their finnes buried and so are justifiied before God: because, as God hatches sin, so he can loue none but them whom he justifieth. But this is a meruelous manner of justifying, that they being covered with the righteoufnesse of Christ stande not in feare of the judgement which they haue deferred, and when they worthy condemne themselves are accounted righteous without themselves.

12 But the readers are to be warned, that they take good heed to the
mysterie which he braggeth that he will not hide from them. For after that he hath long and largely travailed to prove that we doe not obtaine favour with God by the only imputation of the righteousnesse of Christ, because this should be impossible for him to count them for righteous that are not righteous, (I vfe his owne words) at length hee concludeth that Christ was giuen vs vnto righteousnesse, not in respect of his nature of manhood but of his nature of Godhead: and that although this righteousnesse can not be founde but in the perfon of the Mediatour, yet it is the righteousnesse not of man but of God, he doth nowe binde vp his rope made of two righteousneses, but he plainly taketh away the office of justifying from Christes nature of manhood. But it is good to see how he disagreeeth. It is layde in the same place, that Christ was made vnto wisedome, which belongeth to none but to the eternall worde. Therefore Christ in that he is man is not wisedome. I answere that the onely begotten sonne of God was in deede his eternall wisedome, but in Paules wryttings that name is giuen him in diverse wise, because all the treasures of wisedome and knowledge are layde vp in him. That therefore which he had with his father, he disclosed vnto vs: and so that which Paul saith is not referred vnto the essence of the sonne of God, but to our vfe, and is rightly applied to Christes nature of manhood: because although he shined a light in darkenes, before that he did put on flesh, yet it was a hidden light til the same Christ came forth in the nature of man, the shining sonne of righteousnesse, which therefore calleth himselfe the light of the worlde. Also it is foolishly objected of him, that the power of justifying is farre aboue both Angels and men: forasmuch as this hangeth not vpon the worthinesse of any creature, but vpon the ordinance of God. If Angels will take vpon them to satisfie God, they can nothing preuaile, because they are not appointed thereunto. But this singularly belonged to Christ being man, which was made subject to the law, to redeem vs from the curse of the lawe. Also he doth slanderously cauill, that they which denie that Christ is our righteousnesse according to his nature of Godhead, doe leaue but one part of Christ, and (which is worse) do make two gods, because although they confesse, that God dwelleth in vs, yet they say again that we are not righteous by the righteousnes of God. For although we call Christ the author of life, in respect that he suffered death to destroy him that had the power of death, we do not by & by take away his honor from whole Christ as he was openly shewed God in his flesh, but we only make a distinction how the righteousnes of God is conuerted vnto vs, that we may enjoy it. In which point Ofiander hath too fowly errored. Neither do we deny that that which is openly giuen vs in Christ, proceedeth from the secret grace & power of God: and we strive not against this, that the righteousness which Christ giueth vs is the righteousness of God that proceedeth from God: but we holde this steadfastly, that we have righteousnesse and life in the death & resurrection of Christ. I overspaie that heaping together of places whereof he may wel be afamed, wherewith he hath tediousely combred the readers without choice and without common reason, to prove that whereasuer is made mention of righteousneses, there ought to be understood this essentiaall righteousness. As where David calleth vpon the righteousnes of God to helpe him: whereas hee doeth in name above a hundred times, Osiander sticketh not to corrupt so many sentences. And nothing stronger is the other objection, y that is properly and rightly called righteousness, whereby we be moued to do rightly, but that God onely worketh in us both to will and to performe. For we doe also not deny, but that God reformeth vs with his spirit unto holinesse of life and righteousness: but we must first see whether hee doe this by him selfe & immediately, or by the hand of his sonne, with whom he hath left all fulnesse of his holy spirit, that with his abundant store he should supply the neede of his members. Moreover although righteousness come vs out of the secrete fountain of the godhead, yet it followeth not that Christ which sanctified him selfe in the flesh for our sakes, was righteousness vs to vs according to his nature of godhead. No lefe fondes is y which he faith, that Christ him selfe was righteous by the righteousness of God. Because vnlesse the will of his father had moued him, he could not himselfe have satisfied the office committed vs to him. For though we have in another place saide, that all the deseruinges of Christ himselfe do proceede from the mere good will of God, yet that maketh nothing to that fantastical thing, wherwith Osiander bewitcheth both his owne & simple mens eyes. For who would suffer a man to gather this conclusion, y because God is the fountain & beginning of our righteousness, therefore we be essentially righteous, and y essence of God's righteousness dwelleth in vs? In redeeming y Church(faith Esay) God did put on his righteousness as a harnesse: but did hee so to spoile Christ of his armure which he had given him, to make him to be no perfect redeemer? But the Prophet meant nothing else but that God borrowed nothing out of himselfe, nor was holpen by any aide to redeeme vs. Which thing Paul briefly expressed in other wordes, saying that he gaue vs salvation to the shewing of his righteousnes. But this doth not ouerthrow y which he teacheth in another place, that we are righteous by the obedience of one man. Finally whocoeuer wrapperth vp a double righteousness, that poore soules may not rest in the mere only mercie of God, he doth in a mockerie crowne Christ with thornes.

13 But for as much as a great part of men, imagineth righteousness to bee made of faith and workes, let vs first shewe this also, that the righteousnes of faith and workes do fo differ, that when the one is stablighed, the other must needs be ouerthrown. The Apostile faith that hee esteemed all things as dong, that he might winne Christ and finde in him the righteousnes that is of God by faith, counting not his righteousness that which is by the lawe, but that which is by the faith of Jesus Christ. You see that here is also a comparison of contraries and y here is declared that he which will obteine the righteousnes of Christ, must for sake his owne righteousness. Therefore in another place he saith, y this was the cause of fal to the Jewes y going about to establish their owne righteousnes, they were not subject to the righteousness of God. If in establishing our owne righteousnes we shawe away the righteousnes of God, therfore to obteine Gods righteousness our owne must bee vitterly abolisshed. And hee sheweth the same thing, when he faith, that our glorying is not excluded by the lawe, but by faith. Wherevpon followeth that so long as there remaineth any righteousness of of workes, howe little souer it be, there still remaineth to vs some matter to glorie vpon. Nowe if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteousnesse of workes can no wise be coupled with the righteousnesse of faith. To this effect he speakeoth so plainly in the fourth Chapter to the Romaines, that he leaueth no roume for caullations or shifte: If (faith he) Abraham was justified by workes, he hath glorie. And immediately he addeth: but hee hath no glorie in the sight of God. It followeth therefore that he was not justified by workes. Then he bringeth an other argument by contraries, when reward is rendered to workes, that is done of debt and not of grace. Therefore it is not of the defertiunges of workes. Wherefore farewell their dreame, that imagine a righteousnesse made of faith and workes mingled togethe.

14 The Sophisters thinke that they have a subtle shifte, that make to themselves sport and pastime with wresting of Scripture and with vaine caullations. For they expounde workes in that place to bee thefe which men not yet regenerate doe onely literally and by the endeouer of free wil with out the grace of Christ: and doe fay that it belongeth not to spiritual works. So by their opinion a man is justifie both by faith and by workes. So that the workes be not his owne, but the gifts of Christ and fruities of regeneration. For they fay that Paul fpake fo for none other caufe, but to conuince the lewes, trusting vpon their owne workes, that they did foolishly presume to claime righteousnesse to themselves, fith the onely spirit of Christ doeth giue it vs, and not any iudgement by our owne motion of nature. But they do not marke that in the comparison of the righteousnesse of the law & the righteousnesse of the Gospel, which Paul bringeth in in another place, all workes are excluded with what title souer they be adorned. For hee teacheth that this is the righteousnesse of the lawe, that hee shoule obteine falueation that hath performed that which the lawe commandeth: and that this is the righteousnesse of faith, if wee beleue that Christ died and is risen againe. Moreover wee shal hereafter shew in plaice fit for it, that fannification and righteousnesse are feuerall benefites of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the vere spiritual workes come not into the account, when the power of juftifying is ascrib’d to faith. And where Paul denieth (as I euen nowe alleaged) that Abraham had any thing whereupon to glorie before God, because he was not made righteons by workes; this ought not to be restrained to the literall and outwarde kinde of verties, or to the endeouer of free will. But although the life of the patriarch Abraham were spiritual and in maner Angellike, yet hee had not sufficient defertiunges of workes to purchase him righteousnes before God.

15 The Schollermen teach a little more grolfsly that mingle their preparaotions: but these doe lesse infect the simple and vnskillfull with corrupt doctrine, under pretence of Spiritue and grace hiding the merie of GOD which onely is able to appeafe trembling confciences. But we confesse with Paul that the doers of the lawe are justified before God: but because we are all farre from the keeping of the lawe, hereupon wee gather, that the works which should most of all have auailed to righteousnesse, doe nothing help vs because wee lacke them. As for the common Papiftes or Schollermen, they are are in this point doubly deceived: both because they call faith an assured ness of conscience in looking for rewarde at the hande of God for destrctions, and also because they expounde the grace of God not to be a free imputation of righteounes, but the holy gohte helping to the endeouer of ho-lineffe. They read in the Apostle that he which commeth to God, must first belieue there is a God, & then that he is a render of rewarde to them that seeke him. But they marke not, what is the maner of seeking. And that they are deceived in the name of grace, is plainly prooued by their owne writings. For Lombard expoundeth, that iustification by Christ is giuen vs two waies. First (faith he) the death of Christ doth iustifie vs, when by it charitie is stirred vp in our hearts, by which we are made righteous. Secondly that by the same death sinne is destroyed, whereby Satan helde vs captiue, so y now he hath not whereby to condemn vs. You see how he considereth the grace of God principally in iustification, to be so farre as we are directed to good worke by the grace of the holy Ghost. He would fortooth haue followed the opinion of Augustine: but he followeth him a farre off, & goeth farre out of the way from rightly following him: because if Augustine haue spoken any thing plainly he darkeneth it, if there be any thing in Augustine not very vnpure, he corrupeth it. The Schoolemen haue still strayed from worfe to worfe, til with headlong fall at length they be rolled downe into a Pelagian error. And the verie sentence of Augustine, or at least his manner of speaking is not altogether to be receiued. For though he singularly well taketh from man all proue of righteounes, and assignteth it whole to a grace of God, yet he referreth grace to sanctification, whereby we are renued in to newneffe of life by the holy Ghost.

16 But the Scripture, when it speakeith of the righteounes of faith, lea-deth vs to a farre other ende, that is to say, that turning away from the loo-kmg vpon our owne worke, we should only looke vnto the mercie of God & perfection of Christ. For it teacheth this order of iustification, that first god vouchsaueth to embrace man being a sinner with his meere & free goodnes, considering nothing in him but merie whereby he may be moved to mercie, forasmuch as he seeth him altogether naked & voide of good worke, fetching from himselfe the caufe to do him good; then, that he moueth the sinner him selfe with feeling of his goodnes, which dispairing vpon his owne worke casteth at the summe of his salvation vpon Gods mercy. This is the feeling of faith, by which feeling the sinner commeth into poffession of his saluation, when he acknowledgeth by the doctrine of the Gospell, he is reconcile to God; y obtaining forouenes of sinnes by meanes of the righte-ounes of Christ, he is iustified: & although he be regenerate by the spirit of God, he thinketh vpon continual righteounes layde vp for him not in the good worke to which he appelleth himselfe, but in the only righteounes of Christ. When these things shalbe every one particularly weyed, they shall give a perfect declaration of our sentence. Albeit they might be better disposed in another order than they are set forth. But it maketh little matter, so that they hang together in such sort that we may haue the whole matter truely declared & sturily prooued.

17 Here it is good to remember the relation that we haue before saide to be betweene faith and the Gospel: becaus it is saide for this cause faith is justifieth, for that it receiueth & embrace the righteousnes offered in the Gospel: And whereas it is saide to be offered by the Gospel, thereby all consideration of works is excluded. Which thing Paul declareth many times else where, but most plainly in two places. For, to the Romans, comparing the law and the gospel together he faith: the righteousnes that is by the law is thus, the man that doth these things shall live in them. But the righteousnes that is of faith offereth salvation, if thou believe in thy heart & confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, & that the father hath raised him vp from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the law & the Gospel, that the law giueth righteousnes to workes, and the gospel giueth free righteousnes without helpe of workes? it is a notable place, and that may deliuer vs out of many hard doubtes, if wee vnderstande that the same righteousnes that is giuen by the gospel is free from all conditions of the law. This is the reason, why he doth more then once with great feeming of contrarietie set the promise by way of opposition against the law, as if the inheritance be of the law, then is it not of the promise: and all the rest in the same chapter to the same effect. Truely the law it selfe hath also her promises. Therefore there must needs be in the promises of the gospel, something different and diuerse from the promises of the law, vnlesse we wil confesse that the comparison is very fond. But what diuerstie shall this be, vnlesse it bee that they are freely giuen, and vpholden by the onely merchie of God, whereas the promises of the law hang vpone the condition of workes? Neither let any man here carpe against mee, and say, that in this place the righteousnes is reiecteth which men of their owne force and freewill would compell God to receiue: forasmuch as Paul without exception teacheareth that the law in commanding profiteth nothing: because there is none not onely of the common multitude, but also of the perfectest, that fulfilleth it. Loue vndoubtedly is the chiefe point of the law: when the Spirite of GOD frameth vs vnto it, why is it not to vs a cause of righteousness, but for that even in the holy ones it is vntperfect, and therefore of it selfe deserueth no rewarde.

18 The second place is this. It is manifest that no man is justifieth by the law before God: Because the righteous man shall live by faith. But the law is not of faith: but the man that doth these things shall live in them. Howe could this argument otherwise stand together, vnlesse wee agree vpon this point, that workes come not into the account of faith, but are vterly to be seuered from it? The law (faith he) differeth from faith. Why so? because workes are required to the righteousnes therof. Therefore it followeth that workes are not required to the righteousnes of faith. By this relation it appeareth, that they which are justifieth by faith are justifieth beside the deferring of workes, yea without the deferring of workes, because faith receiueth that righteousnes which the Gospel giueth. And the Gospel differeth from the law in this point, that it bindeth not righteousnes to workes, but setteth in the only merce of god. Like hereunto is that which he affirmeth to the Romanes, that Abraham had nothing to glory vpon, because faith was imputed to him vnto righteousnes, & he addeth a confirmation, because then then there is place for the righteousness of faith, when there are no works to which a reward is due. Where be works (faith he) due reward is rendered unto them: that which is given to faith is freely given. For the very meaning of the words that he saith in that place serue to prove the same. Whereas he adiyneth within a little after, y therefore we obtaine the inheritance by faith as according to grace, hereupon he gathereth that the inheritance is of free gift, because it is received by faith and how commeth y, but because faith without any help of works is anneth wholly vpon y merie of God: And in the same meaning without doubt he teacheth in another place, that the righteousness of God was openly shewed without the law, although it haue witnesse borne of it by the law & the Prophets: because excluding the law, he faith that it is not holpen by works, and that we obtaine it not by working but come empie that we may receive it.

19 By this time the reader perceiving the with what equitie the Sophisters do at this day calul at our doctrine, when wee say, that man is justified by faith only, They dare not deny that man is justified by faith because it is so often found in Scripture: but because this word, Onely, is never expressed, they cannot abide to haue such an addition made. Is it so? But what will they anfwer to these words of Paul, where he affirmeth that righteousness is not of faith except it be freely giuen? How can free gift agree with works? And with what caullations will they mocke out, that which he faith in another place, that the righteousness of God is manifestly shewed in the Gofpel? If righteousness be manifestly shewed in the Gofpel, surely therein is contained not a torne or halfe righteousness, but full and perfect. Therefore the lawe hath no place therein. And they stande vpon not onely a false but also a foolish shift about this exclufive word, Onely. Doeth not he perfectly enough giue all things to onely faith, that taketh all things from works? What, I pray you mean you these sayings: that righteousness was manifestly shewed without the lawe: that man is justified freely and without y works of the lawe? Here they have a wittie shift to escape withall, which although they defuifed it not themselues but borrowed it of Origen & certaine of the olde writers, yet is verie foolish. They prate that the ceremoniall works of the lawe, not the morall, are excluded. They profit so with continuall brawling, that they knowe not the verie first rules of Logike. Do they thinke that the Apostile doted when he alleged these places to prooue his sayinge? The man that shall doe these things shall liue in them: and, Cursed is euery one that fulfillleth not all things that are written in the volume of the lawe. Vnleffe they be madde, they will not say that life was promised to the keepers of Ceremonies, or curse threatened onely to the breakers of them. If these places be to be vnderstanned of the morall law, it is no doubt that the morall works also are excluded from the power of justifying. To the same purpose serue these arguments y he saith: because the knowledge of sinne was by the lawe, therefore righteousness is not by the law. Because the lawe worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteousness. Because the lawe cannot make confidence assurred, therefore alfo it cannot giue righteousness. Because faith is imputed vnto righteousness, therefore righteousness is not a reward of worke, but is giuen beeing not due.
Because we are justified by faith, therefore glorying is cut off. If there had been a law given that might give life, then righteousness were truly by the law: but God hath shut up all under sinne that the promise might be given to the beleeuers. Let them now fondly say if they dare, that these things are spoken of ceremonies and not of manners: but verie children would have hitte out so great shamelesse. Therefore let vs holde this for certaine, that the whole law is spoken of, when the power of justifying is taken away from the law.

20 But if any man marueil why the Apostle vseth such an addition, not being content with onely naming works: the reason is readie to be shewed for it. For, although works be so highly esteemed, yet they haue that value by the allowance of God, rather than by their owne worthinesse. For who can boast vnto God of any righteousness of works, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claim any reward as due vnto them, but such as he hath promised? They haue therefore this of the bountifullnes of God, that they are counted worthy both of the name & rewards of righteousness: & they be of value only for this cause, when the purpose of him y doeth them, is by them to shewe his obedience to God. Wherefore the Apostle in another place, to proue y Abraham could not be justified by works, allegeth that the law was given, almost foure hundred & thirtie yeres after the covenante made. Unlearned men would laugh at such an argument, because there might be righteous works before the publishing of the law. But because he knewe that there was no such value in works but by the testimonie and vouchsafing of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing confessed, that before the law they had no power to justify. Wee vnderstande why he namely expresseth the worke of the lawe, when he meaneth to take away justification from any works because controversie may be mowed of those & none other. Albeit sometimne he excepteth all worke without any addition, as when he sayeth that by the testimonie of David blestnednes is assignd to that man, to whom the Lord imputeth righteousness without worke. Therefore they can with no calulations bring to passe, but he shal get this general exclusive, only. And they do in vaine seeke y trifling subtletie, that wee are justified by that only faith which worketh by loue, so that righteousness must stinde upon loue. We grant in deede with Paul, y no other faith justifieth, but that which is effectually working with charitie: but that faith taketh not her power of justifying from that effectualnes of charitie. Yea it doth by no other meanes justifieth, but because it bringeth vs into the communicatting of the rightoufnes of Christ. Or else all that which the Apostle so earnestly presteth, should fall to nought. To him that worketh (faith he) the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to des. But to him that worketh not, but beleeueth in him that justifieth the vnrighteous, his faith is imputed vnto righteousness. Could he speake more euidently than in so saying? that there is no righteousness of faith but where there are no worke to which any reward is due: and that onely then faith is imputed vnto rightoufnes, when rightoufnes is given by grace that is not due.

21 Now let vs examine how true that is, which is saide in the definition, that the righteousness of faith is the reconciliation with God, which consefifteth upon the only forgiueneffe of finnes. We must alway returne to this principle, that the wrath of God refeth upon all men, so long as they continue to be sinners. That hath Esay excellently well set out in these words: The hand of the Lorde is not shortned, that he is not able to faue: nor his care dulled that he cannot heare: but your iniquitie haue made disagreement between you and your God, & your finnes haue hidden his face from you that he heareth you not. We heare that sinne is the division betweene man & God, & the turning away of Gods face from the sinner, Neither can it otherwise be. For it is disagreeing from his righteousness to have any fellowship with sin. Wherefore the Apostle teacheth, man is enimie to God til he be restored into fauour by Christ. Whom therefore the Lorde receiueth into ioyning with him, him he is said to iustifie: because he can neither receiue him into fauour nor ioyne him with himselfe, but he must of a sinner make him righteous. And we further saie, that this is done by the forgiuene-eses of finnes. For if they whome the Lord hath reconciled to himselfe he be judged by their works, they shalbe found still sinners in deed, who yet must be free & cleane from sinne. It is certaine therefore that they whome God embrac-eth, are no otherwise made righteous, but because they are cleansed by having the spolettes of their finnes wiped away by forgiuenees, that such a right-eousnes may in one worde be called the forgiuenees of finnes.

22 Both these are most clearly to be seene by these words of Paul, which I haue already alleaged: God was in Christ reconciling the worlde to himselue, not imputing their finnes to man, and he hath left with vs the word of reconciliation. And then he addeth the summe of his message, he which knewe no sinne he made sinne for vs, that we might be made the righteousnes of God in him. Here he nameth righteousness and reconciliation without difference, that wee may perceiue that the one is mutually contained vnder the other. And he teacheth the manner to attaine this righteousness be when our finnes are not imputed vnto vs. Wherefore dout thou not hereafter how God doth iustifie vs, when thou hearest that he doth reconcile vs to himselfe by not imputing finnes. So to the Romanes he prooueth by the testimonie of David, that righteousness is imputed to man without Ro.4,6. works, because David pronounceth the man blessed whose iniquities are forguen, whose finnes are covered, to whom the Lord hath not imputed his offences. Without dout by blessednes he there meaneth righteousness. As 1st he affirmeth the same to stand in the forgiueneffe of finnes, there is no cause why we should otherwise define it. Therefore Zacharie the father of John the Baptift fingeth that the knowledge of saluation consisteth in for-giuenees of finnes. Which rule Paul following in his Sermon which he made to the Antiochians concerning the summe of saluation, as Luke reporteth it, concluded in this manner: by him forgiueneffe of finnes is preached vnto you, & every one that belieueth in him is iustified from all these things, from which ye could not be iustified in the law of Moses. The Apostle fo knitteth the forgiueneffe of sinnes with righteousness, that he fieweth that they be both all one. Whereupon he rightly reasoneth that the righte-ousnes is freely given vnto vs, which we obtaine by the louing kindnes of God. Neither ought it to seeme a strange vnused speach, that the faithfull are are righteous before God, not by works, but by free acceptance; such both it is so oft found in the Scripture, and the old authors also do sometime so speake. For Augustine faith thus in one place: The righteousness of faith is in this worlde standeth rather in forgiveness of sins, than in perfection of vertues. Wherefore with agrée the notable sentences of Bernard: Not to sin is the righteousness of God: but the righteousness of man, is the mercifull kindnes of God. He had before affirmed that Christ is to vs righteousness in abolution, and therefore that they only are righteous that have obtained pardon by mercy.

23 Hereupon also followeth this, that by the only meane of Christes righteousness, we obtaine to be justified before God, Which is as much in effect as if it were said, that man is not righteous in himselfe, but because the righteousnes of Christ is by imputation enterpartened with him, which thing is worthie to be heedfully marked. For that tripling error vanisheth away, to say ye man is therefore justified by faith, because faith taketh parte of the Spirit of God by which he is made righteous, which is so contrary to the doctrine above taught, that they can neuer be made to agree together. For it is no dout he is void of his own righteousnes, that is taucht to seeke righteousnes without himself. This the Apostle affirmeth most plainely where he writeth ye he which knew no sinne was made vs a propitiatory sacrifice to cleansse away sinne, ye we might be made the righteousnes of God in him. You see ye our righteousnes is not in vs but in Christ, & ye it belongeth to vs onely by this title, because we be partakers of Christ, because we posseffe his richesse with him. And it maketh nothing to the contrary that in another place he teacheth, ye sinne was condemned of sinne in y flesh of Christ, that the righteousnes of the law might be fulfilled in vs: where he meaneth no other fulfilling, but ye which we obtaine by imputation. For ye Lord Christ doth in such sort communicate his righteousness with vs, that after a certain maruellous maner, he poureth the force thereof into vs, so much as pertained to the judgement of God. It appeareth ye he did no otherwisle meane, by the other sentence which he had spoken a little before. As by the disobedience of one man we were made sinners, so by the obedience of one man we are justified. What is it else to set our righteousnes in the obedience of Christ, but to affirme ye hereby only we are accounted righteous, because ye obedience of Christ is imputed vnto vs as if it were our own? Therefore me thinke ye Ambrose hath excellently well shewed howe there is an example of this righteousnes in the blessing of Iacob. For as Iacob hauing not of him selfe deserued the preeminencie of ye first begotten sonne, hid himselfe in the apparel of his brother, & being clothed with his brothers cote, ye favoured of a most sweet flamell, he crept into the favor of his father, & received ye blessing to his own solomity, vnder the precious purenes of Christ our elder brother, that we may get a testimony of rightouenesse in the sight of God. The wordes of Ambrose are these: Whereas Iacob smel the favour of the garments, peraduentise this is meant thereby, that we are not justifie by workes but by faith; because fleshy weakenesse hindereth workes, but the brightenes of faith which make eth forgivingenesse of sinnes, ouershadoweth the errore of deedes. And truly so it is. For, that we may appeare before the face of God vnto salvation, it is necessary for vs, to smell sweetely with his odour, and to have our faultes couered and barred with his perfection.

The xij. Chapter.

That, to the end we may be fully perswaded of the free justification, we must lift up our minde to the judgmenet fear of God.

Although it appeareth by most euident testimonies, that all these things are true, yet we shall not clearely perceiue how necessarie they be, vntill we haue set before our eyes those things that ought to be the groundes of all this disputation. First therefore let vs remember this, that wee purpose not to speake of the righteouenes of a worldly judgmenet court, but of the heavenlye judgmenet seate: that we shoûde not measure by our owne small portion, but by what uprightenesse of worke Gods judgement may be satisfied. But it is maruellsome to see with what rafines and boldnes it is commonly debared. Yea and it is to be seene howe none doe more boldly or with fuller mouthes (as the saying is) prate of the righteouenesse of worke, then they that are either monstitiallie sicker of open outward diseases, to be proffic to burst with inward vices. That cometh to passe because they thinke not upon the righteouenesse of God, whereof if they had neuer so little feeling, they would neuer make so great a mockery of it. And truely it is out of measure lightly regarded, when it is not acknowledged to be such and so perfect that nothing be impuited vnto it but every way whole & absolute, & defiled with no uncleanesS:such as neuer was and neuer shall be able to be found in man. It is in deede easie and ready for every man in Schooles to talke vaine ly upon the wortheouenesse of worke to juftifie men: But when they come into the sight of God, such dailiance must auoide, because there is earnest doing vfe d, and no trifling strife about wordeS. To this, to this I say, we must apply our minde, if we will profitaftly enquire of true righteouenesse, how we may answere the heavenlye judge when he calleth vs to accouët. Let vs think him to be a judge, not such a one as our owne understandinges doe of themselvese imagine: but such a one as he is painted out in the Scripture, with whose righteouenesse the starrs shall be darkened, by whose strength the hils doe melt away, by whose wrath the earth is shaken, by whose wisdom the wise are taken in their straffely, by whose purenesse all thinges are proued vpure, whose righteouenesse the Angels are not able to beare, which maketh the innocent not innocent, whose vengeance when it is once kindled pursueth to the bottome of hel. If he (HAY) hit to examine mens doinges, who shall appeare assuere before his throne: who shall dwell with a deouering fire? Sayth the Prophet. Who shall abide with continuall burnings? he that walketh in righteouenesse and speaketh truth, &c. But let such a one come forth, whosoeuer he be. But that aunswere maketh, that none commeth forth. For this terrible saying foun- deth to the contrary; Lord if thou marke iniquitieS, Lord, who shall abide it truly all must needs immediately perish, as it is written in an other place: Shall man be justified if he be compared with God? or shall he be purer than his maker? Beholde they that serue him are not faithfull, and he hath founde found peruersenes in his Angels. How much more shal they that dwell in houses of clay, and that haue an earthly foundation, be consumed with mothes: they shall be cut downe from the morning to the evening. Beholde among his Saints there is none faithfull, & the heauens are not cleane in his sight: how much more is man abominable and vnprofitable, which drinketh iniquitie as water? I graunt in deede that in the booke of job, is mention made of a righteousnesse that is huer than the keeping of the lawe. And it is good to vnderstande this distinction: because although a man did satisfie the law, yet he could not fo stande to the triall of that righteousnesse that passeth all fenses. Therefore although job be cleare in his owne confidence, yet he is amazed, and not able to speake because he seeth that very angelike holinesse can not appease God, if he exactly weye their works. But I therefore wil at this time ouerpaue that righteousnesse which I haue spoken of, because it is incomprehensible: but only this I say, that if our life be examined by the rule of the written law, we are more than feneslesse if so many curses where-with the Lorde hath willed vs to be awaked do not torment vs with horribl feare, and among other this generall curse, Cursed is every one that doeth not abide in all the things that are written in the booke. Finally all this discourse shalbe but vnfaouery and cold, vnlesse euery man yelde himselfe gilde before the heavenly judge, and willingly throwe downe and abase himselfe, being carefull how he may be acquired.

2) To this, to this I say, we shoulde haue lifted vp our eyes, to learne rather to tremble for feare, than vainely to reioyce. It is in deede easie, so long as the comparison extendeth no further than men, for euery man to think him selues to haue somwhat which other ought not to despise. But when we rise vp to haue respect vnto God then suddenly that confidence fallett to the ground and cometh to naught. And in y same case altogether is our soule in respect of God, as mans body is in respect of the heaven. For the sighth of the eye, so long as it continueth in seeing thinges that lie neere vnto it, doth shewe of what pearing force it is, but if it be once directed vp to the sunne, then being dafeled and dulled with the too great brightness thereof, it feeth no lesse feblenes of its selfe in beholding of the sunne, than it perceived strength in beholding inferior things. Therefore let vs not deceuie our selues with vaine confidence, although we count our selues either equall or superiour to other men: but that is nothing to God, by whose wil this knowledge is to be tried. But if our wildenes can not be tamed with these admonitionis, he will answere to vs as he sayd to the Pharisees: you be they that justifie your selues before men: but that which is hie to men is abominable to God. Now go thy way and proudly boaste of thy righteousnes among men, while God from heauen abhorret the. But what say the servantes of God that are truely instruicted with his Spirit? Enter not into judgment with thy servant, because euery liuing man shall not be justified in thy sight. An other faith, although in somwhat diverse meaning: Man can not be righteous with God: if he will contend with him, he shall not be able to answere one for a thousand. Here we now plainly heare what is the righteousnesse of God, even such as can be satisfied with no workes of men, to whom when it examineth vs of a thousand of offences, we can not purge our selues of one. Such a righteousnesse had had that same chosen instrument of God Paul conceived, when he professed that he knew himselfe guiltie in nothing, but that he was not thereby justified.
The grace of Christ.

Lib. 3. 248

3 And not only such examples are in the holy Scriptures, but also all godly writers do shew that they were alway of this minde. So Augustine sayth. Ad Boni. lib. All the godly that grone under this burden of corruptible flesh, and in this weakness of life have this only hope that wee have one mediator Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the appeaferment for our finnes. What faith he? If this be their only hope, where is the confidence of works? For when he calleth it only, he leaueth none other. And Bernard sayth. And indeed where is safe and steadfast rest and assuredness for the weake, but in the wounds of our Saviour? and so much the surer I dwell therein as hee is mightier to faue. The world doth rage, the bodie burdeneth, the deceit lieth in waite. I fall not, because I am builded vpon the sure rocke. I haue sinned a greeuous sinne, my conscience is troubled, but it shall not be ouertroubled, because I shall remember the wounds of the Lorde, And here vpon after- warde he doth conclude: Therefore my merite is the Lordes taking of mercie, I am not utterly without mercie, so long as hee is not without mercies. But if the mercies of the Lord be many, then I haue many mercies. Shall habitat fer. I sing mine owne righteounesse? Lorde I will remember only thy righteounes. For that is also my righteounesse, for hee is made vnto mee righteounesse of God. Againe in another place, This is the whole merite of man, if hee put his whole hope in him that faueth whole man. Likewise In cant. fer. where reteining peace to himselfe hee leaueth the glorie to God. To thee faithful grace remaine unminished: it shall bee well with mee, if I haue peace. I forswere glorie altogether, least if I wrongfully take vpon me that which is not mine owne, I loose also that which is offered me. And more plainly in another place he faith: Why shoulde the Church be carefull of merites, which hath a surer and safer way to glorie vpon the purpose of God? So there is no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merites we hope for good things, specially when thou hearest in the Prophete, I will doe it not for your sakes, but for mine owne sake, faith the Lorde. It sufficeth for merite, to knowe that merites sufficeth not. But as it sufficeth for merite not to presum alone of merites, so to be without merites sufficeth to judgement. Where- as hee freely veth this worde Merites for good workes, wee must therein beare with the custome. But in the end he purpose was to make hypocrites afraide, that wildly range with licentiousness of sinning against the grace of God. As afterwarde he expoundeth himselfe saying: Happie is the church that neither wanteth merites without presumption, nor presumption without merites. It hath where vpon to presum, but not merites. It hath merites, but to deference, not to presum. Is not the verie not presuming a deferring? Therefore it presumeth so much the more boldly, because it presumeth not, having large matter to glory vpon, even the manie merices of the Lorde.

4 This is the the trueuth. The exercised consciences perceive this to bee the onely sanctuarie of safetie, wherein they may safely rest themselves when they haue to doe with the judgement of God. For if the Starres that seemed seemed most bright in the night season, doe loose their brightness, with sight of the sunne, what thinke we shall be come euens of the rarest innocencie of man, when it shall be compared with the purenesse of God? For that shalbe a most severe examination, that shall pierce into the most hidden thoughts of the heart, and (as Paul faith) shall reveale the secretes of darkenes, and disclose the hidden thinges of the heart, which shall compell the lurking & unwilling conscience to utter all thinges that now are fallen out of remembrance. The Deuill our accuser will presse vs, which is pruie to all the wicked decedes that he hath mouted vs to doe. There the outwarme pompous shewes of good worke which now onely are esteemed, shall nothing profit vs. Onely the purenesse of will shall be required. Wherefore the Hypocrisie, not only whereby euerie man knowing himselfe guiltie before God defireth to boast himselfe before men, but also where with every man deceiueth him selfe before God (as we be all inclined to stroke and flatter our selues) shall fall downe confounded, howsoever it nowe be proud with more than dronken boldnes. They that bend not their wit to such a sight, may indeed for a short time sweetly and pleasantly frame a righteounesse to themselues, but it is such a righteounesse as shall bee by and by shaken away from them at the judgement of God: like as a great rickeffe heaped vp in a dreame doe va-nish away from men when they awake. But they that shall earnestly as it were in the sight of God, enquire of the true rule of righteounesse, shall certainly finde that all the worke of men, if they be judged by their owne workines, are nothing but deslings and filthines: that that which among the common people is accompted righteounesse, is before God mere wickednes: that that which is judged purtie, is vnlownenes: that that is reckned glory, is but shame.

5 From this beholding of the perfection of God, let it not greeue vs to defende to looke vpon our selues without flatterie or blind affection of loue. For it is no meruell if we be all so blinde in this behalfe, for as much as none of vs doth beware of the pestilent tendernesse towarde himselfe, which (as the Scripture crieth out) naturally sticketh fast in vs all. To euerie man (as Salomon) his owne waye is right in his owne eyes. Againe. All the wyues of man seeme clean in his owne eyes. But what? Is he acquited by this blindnes? No. But (as he further faith in the same place) the Lord eyseth the heartes, that is to say, while man flattereth himselfe by reason of the outwarde vfor or righteounesse that he beareth in remembrance, in the meane time the Lord with his balance examineth the hidden vncleanness of the heart. Therefore let vs do nothing profit with such flatteries, let vs not wilfully mocke our selues to our owne destruction. But that wee may trie our selues rightly, we must necessarily call backe our confidence to judgement seat of God. For we do altogether neede his light to disclose the secret foldings of our peruerfnesse, which otherwise lie too deeplye hidden. For then and never till then, we shall clerely perceiue what is meant hereby: that man being rottennesse and a worme, abominable and vaine, which dranketh wickednes as water is far from being justified before God. For who shoulde make that cleane that is conceived of vncleane seede? not one man. Then shall we also finde that by experience, which Job saide of himselfe: If I will goe
The grace of Christ.

go about to shew me my selfe innocent, mine owne mouth shall condemning me: if I will shew me my selfe righteous, it will prooue me wicked. For that is not meant of one age onely, but of all ages, which the Prophete in old time complained of Israel, that all went astray like sheepe, that euerie one turned aside to his owne way. For he there comprehendeth all the to whom thy grace of redemption should come. And the rigorousnes of this examination ought to procede so far, till it subdue vs, so that we be fully throwne downe withall, and by that meanes prepare vs to receive the grace of Christ. For he is deceived that thinketh himselfe able to receive the enjoying of this grace, vntill hee haue first throwne downe all hawtinesse of minde. This is a known saying: that God confoundeth the proud, and giueth grace to the humble.

But what way is there to humble our selues, but that we being altogether needie and emptie, shoulde gie place to the mercie of God? For I doe not call it humbleness: if we thinke that we haue any thing remaining with vs, and hereafter they have taken a very hurtful hypocrisy that haue royned these two thinges together, that wee must thinke humbly of our selues before GOD, and that we must make all account of our owne righeteonness. For if we confesse to God contrarie to our owne thinking, we doe wickedly lye vnto him: but we can not thinke as we ought, but that by & al that seemeth glorious in vs must be troden vnder foote. Therefore when thou hearest in the Prophet, that there is prepared salvation for the humble people, and abatement for the eyes of the wicked: First thinke, that there is no entrie open to salvation, vntill thou haue laide away al pride and taken to thee perfect humblenesse: then, thine humblenesse is not a certaine modestie whereby thou giuest ouer to the Lord a haire breedth of thine own right, as they are called humble before men that do neither presumptuously aduance themselues, nor reprochfully triumph over other, although they stand upon some estimation of their owne excellencie: but an unfailld substitution of a mind throwne downe with seeing of his owne miserie and needinesse. For it is so ecchwhere described in the word of God, When the Lords faith thus in Zephanias: I will take away out of thee him that outragious rejoyfeth, & I will leave in the middes of thee the afflicted man & the poore man, and they shall trust in the Lord: doeth he not there plainly shewe who are humble: even they lie afflicted with knowledge of their own poueritie. On the other side hee calleth the proud, outragious rejoyfers, because men joying in prosperitie are wont to rejoyce without measure. But to the humble whom he purposeth to faue, hee laeueth nothing but to trust in the Lord. And likewise it is sayde in Esay: Whome shall I lookke vnto, but to the poore and contrite in spirite, and him yeareth my words? Againe: The high and excellent, that inhabiteth eternitie, his name is holy, that dwelleth on hie, and in the holy place, and with the contrite and humble spirite, to quicken the spirite of the humble and the heart of the contrite. When thou so oft hearest the name of contrition, understand thereby the wound of the heart, that suffereth not a man thrown downe on the ground to rise againe. With such contrition ought thy heart to bee wounded, if thou wilt according to the saying of GOD bee aduaunced with the humhumble: If that be not done, thou shalt be brought low with the mighty hand of God to thy shame and disgrace.

7 And our best Schoolmater thinking it not enough to shew it out in words, hath also set out vnso vs in a parable the image of true humilitie as in a painted table. For he bringeth forth a Publican that standing a farre off, not daring to lift vp his eyes to heauen, with much knocking his breast, prayeth in this wise: Lorde be mercifull to me a sinner. Let vs not thinke thefe to be tokens of assumed modestie, that hee dare not looke vp to heauen, nor to come nere, that with knocking his brest he confesseth him-selxe a sinner: but let vs knowe that they bee testimonies of inwarde affection. On the other side he setteth the Pharisee, which thanketh God that he is not of the common sorte of men, either an oppressor, or an vnrighteous man, or an adulterer, because he fafted twice on the Sabbath, & gaue riches of all that hee possesseth. He doth with open confession acknowledge that the righteousnes which he hath is the gift of God: but because he standeth in confidence that he is righteous, he departeth from God vnfauored and in hatred. The Publicane by acknowledging of his owne wickednesse is justified. Hereby we may see, howe great is the estimation of our humbling vs before God: so that the heart cannot be open to receyue his mercie, vnlesse it be first voide of all opinion of his owne worthinesse. When this opnion hath possesseid the place, it shutteth vp the way for Gods mercie to enter. And that no man shoulde doubt thereof, Christ was sent of his father into the earth with this commission, to bring glad tidinges to the poore, to heale the contrite in heart, to preach libertie to the captiue, & deliverance to them that were shut vp in prison, and to comfort them that mourn: to give them glorie for ashes, oyle for mourning, the robe of praise for the spi-rite of sorrow. According to this commission, he calleth none but them that labour and are loden to take parte of his liberalitie. And in another place he faith: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.

8 Therefore if we will give place to the calling of Christ, let all arrogancie & carelesnes depart far away fro vs. A sophsitie growth of a falsit persuasion of our owne righteousnes, when a man thinketh himselfe to have somewwhat, by the desurfing whereof he may bee commended before God, carelesnesse may bee cenu without any persuation of workes. Form any sinners, because being dronke with sweetnesse of vices they thinke not upon the judgement of God, lie as it were fenelesly amased with a diase of drouines, that they aspire not to the mercie offered them, But we must no leffe shake off such dull sluggisnesse, than we must cast away all vaine confidence of our felues, that wee may without incombrance hasten to Christ, that we being empty and hungry may be filled with his good things. For wee shall never sufficiently haue truft in him, vnlesse we utterly distrust of our selues, wee shall never sufficiently raife vp our courages in him, vnlesse they be first throwne downe in our selues. Wee shall never sufficiently haue consolation in him, vnlesse wee be first defolate in our selues. Therefore we be then mone to take holde of and obteine the favour of God, casting away all truft of our selues, but trusting vpon the onely assurednesse of his goodnesse, when ( as Augustine faith ) forgetting our owne desurfings, we imbrace the giftes of Christ.
Because if he sought defervings in vs, we shoule not come to his giftes. Wherewith Bernard very wel accordeth, comparing proude men to vnfaithfull fervantes, that arrogantly claime any thing be it neuer so little to their owne deservings: because they do wrongfully keepe to themselves the praise of grace passing by them, as if a wall would fay that it bringeth forth the sunbeame which it receiued through a windowe. But, not to tary longer hereupon, let vs take a short but a generall & sure rule, that he is prepared to take part of the fruits of Gods mercy, that hath utterly emptied himselfe, I will not fay of righteounessee, which is none at all, but of the vaine and windy image of righteounes. Because every man so much hindereth his receiuing of the liberalitie of God as he refeth in himselfe.

The xiii. Chapter.

That there are two things to be marked in free Justification.

And here are alway two things to be principally looked vnto: y is to say, that there may remaine to the Lorde his glory vnminished, & as it were wholly and perfectly maintaine, and to our conffciences an vntroubled quietnes and calme tranquillitie before his judgement. We see how oft and how earnestly the Scripture exhorteth vs, to give owne to God a confession of praise, when we entreate of righteounes. And the Apostle testifieth, that this was the Lords principal purpose of giving vs righteounes in Christ, he might shew his owne righteounes. And what a shewing y shoulde be, he declareth immediately after: that is, if he alone be known to be righteous, & that justified him that is of the faith of Jesus Christ. Thou seest y the righteounes of God is not sufficiently let out, vnlesse he alone be accounted righteous, and do communicate the grace of righteounes to them that deserveth it not. By this meane he will haue every mouth to be stopped, and the whole world to be made subject to him. For while man hath any thing to speake in his owne defence, so long there is somwhat taken away from the glory of God. So in Ezechiel he teacheth how much we gloriie his name by reknowledging of our owne wickednesse. You shall remember (sayth he) the wayes and all the wicked doings wherewith ye haue beene defiled. And ye shall be displeased with your selues in your owne sight, in all the evils that ye haue committt. And ye shall knowe that I am the Lord, when I shall doo good to you for mine owne names sake, and not according to your most wicked offences. If these things be contained in the true knowledge of God, that we beeing brooched with knowledge of our owne iniquitie, should consider that he doth good to vs whereas we be unworthy thereof: why then doe we to our great hurt attempt to steale away from the Lorde any parcell be it neuer so small of the praise of his owne goodness? Likewise Jeremie when he cryeth out, Let not the wife man glory in his wildome, or the rich man in his riches, or the strong man in his strength, but let him that glorifieth, glory in the Lord: doth he not there declare somwhat is diminished from Gods glory, if man glory in himselfe? To this purpose truely doth Paul applye those wordes, when he teacheth that all the partes of our saluation are reposed in Christ, that wee should not glory but in the Lorde. For his meaning is that he riseth vp against God and darkeneth his glory; whosoever thinketh that he hath any thing.
thing be it never so little of his owne.

2. This is the truth, we never truly glory in him, vnlesse we be ytterly put from our owne glory. On the other side, this is to be holde for a catholike principle, that all they glory against God that glory in themselues. For Paul judgeth that onely by this meane the world is made subject to God, when all matter to glory upon is ytterly taken from men. Therefore Esaias, when he declareth that Israell shall have their justification in God, sayeth also that they shall there also have their prayse: as though he should say, that the Lorde to this ende justifieth the elect that they should glory in him and in nothing else. But how we ought to be praised in the Lorde, he had taught in the verfe next before: that is, that we should beware that our righteoufnes and strength are in the Lorde. Not that there is not required a bare confession, but confirmed with an othe, that a man should not thinke that he shall be discharged with I wote not what fained humilitie. And let no man here allege for excuse that he doth not glory when without arrogence he knowlegeth his owne righteoufnesse: for there can be no such estimation but it engendreth confidence, nor confidence but it breedeth glory. Therefore let vs remember that in all the disputation of righteoufnesse wee must have regard to this ende, that the prayse thereof remaine with the Lorde whole and perfect. Forasmuch as for declaration of his righteoufnes (as the Apostle telleth) he hath poured out his grace vpon vs, that he might be just and justifying him that is of the faith of Christ. Wherefore in an other place, when he had taught that the Lord gave vs saluation, to set out the glory of his name, afterward as it were reparing the same thing he addeth: ye are saued by grace and by the gift of God, not by works, that none shoulde glory. And when Peter telleth that we are called vnto hope of saluation that we shoulde declare the powers of him that hath called vs out of darkenesse into his marvelous light, without doubt his meaning is so to make the onely prayses of God to founde in the ears of the faithfull, that they shoulde with deepe silence oppress all arrogancia of the fift. In a summe, man can not without robbery of God chalenge to himself any one crum of righteoufnesse: because euery so much is plucked & taken away from the glory of Gods righteoufnesse.

3 Now if we ask by what mean the conscience may be quited before God, wee shall finde no other meane but if free righteoufnesse be givem vs by the gift of God: Let vs alway thinke vpon this sayinge of Salomon, Who shal say: I haue cleansed my heart, I am made cleane from my sinne? Truely there is no man that shal not be ouerwhelmed with infinite filthinesse. Therefore let euery perfect man descende into his owne conscience, and call his doinges to account: what end shal he haue? Shall he sweetly rest as though all things were in good order betweene him and GOD? and shal he not rather be vexed with terrible tormentes, when he shal feel matter of damnacion abiding in himselue if he be judged according to his workes? The conscience if it looke vpon God, must of neceffitie either have assured peace with his judgement, or be befeeched with the terrous of hell. Therefore we profit nothing in disputing of righteoufnesse vnlesse we stablishe such a righteoufnesse, with the stedfastnesse whereof our soule may be stayed in the judgment of God. When our soule shall haue whereby it may both without feare appeare before the face of God, and receiue his judgemen, vnshaken, then and not till then let vs know that we haue founde an unsaine righteousness. Therefore not without cause the Apostle standeth so much vpon this point, with whose words I had rather expresss it than with mine owne. If (faith he) the promise of inheritance be of the law, faith is made voide, the promise is made abolisshed. Hee first inferreth that faith is disanulled and made void if the promise of righteousness haue respect to the deservings of our works, or doe hang vppon the keeping of the lawe. For so could neuer any man assur’dly rest in it: becaufe it could neuer come to passe any man might assur’dly determine with him selfe that he had satisfied the lawe, as indeed neuer any man doeth by workees fully satisfie it. Whereof, that we shoulde not neede to seeke far for testimonies to prooue it,uerie man may be a witnesse to himselfe that will with a right eye behold himselfe. And hereby appeareth, in how deeppe and darke corners hypocritse buried the minde s of men, while they lo carelessely beeare with them false, that they sticke not to set their owne flatteringe against y judgemet of God, as though they wold bind to a lay his judicall proceeding. But the faithfull that doe sincerely examine themselves, are greeued and tormented with a farre other manner of carefulnes. Therefore there shoulde so enter into all minde s a doubting, and at length a verie desperate where eche man for himselfe shoulde make account, with how great a burden of debt he is still overpresst, and how far he is from the condition wherewith he is charged. Loe, how faith is by this meane alreadye expressed & extinguished. For to waver, to varye, to be carried vp & down, to stick fast in doute, to be holden in suspence, to stagger, & at length to desperate, is not to truist but to strengthen thy mind with constant certainty, and perfect assurednes, and to haue wherevpon to rest and fasten thy foote.

4 He adiouneth also an other thing, that is, that the promise shal thre be made of no effect and voide. For if the fulfilling thereof do hang vpon our desuring, when shal we come thus far as to desere the bountifulnes of God? Also this seconde point hangeth vpon the former. For the promise shall not be fulfilled but to them that beleue it. Therefore if faith bee fallen, there shall remaine no force of the promise, Therefore the inheritance is of faith, that it may be according to grace, to stablish the promise. For it is abundantly well stablished when it resteth vpon the only mercie of God; because his mercie & truth are with a perpetual knot ioyned together, that is toay, whatsoever God mercifully promiseth, he also faithfully performeth. So Dauid, before that he required sallution by the word of god first determineth they cause thereof to be in his mercie. Let thy mercies (faith he) come vnto me, thy sallution according to thy word. And rightfully; because God is by no other meane perswaded to make the promise, but of his owne, mere mercie. Therefore we must herein stay, and deeply fasten al our hope and not to looke to our owne workees, to seeke any helpe of them. And that you should not thinke that I herein speake any newe thing: Augustine doth also teache that we ought so to doe. Christ (faith he) shall reign for euer in his seruantes, G O D hath promisid it. Therefore forasmuch as the promise is stablished, not according to
to our desires, but according to his mercie, no man ought to speake fearfully of y of which he cannot dout. Bernard alle faith: The disciples of Christ say, Who can be saved? But he answered: this is impossible with men, but it is not impossible with God. This is all our confidence, this is our only comfort, this is whole ground of our hope, but being assured of the possibility, what say we of his will? Who knoweth whether he be worthy of love or hatred? Who hath known the Lords meaning? Or who hath beene his counsellor? Here nowe faith must of necessitie helpe vs, here must his true faith succour vs, that that which is hidden from vs in the heart of the father, may be reeuiled by the Spirite, and his Spirite testifying it may perswade our heartes that wee are the sonsnes of God. And it may perswade vs by calling and justifying vs freely by faith, in which things there is as it were a certaine meane passage from the eternall predestination to the glorie that is to come. Briefly let vs thus conclude. The Scripture declareth that the promises of God are not stablished, vnlesse they be taken hold of with assured affiance of conscience: and wherfore ther is anie doubting or uncertainitie it pronounceth that they be voide. Againe it pronounceth that they doe nothing but stagger and waue, if they rest upon our owne workes. Therefore wee must needs either lose rightcounsellor, or wee must not consider our owne workes, but onely faith must take place, whose nature is this, to lifte vp her ears & shut her eyes, that is to say, to bec hee hee-fully bent to the promise onely, and to turne away her thought from all mans worthinesse or desiring. So is that notable prophecie of Zacharie fulfilled, that when the wickednesse of the lande shall be done away, a man shall call his friend under his vine and under his figge tree, where the Prophet declareth that at the faithfull do no otherwise enjoy true peace but after obtaining of the forgiveness of sinnes. For this caulation is to bee remembred in the Prophesies, that when they speake of the kingdom of Christ, they set out the outwarde blessings of God as figures of the spiritual things. Whereupon Christ is called both the king of peace and our peace, because he appeareth all the troublesome motions of conscience. If we seeke by what meane he doth it, wee must needs come to the sacrifice by which God is appeased. For hee shall never cease to tremble for feare that he shall not determine that God is appeased by the onely satisfactorie cleansing wherein Christ hath suffeyned his wrath. Finally peace is no where else to be sought for but in the terrors of Christ our redeemer.

But why doe I bee so darke a testimonie? Paul every where denieth that there is peace or quiet joye left to consciences, vnlesse it be determined that we be justified by faith. And he therewithall declareth whence that assurednesse commeth, namely when the loue of GOD is powred into our heartes by the holy Ghoft: as if he had saide, that our consciences cannot otherwise be queted, vnlesse we be certainly perswaded that we please God. Whereupon also in another place he crieth out in the perfoun of all the godlie, Who shall seuer vs from the loue of God, which is in Christ? because wee shall tremble euene at euery little breath, till we bee arrived into the haven: but wee shall be without care euene in the darkenesse of death, so long as the Lorde shall shewe himselfe a pastor to vs. Therefore whosoever prate prate that we are justifled by faith, because being regenerate we are just by Gal. 3:11, 12. Praise spiritually: they never tasted the sweetness of grace, to consider that God will be mercifull unto them. Whereupon also followeth, that they do no more know the manner of praying rightly, than Turks and whatsoever other profane Nations. For (as Paul witnesseth) it is no true faith vnlesse it reache & putt vs in minde of that most sweete name of Father, yea vnlesse it open our mouth freely to cry out Abba father. Which in another place he more plainly expresseth, where he faith that in Christ we have boldness & entrie in confidence by the faith of him. Truely this commeth not to passe by the gift of regeneration; which as it is alway vnperfect in the flesh, so it containeth in itself manifold matter of douting. Wherefore we must of necessity come to this remedie, that the faithful should determine that they may by no other right, hope for the inheritance of the heauenly kingdom, but because being grafted into the body of Christ they are freely accounted righteous. For as touching justification, faith is a thing meereely passinge, bringing nothing of our owne to the recovering of the fauour of God, but receiving of Christ that which we want.

What is the beginning of justification, and the continuall proceedings thereof.

That the matter may be made more plaine, let vs search, what may be the righteounenes of man in the whole course of his life: and let vs make foure degrees thereof. For men either being endued with no knowledge of God, are drowned in idolatry: or being entred into profession by sacraments, denying God with vncleaneffe of life, whom they confesse with mouth, they are Christes no further than in name: or they be hypocrites, which cover the wickednesse of their heartes, with vaine deceitfull colours: or being regenerate by the spirit of God, they endeavour themselves to true holyneffe. Specially when they are to be judged by their natural gifts, from the crowne of their head to the sole of their foote, there shall not be founde one spare of goodnes, vnlesse peraduenture we wil accuse the Scripture of falshood, when it setteth out all the sonnes of Adam with these titles, they be of sordward and stubborn heart, that at the imagination of their heart is euil from their infancie, that their thoughts be vaine, that they have not the feare of God before their eyes, that none of them understandeth or seeketh God, briefly that they be flesh, by which word we are understood all those worke which Paul rehearseth, fornication, vncleneffe, vnchaustic, vntouenise, worshipping of idoles, witchcraftes, enmitie, contentions, emulation, anger, dissentions, fettles, enuiies, manslaughters, and whatsoever filthyneffe and abomination may be devised. This forsooth is the worthines, with confidence whereof they must be proued. But if any among them excell with such honestie of manners as may haue some shine of holiness among men: yet because wee knowe that God regardeth not the outwarde glittering, we must search the very fountain of worke if we will haue them to auaille any thing to righteounesse. We must (I say) throughly looke into them, from what affections of heart these worke proceede. But althoughhere here lieth open a most large field to discourse in, yet because the matter may be declared in very fewe wordes, I wil follow as much as I may a briefnes in teaching.

2 First I deny not that whatsoever excellent gifts appeare in the vnbelecuer, they are the gifts of God. Neither do I so differ from common judgement, that I would affirme that there is no difference betweene the iustice; temperance and equitie of Titus and Traianus, & the rage, intemperance, and crueltie of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: betwene the filthie lustes of Tiberius, and in this behalfe the continencie of Velipasian: and (that we may not carrie upon some special vertues or vices) betwene the obseruing and the despising of right and lawes. For there is so great difference of right and wrong, that it appeareth euon in the dead image thereof. For what thing shall there remaine wel ordered in the world, if we confound these together? Therefore such a difference betwene honest & vnhonest doings, the Lorde hath not onely engraven in the minde of all men, but also dooth oft conforme it with the dispensation of his providence. For we see how he extendeth many blessings of this present life to them that among men do follow vertue. Not because that outward image of vertue defcrue eth so much as the least benefite of his; but so it pleaseth him to declare by proofe howe much true righteouynes pleasth him, when he suffreth euon outward & fained righteouynes not to be without reward. Whereupon followeth that which we euon now confesse, that these vertues, such as they be, or rather images of vertues, are the gifts of God; for as much as there is nothing in any wise praielworthie, which proceedeth not from him.

3 But yet otherles it is true which Augustiue wryteth, that all they that are strangers from the true religion of the one God, howsoever they be accounted worthie of admiration for opinion of vertue, are not onely worthie of no reward, but rather are worthie of punishment, because they doe with defiling of their heart, bespot the pure good things of God. For though they be the instruments of God, to preserve the fellowship of men with iustice, continencie, temperance of mind, valiancie, & wisedome: yet they do very euilly execute those good workes of God: because they are restraine from euil doing, not by sincere love of goodnes, but either by only ambition, or by love of themselves, or by some other crooked affection. Where therefore they are corrupt by the very vncheanne of heart, as by their beginning, they are no more to be reckned among vertues, than those vices, which are wont to deceive by reason of necenes & likenesse of vertue. Finally when we remember, that the ende of that which is right, cuer is that God be serued: whatsoever tendeth to any other end, fowitwith worthily losfeth the name of right. Because therefore they have not respect to the marke which the wisedome of God appointeth: although the thing that they doe, seeme good in doing, yet by a wrongefl end it is finne. He conclude therefore that all the Fabricij, Scipioes, & Catoes, in all those excellent actes of theirs, yet finned in this behalfe, whereas they lacked the light of faith, they did not apply them to the end to which they ought to have applied them: and that for that cause, true righteouynes was not in them: forasmuch as duties are not weyed by the doings, but by the endes.

Moreover it be true which John sayeth, that there is no life without the sonne of God: who so have no part in Christ, what manner of men so ever they be, whatsoever they doe or goe about, yet they runne forwarde with their whole course into destruction and the judgement of eternal death. After this reason, is that sayde of Augustine. Our religion differeth the righteous from the vnrightheous, not by lawe of works: but by the very lawe of faith, without which, those that seeme good, workes are turne into finnes. Wherefore the same Augustine faith very well in an other place, when he calleth the endeoure of such men to running out of the way. For how much fafter a man runneth out of the way, so much further he is from the mark, and therefore is made so much more miserable. Wherefore he affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, then to runne out of the way. Finally it is certain that they are euil trees, forasmuch as without the communicating of Christ there is no sanctification. They may therefore beare faire fruities and beautifull to the eye, yea and sweete in taste, but in no wise good fruities. Herby we easily perceiue that whatsoever man thinketh, purposeth, or doth, before that he be reconciled to God by faith, is accursed, and not onely of no value to righteousnes, but of certaine doestruing to damnation. And why disfute we herof as of a doulfull thing, sith it is alreadie proued by the wisdome of the Apostle, that it is impossible that any man may please God with out faith?

But there shall yet appeare a plainer proooke, if the grace of God be in comparision, directly set against the natural state of man. For the Scripture crieth out every where, that God findeth nothing in man whereby he may be prouoked to do good to him, but with his owne free goodnes pruenteeth him. For what can a dead man do to attaine life? But when he lightneth vs with the knowledge of his owne, he is said to raise vs from death, &c to make vs a newe creature. For we see that oftentimes, specially of the Apostle, the goodnesse of God is set forth vnto vs by this title, God (sayeth he) which is rich in mercy, for the great loue wherewith he loued vs, euene when we were dead by sinnes, hath made vs alive together in Christ, &c. In an other place, where vnder the figure of Abraham he entreateth of the general calling of the faithfull, he sayeth: it is God that giueth life to the dead, and calleth those things that are not, as though they were. If we be nothing, what (I beseech you) can we do? Wherefore the Lord strongly beateth down this arrogancie, in the history of Job, in these wordes: who pruenteeth me, &c I shall render it him? for all things are mine. Which sentence Paul expounding applieth it to this, that we should not think that we bring any thing to the Lorde but meere shame of needines and emptines. Wherefore in the place above cited, to prove that wee are come into the hope of salvation by his grace alone, not by workes, he allegeth that we are his creatures because we are new begotten in Christ Jesus, to the good workes which he hath prepared that we hold walke in them. As if he had said: which of vs may boast that he hath with his righteousnesse prouoked God, sith our first power to doe good proceedeth out of regeneration? For as we are made by nature, oyle shall sooner be wrong out of a stone, than a good worke out of vs. Truly it is wonderfull if man being condemned of so great a shame, dare yet say that there remainth any thing with him. Therefore let vs confesse with this noble instrument of God, that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our worke, but according to his purpose and grace: and that the kindness and loue of God our saviour towards vs hath appeared, because he hath enuied vs, not by the worke of righteousness which we have done, but according to his owne mercy: that being justified by his grace, we might be made the heires of eternall life. By this confession we dispoile man of all righteousness even to the least little piece thereof, till he be by only mercy regenerate into hope of eternall life: forasmuch as if the righteousness of worke do bring any thing toward the justifying of vs, it is falsely said y we are justified by grace. Truely the Apostle had not forgotten himselfe, when he affirmed justification to be of free gift, which in an other place reazoneth that grace is now not grace, if works do any thing avail. And what other thing doth the Lord meane, when he faith he came not to call righteous men but sinners? If only sinners are receiued, why seeke we an entry by fained righteousness?

6 Still this same thought hath now, and then recourse to my mind, that it is perilous leaf. I should do wrong to the mercies of God, which do so carefully travaile in prouing of this thing as though it were doubtful or darke. But because our enuiousnes is such, as vnlesse it be most straitly thrust out of place, it never yeeldeth to God that which is his. I am compelled to tary somewhat the longer vpon it. Yet forasmuch as Scripture is clere enough in this matter, I will in fighting rather vse the words of then mine owne. Esay, when he hath described vniversal destruction of mankind, doth immediately after very fitly adioyn the order of reverting. The Lord hath seen, & it seemed evil in his eyes. And he faw, that there is no man; and he marcelled that there is none that offereth himselfe: and he hath set salvation in his owne armes, and hath strengthened himselfe with his owne righteousness. Where are our righteousnesses if it be true which the Prophet saith: that there is no man that helpeth the Lord in recovering his salvation? So an other Prophet, where he bringeth in the Lord, discouering of the reconciling of sinners to himself, saith: I will espousse thee to me for ever, in righteousnesse, judgement, grace and mercie. I will lay to her that hath not obtained mercie, thou haft obtained mercy. If such covenant, which it is certaine to be the first conioyning that we haue with God, standeth vpon the mercie of God, there is left no foundation of our owne righteousness. And I would faine lerne of those men which faine that man meeteth God with some righteousness of worke, whether they thinke that there is any righteousness at all, but that which is acceptable to God. If it be madness to thinke so, what acceptable thing to God can procede from his enemies, whom he wholly abhorreth with all their doinges? That al we, I say, are the deadly and profecled enemies of our God, the truth it felttestiseth, till being justified, we are receiued into friendship. If justification be the beginning of loue, what righteousnesse of worke shall go before it? So John, to turne away that pestilent arrogame, doth diligently put in minde howe we did not first love him. And the selfe same thing the Lord had long before taught by his Prophet: I will love them sayth he, with a free loue, because mine anger is turned. Certainly his loue is not provoked by worke, if it hath of his owne accord inclined it selfe selfe vnto vs. But the rude common sort of men thinke it to be nothing els, but that no man hath deservd that Christ should performe our redemption: yet that to the entering into the possession of redemption, wee be holpen by our owne workes. Yea but howfouer we be redeemed of Christ, yet till we be by the calling of the Father graffed into the communion of him, wee are both heires of darkenesse and death, and the enemies of God. For Paul teacheth that wee are not cleansed and washed from our vncleanneffes by the bloud of Christ, vntill the holy Ghost worketh that cleansing in vs. Which fame thing Peter minding to teach, declareth that the sanctifying of the Spiritte availeth vnto obedience & the sprinkling of the bloud of Christ. If we be by the Spiritte sprinkled with the bloud of Christ vnto cleansing, let vs not thinke that before such watering wee be any other than a finneris without Christ. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that the beginning of our salvation is as it were a certaine resurrection from death to life: because when for Christes sake it is giuen to vs to beleue in him, then we first begin to passe from death into life.

Vnder this sort are comprehended they which haue in the division above seriene noted for the second and third sort of men. For the vncleanneffe of conscience proueth that both of them are not yet regenerate by the Spiritte of God. And againe, whereas there is no regeneration in them, this proueth the want of faith. Whereby appeareth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor yet iustified in his sight: forasmuch as these good things are not attenede to, but by faith. What can finners being estranged from God bring forth, but that which is accursed in his judgment? With this foolish boldnes in deed, both all wicked men are puffed vp, and specially hypocrites, because howsoever they knowe that their whole hart swarmeth full of filthinesse, yet if they do any works they haue a shew of goodnes, they thinke them worthie God should not despise them. Hereof groweth y pertinency of a wicked & mischivous minde, yet they cannot be druen to confess themselves void of righteousnes: but even when they acknowledge themselves vnrighteous, because they cannot deny it, yet they arrogantly claim they some righteousnes vnto them. This vanitie Lord excellently well confirr'd by the prophet: Avoke (faith he) the priifts, saying: if a man carrie sanctified flesh in his hand, & putreth it bread or other meate, shall it be sanctified? The priifts answered: No. And Haggee said: If a defiled man in soule touch any of such these things, shall it be defiled? The priifts answered: it shall be defiled. Haggee said: So is this people before my face, faith the Lord: & so all the works of their handes, and all things they offer to mee shall be defiled. I would to God this saying might either get full credit with vs, or wee be setl'd in our remembrance. For there is no man, though he be otherwise in his whole life neuer so hainous a wicked doer, y can abide to be perfwaded, that which the Lord here plainly pronounceth. The naughtifte man so fone as he hath perfommed one or two doutfull deeds of the law, doubteth not y it shall be accounted to him for righteousness. But y Lord crieth to the contrarie, y there is no sanctification gotten thereby, vnlesse the heart be first well cleansed. And not contented therewith, he affirmeth that al the works whatsoever they be that proceede from finners, as are defiled with uncleanness of the heart. Therefore let the name of righteousnes depart from these worke, which are by the Lordes owne mouth condemned of filthines. And with how fit a similitude doth he use the same? For it might have bene objected, that whatsoever the Lorde had commanded, was inviolably holy. But he on the contrary side setteth against them, that it is no manuell, if those things that are hallowed by the lawe of the Lord, are defiled with the filthinesse of naughtie men: whereas an vncleane hand prophaneth a holy thing with touching it.

8 The same matter he excellently well handlet in Esay, Offer not (faith he) sacrifice in vaine: incense is abomination to me: my soule hateth your Calendes & solemnities. They are become tedious to me, and I haue beene wearie with bearing them: when you fhall holde vp your hands I will turne away mine eyes from you: when you fhall multiply prayer I will not heare; for your hands are full of blood. Be washed, be cleane, take away the euil of your thoughts. What meaneth this? the Lorde so lootheth the obeying of his owne law? Yea, but he here refuseth nothing that is of the natural obseruing of the law, the begining wherof he doth to bee the vnfrained feare of his name. When that is taken away, whatsoever things are offered him are not onely trifles, but thinketh and abominable filth-inesse. Nowe let the hypocrites goe, and keeping peruerfnesse wrapped vp in their heart, endeavouer to deftorre the fauour of God with worke. But by this meanes, they shall more and more prouoke him to wrath. For to him the sacrificies of wicked are abominable, and the onely prayer of vpright men pleaseth him. Therefore we hold that out of doubt, which ought to bee most truely known to him, that is euen but meanely exercized in the Scriptures, that euen those worke that glister mote gloriously in men not yet truely sanctified, are so farre from righteousneses in the sight of the Lord, that they be judged finnes. And therefore they haue said mote truly that haue taught that fauour with God is not procured to any person by worke: but contrariwise that worke do then please, & neuer til then, when the person hath first found grace in the sight of God. And this order is religiously to be kept, to which the scripture leadeth vs by the hand. Moses wrieth that the Lord had respect to Abiel & to his worke. See you not how he declared that God is fauourable to the men, before that he hath respect to their worke? Wherefore the cleansing of the heart must go before, that the worke which come from vs, may be louingly receiued of God: because this saying of Jeremie, he is alway in force, that the worke of God haue respect vnto truth. And that it is only faith by which the hearts of men are cleene, the holy Ghost hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter: whereby it is certaine, that the first foundation is in true and liuely faith.

9 Now let vs looke what righteousnes they haue, whome wee haue set in the fourth degree. We grant that when God by the meanes of the righte-ousnes of Christ, reconcileth vs to his owne, and giveth vs free forgivennesse of finnes, accounteth vs for righteous, with such mercy is also coni oynd this his beneficall doing, that by his holy spirit he dwelleth in vs, by the power whereof the lustes of our flesh are daly more & more mortified, but we are sanctified: that is to say, hallowed to the Lorde vnto true purenes of life, when our heartes are framed to the obedience of the lawe: that this may be our chiefe will, to serue his will, and by all meanes to advance only his glory. But euen while by the guiding of the holy Ghost we walke in the ways of the Lorde, least yet we forgetting our selues should waxe proude, there are left certaine remanentes of imperfection, which may minister vs matter of humilitie. There is none righteous, (faie the Scripture) that doth good and sinnet not. What maner of righteousnes therfore will they yet get by their worke? First I say, that the best worke that can be brought forth of them, is yet alway sprinkled and corrupted with some vncleanesse of the flesh, and hath as it were some dregges mingled with it. I say, let a holy servant of God choose out of all his life the most excellent thing that he shall thinke that he hath done in the whole course thereof, and let him well consider all the partes of it, without doubt he shall finde somewhat somewhat sauoring of the rottennes of the flesh, forasmuch as to doing well our cherefull quickeness is never such as it ought to be, but in slacke our course our weaknesses is much. Although we see that there are euident soule blots wherewith the worke of the holy are bespredd, yet graunt that they be nothing but most little spotses: shall they nothing offende the cies of God, before whom euene the starres are not cleane? Thus haue we shewed that there commeth not so much as one good worke out of holy men, which if it be judged in it selfe, deserueth not iust rewarde of flamme.

10 Secondly I say, that if it were possible, we should haue some throughly pure and perfect works, yet one sinne is enough to blotte out and quench all the remembrance of the former righteousnesse, as the Prophet faieth. With whom also James agreeth: He that offendeth (faith he) in one, is made guilty of all. Now with this mortall life is never pure or void from sinne, whatsoever righteousnes we should purchase, being from time to time with sinnes following corrupted, oppressed and lost, it should not come into the sight of God, nor be accounted to vs for righteousnesse. Finally when the righteousnesse of worke is entreated of, we must not have respect to the worke of the lawe, but to the commandement. Therefore if we seeke righteousnesse by the lawe, we shall in vaine bring forth one or two worke: but a perpetuall obedience of the lawe is there necessary. Wherefore the Lorde doth not but once (as many foolishly thinke) impute to vs for righteousnesse, a strange forgivingnesse of sinnes whereof we have spoken, that haueing once obtained pardon of our life past, we should afterward seeke righteousnesse in the lawe: because he should so doe nothing else but bring vs into a falle hope, and mocke and laugh vs to scorn. For fith no perfection could come to vs so long as we are clothed with this flesh, and fith the law threatneth death & judgement to all them that performe not full righteousneses in worke: it shall alway haue whereof it may accuse and condemn vs, vnlesse the mercie of God on the other side did withstand it, to acquite vs from time to time with continual forgivingnesse of sinnes. Wherefore this standeth alway certain which we say at the beginning, that if we be weied by our owne worthinesse, whatsoever we purpose or go about, yet we with all our travailes and endeavours are worthie of death and destruction.

11 Upon these two pointes we must strongly stande fast: that there was never any worke of a godly man, which if it were examined by the seuerest judgment of God, was not damnable. Again, if there be any such fowed, (which is not possible for man) yet being corrupted and defiled with the sins, wherewith it is certaine that the doer of it is loden, it loseth the grace. And this is the chief point of our disputation. For about the beginning of justification there is no strife betwenee vs and the founder sorte of Scholemen, but that a sinner being freely delivered from damnation obtaineth righteousness, and that by the forgiveness of sins: saying that they under the worde of justification comprehend the running wherewith we are newly formed by the Spirit of God into the obedience of the lawe and they thus describe the righteousness of a man regenerate, that man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Christ, is by good works judged righteous before God, and by their deferuing is accepted. But the Lord contrariwise pronounceth that he imputed to Abraham faith for righteousness, not at the time when he yet served Idols, but when he had already many yeares excelled in holinesse of life. Therefore Abraham had long worshipped God from a pure heart, and had performed the obedience of the lawe which may be performed of a mortall man, yet he hath righteousness repoused in faith. Whereupon we gather, according to the argument of Paul, that it was not of worke. Likewise when it is lyde in the Prophet: The righteous man shall live by faith, it is not spoken of wicked & prophane men, whom the Lorde justifieth by converting them to the faith, but the speach is directed to the faithfull, and to them is promised life by faith. Paul also taketh away all doubt, when for confirming of that sentence, he taketh this verse of David: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiuen. But it is certaine, that David speaketh not of the wicked, but of the faithfull, such as himselfe was: because he spake out of the feeling of his owne conscience. Therfore this blessednes we must not haue once in our life, but hold it throughout all our life. Last of all he refieth that the embassage concerning the free reconciliacion with God is not published for one or two dayes, but is perpetuall in the church. Therefore the faithfull haue even to the ende of their life no other righteousness than that which is there set forth. For Christ everlastinge ly remaineth the Mediatour to reconcile the father to vs, and the effectualnesse of his death is everlasting: namely washing, satisfaction, expiation, finally perfect obedience, wherewith all our iniquities are couered. Neither doth Paul to the Ephesians say, that we haue y beginning of salvation out of grace; but that we are saued by grace, not of works, that no man shold glory.

12. The starting holes which the Scholemen do here seeke to escape by, do not deliver them. They say that good worke are not by inward worthines in themselves of so great value, that they be sufficient to purchase righteousness: but this, that they be of so great value, is of grace accepting them. Then, because they be druen to confesse that the righteousness of worke is in this life alway vnperfect, they graunt that we, so longe as we liue, do neede forgiveness of sinnes, whereby the want of worke may be supplied: but that the defaults which are committed, are recompesed with worke of supererogation. For I answer, that that the accepting grace as thy call it, is none other than is free goodness wherewith the father embraceth vs in Christ.
Christ, when he clotheth vs with the innocencie of Christ, and accounteth the same ours, that by the beneficiall meane thereof he may take vs for holy, pure, and innocent. For, the righteousnes of Christ (which as it only is perfect, so only can abide the sight of God) must be set in our stead, and be presented at the barre as a sinner. Herewith we being furnished, doe obtaine continuall forgiveness of sinnes in faith. With the purenesse hereof our filthinesse and uncleannesse of imperfections being covered are not imputed: but are hidden, as if they were buried, that they may not come into the judgment of God, vntill the houre come when the olde man being slaine and vterly destroyed in vs, the goodness of God shall receive vs into blessed peace with the new Adam, where let vs looke for the day of the Lorde in which in receiuing vncorrupt bodies, we shalbe remoued into the glory of the heauenly kingdom.

If these things be true, verily no workes of ours can of themselves make vs acceptable and pleasing to God: neither can the workes themselves please, but in respect that man being covered with the righteousnesse of Christ, pleaseth God, and obtaineth forgivenesses of his sinnes. For God hath not promised the reward of eternal life to some certaine workes, but only pronounceth that he which doth these things, shall live: setting the notable curse against all them that continue not in all things. Whereby the deuise of righteousnesse in part is largely contusted, with no other righteousnes is admitted into heauen, but a whole obseruing of the law. And no whit fonder is that which they are wonte to babble of supplying of recompence by workes of Supererogation. For why? Do they not still returne to the same place from whence they are already shut out: that he which keepeth the law in part, is by workes so farre righteous? That which no man of sound judgement will grant them, they do too flamelessly take for confessed. So oft the Lorde testifieth that he acknowledgeth no righteousnesse of workes, but in the perfect obseruing of his lawe. What obtinacie is it, that we when we are detirrit of that obseruing, least we should seeme spoyled of all glory, that is, to have altogether gien place to God, do boast our selves of I wot not what small pieces of a fewe workes, and go about by satisfactions to redeeme that which wanteth. Satisfactions have already before bin sufficently ouerthrown, that we ought not now so much as to dreame of them. Only this I say, that they which so play the fools, do not wry how detestable a thing sinne is before God: for truely they should understnde ye the whole righteousnes of men being layde upon a heape, is not sufficient to make recompence for one sinne. For we see that man was by one offence so cast away and abandooned of God, that he therewithall lost all meanes to recover salvation. Therefore the power of Satisfactio is taken away, wherwith they flatter thescules, but surely shall never satisfie God, to whom nothing is pleasant or acceptable that proceedeth from his enemies. And his enemies are al they to whom he purposeth to impute sinnes. Therefore our sinnes must be covered and forgiven, before that the Lorde have respect to any workes of ours. Whereupon followeth that the forgivenes of sinnes is of free grace which they do wickedly blasphe me that trust in any satisfactions. Let vs therefore, after the example of the Apostle, forgetting those things you are behind vs, and hafting forwarde to those things that are before vs, run in our race, endouuring to the price of the race calling.

14 But how doth the boasting of the works of supererogation agree with that rule which is taught vs, that when we have done all things that are commanded vs, we should say that we are unprofitable servants, and that we have done no more than we ought? To say before God, is not to fame or to lie, but to determine with thy selte, that which thou art assured of. The Lorde therefore commanded vs unfaignedly to thinke and consider with our selves, that we doe not any free beneficial doings to him, but to render due service. And worthily. For we are servants endidted in so many services, as we are not able to discharge, although all our thoughtes and all our members, are turned into dutifull deece of the lawe. And therefore that which he sayth. When ye have done all things that are commanded you, &c. is as much in effect, as if they righteousnes of one man were more than all righteousness of men. How therefore may we (of whom there is none that is not most farre distant from this marke) be so bolde as to boast that we have added a heape to the full measure? Neither is there any cause why any man may take exception & say, that nothing with standeth but that his endeouour may proceed beyond necessary duties, which in some behalfs exceedeth those that be from necessitie. For this we must altogether holde, that we can imagine nothing that waileth either to the worship or the loue of God, which is not comprehended under the law of God. If it be a part of the law, let vs not boast of voluntary liberalitie, where we are bound to necessitie.

15 And for this purpose that glorying of Paul is out of seacion alleged: That among the Corinthians he did of his owne will yeilde of his right, which otherwise he might have vfed if he had would, & that he hath employed vp on them not onely so much as he ought of duties, but also hath given them his free trauail beyond the boundes of dutie. But they should haue marked the reason there expressed, that he did this least he should be an offence to the weake. For false and deceitfull workemen did boast them selves with this alluring shewe of liberalitie, whereby they might both procure fauour to their poisonous doctrines, and raife vp hatred to the Gospel, so that Paul was driven of necessitie either to bring the doctrine of Christ into danger, or to meeete with such crafte. Go to: if it be to a christian man an indifferent thing, to run into offence, when he may refraine it; then I grant that the Apostile did somthing of Supererogation for the lorde. But if this were by right required of a wise distributor of the Gospel, then I say that he did that which was his dutie to do. Finally although there appeare no such cause, yet this sayeng of Chryfoftome is alway true, that all our things are in the same case wherein are the proper posseffions of bondmen, which it is certain by the lawe to be due to their Lord. And Christ hath vstered the same in the parable. For he asked what thankes we will give to a bondeseruant when hauing bene all the day trauailed with fundrie labours he returneth home to vs in the evening. But it is possible, that he hath laboured with greater diligence than we durft haue required. Be it so: yet he hath done nothing but that which by his state of bondage he ought, for hee with his whole abilitie is ours. I speake not of what sort their Supererogations are which these men will will boast of to God; for they be trifles, such as he neither hath at any time commanded, nor doth approve them, nor will allow them when account shall be made before him. In this signification only we will grant that they are works of Supererogation, namely of which it is spoken in the Prophet: Ps. 1. 43, 2, Ps. 5. 5, 2, who hath required these things at your hands? But let them remember what is in another place also spoken of these things: Wherefore do ye yet weigh your silver and not in bread? Ye spend your labour and not in being satisfied. It is indeed not verie harde for these idle Rabbines to dispute under the shadowe in a soft chaire: but when the soueraigne judge shall sit in his judgement seat, such windy decrees shall of necessitie vanishe away. This, this was to be sought what affiance of defence wee may bring to his judgement seat, nor what we may talke of in schooles and corners.

16 In this behalfe there are chiefly two pettinesences to be druen out of our mindes: that we put no affiance in the righteousnes of worke: And ye we ascribe no part of glorye to them. The scriptures doe euery where thrust vs from all manner of affiance, when they teach that our righteousness doe stande in faith of God, ynde they receive a good soueraine from the innocence of Christ, and that they can do nothing but provoke the vengeance of God, vnlesse they be suffyeyed by the tendernes of his mercie. Moreover they doe leaue nothing ro vs, but that wee shoulde craue the mercie of our judge with that confession of Davuid, that none shal bee justified before him, if he require account of his servauntes. But where Iob saith: If I haue done Iob, 20, 15, wickedly, woe to me: but if I doe righteously, yet I will not set vp my head: though he meaneth of that most high righteousnesse of God, wherunto the verie Angels answered not: yet hee therewithall sheweth that when they come to the judgement of God, there remaineth nothing for all mortall men, but to holde their peace as dumbe. For it tendeth not onely to this purpose that he had rather willingly yeeld than daungerously strieue with the righteousnesse of God: but he meaneth that hee felt no other righteousnesse in himself, than such as at first moment shoulde fall before the fight of God. When affiance is druen away, all glorying must also necessarily depart. For who can giue the praise of righteousnesse to these worke, the affiance whereof trembleth before the fight of God? We must therefore come whither E- say calleth vs, that all the seede of Israel may be praised & glory in God: because it is most true which he faith in another place, that we are the planting of the glorie of God. Our minde therefore shall then rightly be purged, when it shall neither in any behalfe rest vppon the confidence of worke, nor rejoynce in the glorie of them. But this erroour encouraged foolish men to the putting vp of this false and lying affiance, that they alway set the cause of their saluation in worke.

14 But if wee looke to the foure kindes of caufes, which the Philosophers teach vs to consider in the effect of things, we shall finde that none of them doth accorde with worke in the establishing of our saluation. For the scriptures doth euery where report, that the caufe of procuring the eternall lyfe to vs, is the mercie of the heavenly Father and his free loue towardes vs: that materiall caufe is Christe with his obedience, by which hee purchased righteousnesse for vs. What also shall wee say to bee the formall Or instrumental cause but faith? And these three causes John comprehended together in one sentence, when he saith, GOD so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Sonne, that every one which belieueth in him may not perish, but may have everlasting life. Now the final cause the Apostle testifieth to be both shewing of the righteousnes of God and the praise of his goodnesse: where he rehearseth also the other three in express words. For he faith thus to the Romans: all have sinned and do neede the glorie of God; but they are justified freely by his grace. Here thou haist the head & first fountain, namely that God imbraced vs with his free mercie. Then followeth: By the redemption which is in Christ Iesus. Here thou haist it were the matter whereof righteousnesse is made for vs through faith in his bloode. Here is shewed the instrumental cause, whereby the righteousnesse of Christ is applied to vs. Last of all hee joyneth the ende, when hee faith, vs into the shewing of his righteousnesse that he may be righteous and the rightouesmaker of him that is of the faith of Christ. And (to touch by the way that this righteousnesse (and thenth of reconciliation) he setteth expressly by name, that Christ was gienen to vs for reconciliation. So in the first chapter alio to the Ephesians he teacmeth that wee are receaved of God into fauour by mere mercy: that the same is wrought, by the intercession of Christ: received by faith: all to this ende, that the glorie of the goodnesse of God may fully shine. When we fee that all the parts of our saluation are so without vs, what cause is there that wee should now either have affiance or glorie in worke? Neither can exten the most sworne enemies of the grace of God moue any controuersie with vs about the efficient or finall cause, vnlesse they will denie the whole Scripture. In the Materiall and Formall cause they cau a sable collour, as though our worke haue a halfe place w faith and the righteousnes of Christ. But this also they teach, the Scripture crying out against them, which simple affirme both ye Christ is to vs for righteousnesse and life, and that this benefite of righteousnesse is possest by onely faith.

18 But whereas the holy men do oftentimes strengthen and comfort themselves with remembrance of their owne innocencie and vprightnesse, and sometime also forbeare not to report of it with prayse, that is done two ways: either ye in comparing their good cause with the cuill cause of the wicked, they conceyue thereby assurèd trust of victorie, not so much for commending of their owne righteousnesse, as for the just and deferued condemning of their aduersaries: or that even without comparison of other, while they recorde themselues before God, the purenes of their owne conscience bringeth to them both some comfort and affiance. Of the first of these two wayes, wee shall see hereafter: nowe let vs briefly declare of the latter, how it agreeeth with that which we haue aboue faide, that in the judgement of God we must rest vpon no affiance of worke, and glorie vpon no opinion of them. This is the agreement that the holy ones, when it concerneth the founding and stabilishing of their saluation, doe without respect of worke, bend their eyes to the onlie goodnesse of God. And they doe not onely bend themselves to it afore all things as to the beginning of blessednesse, but do rest therein as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raised and
and stablished, is also stablished with consideration of worke: namely so farre as they are the wittneffinges of God dwelling and raingen in vs. Sith therefore this affiance of worke hath no place, vnlesfe thou haue first cast the whole affiance of thy minde vppon the mercie of God: it ought not to feeme contrarie to that whereupon it hangeth. Wherefore when we exclud the affiance of worke, we meane onely this that a Christian minde may not bowe to the merite of worke as to ye succour of salvation, but should throughly rest in the free promife of righteousnesse. But we forbid it not to vnderprop & strenthen this faith with ye signes of the good will of God toward itfelfe. For if all the good giffes which God hath beftowed vppon vs, when they be recorded in remembrance, are to vs after a certaine manner as it were beames of the face of God, by which wee are enlightened to beholde that soueraigne light of goodnesse: much more is the grace of good worke, which sheweth that the Spirit of adoption is giuen vs.

19 When therefore the holy ones doe by innocencie of conscience confirme their faith, and gather matter of rejoycing, they do nothing but call to minde by the fruites of their calling, that they are adopted of ye Lord into the place of children. This therefore that is taught by Salomon, that in the feare of the Lord is stedfaft assurیدnesse: and this that sometime the holy ones vfe this protestation, to the intent that they may be heard of the Lord, that they haue walked before his face in vprightnesse and simplicitie: haue no place in laying the foundation of stablishing of conscience; but are then onely of value, if they be taken of the ensuing effect: because both that feare is no where which may stablish a full assurیدnesse, and the holy ones are priie in their conscience of such an vprightnesse, wherewith are yet mingled many remnauntes of the flefe. But for asmuch as of the fruites of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghost dwelling in them, they do thereby not flenderly strenthen themfelves to look for the help of God in all their necessitites, when they by experience finde him their father in so great a matter. And even this also they cannot doe, vnlesfe they haue first conceived the goodnesse of God, sealed with no other assurیدnesse, than of the promife. For if they beginne to wey it by good worke, nothing shall be more vnceertaine nor more weake: for asmuch as if worke be considered by themfelves, they shall no leffe by their imperfection shewe proofe of the wrath of God, than they doe with howfoever imperfeft purenesse testifie his good will. Finally they doe so set out the benefites of God, that yet they turne not away from the free fauour of God, in which Paul testifieth that there is the length, breadth, depth, & hight of them: as if he should say, Whitherfoever the lenies of the godly doe turne themfelves, howe he foever they clime, how farre and wide foever they extende them, yet they ought not to goe out of the loue of Christ, but holde themfelves wholly in the meditation thereof, because it comprehendeth all kinds of measures in it. And therefore he faith that it excelleth and surmounteth above all knowledge: & that when we acknowledge howe much Christ hath loued vs, we are fulfilled into all the fulnesse of God. As in an other place, when he glorifieth that all the Godly are vanquishers in battel, he by and by addeth a reason, because of him that loued vs.

Cap. 14.

20 We see nowe that there is not in the holy ones’ affiance of works, which either giueth any thing to the merite of them (forasmuch as they regard them none otherwise than as the gifts of God, whereby they reknowledge his goodnesse none otherwise than as signes of their calling, whereby they maythink upon their election) or which withdraweth not any thing from ye free righteousnesse which we obtaine in Christ, forasmuch as it hangeth vpon it, and standeth not without it. The same thing doeth Augustine in fewe worde, but verie well set out where he wrighteth, I do not say to ye Lord, despite not the workes of my handes, or I haue fought the Lorde with my hands and haue not beene deceived. But, I do not commend the workes of my handes: for I feare, leaft when thou haft looked vpon them, thou haist finde moe sinnes than merits. Only this I say, this I ask, this I desire, despite not the workes of thy handes, beholde in me thy worke, not mine. For if thou beholdest mine, thou damnest mee: if thou beholdest thine, thou crownest me. For allo whatsoeuer good worke I haue, they are of thee. Hec sette the two causes, why he dare not boast of his workes to God, because if he haue any good workes, he feeth therein nothing his owne: secondly, because the same is also overwhelmed with multitude of sinnes. Wher vpon commeth to passe that the conscience feeleth thereby more feare & diying than assurednes. Therefore he would have God no otherwise to looke on his well doings, than that reknowledging in them the grace of his calling, hec may make an end of the worke which he hath begonne.

21 But furthermore whereas ye scripture sheweth that the good workes of the faithfull, are causes why the Lord doeth good to them, that is so to be vnderstended, that ye which we haue before set may stand vnshaken, that ye Effect of our saluation consisteth in the loue of God the Father: the Matter, in the obedience of the Sonne: the iuftiment, in the enlightning of the holy Ghost, that is to say, in faith: that the end is the glorie of the so great kindnesse of God. These things withstande not, but that the Lorde may embrace works as inferiour causes. But whence commeth that? Namely where the Lorde of his mercie hath appointed to the inheritance of eternall life, them with his ordinarie dispensation he doth by good workes bring into the possession thereof. That which goeth before in order of dispensation, he calleth the cause of that which followeth. After this manner he sometime derieth eternall life from works: not for that is to be ascribed to them: but because whom he hath chosn, them he doth iustifie, that he may at length glorifie them, he maketh the grace that goeth before which is a step towards that which followeth, after a certaine maner the cause of it. But so oft as he hath occasion to assigne the true cause, he biddeth vs not to flee to worke, but holde vs in the onely thinking vpon the mercie of God. For what manner of thing is this which he teacheth by the Apostle: The reward of sin is death: the grace of the Lord, is life everlafting? Why doeth he not set righteousnesse in comparison against sinne, as hee setteth life against death? Why doeth he not make righteousnesse the cause of life, as he maketh sinne the cause of death? For so should the comparison of contraries haue stonde wel together, which is much broken by this turning. But the Apostle meant by this comparison to expresse that which was trueth, that death is due to the the deroguinges of men; that life is reposed in the only mercie of God. Finally in these maners of speaking is rather expressed the order than ye cause: because God in heaping graces upon graces, taketh cause of the first to add to the fcondone, that he may leave nothing undone to the enriching of his seruauntes: and he so continually extendeth his liberalitie, that yet he would haue vs alway to looke vnto the free election which is the fountain & beginning of it. For although he loueth ye gifts which he dayly giueth, in somuch as they spring out of that fountain; yet it is our part to holde fast that free acceptance, which alone is able to vpholde our soules: as for such gifts of his Spirite as he afterward giueth vs, so to adioyne them to the first cause, that they minish nothing of it.

That those things that are commonly boasted concerning the merites of workes, doe overthrow as well the præfie of God in giuing of righteousnesse, as also the assureednesse of salvation.

Nowe we haue declared that which is the cheefe pointe in this matter: that because if righteousnesse be vpholde with works, it must needs by and by fall downe before the sight of God, it is contenited in the only mercie of God, the onely communicating of Christ, and therefore in onely faith. But, let vs diligently marke that this is the cheife stay of the matter, leaft wee be entangled with that generall error, not onely of the common people, but also of learned men. For so soone as question is moued of the justification of faith and workes, they flee to those places which seeme to giue to workes some merite in the sight of God: as though the justification of workes were fully wonne, if it be once prooued that they be of any value with God. But wee haue aboue plainly shewed that the righteousnesse of workes consisteth onely in the perfect and keeping of the lave. Whereupon followeth that no man is justified by workes, but he that hauing climbed vp to the hieft top of perfection cannot be prooued giuie of any offence be it never so little. Therefore it is an other & feuerall question: Howesoever workes suffice not to justifie a man, whether yet do they not deserve favor with god?

2. For the name of merite I must needs say this afore hande, that who soeuuer first applied it to workes of men compared to the judgement of God, he did very ill provide for the purenesse of faith. Truely I doe by my good will abstinence from striuces aboue wordes, but I woulde with that this librieties had alway been vsed among Christian writers, it they would not have found in their harts to vs words strange from the scriptures, which vndered much offence & no fruite. For wherefore, I beseech you, was it needfull to haue the name of merit brought in, when the price of good workes might be fitly expressed by an other name without offence? But howe much offence that worde containeth in it, is evident with the great hurt of the world. Surely as it is most proude it can doe nothing but darken the grace of God, and fill men with frowarde pride. The olde writers of the Church, I grante, haue commonly vsed it, and I woulde to God they had not with the abusing of

of one little word given to potevitie matter of error. Howbeit they them felles also doe in manie places teftifie, howe in no case they meant to give any periidue against the truth. For thus faith Augustine in one place, Let merites of men here holde their peace, which have perished by Adam: and let the grace of God raigne, by Iosus Christ. Againe, The saintes giue nothing to their owne Merites: they will giue all to none but to thy mercy, O God. In another place, When man seeth that whatsoever good he hath, he hath it not from himselfe, but from his God, he seeth that all that which is praised in him, is not of his own merits, but of the mercie of God. You see howe taking from men the power of doing well, he also throweth downe the dignitie of merite. And Chrysostome faith, Our workes, if there bee any, which followe the free calling of God, are repayment and debt; but gifts of God are grace and bountifullnesse and the greatnesse of liberal giuing. But leaving the name, let vs rather looke vppon the thing. I haue verily before alleadge a sentence out of Bernard, As it sufficeth to merite, not to presume of Merites: so to want Merites, sufficeth to judgement. But by adding forth with an exposition, he sufficiently mitigateth the hardnesse of the worde, where he faith: Theryfore care thou to haue Merites: when thou haft them, knowe that they are giuen: hope for fuite, the mercie of God: and so thou haft escaped all danger, of pouverie, vnthankfulness, and presumption. Happy is y church which neither wanteth merits without presumption, nor presumpti6 without merits. And a little before he had largely shewed, how godly a meaning he vshed. For of Merites, (faith hee) why should the Church bee carefull, which hath a freedafter and fierer caufe to glorie of the purpose of God? God cannot denie himselfe, he will doe that which hee hath promised.
If there bee no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merites may wee hope for good thinges? specially if thou hearest it faith, Not for your fakes, but for my sake: it sufficeth to Merite, to know that Merites suffice not.

3 What all our workeles doers receive, the Scripture sheweth when it faith that they cannot abide the sight of God, because they are full of vncleneesse: then, what the perfect obseruing of the lawe (if any such could bee found) shall receive, when it teacheth that wee should thinke our felles vnpro-table seruantes when we haue done all thinges that are commanded vs: because wee shall haue giuen nothing freely to the Lorde, but onely haue performed our due seruices, to which there is no thanke to be giuen. But those good workeles which he himselfe hath giuen vs, the Lorde both calleth ours and teftifieth that they are not only acceptable to him, but also that they shall haue rewarde. It is our duetie againe for our part, to bee encouraged with so great a promise, and to gather vp our heartes, that we bee not wearied with well doing, and to yeele true thankfulnessse to so great bounti-fulnesse of G O D. It is vndoubted that it is the grace of God whatsoeer there is in workeles that deserueth praise: that there is not one droppe, which wee ought properly to ascribe to our felles. This if wee doe truely and earnestly acknowledge, there vanishteth away not onely all affiance but also opinion of Merite. Wee (I say) doeth part the praise of good workeles (as the Sophisters doe) betweene G O D and man: but wee reserve it whole, perfecte, and vnminished to the Lorde. Onely this wee affigne

Lib. 3. 260

Signe to man, that even the very same works that were good hee by his uncleannesse corrupteth and deslieth. For nothing commeth out of man, howe perfect soever hee bee, that is not defiled with some spotte. Therefore let the Lorde call into judgement even these things that are best in the works of men: he shall verily eschew in them his owne rightousnesse, but mans dishonesty and shame. Good works therefore do please God and are not unprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receive for reward the most large benefits of God: not because they so deserve, but because the goodness of God hath of it selues appointed this price unto them. But what spitefulnesse is this, that men not contented with that liberalitie of God, which giveth undue rewards to works that deserve no such thing, do with ambition full of sacrilege endeavoured, that which is wholly of the liberalitie of God, may seem to be rendered to his merites of men. Here I appeale to the common judgement of every man.

If any man that hath a taking of profit in a piece of ground by another man liberal grant, do also calme to himselfe the title of proprietie: doth he not by such unthankfulnesse deserve to loose the very felie possession which he had? Likewise, if a bondslawe being made free of his Lord, do hide the benefite of the estate of a Libertine, and boast himselfe to be a freeman borne: is he not worthy to be brought backe into his former bondage? For this is the right vsse of enjoying a benefite, if wee neither calme to our felues more than is giuen, nor do infrade the author of the benefite of his praise: but rather do so behaue our felues, that that which he hath giuen from him selve to vs, may seeme after a certaine manner to remaine with him. If this moderation be to be kept toward men, let all men looke and consider what manner of moderation is due to God.

4. I knowe that the Sophisters do abuse certaine places, to prove therby that the name of Merit toward God is founde in the Scriptures. They allege a sentence out of Ecclesiasticus, Mercy shall make place to every man, according to the Merite of his works. And out of the Epistle to the Hebrews, Forget not doing good and communicating, for with such sacrifices men merite of God. As for my right in resifting the authoritie of Ecclesiasticus, I do now releafe it. Yet I deny that they faithfully allege that which Ecclesiasticus, whatsoever writer he were, hath written. For the Greeke copie is thus: παρείροισιν τον δικαιοσύνην, έκκλησίαν. He shall make place to every mercie, & every man shall finde according to his works. And that this is the true text, which is corrupted in the Latine translation, appeareth both by the framing of these worde: & by a longer ioyning together of the sentence going before. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, there is no cause why they should scarce vs in one little worde, when in the Greeke wordes of the Apostle is nothing else but that such sacrifices doe please & are acceptable to God. This alone ought largely to suffice to subdue & beate downe the outragiousnes of our pride, that wee feare not any worthines to works beyond the rule of Scripture. Now the doctrine of the Scripture is, that all our good works are continually besprinkled with many filthie spottes, wherewith God may be worthily offended & be angry with vs: so farre is it off, y they be able to win him to vs, or to provoke his liberalitie.

toward vs; Yet because he of his tender kindnesse doeth not examine them by extremitie of law, he taketh them as if they were moste pure, and therefore though with out merite, he rewardeth them with infinite benefits both of this present life and of the life to come. For I do not allowe the distin-tion set by men otherwise learned and godly: that good workes deserve the graces that are giuen vs in this life, and that eternal life is the rewarde of faith alone. For the Lorde dooth commonly alway set in heauen the reward of labours and the crowne of battel. Againe, to giue it so to the merite of workes, that it be taken away from grace, that the Lorde heareth vs with graces upon graces, is against the doctrine of the Scripture. For though Christ faith that to him that hath, shalbe giuen, and that the faithfull & good seruant which hath shedde himselfe faithfull in sowe things, shalbe set over many: yet he also sheweth in another place, that the encreases of the faith-full are the gifts of his free goodnes. All ye that thirst (faith he) come to the waters: and ye that haue not money, come & byte milke and home without money and without any exchange. Whatsoeuer therefore is nowe giuen to the faithfull for help of saluation, yea and blessednes it selfe, is the meere liberalitie of God: yet both in this and in those he testifieth that he hath co-rdination of workes: because, to testifie the greatnesse of his loue towards vs, he vouchsaueth to giue vs such honor not only to vs, but also to the gifts which he hath giuen vs.

5 If these things had in the ages past bene handeled & disposed in such order as they ought to have bene, there had never arisen so many troubles & diffusions. Paul faith, that in the building of Christian doctrine, we must keepe stil that fundament which he had layed among the Corinthians, beside which no other can be layed: and that the same foundation is Jesus Christ. What manner of fundament haue we in Christ? is'that he was to vs the beginning of saluation; that the fulfilling thereof should follow of our selues? & hath he but only opened the way, by which wee should go forwarde of our owne strengte? Not so: but, as he said a little before, when wee acknowledge him, he is giuen to vs for righteounesse. No man therefore is well founde in Christ, but he that hath full righteounesse in him: forasmuch as the Aupostle faith not that he was sent to helpe vs to obtaine righteousnes, but that he himselfe might be our righteousnes. Namely, that we are choyen in him from eternitie before the making of the world, by no desirous of ours, but according to the purpose of the good pleasure of God: that by his death wee are redeemed from the damnation of death, and delutered from desuetuti-on: that in him wee are adopted of the heauenly fater into children and heires: that by his bloud wee are reconciled to the Father: that being giuen to him to be kept wee are delivered from peril of perishing and of being loft: that being so engraffed in him, wee are alreadie after a certaine manner partakers of eternall life, being entred into the kingdom of God by hope: and yet more: that hauing obtained such partaking of him, howfoeuer wee be yet foole in our selues, he is wisdome for vs before God: howfoeuer wee be sinners, he is righteousnesse for vs: howfoeuer wee be uncleeane, he is cleane for vs: howfoeuer wee be weak, howfoeuer vnarmed and lying open in danger of Satan, yet ours is the power which is giuen hu him in heaven and earth, whereby he may treade downe Satan for vs, and dripe the gates of hell. Howfoever we still err about with vs his body of death, yet he is life for vs: briefly that all his thinges are ours, & we in him haue all thinges, in our selves nothing. Upon this foundation, I say, it behaueth that we bee builded, if we will encreane into a holy temple to the Lorde.

6 But the world hath a long time beeene otherwaies taught. For there haue beeene found out I wot not what morall good works, by which men may be made acceptable to God before that they be graffed in Christ. As though the Scripture lieth, when it saith, that they are all in death which haue not possessed the Sonne. If they be in death, howe shoulde they bring forth matter of life? As though it were of no more force, that whatsoever is done without faith, is sene: as though there may be good fruits of an euill tree.
But what haue these most pestilent Sophisters left to Christ where in he may shew foorth his power? They say that he hath deserued for vs the first grace, namely the occasion of deservuing: that it is nowe our parte not to faile the occasion offered. O desperate shamelesnesse of vngodlinesse.
Who would haue thought that men professing the name of Christ, durst so strippe him naked of his power, and in a manner tread him vnder foote? This testimonie is ech where spoken of him, that all they are justified that beleue in him: these fellowes teach, that there commeth from him no other benefite, but this, that the way is opened to every man to iustifie himselfe. But I would to God they tasted what these sayings meane: that all they haue life that haue the Sonne of God: that whatsoever beleueth, is already passed from death into life: that we are justified by his grace, we might be made heires of eternall life: that the faithfull haue Christe abiding in them, by whome they cleaue fast to God: that they which are partakers of his life, do fit with him in heavenly places: that they are transplanted into the kingdom of God, and haue obtained saluation and innumerablie other such. For they do not declare, that there commeth by the faith of Christ nothing but the power to obteine righteousnesse or saluation, but that they are both giuen to vs. Therefore so soone as thou art by faith engraffed into Christ, thou art already made the sonne of God, the heire of heauen, partaker of righteousnes, possessor of life, and (that their lies may be better confounded) thou haft not obtained the fit ability to deserrue, but euene all the deservings of Christ: for they are communicated to thee.

7 So the Sorbonicall scholes, the mothers of all erreours, haue taken from vs the iustification of faith which is the summe of all godlinesse. They grant verity in worde, that man is justified by formed faith: but this they afterwarde expound, because good works haue of faith this that they auail to righteousnesse: that they seeme in a manner to name faith in mockage, sith without great euiliousnesse it could not be passed ouer in silence, seeing it is so oft repeated of the Scripture. And not yet contented, they doe in the praise of good works priuely fcape from God somwhat to giue away to man.
Because they see that good works lide auail to advancen man, and that they cannot be properly called Merits, if they be accounted the fruits of the grace of God: they picture them out of the strength of free will, oyl forsooth out of a stone. And they denie not in deede that the principal cause

of them is in grace: but they affirm that thereby is not excluded free will, by which is all merite. And this not onely the latter Sophisters do teach, but also their Pythagoras, Lombard: whom if you compare with these men, you may say to be founde witted and sober. It was truly a pointe of marvellous blindenesse, that when they had Augustine so oft in their mouth, they sware not with how great carefulnesse that man prouided that no pece of the glorie of good workes were it neuer so little, shoule bee conveyed to men. Here before where we entreated of free will, we recited certaine testimonies of his to this purpose, of which sort there are ofetimes founde many like in his writings: as when he forbiddeth vs that we should no where boast of our merites, because euen they also are the gifts of God: And when he writeth, that al our merite is onely of grace, that it is not gotten by our sufficiencie, but is al made by grace, &c. It is no maruell that Lombarde was blinde at the light of the Scripture, in which it appeareth that he was not so well practised. Yet nothing could be desired more plaine against him and his discipiles, than this word of the Apostle, For when he forbiddeth Christians all glorying, he adioyneth a reason why it is not lawful to glory: because we are that handworke of God, created to all good workes, that we should walke in them. Sith therefore there commeth out of vs no good thing, but in so much as we be regenerate: and our regeneration is whole of God without exception: there is no right why we should claime to our selves one ounce in good workes. Finally whereas they continually call vpion good workes, in the meanie time they lo instruct confiences, they neuer dare have affiance, that they haue God well pleased and fauourable to their workes. But contrariwise we, without making any mention of Merite, do yet by our doctrine raise vp the courages of the faithful with singular comforte, when we teach them that in their workes they pleae God, and are undoubtedly acceptted vnto him. Yea and also here we require that no man attempt or go about any worke without faith, that is to say, vnlesse he doe first with afluured confidence of minde determine that he shall please God.

8 Wherefore let vs not suffer ourselves to be led so much as one haire breadth away from this onely foundation: which being laid, wise builders do afterwarde well and orderly bulde vp on it. For if there be neede of doctrine and exhortation, they put men in minde, that the fonne of God hath appeared to this ende, that he might destroy the worke of the dewill: that they should not sinne which are of God, that the time past is enough for the fulfilling of the defires of the Gentiles: that the elect of God are vessels of mercy chosen out vnto honour, which ought to be made cleane from all filthinesse. But all is spoken at once: when it is shewed that Christ will have such discipiles, which forfaking themselves, and taking vp their cross, doe followe him. He that hath forsaken himselfe, hath cut off the roote of all euels, that he may no more seeke those things that are his owne, He that hath taken vp his croffe, hath framed himselfe to all patience and mildenesse. But the example of Christ conteneth both these and all other duties of godlines & holinesse. He shewed himselfe obedient to his father, even to the death: he was wholly occupied in doing the worke of God: he with his whole heart breathed out the glorie of his father; hee gave his foule for his brethren: he both did good and witheld good to his enemies. If there bee neede of comfort, these will bring marvellous comfort, that we be in affliction, but we are not made careful: that we labour, but we are not forsaken: wee are brought low, but we are not confounded: we are thrown downe, but wee do not perish: alwayy bearing about with us in our body the mortifying of Iesus Christ, that the life of Iesus may be manifeestly shewed in vs, that if wee be dead with him, wee shall also live together with him: if wee suffer with him, wee shall also reigne together with him: that we be so fashioned like to his sufferings, till wee attaine to the likenesse of his resurrection: For as much as the Father hath predefinete these to be fashioned like the image of his sonne, whom, in him he hath chosen, that he may be the first begotten among all his brethren: and therefore that neither death, nor present things, nor things to come, shall seuer vs from the loue of God which is in Christ: but rather all things shall turne to vs to good and to saluation. Lo, we do not iustifie a man by workes before GOD: but we say, that all they that are of God, are regenerate and made a new creature, that they may passe out of the kingdome of sinne into the kingdome of righteounesse, and that by this testimonie they make their calling certaine, and are judged as trees by the fruites.

The xv. Chapter.

A confutation of the flanders, whereby the Papistes go about to bring this doctrine in hatred.

With this one worde may the shamelesnesse of certaine vngodly men be confuted which slander vs with saying that wee destroy good workes, and do drawe men away from the following of them, when wee say that they are not iustified by workes, nor doe deuerie saluation: and againe, that wee make too easie a way to righteounesse, when wee teach that it lyeth in the free forgiveness of sinnes, and that wee doe by this enticement allure men to sinne, which are of their owne will too much enclined thereto alreadye. These flanders (I say) are with that one worde sufficiently confuted: yet I will briefly aunswere to them both. They allege that by iustification of faith, good workes are destroyed. I leave unspeaken, what manner of men be these zealous lovers of good workes which do so backbite vs. Let them have licence as freely to rayle as they doe licentiously infect the whole worlde with the filthinesse of their life. They faine that they be grieued, that when faith is so gloriously advanced, workes are druen downe out of their place. What if they be more raised vp, and stablished? For neither do wee dreame of a faith voide of good workes, nor an iustification that is without them. This onely is the difference, that when we confess that faith and good workes doe necessarily hang together, yet wee set iustification in faith, not in workes. For what reaon we do so, we haue in readinesse easily to declare, if wee doe but turne to Christ vnto whom our faith is directed, and from whom it receiueneth her whole strength. Why therefore are we iustified by faith? because by faith wee take hold of the righteounesse of Christ, by which alone wee are reconciled to God. But this thou canst not take holde of, but that thou must also therewithall take hold of sanctification. For he was giuen to vs, for righteousnesse, wisedome, sanctification, and redemption. Therefore Christ justifyeth none whom he doeth not also sanctifie. For these benefits are coupled together with a perpetuall and inseparable knot, that whom he enlighteneth with his wisedome, them he redeemeth: whom he redeemeth, he justifyeth: whom he justifyeth, he sanctifieth. But forasmuch as our question is onely of righteousnes and sanctifying, let vs stay upon these. We may put difference betwenee them, yet Christ containeth them both inseparably in himselfe. Wilt thou therefore obtaine righteousness in Christ? Thou must first possess Christ: and thou canst not possess him, but that thou must be made partaker of his sanctification: because he cannot be borne in pieces. Sith therefore the Lorde doeth graunt vs these benefits to be enjoyed none otherwise than in giving himselfe, he giueth them both together, the one ouer without the other. So appeareth how true it is, that wee are justified not without works, and yet not by works: because in the partaking of Christ, whereby wee are justified, is no lesse contained sanctification than righteousness.

Min 3 this

2 That also is most false, that the minds of men are withdrawn from the affection of well doing, when wee take from them the opinion of meriting. Here by the way the readers must be warned, that they foolishly reason from rewarde to merite, as I shall afterwarde more plainly declare: namely, because they knowe not this principle, that God is no lesse liberal when he assigneth rewarde to workes, than when he giueth power to doe well. But this I had rather difference to the place fit for it. Now it shalbe enough to touch how weake their objection is: which shalbe don two wayes. For first whereas they say that there shalbe no care of well framing of life, but when hope of reward is set before them: they erre quite from the truth. For if this onely be entended when men serue God, that they looke to rewarde, or let out to hire or sell their labors to him, they little preuaile: for God will be freely worshipped, freely loued: he (I say) alloweth that worshipper, which when all hope of receiving reward is cut off, yet celoth not to worship him. Moreover, if men be to be pricked forward, no man can put sharper spurre vnto them, than those that are taken of the ende of our redemption and calling: such as the worde of God spurreth men withall, when it teacheth, that it is too wicked vnhthankfulness, not mutually to loue him againe which first loued vs: that by the bloud of Christ our confciences are cleaned from dead worke, to serue the liuing God: that it is a hainous sacriledge, if being once cleansed, wee defile our selves with newe filthinesse, and prophanse that holy bloud: that wee are delivered from the handes of our enemies, that wee may without feare serue him in holinesse and righteousnesse before him all the daies of our life: that wee are made free from sinne, that we may with a free Spirit folowe righteousness: that our olde man is crucified, that wee may rise againe into newnesse of life: againe, that if wee be dead with Christ (as becommeth his members) wee must fecke those things that are aboue, and must in the world be waifaring men from home, that wee may long towaerd heaven where is our treasure: that the grace of God God hath appeared to this end, that forsaking all ungodliness and worldly desires, we may live soberly, holy, and godly in this world, looking for the blessed hope and the appearing of the glory of the great God and our Saviour: therefore that we are not appointed that we should strive vp wrath to our selves, but that we may obtaine salvation by Christ: that we are the temples of the holy Ghost, which it is not lawful to be defiled: that we are not darkneffe, but light in the Lorde, which must walke as children of light: that we are not called to vncleneannes, but to holinesse: because this is the will of God, our sanctification, that we abstaine from unlawful desires: that our calling is holy, that the name is not fulfilled but with purenesse of life: that we are for this purpose deliuere from sinne, that we should obey to righteousnesse. Can we be pricked forwarde to charity with any more lively argument than that of John, that we shold mutually love one another as God hath louted vs? that herein his children doe differ from the children of the Deuill, the children of light from the children of darknesse, because they abide in love? Againe with that argument of Paul, that we if we cleaue to Christ, are the members of one body, which it is meete to be holpen one of another with mutual duties? Can we be more strongly prouoked to holiness than when wee heare againe of John, that all they that haue this hope, doe sanctifie themselues, because their God is holy? Againe of the mouth of Paul: that haueing the promise of adoption, wee should cleaue our selves from all the defiling of the flesh and spiritue? then when wee heare Christes setting forth himelte for an example vnto vs that we shoulde followe his steppes?

3 And these fewe things I haue set forth for a taske. If I should entende to goe through all, I shoulde be druen to make a long volume. The Apostles are all full of encouragementes, exhortations and rebukings, whereby they may instruct the man of God to euery good worke, & that without any mention of merite. But rather they fetche their chiefe exhortations from this that our salvation standeth vpon the onely mercie of God and vpon no merite of ours. As Paul, after that he hath in a whole Epistle discoursed that there is no hope of life for vs but in the righteousnesse of Christes, when he commeth downe to morall exhortations, he befeecheth them by that mercie of God which he hath vouchsafed to extende to vs. And truly this one cause ought to haue bin sufficient, that God may be glorified in vs. But if any be not so vehemently moued with the glorie of God, yet the remembrance of his beneitures ought to haue bin, most sufficient, to stirre vp such men to do well. But these men, which doe paraduenture with thrusting in of merites beate out some seruile and constrained obediences of the lawe, doe failely say that we haue nothing whereby we may exhorte men to good workes, because we go not the same way to worke. As though God were much delited with such obediences which protesteth that he loueth a cherefull giver, and forbiddeth any thing to be given as it were of heaviness or of necessity. Neither do I speake this for that I doe either refuse or despise that kinde of exhortation, which the Scripture ofteentimes vseth, that it may leaue no meane unattempted euery way to stirre vp our minds. For it rehearseth the rewarde which God will render to euery man according to his works. But I deny that that is the only thing, yea or the chief among many. And then I grant not that we must take beginning thereto. Moreover I affirm that it maketh nothing to the setting up of such merits as these men boast of, as we shall hereafter see. Lastly of all I say that is to no profitable vse, unless this doctrine have first taken place, that we are justified by the only merit of Christ, which is conceived by faith but by no merits of our works, because none can be fitted to the end of holiness, unless they have first digested this doctrine. Which thing also the Prophet verily well signifieth, when he thus speaketh to God: With thee is mercy, that thou mayst be feared. For he sheweth that there is no worshipping of God, but when his mercy is acknowledged, upon which alone it is both founded and established. Which is verily worthie to be noted, that we may knowe not onely that the beginning of worshipping God aright is the affiance of his mercy, but also that the fear of God (which the Papistes will have to be meritorious) cannot have the name of merite, because it is grounded upon the pardon and forgiveness of sinnes.

4. But it is a moste vaine slander, that men are allured to sinne, when wee affirm the free forgiveness of sinnes, in which we say that righteousnesse consisteth. For, wee say that it is of so great value, that it can with no good of ours be recompened, and that therefore it should never be obtained, unless it were freely given. Moreover, that it is to vs in deed freely given, but not so to Christ which bought it so dearly, namely with his owne most holy bloud, besides which there was no price of value enough that might be paid to the judgement of God. When men are taught these things, they are put in minde that it is no thanke to them that the same most holy bloud is not shed for oft as they sinne. Furthermore, wee learne, that our filthinesse is such, as is never washed away but with the fountain of this most pure bloud. Ought not they that hear these things, to conceive a greater horror of sinne, than if it were saide that it is wiped away with the sprinkling of good works? And if they have any thing of God, howe can they but dread being once cleansed, to wallowe themselves againe in the mire, as much as in them lieth to trouble and infect the purenesse of this fountain? I have washed my feete (faith the faithful soule in Salomon) howe shall I againe defile them? Nowe it is evident, whether fort doth both more abace the forgiveness of sinnes, and do more make vile the dignitie of righteousness. They babble that God is appeased with their owne trifling satisfactions, that is, their dounge: Wee affirm that the giltine of sinne is more grievous than can be purged with so light trifles: that the displeasure of God is more heauie than can be released with these satisfactions of no value, and that therefore this is the prerogative of the only bloud of Christ. They say that righteousness (if it faile at any time) is restored and repaired by satisfactorie workes: wee thinke it more precious than that it can be matched with any recompence of workes, and that therefore for the restoring thereof wee must flee to the onely mercie of God. As for the rest of those things that pertaine to the forgiveness of sinnes, let them be sought out of the next Chapter.
Nowe let vs also go through the other argumentes wherewith Satan by the souldiers of his garde, goeth about either to ouerthrowe or batter the justification of faith. This I thinke we haue already wrung from the slaunderers, that they can no more charge vs as enemies of good workes. For, justification is taken away from good workes, not that no good workes should be done, or that those which be done should be denied to be good, but that we should not put affinuice in them, nor glorie in them, nor ascribe salvation vnto them. For this is our affiance, this is our glory, and the only author of our salvation, that Christ the sonne of God is ours, and we likewise are in him the sonnes of God, and heires of the heavenly kingdom, being called by the goodnesse of God, not by our owne worthinesse, into the hope of eternall blessednesse. But because they doe beside these affaire vs, as we haue sayde, with other engines, goe to, let vs go forward in beating away these also. First they come backe to the promises of the lawe, which the Lorde did set forth to the keepers of his lawe: and they ask whether we will haue them to be utterly voyde or effectuall. Because it were an absurditie and to be scorned to say that they are voyde, they take it for confessed that they are of some effectuallnesse. Hereupon they reason that we are not justified by only faith. For thus faith the Lord: And it shalbe, if thou shalt here these commandements and judgements, and shal keepe them and do them, the Lord alfo shal keepe with thee his covenante and mercy which he hath sworn to thy fathers, he shal loue thee and multiply thee, and bleffe thee, &c. Againe, If ye shal well direct your wayes and your endeauours, if ye walk not after strange Gods, if ye do judgemenbetwene man and man, and go not backe into malice, I will walke in the meddle of you. I will not recite a thousande pieces of the same sort, which sith they nothing differ in sense, shalbe declared by the solution of these. In a summe, Moses testifieth that in the lawe is set forth blessing and curse, death and life. Thus therefore they reason, that either this blessing is made idle and frutelesse, or that justification is not of faith alone. We haue already before shewed, howe if we sticke fast in the lawe, ouer vs being destitute of all blessing, hangeth onely curse which is threatened to all transgressors. For the Lord promiseth nothing but to the perfect keepers of his lawe, such as there is none found. This therefore remaineth, that all mankinde is by the law accused, and subject to curse & the wrath of God: from which that they may be loosed, they must needes goe out of the power of the law, and be as it were brought into libertie from the bondage thereof: not that carnall libertie which shoulde drawe vs from the keeping of the lawe, should allure vs to thinke all things lawfull and to suffer our lust, as it were the staiies being broken and with loose reins to run at riot: but the spiritual libertie, which may comfort and raise vp a dismayed and ouerthrown conscience, shewing it to be free from the curse and damnation wherewith the lawe helde it downe bounde and faste yed. This deliverance from the subiection of the lawe, and Manumission (as I may call it) wee obtaine when by fayth wee take holde of the mercy of God.
God in Christ, whereby we are certified and assured of the righteousness of sins, with the feeling whereof the lawe did pricke and bite vs.

2 By this reason even the promises that were offered vs in the law, should be all effectuall and voyde, vnlesse the goodness of God by the Gospel did helpe. For, this condition that we keepe the whole lawe, ypon which the promises hang, and whereby alone they are to be performed, that never be fulfilled. And the Lorde so helpe them, not by leasing part of righteousnes in our worke, and supplying parte by his mercifull bearing with vs, but when he setteth onely Christ for the fulfilling of righteousnesse. For the Apostle, when he had before sayde that he and other Ivewes beleueu in Jefus Christ, knowing that man is not iustified by the worke of the lawe, adddeth a reason: not that they should be holpen to fulnesse of righteousnesse by the faith of Christ, but by it should be iustified, not by the worke of the lawe. If the faithfull remove from the lawe into faith, that they may in faith finde righteousnesse which they see to be absent from the lawe: truly they forfake the righteousnesse of the lawe. Therefore now let him that lieth, amplifie the rewardinges which are faide to bee prepared for the keeper of the lawe, so that he therewithall consider that it commeth to passe by our peruernesse, that we seele no fruitue thereof till we haue obtained an other right-ouesnesse of faith. So David, when he made mention of the rewarding which the Lorde hath prepared for his servantes, by and by descendeth to the reknowledging of finnes, whereby that same rewarding is made voyde. Also in the xix. Psalme, he gloriously setteth forth the benefites of the lawe, but he by and by crieth out: Who shall understand his faults? Lord cleanse me from my secret faults. This place altogether agreeth with the place before, where when he had sayd that all the wayes of the Lord are goodnes & truth to them that feare him, he addeth: For thy names sake Lord, thou shalt be mercifull to my peruerfenesse, for it is much. So ought we also to reknowledge, that there is in deede the good wil of God set forth vs in thy lawe, if we might deferue it by worke, but that the same never commeth to vs by the differencing of worke.

3 How then? Are they guen that they should vanish away without fruit?
I haue euene nowe already protested that the same is not my meaning. I say verily that they vter not their effectuallnesse toward vs, so long as they haue respect to the merite of worke, and that therefore if they be considered in themselues, they are after a certaine manner abolifhed. If the Apostle teacheth that this noble promise: I haue guen you commaundements, which who so small do small live in them, is of no value if we stand still in it, and shall never a whit more profit than if it had not beene guen at all: because it belongeth not euene to the most holy servantes of God, which are all far from the fulfilling of the lawe, but are compassed aboute with many transgressions. But when the promises of the Gospel are put in place of them, which do offer free forguenesse of finnes, they bring to passe that not onely we our selues be acceptable to God, but that our worke also haue their thankes: & not this only, that the Lord accepteth them, but also extendeth to them the blessings which where by covenant due to the keeping of thy lawe. I grant therfore, that those things which the Lorde hath promised in his lawe to the followers
followers of righteousnesse and holinesse, are rendred to the workes of the faithful; but in this rendring the cause is alwayes to be considered that powrth grace to workes. Now causes we see there be three. The first is, that God turning away his sight from the workes of his ferauantes, which alway deseure rather reproch then praiue, embraceth them in Christ, and by the onely meane of faith reconcileth them to himselfe without the meane of workes. The seconde, that of his fatherly kindnesse and tender mercifullnes, he lifteth vp workes to so great honour, not weyng the worthines of them, that he accounteth them of some value. The third, that he receiueth the very same works with pardon, not imputing the imperfection, whereof they al being defiled, should otherwise be rather reckned among sinnes then vertues. And hereby appeareth how much the Sophisters haue ben deceived, which thought they had gaily escaped al absurdities when they said workes do not of their owne inward goodnesse availe to deserve saluation, but by workes of the couenant, because the Lord hath of his liberalitie so much esteemed them. But in the meanesse of time they considered noe, howe farre those workes which they would have to be meritorious, were from the condition of the promises, vnles there went before both justification grounded vpon onely faith, and the forgiuences of sinnes, by which eu en the good works themselves haue neede to be wiped from spottes. Therefore of three causes of Gods liberalitie, by which it is brought to passe that the workes of faithfull are acceptable, they noted but one, and suppressed two, yea and thofe the principall.

4 These alledge the saying of Peter, which Luke rehearseth in 8 Acts: I finde in truth that God is not an accepter of persons: but in euery nation he that doth righteousnesse is acceptablc to him. And hereupon they gather that which seemeth to be vndoubted, that if man doeth by right endeuours get himselfe the fauour of God, it is not the benefcial gite of God alone that he obteineth saluation; yea that God doeth so of his mercie helpe a finner, that he is by workes bowed to mercie. But you can in no wise make the Scriptures agree together, vnlesse you note a double accepting of man with God. For, such as man is by nature, God findeth nothing in him whereby he may be inclined to mercie, but onely miserie. If therefore it bee certaine that man is naked and neede of all goodnesse, and on the other full stuffed and loden with al kindes of euils, when God first receiueth them: for what qualitie, I pray you, shall we say that he is worthie of the heavenly calling? Away therefore with the vaine imagining of merites, where God so evidently setteth out his free mercifullnesse. For, that which in the same place is saide by the voice of the Angels to Cornelius, that his prayers and almes had ascended into the sight of God, is by these men most lewdly wrestted, that man by endeauour of good workes is prepared to receive the grace of God. For it must needs be that Cornelius was alreadie enlightened with the spirit of wisdome, and he was endued with true wisdome, namely with the face of God: that he was sanctified with the same Spiritte, sith he was a follower of righteousnesse, which the Apostle teacheth to be a most certaine fruit thereof. All these things therefore which are said to have pleased God in him, he hath of his grace, so farre is it of that he did by his owne endeauour prepare prepare himselfe to receive it. Truely there cannot one syllable of the scripture be brought forth, that agreeeth not with this doctrine, that there is none other cause for God to accept man unto him, but because hee feeth that man should be euerie way loft, if hee be left to himselfe: but because hee will not haue him lopt, hee vseth his owne mercie in delievering him. Nowe wee see howe this accepting hath not regard to the righteousnesse of man, but is a mere token of the goodnesse of God towarde men being miserable & most vnworthie of so great a benefite.

5 But after that the Lorde hath brought man out of the bottomlesse depth of destruction, and feuered him to himselfe by grace of adoption: because he hath new begotten him and newly formed him into a newe life, he now embraceth him, as a newe creature with the gifts of his spirit. This is that accepting whereof Peter maketh mention, by which the faithfull are after their vocation allured of God even in respect also of works: for the Lord cannot but loue & kisfe those good things which he worketh in them by his Spirit. But this is alway to be remembred, that they are none otherwise acceptable to God in respect of works, but in as much as for their cause & for their fakes, whatsoever good workes he hath giuen them in encreasing of his liberalitie, he alfo vouchfaeth to accepte. For whence haue they good workes, but because the Lorde, as he hath chofen them for vessels vnto honour, so will garnish them with true godlinesse? Whereby alfo are they accounted good, as though there were nothing wanting in them, but because the kinde Father tenderly graunteth pardon to those deformities and spottes that cleaue to them? Summarily, he signifieth nothing els in this place, but that to God his children are acceptable and louely in whom he feeth the marks and features of his owne face. For we haue in another place taught that regeneration is a reparing of the image of God in vs. For as much as therefore wherefoever the Lord beholdeth his owne face, he both worthily loueth it and hath it in honour: it is not without cause saide, that the life of the faithfull being framed to holines & righteousness pleath him, but because the godly being clothed with mortall flesh, are yet sinners, and their good workes are but begunne and sauouring of the faultinesse of the flesh: he can not be favourable neither to those nor to thee, vnlesse hee more embrace them in Christe than in themselues. After this manner are those places to be taken, which testifie that G O D is kinde and mercifull to the followers of righteousnes. Moses faide to the Israelites, Deut. 7-9.

The Lorde thy God keepest couenant, to a thousande generations: which sentence was afterward vfed of the people for a common maner of speach.

1. King. 8-23.
So Salomon in his solemn prayer, faith, Lord God of Irael, which keepest couenant and mercie to thy seruauntes which walke before thee in their whole heart. The same wordes are also repeted of Nehemias. For, as in al the couenants of his mercie, the Lord likewise on their behalfe required of his seruauntes vprivrighentnesse and holines of life, that his goodnesse should not be made a mockerie, and that no man swelling with vaine rejoyefing by reason thereof shoulde bleffe his owne soule, walking in the meane time in vperterfnesse of his owne heart: so his will is by this way to keepe in their dutie thome that are admitted into the communion of the couccovenent: yet neuertheless the covenent it selfe is both made at the beginning free, and perpetually remaineth such. After this manner David when he glorifieth that there was rendred to him rewarde of the cleaneffe of his handes, yet omitteth not that fountaine which I haue spoken of, that he was drawn out of the wombe, because God loued him: where he fotteth out the goodnes of his covenent, that he abateth nothing from the freemercy which goeth before all gifts, whereof it is the beginning.

6 And here by the way it shall be profitable to touch what these forms of speaking doe differ from the promises of the lawe. I call promises of the lawe, not those which are eche where commonly written in the bookes of Moses:(for as much as in them also are found many promises of the Gospel) but those which properly belong to the ministerie of the lawe. Such promises, by what name so ever you lift to call them, doe declare that there is rewarde ready vpon condition, if thou doe that which is commandd thee. But when it is sayde, that the Lord keepeth the covenent of mercie to them which love him,thcrcin is rather shewed what manner of men be his seruants which haue faithfully receiued his covenant, than the cause is expressed why the Lorde shoule doe good to them. Nowe this is the manner of shewing it. As the Lord vouclafseth to graunt vs the grace of eternal life, to this ende that he should be loued, feared, and honored of vs: so whatsoever promises there are of his mercie in the Scriptures, they are rightfully directed to this, and that we shoule reuerence and worship the author of the benefites. So oft therefore as we heare that he doth good to them that kepe his lawe, let vs remember that the children of God are there signified by the duetie which ought to be continuall in them: that we are for this cause adopted, that we shoule honour him for our Father. Therefore leaft we should disshirite our priviledges from the right of adoption we must alway endewour to this whereunto our calling tendeth. But let vs againe kepe this in minde, that the accomplisment of the mercie of God hangeth not vpon the works of the faithfull: but that he therefore fulfilleth the promise of salvation to them which aunswere to their calling in uprighnesse of life, becaus in them he acknowledgeth the natural tokens of his children which are ruled with his Spirite vnto good. Hereunto let that be referred which is in the xv. Psalm spoken of the Citizens of the Church, Lorde who shall dwell in thy tabernacle, and who shall rest in thy holy hill? The innocent in handes and of a cleane heart, &c. Againe in Efaie, Who shall dwell with deuouring fire? He that doth righteoufneffe, he that speaketh right things, &c. For there is not described the stay whereupon the faithful may stand before the Lord, but the manner wherewith the most mercifull father bringeth them into his fellowship, and therein defendeth and strengtheneth them. For, because he abhorreth finne, he loueth righteoufneffe: whom he ioyneth to himselfe, them he cleaneth with his Spirite, that he may make them of like fashion to himselfe and his kingdom. Therefore if the question bee of the first cause whereby the entrie is made open to the holy ones into the kingdom of God, from whence they haue that they may stand fast & abide in it, we haue this aunswere ready, because the Lorde by his mercie both hath once adopted them, and perpetually defendeth them. But if the question be of the manner, then we must come downe to regeneration & the fruits thereof, which are rehearsed in that Psalm.

7 But there seemeth to be much more hardnesse in these places, which doe both garnish good works with the title of righteousnesse, and affirmeth that man is justified by them. Of the first sorte there be very manie places, where the offeruings of the commandements are called justifications or righteousnesse. Of the other sorte, that is an example which is in Moses, This shalbe our righteousnesse, if we keepe all these commandments. And if thou take exception and saye that this is a promise of the law, which being knitt to a condition impossible, proueth nothing. There be other of which you can not make the same aunswer, as this: And that shalbe to thee for righteousnesse before the Lord, to redeliver to the poore man his pleadge, &c. Againe, that which the Prophete faith, that the zeale in reuenging the shame of Israel, was imputed to Phinees for righte-ousnesse. Therefore the Pharisees of our time thinke that here they have a large matter to triumph vpon. For when we say, that when the righteousnesse of faith is set vp, the justification of worke giueth place, by the same right they make this argument: If righteousnesse be of worke, then it is false that we are justified by faith onely. Though I grant that the commandements of the lawe are called righteousnesse: it is no maruell: for they are so in deede. Howe be it we must warne the readers that the Grecians have not costly translated the Hebrew worde θεμον, Diκαι-ωματα, righteousnesse for commandements. But for the worde, I willyingly release my quarrell. For neither doe we deie this to the lawe of G O D, that it containeth perfect righteousnesse. For although, because we are detters of all the things that it commandeth, therefore even when we have performed ful obedience thereof, we are vnprofitable servants yet because the Lord vouchsafed to grant it the honour of righteousnesse, we take not away that which he hath giuen. Therefore wee willingly conseffe that the full obedience of the lawe is righteousnesse, that the keeping of euery commandement, is a parte of righteousnesse, if so be that the whole summe of righteousnesse were had in the other partes also. But wee denye that there is any where any fuch forme of righteousnesse. And therefore we take away the righteousnesse of the lawe, not for that it is maimed and vnperfect of it selfe, but for that by reason of the weakeinesse of our fleshe it is no where seen. But the Scripture not onely calleth simply the commandements of the Lord, righteousnesse: but it also giueth this name to the workes of the holy ones. As when it reporteth that Zacharie and his wife walked in the righteousnesse of the Lord: truely when it fo speaketh, it weyeth workes rather by the nature of the lawe, than by their owne proper state. Howbeit here againe is that to be noted, which I even now fayd, that of the negligence of the Greek tranflatour is not a lawe to be made.
But for asmuch as Luke woulde alter nothing in the received translation, I wil also not strue about it. For God hath commanded these things that are in the lawe to men for righteousnesse: but this righteousnesse we performe not but in keeping the whole lawe: for by every trangression it is broken.
Whereas therefore the lawe doth nothing but prescrie righteousnesse: if we have
The grace of Christ.

Lib. 3.

haue respect to it, all the severall commandements thereof are righteousness: if we haue respect to men of whom they are done, they doe not obtaine the praife of righteousness by one worke, being trespassers in many, and by that same worke which is ever partly faultie by reason of imperfection.

8 But nowe I come to the seconde kinde, in which is the cheefe hardnese. Paul hath nothing more strong to proue the righteousness of faith, than that which is written of Abraham, that his faith was imputed to him for righteousness. Sith therefore it is saide that the act done by Phinees was imputed to him for righteousness; what Paul affirmeth of faith, the same may we al.so conclude of worke. Whereupon our adversaries, as though they had wonne the victorie, determine that wee are indeed not justified without faith, but that wee are also not justified by it alone, and that worke accomplisheth our righteousness. Therefore here I beeche the godly, that if they know that the true rule of righteousness is to be taken out of the Scripture onely, they will religiously and earnestly wey with mee, howe the scripture may without cauillations be rightly made to agree with itself.

For as much as Paul knewe that the justification of faith is the refuge for them that are destitute of their owne righteousness, hee doeth boldly conclude that all they that are justified by faith, are excluded from the righteousness of worke. But sith it is certaine that the justification of faith is common to all the faithfull, hee doth thereof with like boldnese conclude that no man is justified by worke, but rather contrariwise that men are justified without any helpe of worke. But it is one thing to dispute of what value worke are by themselfes, and another thing what account is to bee made of them after the stablishing of the righteousness of faith. If wee shall set a price vpon worke according to their worthinesse, wee fay that they are unworthy to come into the sight of God: and therefore that man hath no worke whereof he may glory before God: then, that being spoyled of all help of worke he is justified onely faith. Nowe wee define righteousness thus, that a sinner being receiued into the communion of Christ, is by his grace reconciled to God, when being cleansed with his blood hee obteineth forgiveness of sinnes, & being clothed with his righteousness as with his owne, he standeth assured before the heavenny judgement seat. When the forgive ness of sinnes is fet before, the good worke which followe haue nowe another valuation than after their owne deseruing: because what soever is in them vnperfect, is covered with the perfection of Christ: whatsoever spots or filthinesse there is, it is wiped away with his cleanness, that it may not come into the examination of the judgement of God. Therefore when the gilines of all trespasses is blotted out, whereby men are hindered that they can bring forth nothing acceptable to God, and when the fault of imperfection is buried, which is wont also to defile good worke: the good worke which the faithfull doe are compted righteous, or (which is all one) are imputed for righteousness.

9 Nowe if any man object this against me to affaile the righteousness of faith, first I will aske whether a man be compted righteous for one or two holy holy works, being in the rest of the works of his life a trespasser of the lawe. This is more than an absurditie. Then I will aske if hee be counted righteous for many good works, if he be in any part founde guiltie. This also hee shall not bee so bolde to affirme, when the penall ordinance of the lawe crieth out against it, and proclameth at them accursed which haue not fulfilled all the commandements of the lawe to the uttermost. Moreover, I will goe further and aske, whether there be any worke that deserueth to be accused of no uncleanesse or imperfection. And howe couold there be any such before those eyes, to whom euere the verie starrs are not clean enough, nor the Angels righteous enough? So shal he be compelled to grant that there is no good worke which is not so defiled with transgressions adjoyned with it, and with the corruptneffe of it selfe, that it can not haue the honour of righteounnes. Nowe if it be certaine that it proceedeth from the righteoundesse of faith that works which are otherwise vnpure, unclean, and but halfe worke, not worthy of the light of God, much lesse of his lour, are imputed to righteoundesse, why doe they with boastings of the righteounesse of works destroy the iustification of faith, whereas if this iustification were not, they shulde in vaine boast of that righteounesse? Will they make a vipers birth? For thereto rend the saying of the vngoodly men. They can not deny that the iustification of faith is the beginning, foundation, cause, matter, and substance of the righteounesse of worke: yet they conclude that man is not iustified by faith, because good works also are accounted for righteounes. Therefore let vs let passe these follies and confesse as the truth is, that if the righteounesse of worke of what sorte so ever it be accounted, hangeth vpon the iustification of faith, it is by this not onely nothing minished but also confirmed, namely whereby the strength there of appeareth more mightie. Neither yet let vs thinke that worke are so recommended after free iustification, that they also afterward come into the place of iustifying a man, or doe parte the office betweene them and faith. For vnlese the iustification remaine alway whole, the uncleanes of worke shall be vncovered. And it is no absurditie, that a man is iustified by faith that not only he himelsey is righteous, but also his worke are esteemed righteous about their worthines.

After this manner we will grant in worke not onely a righteounesse in partes (as our aduersaries themselues would haue) but also that it is allowed of God as if it were a perfect & ful righteounes. But if we remember vpon what foundation it is vpholden, al the difficultie shall be dissolved. For then and not till then it beginneth to bee an acceptable worke, when it is receiued with pardon. Nowe whence commeth pardon, but because God beholdeth both vs and all our things in Christ? Therefore as we, when we are graffed into Christ, doe therefore appear righteous before God, because our wickednesse are couered with his innocence, so our worke are & be taken for righteous, because whatsoever faultinesse is otherwise in them, being buried in the cleannesse of Christ, it is not imputed. So we may rightfully say, that by onely faith not onely we but also our worke are iustified. Nowe if this righteounesse of worke of what sorte soever it bee, hangeth vpon faith and free iustification, and is made of it, it ought to bee included.

ded under it, and to be set under it as the effect under the cause thereof, as I may so call it: so farre is it of that it ought to be raised vp either to destroy or darken it. So Paul to drive men to confesse that our blessednesse consisteth of the mercie of God, not of workes, chiefly enforceth that saying of David, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sinnes are covered. Blessed is he to whom the Lorde hath not imputed sinne. If any man do thrust in to the contrary innumerable sayings wherein blessednesse seemeth to be gien to worke: as are these: Blessed is the man which feareth the Lord, which hath pitie on the poore, which hath not walked in the counsel of the wicked, which beareth temptation: Blessed are they which keepe judgement, the vndele, the poore in Spirite, the meke, the mercifull, &c. they shall not make but that it shalbe true which Paul faith, For because those things that are there commended are newer so in man, that he is therefore allowed of God, it followeth that man is alway miserable, vnlesse he be deliuered from miserie by forgivingnesse of sinnes. For as much as therefore all the kindes of blessednesse which are extolled in the Scriptures, do fall downe voide, so that man receiueth fruite of none of them, til he haue obtained blessednesse by forgivingnesse of sinnes, which may afterward make place for them: it followeth that this is not onely the hieft & the chiefe but also the only blessednesse: vnlesse paraduerture you will haue that it be weakened of those which consist in it alone. Nowe there is much less reason why the calling of men righteous shoulde trouble vs, which is commonly gien to the faithfull. I grant verily that they are called righteous of the holinesse of life: but forasmuch as they rather endeuour to the following of righteousnes, than do fullfill righteousness it selfe, it is meeete that this righteousnes such as it is, giue place to the justification of faith, from whence it hath that which it is.

II. But they say that we haue yet more businesse with Iames, namely which with open voice fighteth against vs. For he teacheth both that Abraham was justified by workes, and also that all we are justified by workes, not by faith only, What then will they draw Paul to fight with Iames? If they hold Iames for a minister of Christ, his saying must be so taken that it disagree not from Christ speaking by the mouth of Paul, The holy Ghost affirneth by the mouth of Paul, that Abraham obtained righteousnes by faith, not by workes; and we also do teache that all are justified by faith without y workes of the law. The same holy Ghost teacheth by Iames that both Abrahams righteousnes & ours consisteth of works, not of only faith. It is certaine that the holy Ghost fighteth not with himselfe, What agreement shall there be therefore of these two? It is enough for the aduerfaries, if they pluck the righteousnesse of faith which we would haue to be fastened with moiste deepe rootes, but to render to confidences their quietenesse, they haue no great care. Whereby verily you may see that they gnawe the justification of faith, but in the mean time do appoint no marke of righteousnesse where confidences may stay. Therefore let them triumph as they lift, so that they may boast of no other victorie than that they haue taken away all certaine of righteousnesse. And this wretched victorie they shall obtaine, where the light of trueth being quenched, the Lord shal suffer them to over-spread spread the darkness of lies. But wheresoeuer the truth of God shall stand, they shall nothing prejudice. I deny therefore that the saying of Iames which they still continually hold up against us as it were the shield of Achilles doth any thing at all make for them. That this may be made plaine, first wee must looke at the market that the Apostle shooteth at: and then we must note where they be deceived. Because there were then many (which mischief is wont to be continual in the Church) which openly bewrayed their infidelity, in neglecting and omitting all the proper workes of the faithfull, and yet caualled not to boast of the false name of faith: Iames doeth here mock the foolish boldnes of such men. Therefore it is not his purpose in any point to diminish the force of true faith, but to shewe how fondly those triflers did chalenge so much the vaine image of it, that being contented herewith they carelessly ranne disolutely abroade into all licentiousnes of vices. This ground being conceived, it shalbe easie to perceive where our aduersaries do misle. For they fell into two deceits in the worde, the one in the name of faith, the other in the word of justification. Whereas the Apostle nameth faith a vaine opinion farre distant from the trueth of faith, it is spoken by way of granting, which is no derogation to the matter: which he sheweth at the beginning in these words. What profiteeth it, my brethren, If any man say y he hath faith, & hath no works: He doth not say, if any haue faith without works, but, If any man boast. More plainly also he speaketh a little after, where he in mockerie maketh it worse than the devils knowledge: last of all, when he calleth it dead. But by the definition you may sufficiently perceive what he meaneth. Thou belieuest (faith he) that there is a God. Truely, if nothing be contained in this faith but to beleue that there is a God, it is now no marucile if it do not justify. And when this is taken from it, let vs not thinke that any thing is abated from the Chrifian faith, the nature whereof is farre otherwise. For after what manner doth true faith justify vs, but when it coniowneth vs with Chrift, that being made one with him wee may enjoy the partaking of his righitouffnesse? It doth not therefore justify vs by this that it conceueth a knowledge of the being of God, but by this that it refeth upon the assurednes of the mercy of God.

12 We haue not yet the worke, vnlesse we examine also the other deceit in the word, forasmuch as James setteth part of justification in works. If you will make Iames agreeing both with the rest of the Scriptures, & thimself, you must of necellitie take the worde of Justifying in an other signification than it is taken in Paul. For Paul faith y wee are justified, when the remembrance of our vnrightouffnesse being blotted out, we are accounted righteous. If Iames had meant of that taking, he had wrongly alleaged that out of Moses: Abraham beleued God, &c. For he thus frameth it togethier. Abraham by works obtained rightouffnes, because he sticked not at y commandement of God, to offer vp his sonne. And so the Scripture was fulfilled which faith, that he beleued God, and it was imputed to him for rightouffnes. If it be an absurditie, that the effect is before his cause, either Moses doth in that place falsely testify, that faith was imputed to Abraham for rightouffnes: or he defered not rightouffnes by that obedience which he sheweth in offering vp of Isaac. Abraham was justified by his faith, when Ifmael was not yet conceived, which was now grown past childhood before that Isaac was borne. How therefore shall we say, that he got to himselfe righteousness by obedience which followed long afterward? Wherefore either James did wrongfully misturne the order (which it is a wickedness to think) or he meant not to say he was justified, as though he desired to be accounted righteous. How then? Truly it appeareth that he speaketh of the declaration of righteousness & not the imputation: as if he had said: Who so are righteous by true faith, they do proue their righteousness with obedience & good works, not with a bare & imaginalke fivor of faith. In a summe, he disputeth not by what meanes we are justified, but he requireth of the faithful a working righteousness. And as Paul affirmeth that men be justified without the help of works: so James doeth here suffer them to be accounted righteous which want good works. The considering of this end shal deliver vs out of all doubt. For our adversaries are hereby chiefly deceived, if they thynke that James defineth the manner of justifying, whereas he traduiceth about nothing else but to overthrow their peruerse carelesnes, which did vainly pretend faith to excufe their despifing of good works. Therefore into how many ways focuer they wret the words of James, they shall wring out nothing but two sentences: that a vaaine bodilie shewe of faith doth not justifie, and that a faithful man not contented with such an imaginatious shewe, doth declare his righteousness by good works.

13 As for that which they allege out of Paul, the same meaning, that doers of the law, not the hearers, are justified; it nothing helpeth them. I will not escape away with the solution of Ambrose, that that is therefore spoken because the fulfilling of the law is faith in Christ. For I see that it is but a mere starting hole, which nothing needeth where there is a broad way open. There the Apostle throweth downe the Jewes from foolith confidence, which boasted themselves of the onely knowledge of the lawe, when in the meane time they were the greatest despisers of it. Therefore that they should not stand so much in their owne conceit for the bare knowledge of the lawe, he warneth them, that if righteousness bee sought out of the lawe, not the knowledge but the observing of it is required. Wee verily make no doubt of this that the righteousness of the law standeth in works: nor yet of this also, that the righteousness consisteth in the worthines and merites of works. But it is not yet proved, that we are justified by works, vnlesse they bring forth some man that hath fulfilled the law. And that Paul meant none otherwise, the hanging togethcr of the text shalbee a sufficient testimonie. After that he had generally condemned the Gentiles and the Jewes of vn-righteousnesse, then he descended to the particular shewing of it, and faith, that they which sinned without the Lawe, doe perish without the Lawe: which is spoken of the Gentiles: but they which have sinned in the lawe, are judged by the lawe: which pertaineth to the Jewes. Now e because they winking at their owne trespassings proudly gloried of the onely lawe: he adiorneth that which moste fitly agreed, that the lawe was not therefore made, that men should be made righteous by onely hearing of the voice thereof: but then and not til then when they obeyed, as if he should say: Seek thou righteousness in the lawe, alleage not your hearing of it, which of it self is of small importance, but bring works by which thou maist declare that the law was not set for thee in vaine. Of these works because they were all defitute, it followed that they were spoyle of glorying of the law. Therefore we must of the meaning of Paul rather frame a contrary argument. The righteousnesse of the lawe confisfteth in the perfection of works. No man can boast that he hath by works satisfied the law. Therefore there is no righteousnes by the lawe.

14 Now they allege also these places, wherein the faithfull doe boldly offer their righteousnes to the judgement of God to be examined, & require that sentence be giuen of them according to it. Of which sort are these: Judge me O Lord according to my righteousnesse, & according to my innocencie, which are in mee. Againe, Hear my righteousnesse, O Lord. Thou haft prooued my heart, & haft visitted it in the night, & there was no wickednesse found in mee. Againe, The Lord shall render to mee according to my righteousnesse, and he shall recompense mee according to the cleanness of my hands. Because I haue kept the wayes of the Lord, & haue not wickedly departed from my God, And I shallbe vnspotted & shall keepe mee from my iniquitie. Againe, Judge me, Lord, because I haue walked in mine innocencie. I haue not sitt with lyeing men, I wil not enter in with them that doc wicked things. Destroy not my soule with the vnsgodly, my life w men of bloud: in whose hands are iniquities: whose right hand is filled w giftes. But I have walked innocently. I haue above spoken of the affiance which the holy ones do seeme simply to take to the fefues of workes. As for these testimonies that we haue here alleaged, they shall not much acombre vs, if they be vnderstood according to their compasse, or (as they commonly call it) their circumstance. Now the same is double. For neither would they haue them to be wholly examined, they should be either condemned or acquited according to a continual course of their whole life: but they bring into judgement a speciall cause to be debated. Neither do they claime to themselves righteousnes in respect of the perfection of God, but by comparison of naughty & wicked men. First when the justifying of man is entreated of, it is not only required he haue a good affiance in some particular matter, but a certaine perpetuall agreement of righteousnesse in his whole life. But the holy ones, when they call vpon the judgement of God to approue their innocencie, do not offer themselues free from all gultines & in every behalf faultlesse: but verily when they haue fastened their affiance of salvation in his goodness only, yet trusting he is the reuenger of the poore afflicted against right & equitie, they commend to him the cause wherein the innocent are oppresed. But when they set their aduersaries with them before the judgement seat of God, they boast not of such an innocencie as shall answer to his purenesse of God if it be severely searched, but because in comparison of the malice, obturatie, suttletie & wickednesse of their aduersaries they know that their plainnesse, righteousnes, simplicitie, & cleanness is known & pleasing to God: they feare not to call vpon him to be judge betweene themselues & them. So when Dauud said to Saul: The Lord render to euery man according to his righteousnes & truth: he meant not that the Lord should examine by himselfe and reward euery man according to his descuences, but he he took the Lord to witness, how great his innocencie was in comparision of the wickednes of Saul. And Paul himselfe, when he boyledth with this glo ing that he hath a good witnes of conscience, that he hath travailed with simplicite and vprightnesse in the Church of God, meaneth not that hee ftandeth upon such glorying before GOD, but being compelled with the flanders of the wicked, he defendeth his faithful and honest dealing, which he knewe to be pleasing to the mercifull kindnesse of God, against all cuyll speaking of men whatsoever it be. For wee see what he sayeth in another place, that he knoweth no cuyll by himselfe, but that he is not thereby ju tified, namely because he knewe that the judgement of God far surmount teth the bleared sight of men. Howsoeuer therefore the godly doe defende their innocencie against the hypocrifye of the vngodly, by the witnesing & judgement of God: yet when they haue to doe with God alone, they all cry out with one mouth: If thou marke iniquitie, Lord, Lord who shall abide it? Enter not into judgement with thy fervants: because euyry one that liueth shall not be justified in thy sight: and distrustung their owne workes, they gladly sing, Thy goodnesse is better than life.

15 There are also other places not vnlike to these before, in which a man may yet tary. Salomon faith, that he which walketh in his vprightnesse, is righteous. Againe, That in the path of righteousnesse is life, and that in the same is no death. After which manner Ezekiel reporteth that he shall live life that doth judgement and righteoufnesse. None of these doe we either de ny or darken. But let there come forth one of the sonnes of Adam with such an vprightnesse. If there be none, either they must perish at the sight of God, or flee to the sanctuarie of mercie. Neither do wee in the meantime deny but that to the faithfull their vprightenesse, though it be but halfe & vn perfect, is a step towards immortalitie. But whence commeth that but be cause whome the Lord hath taken into the covenaut of grace, he searcheth not their works according to their desentings, but kissteth them with fatherly kindnesse: Whereby we do not only vnderstand that which the scholemen doe reach, that workes haue their value of the accepting grace. For they meant that works which are otherwise insufficiant to purchase righteoufnes by the covenaut of the law, are by the accepting of God auauenced to the value of equalitie. But I say that they being deisted both with other trespassings & with their owne spottes, are of no other value at all, than in somuch as the Lord tenderly graunteh pardon to both: that is to say, giueth free righteoufnes to man. Neither are here those prayers of the Apostile seasaonably thrust in place, where he wisheth so great perfection to the faith full, that they may be faultles & vnblamable in the day of the Lorde. These words in deed the Celestines did in old time turmoile, to affirme a perfe ction of righteoufnes in this life. But, which we thinke to be sufficient, wee answere briefly after Augustine, that all the godly ought in deed to ende vour toward this marke, that they may one day appeare spotless & faultles before the face of God: but because the best and most excellent manner of this life is nothing but a going forward, wee shall then and not till then atta aine to this marke, when being vnclathed of this flesh of sinne wee shall ful ly cleaue to the Lorde. Yet will I not stiffeely striue with him which will
Of the manner how to receive the title of perfection to the holy ones, so that he also limitte the same with the words of Augustine himself. When (faith he) we will call the virtue of the holy ones, perfect: to the same perfection also belongeth the acknowledging of imperfection both in truth and in humility.

The xviiij. Chapter.
That of the reward, the righteousness of workes is all gathered.

Now let vs passe ouer to those sayings which affirme, that God will render to every man according to his workes: of which fowre are these. Every man shall bear away that which he hath done in the body, either good or euill. Glorie and honour to him that worketh good: trouble & distresse vpon every soule of him that worketh euill. And they which have done good things, shall go into the resurrection of life: they which have done euill, into the resurrection of judgement. Come ye blessed of my father: I haue hungered, and ye gaue mea meate: I haue thirsted, and ye gaue mee drinke, &c. And with them let vs also ioyne these sayings, which call eternal life the rewardes of workes. Of which fowre are these. The rendring of thy hands of a man shalbe restored to him. He that feareth the commandement, shall be rewarded. Be glad and reioyce, beholde, your reward is plentiful in heaven. Every man shall receive reward according to his labor. Where it is said that God shall render to every man according to his workes, the same is easily assioyed. For, that manner of speaking doth rather shewe the order of following, than the caus. But it is out of doubt, that the Lorde doeth accomplish our salvation by these degrees of his mercie, when those whom he hath chosen he calleth to him: those whom he hath called, he justifieth: those whom he hath justified, he glorifieth. Although therefo he do by his only mercie receive them, he is his into life, yet because he bringeth them into the possession therof by the race of good workes, that he may fulfill his worke in them by such order as he hath appointed: it is no maruaille if it be said that they be crowned according to their works, by which without doubt they are prepared to receive the crowne of immortalitie. Yea and after this manner it is fully saide that they work their owne salvation, when in applying themselves to good workes, they præstie themselves towardes eternall life: namely as in an other place they are commanded to worke the meate which perisheth not, when be eating in Christ they get to the felues life: and yet it is by and by afterward added: Which the sonne of man shal giue you, Whereby appeareth the worde of Working is not set as contrary to grace, but is referred to endeavour; and therefore it followeth not, either faithfull are themselves authors of their owne salvation, or that the same proceeded from their works. How then? So soone as they are taken into the fellowship of Christ, by the knowledge of the Gospel, and the enlightening of the holy Ghost, eternall life is begun in them. Nowe the same good work which God hath begun in them, must also be made perfect vntil the day of the Lord Iesu. And it is made perfect, when resembling the heavenly father in righteousness and holines, they proue themselves to be his children not not swwarted out of kinde.

2. There is no caufe why we should of the name of rewardes gather an argument that our workes are the cause of saluation. First let this be determined in our hearts, that the kingdom of heaven is not a reward of seruants, but an inheritance of children, which they onely shall enjoy, that are adopted of the Lord to be his children: & for no other caufe, but for this adoption, the sonne of the bondwoman shall not be heir, but the sonne of the free woman. And in the very same places, in which the holy Ghoft promiseth to workes eternall glory for reward, in expressing the inheritance by name, he theweth y it commeth from else where. So Christ reherseth workes, which he recompenseth with the rewarding of heaven, when he calleth the elect to the possession thereof; but he therewithal adiuerteth y it must be possessed by right of inheritance. So Paul biddeth seruantes, which do their duty faithfully, to hope for reward of the lord: but he addeth, of inheritance. We see how they do as it were by express words pro vide that we impure not eternall blessednes to workes, but to the adoption of God. Why therefore do they therewithall together make mention of workes? This question shalbe made plaine with one example of Scripture. Before the birth of Isaac, there was promised to Abraham a feede in which all the nations of the earth should be blessed: and a multiplying of his feede, which should match the starres of the skie, and the sands of the sea, and other like. In many yeares afterward, Abraham, as he was commanded by the oracle, prepared himselfe to offer vs his sonne in sacrifice. When he had performed this obedience, he received a promise, I haue sworn by my selfe (faith the Lord,) because thou haft done this thing, and haft not spared thine owne only begotten sonne, I will bleffe thee and multiply thy feede as the starres of the skie, & the sands of the sea: thy feede shall possesse the gates of their enemies, & all the nations of the earth shalbe blessed in thy feede, because thou haft obedied my voice. What heare we? Hath Abraham by his obedience deserued the blessing, the promise whereof he had receivd before that the commandement was giuen? Here verily we haue it without circumstances fowed, that y Lord rewardeth the workes of the faithfull with those benefits which he had already giuen them before that the workes were thought of, haung yet no cause why he should do good to them but his owne mercy.

3. Yet doth the Lord not deceive nor mock vs when he faith that he ren dreth for rewardre to workes the same thing which he had before works ftrely giuen. For, because he will haue vs to be exercised with good workes, to think upon the delivery or enjoying (as I may so call it) of these things which he hath promiseth, and to runne throug them to the blessed hope set before vs in heaven, the fruit of the promisest is also rightly assigned to them, to the ripenesse whereof they do not bring vs. The Apostle very fittly expressed both these pointes, when he said that the Coloffians apply themselves to the duties of charity, for the hope which is laide vp for them in heaven, of which they had before heard by the word of the true speaking Gospell. For when he saith that they knewe by the Gospell, that there was hope layde vp for them in heaven, he declareth that the fame is by Christ only, not vnderpro ped with any workes. Wherewith accordeth that saying of Peter, that the godly godly are kept by the power of God, through faith, into the salvation which is ready to be manifestly shewed at the time appointed for it. When he faith they labour for it, he signifies that the faithful must runne at the time of their life, that they may attaine to it. But least we should thinke that the reward which the Lord promiseth, is not reduced to the measure of merite, he did put forth a parable, in which he made himselfe a houseshoulder, which sowed them that he met, to the trimming of his vineyarde, some at the first hour of the day, some at the second, some at the third, yea & some also at the 11. At evening he payed to every one equall wages. The exposition of which parable, that fame old writer whatsoever he was, whose booke is caried abroad underneath the name of Ambrose of the calling of the Gentiles, hath briefly and truly set out. I will see rather his wordes than mine owne. The Lorde (saueth he) by the rule of this comparison hath established the diversity of many foldre calling, belonging to one grace: where without doubt they which being let into the vineyarde at the 11. hour, are made equall with them that had wrought the whole day, do represent the estate of them, whom for the aduauncing of the excellencie of grace, the tender kindenesse of the Lord hath rewarded at the waning of the day, & at the ending of their life: not paying wages for their labour, but pouring out the riches of his goodness upon them whom he hath chosen without workes, that euen they also which haue sware in great labour, & haue received no more than the lasl, may understand that they haue receiued a gift of grace, not a reward of workes. Laft of all, this also is worthy to be noted in these places, where eternall life is called the reward of workes, that it is not simply taken for the communicating which we haue with God to blessed immortalitie, when he embrace that vs with fatherly good will in Christ: but for possessing or enjoying (as they call it) of blessednes, as also the very wordes of Christ do sound, In time to come life euerlast. And in another place, Come & possess the kingdom, &c. After this maner Paul calleth adoption, the revealing of the adoption which shalbe made in the resurrection: and afterward expoundeth it the redemption of our body. Otherwise as estranging from God is eternall death, so when man is receiued of God into favour, that he may enjoy the communicating of him and be made one with him, he is receiued from death to life: which is done by the beneficiall meane of adoption only. And if, as they are wont, they stily enforce the rewardes of workes, we may turne against them that saying of Peter, that eternally life is the reward of faith.

Therefore let vs not thinke, that the holy Ghost doth with such promise set forth the worthinesse of our workes, as if they deservd such rewardes. For the Scripture leaueth nothing to vs, whereby we may be aduauanced in the sight of God. But rather it wholly endeuoreth to beate downe our arrogancc, to humble vs, to throw vs downe, and altogether to breake vs in peeces. But our weakeenesse is so succoured, which otherwise woulde by and by flipp and fall downe, vnlesse it did sufFerne it selfe with this expectation, & mitigateth her tedious grieues with comfort. First how hard it is for a man to forfake and deny not only all his things, but also himselfe, let every man consider for himself. And yet with this introduction Christ traineth his scholars, that is, all the godly. Then throughout all their life he doth instructeth them under the the discipline of the crose, that they may not set their heart either to the desire or confidence of present good things. Briefly he so handeth them for the most part, that which way soever they turne their eies throughout the whole widenesse of the world, they have on every side nothing but desperation present before them: so that Paul faith, that we are more miserable than all men if our hope be only in this world. That they should not faint in these so great distresses, the Lord is present with them, which putteth them in mind to lift vp their head higher, to cast their eies further, that they finde with him the blesednesse which they see not in the world. This blesednesse he calleth, reward, wages, recompence, not weyng the merit of workes, but signifying that it is a recompensing to their troubles, sufferings, slaunders.&c. Wherefore nothing withstandeth, but that we may after the example of the Scripture, calleth perpetuall life a rewarding, because in it the Lord receiveth his from labors into rest, from affliction into prosperous and happy state, from sorrow into gladnes, from povertie into flowing wealth, from shame into glory, and changeth all the evils which they have suffered for greater good things. So it shall also be no inconuenience, if we thinke holinesse of life to be a way, not which openeth an entry into the glory of the heavenly kingdom, but whereby the elect are led of their God into the disclosing of it: forasmuch as this is his good will to glorifie them whom he hath sanctified. Onely let vs not imagine a corrélation of merit and rewarde, wherein the Sophisters do fondly sticke saft, because they consider not this end which we set forth. But how vnorderly is it, when the Lord calleth vs to one end, for vs to looke to another? Nothing is more evident, than that reward is promised to good works, to relieue the weaknesse of our fleth with some comfort, not to puffe vp our mindes with glorie. Whofouer therefore doth thereby gather the merite of workes, or doth in one balance wey worke with reward, hee ereth farre from the right marke of God.

Wherefore when the Scripture faith that God the just judge will one day render to his a crowne of righteouenesse, I doe not onely take exception with Augustine, and say: To whom should he being a just judge, render a crowne, if he had not being a mercifull father giuen grace: and how should there be righteouenesse, vnlesse grace went before which justifieth the vnrighteous? Howe should these due thinges bee rendered, vnlesse these vndue things were first giuen? But also I ad an other thing. How should he impute righteouenesse to our works, vnlesse his tender mercifullnes did hide y vnrighteousnesse that is in them? Howe should he judge them worthie of reward, vnles he did by immeasurable bountifulnes take away that which is worthy of punishment? For he is wont to call eternall life, grace: because it is rendered to the free giftes of God when it is repaid to workes. But the scripture doth further humble vs, and therewithall raise vs vp. For besides this that it forbiddeth vs to glorifie in workes, because they are the free giftes of God, it therewithall teacheth that they are alwayes defiled with some dregs, that they can not satisifie GOD, if they bee examined by the rule of his judgement: but least our courage should faint, it teacheth that they please by only pardon. But although Augustine speaketh somewhat otherwize than wee doe: yet that he doth not so disagree in the matter, shall appeare by his his words in his thirde booke to Boniface: Where when he had compared two men together, the one of a life euin miraculously holy and perfect, the other honest indeede and of vnccrupt manners, but not so perfect but that much wanteth in him: at the laste hee concluseth thus: Euen this man which in maners seemeth much inferior, by reason of true faith in God whereof hee lueth and according to which hee accuseth himselfe in all his offentse, in all his good works: prayeth God, giving to himselfe the same, and to him glorie, and taking from himselfe both the pardon of sinnes, and the loue of well doing, when he is to be deluered out of this life, hie passeth into the fellowship of Christ. Wherefore, but because of faith? Which although it saue no man without works, (for it is it, which worketh by loue, not a reprobate faith) yet by it also sins are released, because the righteous man lueth of faith, but without it euene the same, which seeme good works are turned into sinnes. Here verily he doeth plainly confesse that which wee so much trauel to prove, that the righteousnes of good works hangeth hereupon, that they are by pardon allowed of God.

6 A verie neere sense to the places aforesaid, haue these: Make to your felues friendes of the Mammon of wickednesse, when you fail faile, they may receivce you into euerlastinge tabernacles. Command the rich men of this world not to be proudely minded, nor to trust in vncertaine richesse, but in the liuing GOD, to doe well, to become riches in good works, to lay vp in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may obteine eternall life. For good works are compared to richesse, which wee may enjoy in the blessednesse of eternall life. Launtiere, that weeshall never come to the true understanding of them, vnnlesse we turne our eies to the marke whereunto holy Ghost directeth his words. If it be true which Christ faith, our minde abideth there where our treasure is, as the children of the world are wont to be earnestly bent to getting of those things which servie for the delights of this present life: so the faithful must looke, sight they have learned that this life shall by and by vvanish away like a dreame, that they sende those things which they would enjoy, thither where they shall have perfect life. We must therefore doe as they doe which purpose to remove into any place, where they have chosen to rest their whole life. They send their goods before, and doe not miscontentedly want them for a time: because they thinck themselfes to much more happy, how much more goods they haue where they shall tary long. If we beleue that heauen is our countrie, it behouseth vs rather to sende away our richesst, thither than to keepe them here where we must loose them with sudden remouing. But how shall we send them thither? If we communicate to the necessities of the poore, to whom whatsoeuer is giuen, the Lorde accounteth it giuen to himselfe. Whereupon commeth that notable promise, Hee that giueth to the poore, lendeth for giaine to the Lord. Againe, hee that liberally soweth, shall liberally reap. For those things are delievered into the hande of the Lorde to keep, which are bestowed upon our brethren by the dutie of charitie. Hee, as he is a faithfull keeper of that which is delievered to him, will one day restore it with plentifull giaine. Are then our dutifull doynge of so great value with God, that he be as richesse laide vp in store for vs in his hand? Who shall

feare so to say, when the scripture doth so oft and plainly witnesse it? But if any man will leape from the meere goodness of God to the worthless of workes, he shall be nothing holpen by these testimonies to the stabilishing of his error. For you can gather nothing rightly thereoff but the meere inclination of Gods tenderneſs toward us. For as much as to encourage vs to well doing although the services which wee doe to him are not worthise of so much as his only looking vpon them, yet he suffieth none of them to be lost.

7 But they more enforce the words of the Apostle, which when he corforreth the Thessalonians in troubles, teacheth that the same are fent to the that they may be accounted worthise of the kingdom of God, for which they suffer. For (faith he) it is righteous with God, to render trouble to them that trouble you: but to you, releafe & when the Lorde Iesus shall be shewed from heaven. But the author of the Epiflée to the Hebrews faith, God is not vnrighteous, that he should forget your worke, and the loue which you have shewed in his name for that you have miniftred to the faintes. To the first place I answer, that there is no worthines of merites spoken of but becaufe God the father willeth that we whom he hath choſen to be his children, should be made like to Chrift his first begotten fonne: as it behooved that he should first suffer, and then enter into the glorie appointed for him: so must we also by many tribulations enter into the kingdom of heaven. Therefore when God doth. If we are accounted worthy of the kingdom of God, because we beare in the body the marks of our Lord and master which are the signes of the children of God. To this purpose make thefe sayings, That we beare about in our body the mortification of Iesus Chrift that his life may be shewed in vs. That we be fashioned like to his sufferings, that we may come to the likenes of his resurrection from the dead. The reaſon which is aſſiroyed for theſte not to profce any worthines, but to confirm the hope of the kingdoms of Godias if he had faid, As it agreeth with the iuft judgement of God, to take vengeance of your enemies for the vexations that they have done to you: so agreeth it also to give to you releafe & releafe the vexations. The other place, which teacheth that it so becommeth of God for the obedience of them that be his, that it declareth it to be in a manner vnrighteous if hee should forget them, hath this meaning: God to quicken our life, hath given us assurance that the labour shall not be vaine which we shall take for his glorie. Let vs alway remember this promife, as all other should bring vs no profit, unlefe the free covenant of mercy went before, whereupon the whole assurednes of our salvation should rest. But standing vpon that covenant, wee ought assuredly to truit, there shall alfo not want reward of the liberalitie of God to our worke: howsoever they bee vnworthy. The Apostle to conforme vs in his expectation, affirmeth God is not vnrighteous, but will stand to his promife once made. Therefore this righteouſnes is rather referred to the truth of Godspromife, than to his justice of rendring due. According to which meaning there is a notable faying of Auguftine, which as the holy man fliakheth not to rehearsal, often as notable, so I thinke it not vnworthie that wee shoulde continually 10
Cap. 18.

Of the maner how to receiue remember it. The Lord (faith he) is faithfull, which hath made himselfe detter to vs, not by receiuing any thing of vs, but by promising all things to vs.

8 There are also allledged these sayings of Paul. If I haue all faith, so y I remoue mountaines out of their place, but haue not charitie, I am nothing.
Againe, Nowe there remaine hope, faith and charitie, but the greatest among these is charitie. Againe, Above all things haue charitie, which is the bond of perfection. By the first two places our Pharisees affirme that we are rather justified by charitie than by faith, namely by the cheeser vertue as they say. But this fonde argument is easily wiped away. For wee haue in an other place alreadie declared, that those things which are spoken in the first place pertaine nothing to true faith. The other place we also expounde of true faith, than which he faith that Charitie is greater: not that it is more meritorious, but because it is more fruitful, because it extendeth further, because it fruiteth more, because it remaineth alway in force, whereas the use of faith continueth but for a time. If we haue regard to excellence, the love of God should worthy haue the cheesest place, of which Paul here speakeh not.
For he enforceth this thing onely, that wee should with mutuall charitie edifie one another in the Lorde, but let vs imagine that charitie doeth cue-rice where excell faith: yet what man of founde judgement, yea or of fonde: braine, will gather thereof that it doeth more iustifie? The power of iustifying which faith hath, consisteth not in the worthinesse of the worke. Our iustification standeth vpon the onely mercie of God and the deoueruing of Christ, which iustification when faith taketh holde of, it is saide to iustifie.
Nowe if you ask what some affinge iustification to charitie, they will aunswere that because it is a dutifull doing acceptable to God, therefore by the deoueruing thereof rightouesnesse is imputed to vs by the acceptation of the goodnesse of God. Here you see how well the argument procedeth. We saie that faith iustifieth, not because by the worthinesse of it selue it iustifieth rightouesnesse to vs, but because it is an instrument by which wee freely obtaine the rightouesnesse of Christ. These men, omitting the mercy of God, & passing ouer Christ, (where the summe of rightouesnesse standeth) doe affirme that we are iustified by the benefite of charitie because it excelleth above faith; even as if a man shoulde reason that a king is fitter to make a shooe than is a shoemaker, because hee is an infinite way more excellent: This onely argument is a plaene example that all the Sobornicall Schooles doe not so much as raft with the uttermost parte of their lippes what the iustification of faith is. But if any wrangler doe yet cape and aske, why in so small distance of place we take the name of faith in Paul so diversely: I have a weightie cause of this exposition. For fith those giftes which Paul rehearseth are after a certaine manner vnder faith and hope, because they pertain to his knowledge of God, he comprehendid them all by way of recapitulation vnder his name of faith and hope; as if he should say both prophesie, and tongues, and the grace and knowledge of interpretation tende to this marke to leade vs to the knowledge of God. And wee know God in this life none otherwise but by hope and faith. Therefore when I name faith and hope, I comprehende all these thinges together. And so there there remaine these three, Hope, Faith, Charity: that is to say, how great di-versitie of giftes soever there be, they are all referred to these. Among these the chiefe is charity, &c. Out of the third place they gather, If Charitie be the bonde of perfection, then it is also the bonde of rightoufnesse which is nothing elfe but perfection. First, to speake nothing howe Paul there calle-uth perfection, when the members of the Church well fet in order do cleaue together, and to grant that we are by charity made perfect before G O D: yet what new thing bring they forth? For I will alway on the contrarie side take exception and say that we neuer come to this perfection vnlesse we fulfill all the partes of charity, & thereupon I will gather, that fith all men are moft far from the fulfilling of charity, therefore all hope of perfection is cut off from them.

9 I will not goe through all the testimonies which at this day the foolish Sorboniftes rashly snatch out of the scriptures, as they first come to hande, and do throw them againft vs. For, some of them are so worthy to be laughed at, that I my felfe alfo can not rehearfe them, vnlesse I would worthily be counted fonde. Therefore I will make an end, when I shall haue declared the saying of Chrift, wherewith they maruellously please themselves. For, to the lawyer which asked him what was necessarie to saluation, he aunfwere-d: if thou wilt enter into life, keepe the commandementes. What would we more (fay they) when we are commaunded by the author of grace himselue to get the kingdome of God by the keeping of his commandementes?
As though forsooth he were not certaine, that Chrift tempered his answeres to them with whome he fawe that he had to doe. Here a doctor of the lawe asketh of the meane to obteaine blessefnesse, and not that only, but with doing of what thing men may attaine vnto it. Both the perfon of him that spake and the queation it felfe led the Lord fo to anfwer. The lawyer being filled with the persuation of the rightoufnesse of the law, was blinde in confidence of workes. Againe, he sought nothing elfe but what were the workes of rightoufnesse, by which saluation is gotten. Therefore he is worthily sent to the lawe, in which there is a perfect mirrou of rightoufnesse. We also do with a loude voyce pronounce that the commandementes must be kept, if life be sought in workes. And this doctrine is necessary to be known of Christians. For how should they flee to Chrift if they did not acknowledge that they are fallen from the way of life into the hellong downfall of death?
But how should they underfande howe far they haue frayed from the way of life, vnlesse they firt understande what is that way of life? For then they are taught that the sanctuarie to recouer saluation is in Chrift, when they fee howe great difference there is betweene their life and the rightoufnesse of G O D which is contained in the keeping of the lawe. The fumme is this, that if saluation be fought in workes, we must keepe the com-mandementes by which we are instructed to perfect rightoufnesse. But we must not flique faft here, vnlesse we will faint in our midde course: for none of vs is able to keep the commandements. Sith therefore we are excluded from the rightoufnesse of the lawe, we must of necessity refort to an other helpe, namely to the faith of Chrift. Wherefore as here the Lord calleth backe the doctour of the lawe whom he knew to swell with vaine confidence
of workes, to the law, whereby he may learne that he is a sinner subject to the dreadfull judgement of eternall death: so in other places, without making mention of the law, he comforteth other that are already humbled with such knowledge, with promise of grace, as, Come to me all ye that labour and are loaden, and I will refresh you, and ye shall finde rest for your soules.

10 At the last when they are weary with wrestling the Scripture, they fall to subtleties and sophistical argumentes. They caull them this that faith is in some places called a worke, & therupon they gather that we do wrongfullly set faith as contrary to workes. As though forsooth faith in that it is an obveying of the will of GOD, doth with her owne deverying procure yt to vs righteousnes, & not rather because by embracing the mercy of God, it fea-leth in our hearts the righteousnes of Christ offered to vs of it in the preaching of the Gospel. The readers shall pardon me if I do not tarry upon con-futing of such follies, for they themselues without any assault of other, are sufficiently ouerthrown with their owne feeblenesse. But I will by the way confute one objection which seemeth to haue some thewe of reason, leaft it should trouble some that are not so well practised. Sith common reason teache-cth that of contraries is all one rule, and all particular sinnes are imputed to vs for vrighteousnesse, they say it is meete that to all particular good works be given the praise of righteousness. They do not satisifie me which answere, that the damnation of men properly procedeth from onely vnbeliefe, not from particular sinnes. I doe in deede agree to them, y vnbeliefe is the fountaine and roote of all euils. For it is the first departing from God, after which do follow the particular trespassings against the law. But wheras they seem to set one selfe same reason of good and euill worke in weying of righteous-nesse or vrighteousnesse, therin I am compelled to disagree from them. For the vrighteousnesse of worke is the perfect obedience of the lawe. Therefore thou canst not be righteous by worke, vnbeliefe thou do follow it as a straight line in the whole continuall course of thy life. From it so soone as thou hast swarued, thou art fallen into vrighteousnesse. Hereby appeareth that righteousnesse commeth not of one or a few worke, but of an vnswaruing & vn-swearied observinge of the will of God. But the rule of judging vrighteous-nesse is most contrary. For he that hath committed fornication, or hath stolen, is by one offence guilty of death, because he hath offended against the majestie of God. Therefore these our subtle arguers do stumble, for that they mark not this saying of James, that he which sinneth in one, is made guiltie of all, because he that hath forbidde to kill, hath also forbidden to steal, &c.
Therefore it ought to seeme no aburditie, when wee say that death is the just rewarde of euery sinne, because they are euery one worthy of the just displeasure and vengeance of God. But thou shalt reason foolishly, if on the contrary side thou gather that by one good worke man may be reconciled to God, which with many sinnes deserveth his wrath.

The xix. Chapter.
Of Christian libertie.

Nowe we must entreate of Christian libertie: the declaration whereof he must not ommitt, whose purpose is to comprehende in an a bridge-ment
ment the summe of the doctrine of the Gospell. For it is a thing principally necessary, and without the knowledge whereof conscience dare in a man enterpryse nothing without doubting, they stumble and start backe in many things, they alwayes stagger and tremble: but specially it is an appended of justification, & vnaileth not a little to the understanding of the strength thereof. Yea they that earnestly feare God, shall hereby receive an incomparable fruite of that doctrine which the wicked and Lucianicall men doe pleasantly taunt with their scoffer, because in the spiritual darkenesse wherewith they be taken, every wanton railing is lawful for them. Wherfore it shall now come forth in fit season: and it was profitable to differre to this place the plainer discoursing of it (for we haue alreadie in diverse places lightly touched it) because so soone as any mention is brought in of Christian libertie, then either were the lustes doe boile, or mad motions doe rise, vnlesse these wanton wittes be timely met withall, which doe otherwise most naughtily corrupt the best things. For some men by pretence of this libertie, shake off all obedience of God, and breake forth into an unbridled licentiousnesse: and some men disdaine it, thinking that by it all moderation, order & choice of things is taken away. What should we here doe, being compassed in such narrowe straites? Shall wee bidde Christian libertie farewell, and so cut off all fit occasion for such perils? But, as we haue saide, vnlesse that bee fast holden, neither Christ, nor the truth of the Gospell, nor the inward peace of the soule is rightly known. Rather we must endure that so necessary a part of doctrine be not soppresst, and yet that in the meane time those fonde objections may bee mette withall which are wont to rise thereupon.

2 Christian libertie (as I thinke) consisteth in three parts. The first, that the conccnces of the faithfull, when the affiance of their justification before God is to be sought, may raie and auduance themselves about the lawe, and forget the whole righteousness of the lawe. For fith the lawe (as we haue alreadie in an other place declared) leaueth no man righteous: either wee are excluded from all hope of justification, or wee must bee loosed from the lawe, and so that there be no regard at all had of worikes. For who so thinkest that he must bring somewhat bee it neuer so little of goodworikes to obteyne righteousness, he can not appoint any end or measure of them, but maketh himselfe deterrent to the lawe. Therefore taking away all mention of the lawe, and laying aside all thinking vpon worikes, we must embrace the onely mercie of God, when we intreat of justification: and turning away our sighte from our felues, wee must beholde Christe alone. For there the question is not howe wee bee righteous: but howe although we bee vrighteous and vnworthie, wee bee taken for worthie. Of which thing if conscience will attaine any certaintie, they muste give no place to the lawe. Neither can any man hereby gather that the lawe is superfluos to the faithfull, whom it doeth not therefore cease to teach, and exhorte; and pricke forwarde to goodnesse, although before the judgement seate of God it hath no place in their consciences. For these two things, as they are most diverse, so must they be wel and diligently distinguished of.
with our works?

6 And that is the cause why the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues, referreth all the good works that are red of in the holy fathers, to faith, & weryeth them only by faith. Touching this libertinie there is a place in the Epistle to the Romanes, where Paul reasoneth that some ought not to have dominion over vs, because we are not vnder the lawe, but vnder grace. For when he had exhorted the faithfull that sin should not reigne in their mortall bodies, and that they shoould not give their members to bee weapons of wickednesse to sinne, but should dedicate themselues to God, as they that are alie from the dead, & their members, weapons of righteousness to God: and whereas they might on the other side object that they do yet carry with them the flesh full of lustes, and that sinne dwelleth in them, he adiogneth that comfort by the libertinie of the lawe, as if he should say, Though they do not yet thoroughly feele sinne destroyed and that rightoufnesse yet lueth not in them: yet there is no cause why they should feare and be discouraged as though they had bene alway displeased with them for the remnants of sinne, forasmuch as they are by grace made free from the lawe, that their works should not be examined by his rule of the lawe. As for them that gather not sin because we are not vnder the lawe, let them know this libertinie pertaineth nothing to them, the end whereof is to encourage vs to to good.

7 The third part is, that we be bound with no conscience before God of outward things which are by themselves indifferent, but that we may indifferently sometime vs them, and sometime leave them vnused. And the knowledge of this libertinie also is very necessary for vs, for if it shalbe absent, there shall be no quiet to our conscience, no end of superstitions. Many at this day do think as it were to moue disputation about the free eating of flesh, about the free vs of dayes, and garnets, & such other small trifles as they in deede think them: but there is more weight in them than is commonly thought. For when conscience have once cast themselves into the snare, they enter into a long and cumberfome way, from whence they can afterward finde no easie way to get out. If a man begin to doubt whether he may occupy linnen in fleshes, shirts, handkerchiefes, and napkins, whether he may be out of doubt whether he may vs hempe, & at the last he will also fall in doubt of matters, for he will wry with himselfe whether he cannot sup without napkins, whether he may not be without handkerchiefes. If any man thinke deeme meat to be vnlawfull, at length he shall not with quietnes before the Lord eat either brownbread or common meates, when he remembereth that he may yet sustaine his body with bauer foode. If he doubt of pleasant wine, afterwaarde he will not drinke dead wine with good peace of conscience, lest of all he will not be bold to touch sweeter and cleaner water than other. Finally, at the length he will come to this point, to thinke it vnlawfull (as the common saying is) to treade upon a strawe lying a crosse. For here is begonne no light strife, but this is in question, whether GOD will haue vs vs to vs thefe or those things, whose will ought to guide all our counsels and dooings. Hereby some must needs bee carried with desperation into a confute devouing pitte: some must, despis-
The grace of Christ. Lib. 3.

8 I knowe (saith Paul) that nothing is common (meaning by common, vnholie) but who so thinketh any thing common, to him it is common. In which wordes he makest all outward thinges subiect to our libertie, proued alway that our mindes haue the assurance of the libertie before God. But if any superstitious opinion cast into vs any doubt, those thinges which of their owne nature were cleane, are defiled to vs. Wherfore he addeth: Blessed is he that judgeth not himselfe in that which he alloweth. But he that judgeth, if he eate, is condemned, because he eateth not of faith. And that which is not of faith, is sinne. Among such narrow straites, who so neuerthelesse with carelesly venturing on all thinges shew themselves boulder, do they not alwaye turn themselves away fro God? But they which are throughly perearsed with some feare of God, when they themselves also are compell'd to doe many thinges against their conscience, are discouraged and doe fall downe with feare. All that are such, doe receive none of the gifts of God with thanksgiving, by which alone yet Paul teftifieth that they all are sanctified to vs, that meane the thanksgiving that proceedeth from a heart that acknowledgeth the liberalitie and goodness of God in his gifts. For, many of them in deed doe understande that those are the benefites of God which they vs, and they praise God in his workes: but sith they are not persuaded that they are given to themselves, howe should they thanke God as the giuer of them? Thus in a simile we see, whereto this libertie tendeth, namely that we should vs the gifts of God to such vs as he hath giuen them vs, without any scruple of conscience, without any trouble of mind, by which confidence our soules may both haue peace with him and acknowledge his liberalitie toward vs. For here are comprehended all ceremonies that are at libertie to be obferv'd, that our consciences should not be bounde with any necessitie to keepe them, but should remember that the vs of them is by Gods beniit subiect to themselves vs to edification.

9 But it is diligently to be noted, that Christian libertie is in all the parts of it a spiritual thing, the whole strength whereof consisteth in appeasing fearefull consciences before God, if either they be vnquieted or carefull for the forgienesse of sinnes, or if they be pensiue whether our imperfect works and defiled with the faults of our flethe doe please God, or if they be troubled about the vs of indifferent thinges. Wherefore they doe wrongfully expounde it, which either doe make it a clode for their owne desires, that they may abuse the gifts of God to their owne lust, or which doe thinke that there is no libertie but that which is vsed before men, and therefore in vsing it haue no regarde of the weake brethren. In the first kinde, men doe at this day much offende. There is almost no man which may by his abilitie of wealth be sumptuous, which delighteth not in excessiue gorgiousnes, in furniture of banketes, in apparell of body, in building of houses, which hath not a will to excell other in all kinde of statelinesse: which doth not matuellously flatter himselfe in his finenesse. And all these thinges are defended under the pretence of Christian libertie. They say that they are thinges indifferent: I grant, so that a man indifferently vse them. But when they are too greedilily couetd, when they are proudly boastd, when they are waftfully spent, it is certaine that those things which otherwise were of themselves lawfull, are by these faults defiled. This saying of Paul doth very well put difference betweene things indifferent: All things are cleane to the cleaue; but to the defiled and vnbeleeuing, nothing is cleane, because their minde and conScience is defiled. For why are assured the rich men, they which haue their comfort, which are satisfied with meate, which do nowe laugh, which sleepe in beds of iworie, which ioyne lande to land, whose banketes haue lute, harp, taber and wine: Verily both iworie, and golde, and riches, are the good creatures of God, permitted yea and appointed by the providence of God for men to vse. Neither is it any where forbidden either to laugh, or to be satisfied with meate, or to ioyne newe posseffions to their owne old posseffions or of their auncesters, or to be defiled with mufcall melody, or to drinke wine.
This is true in deed. But when they haue plenty of things, to wallowe in delites, to glut themselues, to make their wie and mind dronke with preuent pleasures & alway to gape for new, these doings are most far from the lawful vse of the giftes of God. Therefore let them take away immeasurable desire, let them take away immeasurable wanting, let them take away vanitie and arrogance, that they may with a pure conscience purely vse the giftes of God.
When the minde shall be framed to this sobrietie, they shall haue a rule of the lawefull vse. On the other side let this moderation be wanting, cuen base and common delicates are too much. For this is truely sayde, that oftentimes in fishe and course cloth dwelleth a purple heart, and sometyme nder fishe and purple, lieth simple humilitie: Let every man in his degree so liue either poorly, or meanely, or plentifullie, that they all remember that they are fed of God to live, not to be riotous: & let them thinke, that this is the law of chritian liberty, if they haue learned with Paul to be contented with those things which they presently haue: if they can skil both to be hul-ble and to excell: if they be taught in all places and in all things to be both full and hungry, to haue plenty and to suffer want.

Herein also may men do erre, because as though their libertie should not be founde and sade vnlesse it had men witnesses of it, they doe undiffer-ently and vnwisely vse it. By which vnreasonable vsigng they many times offende the weake brethren. You may see at this day some, which thinke that their libertie can not stande, vnlesse they take posseffion of it by eating of fleshe on fryday. I blame not that they eate: but this false opinion must be driven out of their minde. For they ought to thinke that by their liber-tie they obteine no newe thing in the sight of men but before God, and that it standeth as well in abstinence as in vsign. If they vnderstande that it maketh no matter before God, whether they eate fleshe or egges, whether they weare redde or blacke garmentes, that is enough. The conscience is nowe free, to which the benefite of such libertie was due. Therefore although they doe afterwarde absteine all their life long from fleshe, and weare alway but one colour, yet they are no lesse free. Yea therefore because they are free, they doe with a free conscience absteine. But they do most hurt-fully offende because they nothing regard the weakenesse of their brethren, whi which we ought so to beare with, that wee rashly commit nothing with offence of them. But sometime also it behoveth that our libertie be set forth before men. And this I grant. But there is a measure most heedfully to be kept, that we cast not away the care of the weake of whom the Lorde hath so earnestly giuen vs charge.

I will in this place therefore speake somewhat of offences, in what difference they are to be taken, which are to be avoided, and which to be neglected: whereupon wee may afterward determine what place there is for our libertie among men. I like well that common diuision, which teacheth y there is of offences one fort giuen, another taken: for so much as it both hath a plaine testimonie of the Scripture, and doth not vnfitly expresse y which it meaneth. If thou do any thing by vnseasonable lightness, or wantonnes, or rashnesse, nor in order, nor in fit place, whereby the ignorant & weake are offended, that same may be called an offence giuen by thee: because it came to pass by thy fault that such offence was stirred vp. And it is alway called an offence giuen in any thing the fault whereof came from the door of the thing it selfe. It is called an offence taken, when a thing which is otherwise not euyly done nor out of time is by euy will or by some wrongfull maliciousnesse of minde drawen to occasion of offence. For in this case was not offence giuen, but these wrongfull confuters doe without caufe take one. With that first kind of offence none are offended but the weake: but in this second kinde lower natures & Pharificall seornefull heads are offended. Wherefore we shal call the one, the offence of the weake: the other of the Pharifecs: and we shal so temper the use of our libertie, that it ought to giue place to the ignorance of the weake brethren, but in no wise to the rigoroussnesse of the Pharifecs. For, what is to be yielded to weake and Paul theeweth in very many places. Beare (faith he) the weake in faith. Again, Let vs not hereafter judge one another: but this rather, let there nor be layde before our brother any offence or occasion of falling: and many other sayings to y same intent, which are more fit to be red in the place it self, than to be here rehearsed. The summe is, that we which are strong should beare with the weakenes of our brethren, and not please our selues, but every one of vs please his neighbour vnto good for edifying. In another place, But see that your libertie be not in any wise an offence to them that are weake. Again, Eate ye all things that are sold in the shambles, asking no question for conscience: of your conscience (I say) not another mans. Finally be ye fuch, that ye giue no offence, neither to the Iewes, nor to the Greekes, nor to the Church of G O D. Also in another place, Ye are called, brethren, into libertie: onely giue not your libertie to be an occasion to the flesh, but by charitie ferue ye one another. Thus it is. Our libertie is not giuen towarde our weake neighbours, whose seuerants charitie maketh vs in all things: but rather, that haung peace with God in our mindes, wee may alio live peaceably among men. As for the offence of the Pharifecs, how much it is to be regarded, we learne by the wordes of the Lorde, whereby he biddeth them to be let alone, because they are blind, and guides of the blinde. The disciples had warned him, that the Pharifecs were offended with his sayings: he answered that they were to be neglected, and the offending of them not to be cared for.

12 But yet, still, the matter hangsot doutfull, vnlesse we know what are to be taken for weake, and who for Pharifcse; which difference being taken away, I fee not among offtences what vse at all of libertie remaineth, which might never be vned without great daunger. But it seemeth to mee: y Paul hath most plainly declared both by doctrine and by examples, how far our libertie is either to be temped or to be defended though with offtences.

When he took Timothee into his company, hee circumcised him: but hee could not be brought to circumcife Titus. Here were divers doings, and no change of purpose or of minde: namely in circumcife Timothee, when he was free from all men, he made himselfe a seruant to all men: and hee was made to the Iewes, as a Iewe, that he might winne the Iewes: to them that were vnder the lawe, as if he himselfe were vnder the lawe, that hee might winne them which were vnder the lawe: all things to all men, that he might saue many, as he writeth in another place. Thus wee haue a right modera- tion of libertie, if it may be indifferently restrained with some profit. What he had respect vnto, when he stoutly refused to circumcife Titus, hee himselfe testifieth, writing thus: But neither was Titus, which was with mee, al- though he was a Grecian, compelled to be circumcised, because of the false brethren which were come in by the way, which had privily crept in to espie our libertie which we haue in Chrift Iesus, that they might bring vs into bondage, to whome wee gaue not place by subjection so much as for a time, that the truth of the Gospell might continue with you. There is also a time when wee muft of necessitie defend our libertie, if the same be in weake con- sciences endaungered by the vnjust exactings of false Apostles. We muft in every thing studie to preferue charitie, and haue regard to the edifying of our neighbour. All things (faith he) are lawfull for mee, but not all things are expedient: all things are lawfull for mee, but not all things do not edifie. Let no man secke that which is his owne, but y which is anothers. There is nothing now plainer by this rule, than that we muft vse our libertie, if it may turne to the edifying of our neighbor; but if it be not fo expedient for our neighbor, then we muft forborne it. There be some which counterfay the wisdom of Paul in forbearing of libertie, while they doe nothing lesse than apply the same to the dutiees of charitie. For so that they may prouide for their owne quietnes, they with all mention of libertie to be buried, whereas it is no leffe behouefull for our neighbors, sometime to vse libertie for their benefite and edification, than in fit place to restraine it for their commoditie. But it is the part of a godly man to thinke, that free power in outward things is therefore graunted him, that he may be the freer to all dutiees of charitie.

13 But whatsoeuer I haue spoken of avoinding of offtences, my meaning is that it be referred to meane and indifferent things. For, those things that are necessarie to be done, are not to be left vndone for feare of any offtence. For as our libertie is to be submitted to charitie, so charitie it selfe likewise ought to be vnder the purenes of faith. Vertly here alo ought to be had regarde of charitie, but so farre as to the altars, that is, that for our neighbours sake we offend not God. Their intemperance is not to bee allowed, which do nothing but with troublesome turmoiling, and which had rather rashly to render all things, than leisurely to rip them. Neither yet are they to be hardned to, which when they be leaders of men into a thousand fortes of vngodlines, yet do tlzine that they must behave themselves so they be none of fonce to their neighbours. As though they do not in the meanes edifie the consciences of their neighbours to euill, specially whereas they sticke fast in the same mire without any hope of getting out. And the plesant men forsooth, whether their neighbour be to be instructed with doctrine or example of life, say that he must be fed with milke, whose they fill with most euill and poisonous opinions. Paul reporteth that he fed the Corinthians with drinking of milke: but if Popish Maffe had then beeone among them, would he have sacrificed to give them the drinke of milk? No: For milk is not poison. Therefore they lie in saying that they feede them whom vnder a shewe of flattering allurements they cruelly kil. But granting such dissembling is for a time to be allowed, how long yet will they feede their children with milke? For if they never growe bigger, they may at the least be able to beare some light meat, it is certain that they were never brought vp with milke. There are two reasons that move me why I do not nowe more sharply contende with them: first, because their follies are scarcely worthy to be confuted, first they worthily seeme filthy in the sight of all men that haue their sound wit: secondly, because I haue sufficiently done it in peculiar bookes, I will not nowe doe a thing already done. Onely let the readers remember this, with whatsoeuer offences Satan & the world go about to turne vs away from the ordinances of God, or to lay vs from following that which he appointeth, yet we must neverthelasse go earnestly forward: & then, that whatsoever dangers hang upon it, yet is it not at our liberty to swaue one haire breth from the commandement of the same God, neither is it lawefull by any pretence to attempt any thing but that which he giueth vs leave.

14 Now therefore Sith faithfull consciences hauing received such prerogatiue of liberty as we haue aboue set forth, haue by the benefit of Christ obtained this they be not entangled with any snares of obseruations in those things in which the Lord willed that they should be at liberty: we conclude that they are exempt from all power of men. For it is vnmeet, that either Christ should lose the thank of his so great liberality, or consciences their profit. Neither ought we to thinke it a slight matter, which we see to haue cost Christ so deere: namely which he valued not with gold or siluer, but with his owne bloud: so that Paul stickeoth not to saie, that his death is made voyd, if we yeilde our foules into subjection to men. For he trauellleth about nothing els in certaine chapters of the epistle to the Galathians, but to shewe that Christ is darkned or rather destroyed to vs, vnlesse our consciences stande fast in their liberty, which verily they have lost if they may at the wil of men be snared with the bondes of lawes and ordinances. But as it is a thing most worthy to be knowen, so it needeth a longer and plainer declaration. For so soone as any worde is spokene of the abrogating of the ordinances of men, by & by great troubles are raised vp partly by seditious men, partly by sлаundurers, as though the whole obedience of men were at once taken away and overthrown.
15 Therefore that none of vs may stumble at this stone, first let vs consider, that there are twoforts of government in man: the one spiritual whereby the conscience is framed to godlines and to the worship of God: the other civill, whereby man is trained to the duties of humanitie and civility which are to be kept among men. They are commonly by not vsit names called the Spiritual and Temporall jurisdiction, whereby is signified, that the first of these two formes of government pertaineth to the life of the soule, and the latter is occupied in the things of this present life: not onely in feeding and clothing, but in setting forth of lawes whereby a man may spende his life among men holily, honestly, and soberly. For, that first kinde hath place in the inwarde minde, this latter kinde ordereth onely the outward behauiours. The one we may call the Spiritual kingdom, the other, the Civill kingdom. But these two, as wee haue deuided them, must be either of them alway seuerally considered by themselves: and when the one is in considering, we must withdrawe and turne away our mindes from the thinking upon the other. For there are in man as it were two worlds, which both diverske kings and diverske lawes may goure. By this putting of difference shall come to passe, that that which the Gospel teacheth of the spiritual libertie, we shall not wrongfully drawe to the civill order, as though Christians were according to the outward government lesse subiect to the lawes of men, because their conscience are at libertie before God: as though they were therefore exempt from all bondage of the flesh, because they are free according to the spirit. Again, because even in those ordinances which seem to pertaine to the Spiritual kingdom, there may be some error: we must also put difference betwene these, which are to be taken for laweful as agreeable to the word of God, & on the other side which ought not to haue place among the godly. Of the Civill government there shalbe els where place to speake. Also of the Ecclesiastical lawes I omit to speake at this time, because a more full entreating of it shalbe fitte for the fourth booke, whereas shall speake of the power of the Church. But of this discourse, let this be the conclusion, The question being (as I haue sayde) of it selue not very darke or entangled, doth for this cause accrue many, because they do not suttley enough put difference betwene the outward court as they cal it, & the court of conscience. Moreover this encreafeth the difficulty, that Paul teacheth that the magistrate ought to be obeyed, not onely for feare of punishmes, but for conscience. Whereupon followeth that consciences are also bound by the civill lawes. If it were so, all shoulde come to nought which we both haue spoken and shall speake of the spiritual government. For the loosing of this knot, first it is good to knowe what is conscience. And the definition thereof is to be fetched from the derivacion of the worde. For, as when men do with minde and understanding conceive the knowledge of things, they are thereby saide (Scire) to knowe, whereupon also is derived the name of Science: Knowledge: so when they haue a feeling of the judgement of God, as a witnesse joyned with them, which doth not suffer them to hide their finnes but that they be drawn accused to the judgement seate of God, that same feeling is called Conscience. For it is a certaine means betwene God and man, because it suffereth no man to suppress in himselfe which hee he knoweth but pursueth him so farre till it bring him to gilkines. This is it which Paul meaneth, where he sayth that conscience doth together witness with men, when their thoughts do accuse or acquite them in the judgment of God. A simple knowledge might remaine as enclosed within man: Therefore this feeling which preserveth man to the judgment of God, is as it were a keeper ioyned to man, to markes and espie all his secrets, that nothing may remaine buried in darkness. Wherupon also commeth that olde Proverbe, Conscience is a thousande witnesses. And for the same reason Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience for quieteness of minde, when being perswaded of the grace of Christ we do without fear present ourselves before God. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues, leteth to have no more conscience of sinne, in stead of to be delievered or acquited that sinne may no more accuse vs.

16 Therefore as works haue respect to men, so conscience is referred to God, so that a good conscience is nothing els but the inward purenesse of the heart. In which sence Paul writeth that charity is the fulfilling of the law out of a pure conscience and faith not fained. Afterward also in the same chapter he neweth how much it differeth from understanding, sayeing that some had suffered shipwrecke from the faith, because they had foraken good Conscience. For in these words he signifieth it is a lively affection to worship God, and a sincere endeavour to live holyly and godly. Sometime in deed it extendeth also to men, as in Luke where the same Paul protesteth that he endeavored himselfe to walke with a good conscience toward God and men. But this was therefore saide, because the fruites of good conscience do flow and come euem to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God only, as I haue already sayd. Hereby it commeth to passe that the lawe is said to bind the conscience, which simply bindeth a man without respect of men, or without having any consideration of them. As for example: God commandeth not only to keepe the minde chast and pure from all lust, but also forbideth all maner of gilkines of wordes and outward wantonnesse whatsoever it be. To the keeping of this lawe my conscience is subjicet although there liued not one man in the world. So he that behaueth himselfe intertempore, not onely finneth in this that he giueth an euill example to the brethren, but also hath his conscience bounde with gilkiness before God. In things that are of themselvese meane, there is an other consideration. For we ought to abstaine from them if they breede any offence, but the conscience still being free. So Paul speaketh of flesh consecrate to Idols. If any (sayth he) moue any doubt, touch it not for conscience sake: I say for conscience, not thine but the others. A faithfull man should finne, which being first warned should neruethelfe eat such flesh. But howsoever in respect of his brother, it is necessary for him to abstaine as it is prescribed of God, yet hee eateth not to keepe still the liberty of conscience. Thus we see how this lawe binding the outward workes, leaueth the conscience vnbounde.
Of these things that have beene hitherto spoken, we plainly perceiue how needie and voyde man is of all good things, and how he wanteth all helpes of saluation. Wherefore if he seek for revelations whereby he may succoure his neediness, he must goe out of himselfe and get them else where. This is afterwarde declared vnto vs, that the Lorde doth of his owne free will and liberally giue himselfe to vs in his Christ, in whom hee offereth vs in feeede of our minerie al felicitie, in feeede of our neede welthiness, in whom he openeth vs the heauenly treasuries: that our whole faith should beholde his beloved son, that upon him our whole expectation should hang, in him our whole hope should sticke and rest. This verily is the secret and hidden Philosophy, which can not be wrung out with Logical argumentes: but they learne it whose eyes God hath opened that they may see light in his light. But since that we are taught by faith to acknowledge that whatsoever we have neede of, whatsoever wanteth in vs, the same is in God and in our Lord Iesus Christ, namely in whom the Lord willed the whole fulness of his largesse to rest, that from thence we should all drawe as out of a most plentiful fountaine: nowe it remaineth that we seeke in him, and with prayers craue of him that which we have learne to be in him. Otherwise to knowe God to be the Lord and giver of all good things, which allureth vs to pray to him, and not to go to him and pray to him: shold so nothing profit vs, that it should be all one as if a man should neglect a treasure shewed him buried and digged in the ground. Therefore the Apostle, to shew that true faith can not be idle fro calling vpon God, hath set this order: that as of the Gospell springeth faith, so by it our hearts are framed to call vpon the name of God. And this is the same thing which he had a little before said, that the Spirit of adoption, which sealeth in our hearts the wittnesse of the Gospell, raiseth vp our spirites that they dare shewe forth their desires to God, stirre vp unspeakeable grawnings, and cry with confidence Abba, Father. It is meete therefore that this last point, because it was before but onely spoken of by the way and as it were lightly touched, should now be more largely entreated of.

2. This therefore we get by the benefite of prayer, that we attaine to those riches which are layd vp for vs with the heauenly father. For there is a certaine communicating of men with God, whereby they enteringe into ye sanctuary of heauen, do in his owne presence call to himouching his promisses: that the same thing which they beleuied him affirming onely in worde not to be vaine, they may when neede so requireth finde in experience. Therefore we see that there is nothing set forth to vs to be looked for at the hande of the Lorde, which we are not also commanded to craue with prayers: so true it is that by praire are digged vp the treasuries, which our faith hath looked upon being shewed to it by the Gospell of the Lord. Now how necessary and how many ways profitable this exercise of praire is, it can by no wordes be sufficiently declared. Undoubtedly it is not without cause ye the heauenly father testifieth, that the onely fortresse of saluation is in the calling vpon his name namely whereby wee call to vs the presence both of his providence, by which he watcheth to take care of our matters: and of his power, by which he susteineth vs being weake and in a manner fainting: and of his godnesse, by which he receiueth vs into fauour being miserably loade n with sinnes:flowly whereby we call him all whole, to giue himselfe present to vs. Hereby growth singular rest and quietnesse to our consciences. For when we haue disclos'd to the Lorde the necessitie which distressest vs, wee largely rest though it were but in this onely that none of our euils is hidden from him, whom we are persuad'd both to be most well willing toward vs, and most able to provide well for vs.

3 But (wil some man say) did not he know without any to put him in mind of it, both in what part we be distressed, and what is expedient for vs: so that it may seeme after a certaine manner superfluous, that hee shouldie be troubled with our prayers, as though hee winked or slept, until he were awaked with our voice? But they which so reason, marke not to what ende the Lord hath instructed them that be his to pray; for he ordyned it not so much for his owne cause as rather for ours. He will eth indeecl, as right it is, that his due be rendred to him, when they acknowledge to come from him whatsoeuer men require or doe perceiue to make for their profite, and doe teftifie the fame with wifhumes. But the profite alfo of this sacrifice wherewith hee is worshipped, commeth to vs. Therefore howe must more boldly the holy fathers gloriously talked both to themselves and other of the bene-\footnote{1.Kin.18.42}\footnotesymbol{f}fites of G O D, so much the more sharply they were pricked forwarde to pray. The onely example of Elias shall bee enough for vs, which be\footnotesymbol{ing} lure of the counsell of God, after that he not rashly had promised rain to Achar, yet busily prayeth betweene his knees, and sendeth his seuaunt seven times to espie it: not for that he did differ the oracle of God, but because he knew it was his dutie, leaft his faith should waxe drowse & fluggishto lay vp his desires with God. Wherefore although while we lie en\footnotesymbol{f}lisse and so dull that we perceive not our owne miseries, he waketh & waketh for vs, and sometime alfo helpeth vs undesired,yet it much behoueth vs, that hee be continually called vpon of vs, that our heart may be enflamed with earneft and fervent desire to seek, love, and worship him, while we acc\footnotesymbol{c}ustome our selves in euerie necessitie to flee to him as to our shoot anchare. Again, ye no desire and no wishe at all may enter into our minde, whereof we should be ashamed to make him wittnefe, while we Learne to present our wis\footnotesymbol{h}es, yea and to pourre out our whole heart before his eyes. Then y we may be framed to receive all his benefits with true thankfulnes of mind, yea and with outward thankesgiving, of which we are put in mind by our prayer that they come to vs from his hand. Moreover, y when we haue obtained y which we desired, being persuaded y he hath answered to our prayers, wee may be thereby the more fervently caried to thinke vpon his kindnesse, and there\footnotesymbol{with}al embrace with greater pleasure those things which we acknowledge to have ben obtained by prayer. Lastly, that very vfe and experience may according to the measure of our weaknes assure our minds of his prouidence when we understand y he not onely promiseth that he will never fail vs, & that he doth of his owne accord open vs the entrie to call to him in the verie point of necessitie, but also hath his hande alway stretched out to helpe them y be his, and y he doth not feed them with words, but defendeth them with present helpe. For these causes, the most kinde Father, although he never sleepe, or is slouffishe, yet oftestimes maketh a shewe as though hee slept, and were sflouffishe, that so hee may exercise vs, which are other-wise flouffhull and slouffishe to come to him, to aske of him, to require him to our owne great benefit. Therefore doe they doe too foollisly, which to call away the minde of men from prayer, babble that the providence of God, which maketh for the saluellkeeping of all things, is in vaine wearied with

Psal.145.18. our calling on him: Whereas the Lorde contrariwise not in vaine testifieth that hee is, nie to all them that call upon his name in the truth. And of none other forme is that which other doe trifflingly say, that it is superfluous to aske those things which the Lorde is of his owne wil ready to give: whereas euery same thinges which flouw to vs from his owne free liberalitie, hee will haue vs acknowledge to bee granted to our prayers, Which thing that notable sentence of the Pslime doeth testifie, wherewith many like sayings doe accord. The eyes of the Lorde are vpon the righteous, and his cares vnto their prayers. Which saying he fettieth our providence of God bent of his owne accorde to provide for the safetie of the godly, that yee the ommitteth not the exercis of faith, whereby flouffhullnes is wiped from the minde of men. The eyes of God therefore doe walke, y hee may succoure the necessitie of the blinde: but hee will againe on our be-halfes heare our groningcs, that he may the better proue his loue toward vs. And so both are true, that the watchman of Israel sleepe, nor flum-breth, and yet that he fettieth still as hauing forgotten vs when hee sleeeth vs dull and dumme.

4. Nowe, to frame prayer rightly and well, let this be the first rule, that we be no otherwise framed in minde and heart, than becommeth them that enter into talke with God. Which verily wee shall attaine as touching the minde, of the same being free from fleshly cares and thoughts wherewith it may be calld away or withdrawn from the right and pure beholding of God, doe not onely bend it selfe whole to prayer, but also so much as is possible be lifted vp and caried above it selfe. Neither doe I here require a mind so at libertie, that it be pricked and nipped with no care, whereas contrariwise the ferventnesse of prayer must by such carefulnesse be kindled in vs (as we see that the holy servants of God doe sometime declare great tormentes, much more carefulnesses, when they say they vter to the Lord a bewailing voice out of the deep depth, and out of the midde of the laves of death) But I say that all strange and foraine cares must be driven away, wherewith the minde it selfe wandring higher and thither is caried about, and being driven out of heauen is prefixed downe to the earth. I meaneth this that it must be lifted vp about it selfe, that it may not bring into the sight of God any of those thinges which our blinde and foolish reason is wont to imagine, nor may hold it selfe bounde within the compasse of her owne vanite, but rise vp to putnes worthy for God.

5. Both these thinges are specially worthie to bee noted, that whosouer prepareth himselfe to pray, should therto apply all his senses and endeavours, and not (as men are wont) be diversely drawn with wandering thoughts: because there is nothing more contrarie to the reuerence of God, than such lightnesse which is a witness of too wanton licentiousnesse and loose from all all fear. In which thing we must so much more earnestly labour as we find it more hard, for no man can be bent so to pray, but that he shall seele many bythoughts to creepe upon him, either to breake of, or by some bowing & swarving to hinder the course of his prayer. But here let us call to mind, how great an vnworthinesse it is, when God receiuethe vs vn to familiar talke with him, to abufe his so great gentlenesse, with mingling holy and profane things together, when the reverence of him holdeth not our minde faste bound vs, but as if we talked with some meane man, we do in ± mid, de of our prayer, forsaking him, leapethither and thither. Let vs therefore know that none doe rightly and well prepare themselves to prayer, but they who the maiestic of God perceieth, that they come to it vnscumbred of earthly cares and affections. And that is meant by the ceremonie of lifting vp of handes, that men shoulde remember that they bee farre distant from God, vnslee they lift vp their senses on he. As also it is saide in the Psalm. To thee haue I lifted vp my soule. And the Scripture oftentimes saith this manner of speech, to lift vp prayer: that they which desire to be heard of God, shoule not sit still in their dreames. Let this be the summe: that howe much more liberally God dealeth with vs, gently alluring vs to vnloose our cares into his bosome, so much lesse excusable are we vnslee his so excellent and inseparable benefite doe with vs ouerwey all other things and drawe vs vn to it selfe, that we may earnestly appie our endeoures and senses to pray: which cannot be done vnslee our minde by strongly wraftling with the hinderances doe rife vp aboue them. An other point we haue set forth, that we ask no more than God giueth leaute. For though he biddeth vs to poure out our heartes, yet he doth indifferently giue loose reines to foolish and froward affections: and when he promiseth that he will doe according to the will of the godly, he procedeth not to so tender bearing with them that he submitteth himselfe to their will. But in both these pointes men doe commonly much offend. For not onely the most part of men presume without shame, without reverence, to speake to God for their follies, and shamelesly to present to his throne whatsoever liked them in their dreames: but also so great foolishnesse or senseless dulnesse possesteth them, that they dare thrust into the hearing of God, even all their most filthy desires, whereof they would greatly be ashamed to make men pruie. Some profane men haue laughed to scorne, yea and dectested this boldnesse, yet the vice it selfe hath alway reigned. And hereby it came to passe that ambitious men haue chosen Jupiter to bee their Patron: couetous men, Mercurie: the defirous of learning, Apollo and Minerva: warriers, Mars: and Lecherous foolke, Venus. Like as at this day (as I haue euene nowe touched) men doe in prayers graunt more licence to their vnlawfull desires, than when they sportingly talke with their Eglars. But God suffereth not his gentleenesse to be so mocked: but claiming to himselfe his right, maketh our prayers subiect to his authoritie, and reftringeth them with a bridle. Therefore we must keepe fast this sayinge of John, This is our affiance, that if we ask any thing according to his will, hee heareth vs. But forasmuch as our abilities are farre from being sufficient to performe so great perfection, wee must seek a remedie to helpe vs. As wee ought to bend the sight of our minde to God, so the affection of the heart ought ought also to followe to the same ende. But both doe stay farre beneath it, yea rather doe faint and faile or be caried a contrary way. Therefore God to succour this weaknesses, in our prayers giveth the spirite to be our Scholemaster, to instruct vs what is right, and to governe our affections. For, because we knowe not what wee ought to pray as wee ought, the spirite commeth to our succour, and maketh intercession for vs with unspeakeable groaninges, not that it indece either prayeth or groaneth but itteth vp in vs affiance, defires, and sighinges, which the strength of nature were not able to conceive. And not without cause Paul calleth them unspeakeable groanings so the faithfull sende forth by the guiding of the spirite, because they which are truly exercised in prayers, are not ignornat that they bee to holde in perplexitie with blinde cares, that they scarceely finde what is profitable for them to speake: yea while they goe about to utter stammering wordes they sticke fast incumbed. Wherepon it followeth, that the gift of praying rightly is a singular gitce. These things are not spoken to this purpose, that we favouring our owne flouthfulnesse shoulde giue ouer the charge of praying to the spirite of God, and be dull in that carelessnesse, to which wee are too much inclined (as there are hearde the wicked sayinges of some, that wee must lie negligently gaping to waite untill hee present our mindes occupied else where) but rather that we loathing our owne flouthfulnesse and fluggishnesse, shoulde crave such helpe of the spirite, Neither dooth Paul, when hee biddeth vs to pray in spirite, therefore cease to exhorte vs to wakfulness: meaning that the infinitie of the spirite dooth his force to frame our prayers, that it nothing hindereth or slacketh our owne endeoure: because God will in this behalfe prooue owne, effectually faith moueth our hearts.

6 Let also an other idle bee, that in praying wee alway sele the owne want, and that earnestly thinking howe wee stande in need of those things that wee aske, wee ioyne with our prayer an earnest yea fervent affection to obtaine. For, many doe slighthly for manners fake recite prayers after a prescribed forme, as though they rendered a certaine taske to God; and although they confess that this is a necessarie remedie for their evils, because it is to their destruction to be without the helpe of God which they crave: yet it appeareth that they doe this duetie for custome, forasmuch as in the meane time their mindes are cold, and doe not wey what they aske. The generall and confute feeling indeed of their necessitie leadeth them hereunto: but it doeth not suffre them as sit were in a present case to aske reliefe of their neede. Nowe what thinke wee to bee more hatefull or more delteable to God than this sayning, when a man asketh forgiveness of sinnes, in the meane time eithery thinking that hee is not a sinner, or not thinking vpon this that hee is a sinner, euon wherewith God himselfe is plainly mocked? But of such peruersitie (as I have saide) mankinde is full, that for manners fake they many times aske many things of God, which they certainly judge that without his liberalitie to come to the from some other where, or that they haue them already remaying with them. The fault of some other sectheth to bee lighter and yet not tolerable, that they which haue onely conceieed this principle that wee must sacrifice to God with prayers prayers, doe mumble vp prayers without any musing of minde vp on them. But the godly must principally take heed, that they never come into the fight of God to ask any thing, but because they do both boyle with earnest affection of hearte, and doe therewithall desire to obtaine it of him. Yea and also though in those thinges which wee aske onely to the glorie of God, wee seeme not at the first fight to provide for our owne necessitie, yet the same ought to be asked with no lese ferventnes and vehementnes of desire. As, when we pray that his name be hallowed, we must (as I may so speake) fervently hunger and thirst for that hallowing.

7 If any man obiect, that we are not alway druen with like necessitie to pray, I graunt the same indeede: and this difference is profitably taught vs of Iames: Is any man heauie among you? Let him pray. Who so is merie, let him sing. Therefore even common feeling teacheth vs, that because we are too flouthful, therefore, as the matter requireth we are the more sharply pricked forward of God to pray earnestly. And this Dauid calleth the fit time, because (as he teacheith in many other places) how much more hardly troubles, discommodities, fears & other kinds of tentations do presse vs, so much freer access is open for vs, as though God did call vs vnto him. But yet no lese true is that saying of Paul, that we must at all times: because how-foever thinges prosperously flowe according to our hartes desire, and matter of mirth doeth compasse vs on euery side, yet there is no minute of time wherein our neede doth not exhort vs to pray. If a man have abundance of wine and wheate: yets fith he cannot enjoye onemorcell of breade but by the continual grace of God, whole cellers or barnes full shal bee no leet why he shoule not craue dayly breade. Nowe if wee call to minde how many dangers do euery moment hand ouer vs, y verie feare it selfe wil teach vs that we have no time free fro prayer, but this we may better perceiue in spiritual things. For, when shal so many finnes, whereof we knowe our selues guiltie, suffer vs to sit still without care and not in humble wise craue pardon both of the fault and the paine? When do tentations graunt vs truке, so that we neede not to haft vnto helpe? Moreover the desire of the kingdom and glorie of God ought so to plucke vs to it selfe, not by fittes but continually, that it shoule alway be fit time for vs. Therefore not without cause we are so ofte commanded to pray continually. I doe not yet speake of perseuen- rance in prayer, whereof motion shalbe made hereafter: but when scripture warneth vs that we ought to pray continually, it accuseth our slouthfulnesse, because we doe not perceiue how necessarie this care and diligence is for vs. By this rule all hypocriſe and craftinesse of lying to God, is debarred, yea druen farre away from prayer. God promiseth that he will bee neere to all them that call vp on him in trueth, and he pronounceth that they shall finde him which seek them with their whole heart. But they aspire not thither which pleafe themselves in their owne filthinesse. Therefore a right prayer requireth repentance. Whereupon this is commonly said in the Scriptures, that God heareth not wicked doers, and that their prayers are accursed, like as their sacrifices also be: because it is rightfull that they finde the eares of GOD shuts, which doe locke vp their owne heartes, and that they shoule not finde God eafe to bowe, which doe with their owne hardnesse pro provoke his stiffneſfe. In Eſay hee threateneth after this manner. When ye shall multiply your prayers, I will not heare you: for your handes are full of blood. Again in Jeremie: I haue cried, & they haue refused to heare: they shal likewise cry, and I will not heare: because he taketh it for a most hid diſhonour, that wicked men should boaf of his couenaunt, which doe in all their life defile his holy name. Wherefore in Eſay hee complainteth, that when the fewes come neere to him with their lippes, their heartes is far from him. Hec speake not this of onely prayers, but affirme thet hee abhorreth faining in all the partes of worshipping him. To which purpose make thet faying of James. Yee aske, and receive not: because yee aske ill, that yee may ſpende it vpon your pleasures. It is true indeede (as wee ſhall againe ſhewe a little hereafter) that the prayers of the godly which they powre out, doe not reſt vpon their owne worthineſſe: yet is not that admonition of John superfluous, if we aske any thing, wee ſhall receive it of him, because wee keepe his commandements: forasmuch as an euell consequence ſhutteſt the gate againſt vs. Whereupon followeth that none doe rightly pray, nor are heard, but the pure worshippers of God. Therefore whoſoever prepareth himſelſe to pray, let him be loothfull to himſelſe in his owne euils, and (which cannot be done without repentance) let him put on the person and mind of a begger.

Hereunto let the third rule be joyned, that whoſoever presenteth himſelſe before God to pray, shoulde forſake all thinking of his owne glory, put off all opinion of worthineſſe, and finally give over all truſt of himſelſe, giving in the abacing of himſelſe the glory wholly to God: leſt if we take any thing be it never so little to our felues, we doe with our owne swelling fall away from his face. Of this submiſion which throweth downe al height, we haue often examples in the feruauentes of God: among whom the holier that euerie one is, the more hee is throwne downe when he come into the fight of the Lorde. So Daniel, whom the Lord himſelſe commended with fo great a title of praiſe, said: We powre not out our prayers before thee in our righteouſnesſes, but in thy great mercies. Here vs Lord, I ord be merciful to vs: Hear vs, and do thefe things that we aske. For thine own sake because thy name is called vpon ouer the people & ouer thy holy place. Neither doeth hee by a crooked figure (as men somtyme speake) mingle himſelſe with the multitude as one of the people, but rather feuerally conceffeſth his owne guiltineſſe and humbly feeth to the ſanctuarie of forgiuenes, as he expressly faide: When I confefſed my finnes and the fins of my people. And this humblenes Dauid also fetteſth out with his own example, when he faith,

Enter not into judgement with thy feruauent, because in thy fight euerie one that liueth shall not be iuſtifieſſ. In ſuch manner Eſay præyeth: Loe, thou art angrie because we haue ſinned, the worlde is founded in thy wayes, therefore we haſhe been faueſ: And we haue ben all filled with vnceleaneſſe, & al our righteouſnes as a defiled cloth: and we haue all withered away as a leafe, & our iniquities doe ſcatter vs browd as the winde: and there is none that calleth vpon thy name, that raifeth vp himſelſe to take holde of thee: because thou haft hid thy face from vs, and haſt made vs to pine away in the hand of our wickednes. Now therefore O Lord, thou art our father, we are clay, thou art our our fashioner, & we are the worke of thy hand. Be not angrie O Lorde, nor ther remember wickednes for ever. Behold, look vpon vs, we are all thy peo-lo, how they stand vpon no affiance at al, but vpon this onlly, thinking pon this v they be Gods, they dispaire not v he will haue care of them. Likewife Jeremie: If our iniquities answer against vs, do thou for thy names fake.
For it is both most truely & most holy written, of whomsoeuer it be, which being written by an unknouen author is fathered vpon the Prophet Baruc: A soule heauie & defolate for the greatnes of euid, crooked, & weake, a hun-grie soule, & fainting eyes giue glory to thee O Lord. Not according to the righteoufnesse of our fathers do we pour our prayers in thy sight, & aske merce before thy face O Lord our God, but because thou art merciful, haue merce vpon vs, because we haue sinned before thee.

9 Finally the beginning & also the preparing of praying rightly, is crauing of pardon, with an humble & plaine confession of fault. For neither is it to be hoped, that even the holiest man may obtaine any thing of GOD, vntil he be freely recollected to him: neither is it possible that God may be faurable to any but them whom he pardoneth. Wherefore it is no matter if the faithful do with this keye open to themselues the dore to pray. Which we learne out of many places of the Psalmes. For David when he asketh an other thing, faith: Remember the sinnes of my youth, remember mee according to thy mercie for thy goodnesse sake O Lord. Againe, Look vpon my affliction, & my labour, & forgive all my sinnes, Where we also see it is not enough, if we every seuerall daye do call our felues to account for our newe sinnes, if we do not also remember those sinnes which might seem have bene long ago forgotten. For, the same Prophet in another place, hauing confessed one hainious offence by this occasion returneth euon to his mothers wombe wherein he had gathered the infection: not to make the fault seeme lefse by the corruption of nature, but that heaping together the sinnes of his whole life, how much more rigorous he is in condemning him selfe, so much more easie he may find God to entreat. But although the holy ones do not alway in expressing words aske forgiuences of sinnes, yet if we diligently weye their prayers which the Scripture rehearseth, we shal causly find which I say, they gathered a mind to pray of the only mercy of god, & so alway tooke their beginning at appeasing him because if every man examine his owne conscience, so farre is he from being bold to open his cares familiarly with God, that he trembleth at euery comming toward him, except that he standeth vpon trust of mercie & pardon. There is also another speciall confession, where they aske release of paines, that they also pray to haue their sinnes forgiuuen: because it were an absurdtie to will that ye effect be taken away while the cause abideth. For wee must beware that God bee faourable vnto vs, before that he testifie his favoure with outwarde signes: because both he himselfe will kepe this order, & it shoulde little profitt to haue him beneficall, vnlesse our conscience feeling him appeased shoulde throughly make him louely vnto vs. Which we are also taught by the aunswere of Christ. For when he had decreed to heale the man sicke of thy Palsey, he said, Thy sinnes are forgiuuen thee: lifting vp our minde thereby to that which is chiefly to be wished, that God first receive vs into favoure, and then

Pp.
Cap. 25. Of the manner how to receive

Of the manner how to receive the fruit of reconciliation in helping vs. But beside that special confession of present grievings, whereby the faithful make supplication to obtain pardon of every special fault and peine, that generally preface, which procureth favour to prayers, is never to be omitted, because unless they be grounded upon the free mercie of God, they shall never obtain any thing of God. Whereunto may be referred that saying of John: If wee confess our sinnes, he is faithful & righteous to forgive us, & cleanse vs from all iniquity.

For which cause it behooved praiers in the time of the lawe to be hallowed with expiation of bloud, that they might be acceptable, & that so the people should be put in mind that they are vnworthy of so great a prerogative of honor, til being cleansed from their deslings they should of the only mercy of God conceiue affiance to pray.

But whereas the holy ones seeme sometime for the entreating of God to allege the helpe of their owne righteousness (as when David saith:

"Kepe my soule, because I am good."

Againe Ezekiel: Remember Lorde I beseech thee, that I have walked before thee in truth, and have done good in thine eyes) by such formes of speaking they mane nothing else than by their verie regeneration to testify themselves to be the seruants & children of God, to whom he himselfe pronounceth that he will be mercifull. He teacheth by the prophet (as we have already seenne) that his eyes are vp the righteous, and his ears vs to their prayers. Againe by the Apostle, that we shal obtaine whatsoever we ask, if we keep his commandements. In which sayings he doth not value prayer by the worthines of workes: but his will is to stabilish their affiance, whose own conscience well affirme them of an vnfailed vprightnes and innocencie, such as all the faithful ought to be.

For the same is taken out of the verie truthe of God, which the blinde man that had his sight restored, saith in John, that God heareth not sinners if we understand sinners after the common vse of the Scripture, for such as without all desire of righteousness do altogether sleepe and rest upon their sins: forasmuch as no heart can ever breake forth into vnfailed calling vpon God which doeth not also aspire to godliness. Therefore with such promises accorde the prayers of the holy ones, wherein they make mention of their owne purenes or innocency that they may feele that to bee given them which is to be looked for of all the seruants of God. Againe it is then commonly found that they vfe this kind of prayer, when they do in the presence of the Lord compare themselves with their enemies, from whose vniust dealing they wished themselves to be delivered by his hande. In this comparison it is no marueil if they brought forth their righteousness & simplicitie of heart to mue him the rather by the rightfullnes of their cause to help them. This therefore we take not away from the godly heart of a good man, but that he may vfe the purenes of his conscience before the Lorde, to strengthen himself in the promises wherewith the Lord comforteth & vs holds his true worshippers: but our meaning is, the fruit of obtaining stand vpon only mercy of God, laying away all thinking of their owne desirings.

The fourth rule is, that being thrown downe and subdued with true humilitie, we should notwithstanding with certaine hope of obtaining bee encouraged to pray. These be things in deede contrarie in the we, to Ioyn with with the feeling of the just vengeance of God sure affiance of favour: which things do yet very well agree together, if the only goodness of God raise vs vp being oppressed with our owne evils. For, as wee haue before taught that repentance and faith are knitt as companions together with an unsparable bond: of which yet the one a frayeth us, the other cheareth vs: so in prayers they mutuallly meete together. And this agreement Dauid expresseth in fewe words: I (faith he) will in the multitude of thy goodness enter into thy house: I will worship in the temple of thy holinesse with feare. Under the goodness of God he comprehendeth faith, in the mean time not excluding feare, because not only his maieftie driueth us to reverence, but also our owne vnworthinesse holdeth vs in feare forgetting all pride and affurednes. But I meane not such an affiance which should stroke the mind loosed from all feeling of carefulnesse with a sweete and full quietenesse. For, to rest so pleasably is the doing of them which haue all things flowing as they would with it, are toucht with no care, are kindled with no desire, do swell with no feare. And it is a very good spurre to the holy ones to call upon God, when being distressed with their owne necessitie, they are vexed with most great vnquietnesse, and are almost dimayd in themselues, till faith come in fit time to their succours, because in such distresses the goodnesse of God so shineth to them, that they do in deed grone, being wearied with weight of present evils, they are also in paine & grieved with feare of greater, yet being so vpholden by it, they both relieue & comfort hardnes of bearing them, & do hope for escape & deliverance. Therefore the prayer of a godly man must arise out of both affections, must also contain & shew both: namely to grone for present evils, and to be carefully afraid of new, and yet therewithall to fly to God, not douting that he is ready to reach his helping hand. For God is maruellsouly prouoked to wrath by our distruftfulness, if we ask of him the benefits which we hope not to obtaine. Therfore there is nothing more agreeable with the nature of praiers, than this law be prescrib'd and appointed to them, that they break not forth rashly, but follow faith going before them. To this principle Christ calleth vs all with this saying: I say vnto you, whatsoever things ye require, beleeue ye shall receiue them, and they shall happen to you. The same also he confirmeth in an other place. Whatsoever ye aske in praier beleeuing, ye shall receiue. Wherwith agreeeth James saying, If any need wisdom, let him ask of him which giueth to all men freely, and vpraise thenth not: but let him aske in faith no douting. Wherein setting douting as contrary to faith, he doth most fitly expresse the nature of it. And no lesse is that to be noted which he addeth, that they obtain nothing which call vpon God in waiering and dount, and doe not determine in their hearts whether they shalbe heard or no. Whom he also compar eth to wauers which are diuerely tossed and driven about of the winde. Whereupon in an other place he calleth a right praier, the prayer of faith. Againe when God so oft affirmeth that he will give to every one according to his faith, he signifieth that we obtain nothing without faith. Finally it is faith that obtaieth whatsoeuer is granted by praier. This is meant by that notable saying of Paul, which the foolish menne doe take not heed vnto. Howe shall any man call vpon him, in whom he hath not beleeued? But who shall belieu, vnlesse he haue heard? But faith commeth of hearing, and hearing of the word of God. For conveying by degrees the beginning of prayer from faith, he plainly affirmeth that God can not be sincerely called upon of any other, than them to whom by the preaching of the Gospel his mercifulnesse and gentlenesse hath bin made known, and familiarly declared.

12 This necessity our aduersaries do not thinke vpon. Therefore when we bid the faithful to holde with assured confidence of minde that God is favourable and bareth good will to them, they thinke y we speake a most great absurdity. But if they had any vse of true prayer, they would truly under-stande that God can not be rightly called vpon without that steadfast feeling of Gods good will. Sith no man can well perceiue the force of faith, but he which by experience feeleth it in his heart: what may a man profite by disputing with such men which do openly shew, that they never had any thing but a vaine imagination? For of what force, & how necessary is that assurednes which we require, is chiefeely learned by invocacion. Which who so feeth not, he bewraiefully he hath a very dul conscience. Let vs therefore, leaving this kinde of blindmen, sticke fast in that vaying of Paul, that God can not be called vpon of any other, but them that know his mercy by the Gospel, and are surely perswaded that it is ready for them. For what maner of vaying shoulde this be: O Lord, I am verily in doubt whether thou wilt heare me: but because I am distressed with carefulnes, I fleece to thee, y thou maist help me if I be worthy. This was not the wonted maner of all the holy ones, whose praiers wee read in the Scriptures. Neither hath the holy Ghost thus taught vs by y Apostle which biddeth vs to go to the heavenly throne with confidence, y we may obtiene grace & when in another place he teacheth that we haue boldnes & accesse in confidence by the faith of Christ. We must therefore holde fast with both handes this assurednes to obtiene what we aske (sith both y Lorde with his owne voyce so commandeth vs, & all the holy ones teach it by their example) if we wil pray with fruit. For, y only praiers is pleasing to God which springeth out of such a presumption of faith (as I may so cal it) & is grounded vpon a dreadles certainty of faith. He might have bin content with the bare name of faith, but he not only added confidence, but also furnished the same with liberty or boldnes, by this marke to put difference betweene vs & vnbelieuers, which do in deed alfo pray to God as we doe, but at aduenture. For which reason the whole Church praieth in the Psalm: Let thy mercy be vpon vs, as we put our trust in thee. The same condition is also spoken of in an other place by the Prophet: In what day I shall cry, this I knowe that God is with me. Againes, In the morning I will direct myselfe to thee, & I will watch. For of these words we gather, that praiers are in vaine caste into the aire, vnlesse hope be adioyned, from whence as out of a watchtoure we may quietly waiete for the Lord. Wherewith agreeth the order of Paules exhortation. For before that he moue the faithful to pray in spirit at all times with wakefulness and diligence, he first of all biddeth them to take the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirite, which is the wordes of God. Now let the readers here call to remembrance that which I haue before said, that faith is not ouerthrown where it is joyned with acknowledgeing of our misery, needinesse, and faltinesse. For with how heavy weight souer of euill doinges the faithfull feel themselfes to be cuerloden or grieved, and y they be not only voide of all things which may procure favoure with God, but also that they be burdened with many offences which may worthily make him dread ful to them:y et they cease not to present themselfes, neither doth this feeling make them so afraid but that they still resort to him, forasmuch as there is no other way to come to him. For, prayer was not ordained, whereby we should arrogantly aduance our felues before God, or esteeme at great value any thing of our owne, but whereby confessing our giltnes, we should bewaile our miseries to him, as children do familiarly open their complaints to their parents. But rather the unmeasurable heap of our cuils ought to be full of spurre or prickes to pricke vs forwarde to pray.

As also the Prophet teacheth vs by his example,saying: Heale my foule,because I haue sinned against thee. I graunt in deed y in such sayings shoulde be deadly prickings vnlesse God did helpe: but the most good father of his incomparable tender kindnes hath brought remedy in fit season, whereby appeasing all trouble, afluaging all cares, wiping away feares, he might gently allure vs to him,yea,& taking away all doutes (much more all stoppes) hee might make vs an easie way.

And first when he commandeth vs to pray, he doth by the very same commandement accuse vs of wicked obstinacy, vnlesse we obey him. Nothing could be more precifely commanded, than that which is in the Psalm, call vs to pray. But forasmuch as among all the duties of godlines, the Scripture commandeth none more often, I neede not to tarry longer vs to this point. Asketh (faith our master) & ye shal receive: knocke, it shalbe opened to you. Howbeit here is also with the commandement ioyned a promise as it is necessarie. For though all men conforme y the commandement ought to be obeyed, yet the most part would flee from God when hee calleth, vnlesse he promised y he would be easie to be entreated, yea & wold offer himselfe. These two things being established, it is certaine that whatsoever make delays y they come not straight to God, are not only rebellious & disobedient, but also are provoked giltnesse of infidelitie,because they disdruit y promises. Which is so much more to be noted, because hypocrites vnder the colour of humilitie & modestie do as well proudly despise the commandement of God, as discredite his gentle calling, yea & defraud him of y chiefe part of his worship. For after that he hath refused sacrifices, in which at that time all holinessse seemed to stand, he declareth that this is the chiefe thing & most precious to him above all other, to be called vs in the day of need. Therefore where he requireth his owne, & encourageth vs to cheerfulnes of obeying, there are none so gay colours of douting that may excufe vs. Wherefore how many testimonies are commonly founde in the scriptures whereby we are commanded to call vs to God, so many standers are set vp before our eyes to put affiance into vs. It were rashnes to rush into the fight of God, vnlesse he did preuent vs with calling vs. Therefore he openeth & way with his owne voice, saying: I will say to them, Ye are my people: and they shall say to me, thou art our God. Wee fee howe he preuenteth them that worship him, and willethe them to followe him, and therefore it is not to be feared that this should not be a verie sweete melodie which he tuneth.
Cap. 20.

Psal. 65. 3.

Tuneth. Specially let this notable title of God come in our minde, whereupon if we stay, we shall easily passe over all stoppes. Thou God that hearest prayer, even to theee shall all flesh come. For what is more louely or more alluring than that God be garnished with this title which may a certain vs that nothing is more proper to his nature, than to graunt the desire of humble suiters? Hereby the Prophet gathereth that the gate standeth open not onely to a fewe, but to all men: because he speakeith even to all in this saying: Call vpon mee in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, & thou shalt glorifie mee. According to this rule David laieth for himselfe that a promise was giuen him, that he may obtaine what he asketh: Thou Lord hast revealed into the care of thy servant: therefore thy servant hath founde his heart to pray. Whereupon wee gather that hee was fearefull, fauing in somuch as the promise had encouraged him. So in another place he armeth himselfe with this generall doctrine. He will doe the will of them that feare him. Yea, and this we may note in the Psalms, that as it were breaking his course of praying he paiteth over sometime to the power of God, sometime to his goodnesse, sometime to the trueth of his promises. It might seem that David by unseemly thrusting in of these sentences, made mangled prayers: but the faithful knoue by vs and experience, that frequentnes fainteth vnthankfullnes for the sake of the promise, and therefore in praying the meditation both of the nature of God, and of his worde is no superfluous. And so by the example of David, let it not grieue vs to thrust in such things as may refresh fainting hearts with new liuely strength.

14 And it is wonderfull that with so great sweetenesse of promises wee are either but coldly or almost not at all moued, that a great parte of men wandring about by compasses had rather leaving the fountaine of living waters, to digge for themselues drie pitnes, than to embrace the liberalitie of God freely offered them. An invincible tower is the name of the Lorde; (sayth Salomon) to it the righteous man shall flee, and he shalbe saved. And Joel, after that he had prophecied of that horrible destruction which was at hande, added this notable sentence. Whosoever calleth vpon the name of the Lorde, shall be save: which sentence wee knowe to pertaine properly to the course of the Gospell. Swearceley every hundreth man is moued to go farwarde to meeke God. He himselfe crieth by Esay: Ye shall call vpon mee, and I will heare you, yea, before that ye crieth, I will aunfwere you. And this same honour also in another place he vouchfaucheth to giue in common to the whole Church, as it belongeth to all the members of Christ. He hath cried to mee, I will heare him, I am in trouble with him, that I may deliver him. Neither yet (as I haue alreadie saide) is it my purpose to recken vp all the places, but to choose out the chiefe, by which wee may take a taffe howe kindly God allureth vs vnto him, and with howe freight bondes our unthankfulness is bounde, when among so sharpe prickings our fluggishnes still maketh delay. Wherefore let these sayinges alwayes founde in our eares: The Lorde is nic to all them that call vpon him, that call vpon him in trueth: alio these sayinges which wee haue allledged out of Esaye and Joel, by which God affirmenteth that he is heedful to heare prayers, yea and is delight ethn with a sacrifice of sweete fauour, when wee call our cares vpon him.
him. This singular fruite we receive of the promisses of God, when wee make our prayers not dountingly and fearfully: but trusting uppon his word, whose majestie would otherwise make vs afraid, wee dare call uppon him by the name of Father, forasmuch as he vouchsaufeth to put this most sweete name into our mouthes. It remaineth that wee hauing such alluramentes shoulde knowe that wee haue thereby matter enough to obtaine our prayer: forasmuch as our prayers stande uppon no merite of our owne, but all their worthines and hope of obtaining are grounded uppon the promises of God, and hang uppon them, so that it needeth none other underpropping, nor looketh vpward neither hither or thither. Therefore we must determine in our minde, that although wee excel not in like holinesse as is praised in the holy fathers, prophets and Apostles, yet because the commandement of prayer is common to vs, and faith is also common, if wee rest uppon our wordes of God, in this right wee are fellowes with them. For God (as we haue before thewd) promising that he will bee gentle, and mercifull to all, giueth cause of hope to all eu en the most miserable, that they shall obtaine what they ask. And therefore the generall formes are to bee noted, from which no man (as they say) from the first to the last is excluded: onely let there be present a purenes of heart, misliking of our selfes, humilietie, and faith: let not our hypocriue vnholly abuse the name of God with deceitfull calling uppon it: the most good father will not put backe them, whom he not onely exhorte to come to him, but also mouth them by all the meanes that he can. Hereupon commeth the manner of praying of Dauid which I haue eu en now rehearsed. Lo thou hast promised, Lord, to thy seruanta: for this cause thy seruant at this day gathereth courage, and hath found what prayer he might make before thee. Now therefore O Lord God, thou art God, and thy wordes shalbe true. Thou hast spoken to thy seruant of these benefits: begin therefor, and doe them. As also in another place, Perfume to thy seruant according to thy wordes. And all the Israelites together, so oft as they arme the selfes with remembrance of the covenant, doe sufficiently declare that wee should not pray fearfully, wheras the Lord do appointeth. And herein they followed the examples of the fathers, specially of Iacob, which after that he had confessed that he was vnworthie of so many mercies which he had received at the hand of God, yet he faith that he is encouraged to require greater things because God had promised, he would doe them. But what fouer colours the vnbelieuers do pretend, when they flee not to god so oft as necessitie preseth them, when they seeke not him nor craue his helpe, they do as much defraud him of his due honor as if they made to the selfes new Gods, & idols: for by this meanes they deny he is to them the author of all good things. On the other side, there is nothing stronger to deliuer the godly from all dount, than to be armed with this thought, that no stop ought to stay them while they obey the commandement of God, which pronounceth that nothing is more pleasing to him than obedience. Here againe that which I faide before more clearly appeareth, that a dредles spirit to pray agreeeth well with feare, reverence, and carefulnes: and that it is no absurditi to say God raiseth vp the ouerthrown. After this manner those formes of speech agree well together which in seeming are contrarie. Jeremie and Daniel say that they throwed downe prayers before God. In another place Jeremiah sayeth: Let our prayer fall downe in the sight of God, that he may have mercy on the remnant of his people. On the other side, the faithful are oftentimes said to lift vp prayer, So speaketh Ezechias, requiring the prophet to make intercession for him. And David desireth his prayer may ascend as incense. For although they being persuaded of the fatherly love of God, cheerfully commit themselves into his faithfull keeping, and doubt not to crave the help which he freely promiseth; yet doth not an idle carelessnesse lift them vp, as though they had cast away shame, but they ascend so vpward by degrees of promises, that they still remaine humble suppliants in the abatement of themselves.

Here are questions objected more than one. For the scripture reporteth that the Lord granted certaine desires which yet brake forth of a mind not quiet nor well framed. Verily for a just cause: Joatham had allowed the inhabitants of Sichem to the destruction which afterward came vpon the: but yet God kindled with furiousnesse of anger & vengeance following his execution seemeth to allowe it tempered violent passions. Such heat also caried Samson when he said, Strengthen me O God, that I may take vengeance of the vncircumcised. For though there were some piece of good zeal mingled with it; yet a hote, and therefore faultie greedines of vengeance did beare rule therein. God granted it. Whereupon it seemeth that it may bee gathered, that although the prayers be not framed according to the prescribed rule of the word, yet they obtaine their effect. I answer first that a general law is not taken away by singular examples: again, some time special motions have bene put into a few men, whereby it came to passe, there was another consideration of them than of the common people. For answer of Christ is to be noted, when the disciples did vndiscreetly desire to counterfeit the example of Elias; they knewe not with what spirite they were ended. But we must go yet further, and say that the prayers do not alway pleasfe God which he granted; but that, so much as serveth for example that is by elere praise made plaine which the scripture teacheth, namely that he succoureth the miserable, heareth the gronings of them which being vnjustly troubled do crave his helpe: that therefore hee executeth his judgements, when the complaints of the poore rife vp to him, although they be vnworthie to obtaine any thing beit neuer so little. For how oft hath hee taking vengeance of the cruelties, robberies, violence, filthy lustes, & other wicked doings of vngodly, subdueing their boldnesse & rage, & also overthrowing their tyrannous power, testifying he helpheth the vnworthily oppressed, which yet did bear the airc with praying to an vnscertaine godhead: And one Psalm plainly teacheth that the prayers want not effect, which yet do not pearce into heauen by faith. For he gathereth together those prayers which necessitie wringeth no leffe out of the vnbelieuers than out of the godly by the verie feeling of nature: to which yet he proueth by the effect that God is favourable. Is it because he doth with such gentlenes testifie that they be pleasing to him: No. But to enlarge or to set out his mercy by this circumstance, for that even to vnbelieuers their prayers are not denied: and then the more to proue forward his true worshippers to pray, when they they see that prophane wailings sometime want not their effect. Yet there is no cause why the faithfull should swarne from the lawe layd vpon them by God, or should enuie the vnbelieuers, as though they had gotten some great gaine, when they have obtained their desire. After this manner we haue layd, that the Lord was bowed with the repentance of Achab, that he might theewe by this example howe eafe he is to entreate twardes his elect, when true turning is brought to appease him. Therefore in the Psalm he blameth the Iewes, that they hauing by experience proued him so easy to grant their prayers, yet within a little after returned to the stubborneffe of their nature. Which also plainly appeareth by the historie of the Judges: namely that so oft as they wept, although their teares were deceitfull, yet they were delievered out of the handes of their enemies. As therefore the Lord indifferently bringeth soure his sunne vpon the good and the euill: so doth he also not despite their weepinges, whose cause is righteous and their miseries worthy of helpe. In the meane time he no more heareth these to satisfaction, than herein ministrith foode to the despiers of his goodnes. The question seemeth to be somewhat harder of Abraham and Samuel: of whom the one being warrantied by no word of God, prayed for the Sodomites: the other against a manifest forbidding prayed for Saul. Likewise is it of Jeremie, which prayed that the citie might not be destroyed. For though their requests were denied, yet it seemeth hard to take faith from them. But this solution shall (as I truut) satisfie sober readers: that they being instructed with the generall principles, whereby God commandeth them to be miraculous euens also to the vnworthy, were not altogether without faith, although in a speciall case their opinion deceived them. Augustine writeth wisely in a certaine place. Howe(fayth he) do the holy ones pray by faith, to aske of God contrarie to that which he hath decreed? Even because they pray according to his will: not that hidden and vnchangeable will, but the will which he inspirith into them, that he may heare them after an other maner: as he wisely maketh difference. This is well saide: because after his incomprehensible counsel he so tempereth the successe of things, y the prayers of the holy ones be not voyde which are wrapped both with faith and errorre together. Neither yet ought this more to auaile to be an example to followe, than it excuseth the holy ones themselves, whom I denie not to have passed measure. Wherefore where appeareth no certaine promise, wee must aske of God with a condition adiogned. To which purpose serveth that saying of David. Watch to the judgement which thou haft commannded: because he tolleth that he was warrantied by a speciall oracle to ask a temporall benefit.

16 This also it is profitable to note, that those thinges which I haue spoken of the lower rules of right prayer, are not so exactly required with extreme rigor, that God refueth the prayers in which he shall not finde either perfect faith or perfect repentance together with a ferventnes of zeal and well ordered requestes. We haue said that although prayer be a familiar talke of the godly with God, yet we must kepe a reverence & modestie, that wee giue not loose rein to all requestes whatsoever they be, and that wee desire no more, than God giueth leave: and then, leaft the maiestie of God should growe in contempt with vs, that we must lift our mindes vpwarde to a pure and undefiled worshipping of him. This no man hath ever performed with such purenesse as it ought to bee. For (to speake nothing of the common fort) how many complaintes of Davids do sauer of vntemperance: not that he meant of purpose to quarell with God, or carpe against his judg-

should pray to escape the punishment of the judge. Cheefely the feeblenes or imperfection of faith corrupteth the prayers of the faithfull, vnlesße the tender mercie of God did helpe them. But it is no meruel that God pardonneth this default, which doeth oftentimes exercise them that bee his with sharp instructions, as if he should of purpose quench their faith. This is a most hard tentation, when the faithful are compelled to criε: how long wilt thou be angrie vpon the praiere of thy creatures, as though the veric prayers made God more angrie. So when Jeremie faith: The Lorde hath shut out my prayer, it is no dout that he was flaken with a violent pange of trouble. Innumerable such examples are commonly found in the scriptures, by which appearcth the faith of the holy ones was oftentimes mingled & tossed with doubtings, that in beleewing & hoping they bewrayed yet some vnfaithfullnes; but because they come not so far as it is to be wished, they ought to indeunt so much the more that their faultes being amended, they may dayly come neerer to a perfect rule of praying, & in the mean time to seele in how great a depth of euils they bee drowned, which euin in the very remedies do get to themselves new diseases: fith there is no prayer, which the Lord doth not worthlie loth, vnlesße he winke at the spots wherewith they are all be sprinkled. I rehearfe not these things this end the faithfull should carelesly pardon themselves any thing, but iy in sharply chastising themselves they shold trauel to overcome these ftope, and although Satan labour to stop vp all the wayes, that he may kepe them from praying, yet nevertheles they should breake through, being certaynly perswaded, that although they bee not vn-cumbred of all hinderances, yet their indeuours doe please God, and their prayers are allowed of him, to that they trauel and bend themselves thitherward, whither they do not by and by attaine.

17 But forasmuch as there is no man worthie to present himselfe to God, and to come into his sight: the heavenly Father himselfe to deliver vs both from shame and feare which shoulde have throwne downe all our courages, hath giuen to vs his son Iesus Christ our Lorde, to be an advocate and mediator with him for vs, by whose leading we may boldly come to him, trusting that we have such an interestor, nothing shall be denied vs which we ask in his name, as nothing can be denied him of the father. And herewith must all bee referred whatsoever we have heretofore taught concerning faith: because as the promise is teeth out vnto vs Christ for our Mediator, so vnlesße our hope of obeyning stay vpon him, it taketh from it selfe y benefite of praying. For soone as the terrible majestie of God commeth in our minde, it is impossible but that we should tremble for feare, and the acknowledging of our own vnworthinesse shoulde drive vs farre away, till Christ come meanely betwene vs and him, which may change the thron of dreadfull glorie into the thron of grace: as also the Apostle teacheth that we may be bolde to appeare with all confidence which shall obteine mercy and finde grace in helpe comming in his feacon. And as there is a lawe fet y weshoulde call upon God like as there is a promise giuen, that they shal be heare which call upon him; so are we peculiarly commanded to call vpon him in the name of Christ, & we have a promise set forth, y weshall obtaine y which we shal ask in his name. Hither to (faith he)yee have not asked any thing in

Tim. 1.5
in my name: ask ye and ye shall receive. In that day ye shall ask in my name, and whatsoever ye ask, I will do, that the father may be glorified in the sonne. Hereby it is plain without controversy, that they which call upon God in any other name than of Christ, do stubbornly break his commandements, and regard his will as nothing, and that they have no promise to obeye any thing. For (as Paul saith) all the promises of God are in Christ, yea and Amen, that is to say, they are confirmed and fulfilled.

18 And the circumstance of the time is diligently to be marked, where Christ commanded his disciples to flee to intercession to him, after that he is gone up into heaven. In that hour (faith he) ye shall ask in my name. It is certain that even from the beginning none were heard that prayed, but by means of the mediator. For this reason the Lord had ordained in the law, that the Priest alone entering into the sanctuary, should bear upon his shoulders the names of the tribes of Israel, and as many precious stones before his breast; but the people should stand a farre of in the porch, and from thence should they use their prayers with the priest. Yea and the sacrifice was aUAiled hereto, that the prayers should be made sure and of force. Therefore that shadowish ceremony of the law taught that we are all shut out from the face of God, and that therefore wee neede a Mediator, which may appeare in our name, and may bear vs upon his shouldres, and holde vs fast bound to his brest, that we may be heard in his person; then by sprinkeling of blood our prayers are cleansed, which (as we haue alreadie said) are neuer voyde of filthinesse. And wee see that the holy ones, when they desired to obeye any thing, grounded their hope upon sacrifices, because they knewe them to bee the establishments of all requestes. Let him remember thy offering (faith David) and make thy burnt offering fat. Hereupon is gathered God hath bin from the beginning appeased by the intercession of Christ, to receive the prayers of the godlie. Why then doth Christ appoint a newe heire, when his Disciples shall beginne to pray in his name, but because this grace, as it is at this day more glorious, so doth much more commendation with vs. And in this same sense he had saide a little before. Hitherto yee haue not asked any thing in my name, nowe ask. Not that they understand nothing at all of the office of the Mediator (whereas all the Iewes were instructed in the principles) but because they had not yet clearly knowne that Christ by his ascended into heaven, should be a surer patron of the Church than hee was before. Therefore to comfort their griefe of his absence with some speciall fruite, hee claimeth to him selfe the office of an advocare, and teacheth that they haue hitherto wanted the chief benefite, which it shall bee graunted them to enjoye, when being ayded by his mediation, they shall more freely call upon GOD: as the Apostle saith that his newe way is dedicate in his bloode. And so much lesse excusable is our frowardnesse, vnlesse we doe with both armes (as the saying is) embrace so inestimable a benefite, which is properly appointed for vs.

19 Nowe whereas he is the onely way, and the onely entrie by which it is graunted vs to come in vnto God; who so doe sware from this way and forsake this entrie, for the there remaineth no way nor entrie to God: there is

is nothing left in his throne but wrath, judgement, and terror. Finally this the Father hath marked him for our head, and guide, which they do in any wise swarne or go away from him, do labour as much as in them lieth to race out and disfigure the mark which God hath imprinted. So Christ is let to be the only Mediator, by whose intercession the Father may be made to vs favorable and ease to be entreated. Howe be it in the meane time the holy ones have their intercessions left to them, whereby they doe mutually commende the saffetic one of an other to God, of which the Apostle maketh me-tion: but those be such as hange vpon that one onely intercession: so fare is it of, that they minish anything of it. For as they spring out of the affection of love, wherewith we embrace one an other, as the members of one body: so they are also referred to the vnitie of the head. Sith therefore they also are made in the name of Christ, what doe they else but testifie that no man can be holpen by any prayers at all, but with the intercession of Christ? And as Christ with his intercession withstandeth not, but that in the Church we may with prayers be advocates one for an other: so let this remaine certaine, that all the intercessors of the whole Church ought to be directed to that only one. Yea and for this cause we ought specially to beware of vnthankesfullnes, because God pardoning our vnworthines, doth not only giue leave to every one of vs to pray for himselfe, but also adimiteth vs to be entreaters one of an other. For, where God appointeth advocates for his Church which deferue worthily to be rejected if they pray privatly eye-ry one for himselfe: what a pride were it to abuse this libertie to darken the honour of Christ?

20 Now it is a meere trifling, which the Sophistlers babble, that Christ is the Mediator of redemption, but the faithfull are Meditators of intercession. As though Christ having performed a Mediation for a time, hath giuen to his servantes that eternall Mediatorshippe which shall never die. Full curreently forfooth they handle him, that cutte away fo little a portion of honour from him. But the Scripture saith farre otherwise, with the simplicitie whereof a godly man ought to be contented, leaving these deceivers. For where Iohn faith, that if any doe sinne, we haue an advocate with the Father, Christ Iesus: doth he meane that he was once in olde time a patron for vs, and not rather assigneth to him an everlafting intercession?
Howe say we to this that Paul also affirmeth, that he sitteth at the right hand of GOD the Father and maketh intercession for vs? And when in an other place he calleth him the onely Mediator of God and men: meaneth he not of prayers, of which he had a litlle before made mention? For when he had before sayde that intercession must be made for all men: for proofe of that saying, he by and by addeth, that of all men there is one God and one Mediator. And none otherwise doth Augustine expounde it, when he faith thus: Christians men do mutually commend themselves in their prayers. Par. 2, ca. 1 But he for whom none maketh intercession, but he for all, hec is the onely and true Mediator. Paul the Apostle, though he were a principal member under the head (yet becaufe he was a member of the body of Christe, and knewe that the greatest and truest priest of the Church entred, not by a figure, into the inwarde places of the vail, to the holy of holy places,
Cap. 20. Of the manner how to receive

Rom. 15. 16. but by express, and most true, into the innermost places of heaven, to a holiness not shadowy but eternal) commendeth himself also to the prayers of the faithfull. Neither doth he make himselfe a Mediator between the people and God, but prayeth that all the members of the body of Christ should mutually pray for him: because the members are careful one for another: and if one member suffer, the other suffereth with it. And that so the mutual prayers one for another of all the members yet traualing in earth, may ascende to the head which is gone before into heaven, in whom is appeasement for our finnes.

For if Paul were a Mediator, the other Apostles should also be Mediators: and if there were many Mediators, then neither should Pauls owne reason stand fast, in which he had said, For there is one God, one Mediator of one GOD and mee, the man Christe, in whom we also are one: if we keep the vision of faith in the bond of peace.

Again in another place. But if thou seek for a Priest, he is aboue the heauen, where hee maketh intercession for thee, which in earth dyed for thee. Yet doe we not dreamed that hee falleth downe at the fathers knees and in humble wise entreateth for vs: but we understande with the Apostle, that hee do appear before the face of GOD, that the vertue of his death availeth to be a perpetuall intercession for vs: yet so that being entered into the sanctuarie of heauen, unto the ende of the ages of the world he alone carrieth to God the prayers of the people abiding a farre off in the porch.
